ly Spirit, and of obedience to God's commandments, as the effect and evidence of justifying faith, with other doctrines of similar importance, would, after proper admonition, be rejected by the pastors of the church, and excluded from the communion of believers. No doubt would remain in their minds, that such heretics were subverted, and sinned, and their profession of tenets so destructive of Christianity, would be deemed a kind of 'self-condemnation,' without considering them as less sincere in opposing the truth, than Saul of Tarsus was. They would not judge them proper persons to associate with those who believed the doctrines of Christianity; but yet they would not do them any injury in their temporal concerns, or refuse to aid them in distress, or neglect to pray for 'God to give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth.' The connexion, which has so long subsisted, between excommunication and persecution, has aided in giving occasion to a latitudinarian candor, and a laxity of discipline, to associate with men's ideas of toleration. But the fullest toleration does not imply, that all opinions should be regarded as alike right or probable; nor does excommunication imply, that any alteration should be made in men's civil circumstances. Mat. 18:15—18. 1 Cor. 5:1—5, 9—13. 2 John 7—11. Rev. 2:20—23. Some learned and ingenious men have indeed at length discovered, that it is no sin to treat the Word of God with neglect, contempt, or proud opposition, and that it is of little consequence what doctrines men believe! No wonder, then, that they cannot explain the Scripture into an agree-

FRACT. OBS. It has at all times been necessary, to remind Christians 'to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates,' and 'to submit to one another in the fear of God;' Eph. 5:21. 1 Pet. 5:5-7, but it is peculiarly so at present, when most valuable privileges and liberties in this favored land, which ought to have rendered cheerful subjection and peaceable obedience universal, among all who 'name the name of Christ,' have given occasion to a contrary spirit and conduct in numbers, who seem to forget, that most express precepts to this effect are found in the Scriptures.—We shall not, when really humbled and enlightened, disdain, or be wearied out by the misconduct of, the most unreasonable enemies, because we shall well remember, that we ourselves were formerly 'foolish, disobedient, and deceived, slaves to divers' base lusts, and a fondness for carnal pleasures, 'that we lived in malice and envy,' and in short were hateful to God, and disposed to hate one another, and thus 'vessels of wrath fitted for destruction,' till divine ment with these tenets, or bring the Word of God to declare its own insignificance. But those who believe, that 'men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil,' and treat the truth of God as a lie, because it opposes their pride or lusts, will not find much difficulty in understanding, why such heretics should be separated from the society of believers; and they will chiefly lament, that it is not more generally practised, and more easily practicable, seeing it is evident, 'that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump,' in many churches which once seemed to flourish. All real Christians have sympathy of feeling. 'The object of a Christian church is, the promotion of holiness in the souls of its members, and in the souls of others,—to advance the kingdom of Christ, and prepare themselves and others the better for the day of judgment. Now, though each man enters voluntarily, and all are under law, yet they have no right whatever to make laws for themselves; they

'The cavalry, without which the legion would have been imperfect, was divided into 10 troops, or squadrons; the 1st, as the companion of the 1st cohort, consisted of 132 men; while each of the other 9 amounted only to 65. The whole formed a regiment of 725 horse, naturally connected with its respective legion, but occasionally separated to act in the line, and to compose a part of the wings of the army. The cavalry of the ancient republic was made up of the noblest youths, who, by the service, prepared for the offices of senator and consul; and solicited, by deeds of valor, the future siffages of their countrymen; but the emperor's cavalry had officers from those of the equestrian rank, who joined the army. They despised the complete armor, with which the cavalry of the East (cul, Jer. 6:23.) was encumbered. Their more useful arms consisted in a helmet, an oblong shield, light boots, and a coat of mail. A javelin and a long broadsword, were their principal weapons of offence. The use of lances and iron maces they seem to have borrowed from the barbarians.

'Among the auxiliaries, about equal in numbers to the legionaries, the bravest and most faithful were placed under the command of prefects [Act. 28:16.] and centurions, and severely trained in the Roman discipline; the others retained their national arms, and thus the army was prepared to meet all enemies and all weapons. Each legion, too, had 10 of the largest, and 55 smaller engines, which discharged stones and darts with irresistible violence.

'The camp of a Roman legion presented the appearance of a fortified city. As soon as the space was marked out, the pioneers carefully levelled the ground, and removed every impediment that might interrupt its perfect regularity. Its form was an exact quadrangle; and we may calculate, that a square of about 7000 yards was sufficient for the encampment of 20,000 Romans; though a similar number of our own are not easily and soon to be given up and cast off, but competent time and means must be tried for their recovery. 3. The church's means even with heretics are persuasive and rational; so much the word imports. 4. Upon continued obstinacy and irreclaimableness, the church has power, and is obliged to preserve its own purity, by severing such a corrupt member; which discipline may, by God's blessing, become effectual to reform the offender, or leave him the more inexcusable in his condemnation.

The apostle subjoins some further directions.

V. 12, 13. Here are two personal things enjoined:

1. That Titus should hold himself ready to come to Paul at Nicopolis, (a city of Thrace, as is reckoned, on the borders of Macedonia,) so soon as Artemas or Tychicus should be sent to Crete, to supply his place, and take care of the churches there when he should leave them. Titus, it seems, was not their ordinary fixed bishop* or pastor, but an evangelist, otherwise Paul would not have called him so much from his charge. Of Artemas we read little, but Tychicus is mentioned on many occasions with respect. When Paul says to Titus, Be diligent to come to me to Nicopolis, for I have determined there to winter, it is plain the epistle was not written from Nicopolis, as the postscript would have it, for then he would have said, I determined here, not there, to winter.

2. The other personal charge to Titus, is, that he would bring two of his friends on their journey diligently, and see them furnished. This was to be done, not as a piece of common civility only, but of Christian piety, out of respect both to them and the work they were sent about, probably to preach the Gospel, or to be some way serviceable to the churches. Zenas is styled the lawyer, whether in reference to the Roman or the Mosaic law, is doubtful. Apollos was an eminent and faithful minister. He repeats here,

V. 14, 15. Let Christians, those who have believed in God, learn to maintain good works, especially such as these, supporting ministers in their work of preaching and spreading the Gospel. That they be not unfruitful. Christianity is not a fruitless profession; it is not enough that the professors of it be harmless, but they must be profitable, doing good, as well as eschewing evil. 'Let ours maintain some honest employment, to provide for themselves and their families, that they be not unprofitable;' so some. To maintain good works for necessary uses; not living like drones, on the labors of others, but themselves fruitful to the common benefit.

grace effected the blessed change. Let us then often contemplate the discoveries, which have been made of the 'kindness and love of God our Savior,' towards our fallen, apostate race, in 'giving his Son to be the propitiation for our sins,' his patience in sparing us, during the years of our foolishness and rebellion; his goodness in sending us the Word of salvation, and to crown the whole, his mercy in causing us to partake of the 'washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured upon' our souls, of his plenteous grace, through Jesus Christ our Savior. Having been therefore brought into a state of safety, and made partakers of a joyful hope, by the mercy of God the Father, through the redemption of his incarnate Son, and by the new creation of the Holy Spirit, it certainly behooves us to 'take the lead in every good work,' by which we can glorify God our Savior, or benefit mankind. must both form and govern the association, by the laws which Christ has made for them. A willingness to obey his laws, gives a man a right to admission. So long as this willingness continues, he has a right to remain. No one but Christ has any right to impose laws upon him. So long as he obey Christ, he is free of his brethren, as much as they are of him. Men, by uniting in a church with their fellow-disciples, promise merely to obey Christ. They surrender to each other no right to make laws for each other. They claim no right to enforce any laws, but the laws of Christ; and to attempt to enforce any other, is to violate the spirit of the association. . . . A temper of heart, then, to obey Christ in all He has revealed, makes one a member of the holy catholic church. But, besides this, there are various points of practical obedience, in respect to which real disciples may differ; and this difference, though it do not designate a different temper of heart, yet may nevertheless render it suitable and proper, that those who think alike should associate more especially with each other. . . . Hence arises the division of the church into different sects, as the natural and healthy result of that freedom of opinion, which springs from Protestantism. Practically, then, he who possesses such temper of mind as Christ has commanded, and such harmony of views in regard to external rites and minor observances, as may enable men to unite in the ordinances they feel bound to observe, is qualified for admission to a church of any sect in particular. . . . But, if I show myself destitute of love to God and man by a life of sordid selfishness, I ought to be excluded; while, so long as I do not evince that I am destitute of the right temper of heart, I am held guiltless.' Wayland. Ed.

troops would expose to the enemy a front of more than treble that extent. In the midst of the camp, the pætorium, or general's quarters, rose above the others; the cavalry, the infantry, and the auxiliaries, occupied their respective stations; the streets were broad and perfectly straight, and a vacant space of 200 feet was left on all sides, between the tents and the rampart. The rampart itself was usually 12 feet high, armed with a line of strong and intricate palisades, and defended by a ditch of 12 feet in depth as well as in breadth. This important labor was performed by the hands of the legionaries themselves; to whom the use of the spade and pick-axe was no less familiar than that of the sword or pila. Active valor may often be the present of nature; but such patient diligence can be the fruit only of habit and discipline.

'Whenever the trumpet [1 Cor. 14:3.] gave the signal for departure, the camp was almost instantly broken up, and the troops fell into their ranks without delay or confusion. Beside their arms, which the legionaries scarcely considered as an incumbrance, they were laden with their kitchen furniture, the instruments of fortification, and the provision of many days. [Note, end of Jer.] Under this weight, which would oppress the delicacy of a modern soldier, they were trained by a regular step to advance in about 6 hours, near 29 miles. [Comp. Paul's phrase, 'endure hardness as a soldier,' 2 Tim. 2:3.] On the appearance of an enemy, they threw aside their baggage, and, by easy and rapid evolutions, converted the columns of march into an order of battle. The slingers and archers skirmished in the front; the auxiliaries formed the first line, and were seconded or sustained by the strength of the legions; the cavalry covered the flanks, and the military engines were placed in the rear.

'Such were the arts of war, by which the Roman emperors defended their extensive conquests, and preserved a military spirit, at a time when every other (?) virtue was oppressed by luxury and despotism.'

PAUL'S EPISTLE TO PHILEMON,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. J. Smith.)

THIS epistle to Philemon is placed the last of those with the name of Paul to them, perhaps because the shortest, and of an argument peculiar and different from all the others; yet such as the Spirit of God, who indited it, saw would, in its kind, be very instructive and useful in the churches. The occasion of it was this,—Philemon, one of note, and probably a minister in the church of Colosse, a city of Phrygia, had a servant named Onesimus, who, having purloined his goods, ran away from him, and, in his rambles, came to Rome, where Paul was then a prisoner for the Gospel; and providentially coming under his preaching there, was, by the blessing of God, converted by him; after which, he ministered awhile to the apostle in bonds, and might have been further useful to him; but he, understanding him to be another man's servant, would not, without his consent, detain him, but sends him back with this letter commendatory, wherein he earnestly sues for his pardon and kind reception.

Observe, here, 1. The goodness and mercy of God to a poor, wandering sinner, bringing him by his gracious providence under the means, and making them effectual to his conversion.

2. The great and endeared affection between a true convert and him whom God used to be the instrument of his conversion.

3. The tender and good spirit of this blessed apostle Paul. How pathetic a letter does he here write in Onesimus' behalf! Scarcely any argument is forgotten, that could possibly be used in the case; and all pressed with such force, that had it been the greatest favor to himself that he was asking, he could not have used more.

4. The remarkable providence of God in preserving such a short writing as this, that might be thought of little concern to the church, being not only a letter to a particular person, but of a private, personal matter, namely, the receiving of a poor fugitive servant into the favor and family of his injured master. What in this is there that concerns the common salvation? And yet over this has there been a special divine care, it being given (as the other scriptures were) by inspiration of God, and, in some sort, as they are, profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness. God would have extant a proof and instance of his rich and free grace, for the encouragement and comfort of the meanest and vilest of sinners, looking to Him for mercy and forgiveness; and for instruction to ministers and others not to despise any, as if they were utter cast-aways; but rather to attempt their conversion, hoping they may be saved; likewise how to behave toward them. And on their part, how they must be humble and grateful, acknowledging God and his instruments, in what good they have received, ready to all suitable returns, making what reparation they can in case of injuries, and living a life of thankfulness and obedience. To such purposes may this epistle have been written and preserved. HENRY.

Philemon seems to have been a Christian of some eminence, residing at Colosse, 1, 2. Col. 4:9, 17, who had been converted under Paul's ministry, 19.; perhaps during his abode at Ephesus. Acts 19:10.—The most competent judges have given it [this letter] a decided preference, as a model of good writing in the epistolary kind,* to the most admired remains of antiquity. [Comp. Suppl. on Philemon.] Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, how such a cause, as that of Onesimus', could have been pleaded in a more interesting, obliging, prudent, pathetic, and masterly manner. It is also very replete with useful instruction.—The apostle entertained no doubt of Philemon's compliance with his request; and expected that he would do more than he said. It is therefore probable, that Onesimus was not only received into favor, but set at liberty; and it is generally thought, that he became afterwards a minister of the Gospel. Onesimus accompanied Tychicus to Colosse, and it may be concluded, that the apostle wrote to Philemon at the same time; and that Onesimus, having delivered the letter to his master, and obtained his forgiveness, joined with Tychicus, in executing the apostle's commission to the Colossians. SCOTT.

* Paley remarks on the singular correspondence between this epistle and that to the Colossians. Though the subject did not lead to treat so directly of the doctrines or precepts of Christianity in this as in the other epistles, yet we meet with several allusions to different parts of the Christian plan, interwoven in an easy and natural manner with the rest of the letter. HENRY, abr.—It is impossible to read over this admirable epistle without being touched with the delicacy of sentiment, and the masterly address that appear in every part of it. We see here, in a most striking light, how perfectly consistent true politeness is, not only with all the warmth and sincerity of the friend, but even with the dignity of the Christian and the apostle. And if this letter were to be considered in no other view than as a mere human composition, it must be allowed a master-piece in its kind. Compare Pliny's epistle; which, though written on a similar occasion, and by one reckoned to excel in the epistolary style, and though it has many beauties, yet must be acknowledged, by every impartial reader, vastly inferior to this animated composition of the apostle. DODDR.

V. 1, 2. In these two vs. of preface are the persons from and to whom it is written, with some annexed note or title, implying somewhat of argument to the purpose of the letter.

1. The persons writing: Paul the principal, and Timothy as second, or concurring. Paul calls himself a prisoner of Jesus Christ, i. e. for Jesus Christ. A petition from such petitioners, surely, would be tenderly regarded by a believer and minister of Christ. What could be denied them?

2. The persons written to, Philemon, Apphia, and Archippus, with the church in Philemon's house. Philemon, to whom the letter is inscribed, was the head of the family, in whom were the authority and power of taking in or shutting out, and whose property Onesimus was; with him, therefore, chiefly lay the business: a good man, and probably a minister, and on both accounts dearly beloved by Paul. With Philemon, Apphia is joined, probably his yoke-fellow; and having a concern in the domestic affairs, the apostle directs to her likewise. She was a party offended and injured by Onesimus, and therefore proper to be noticed in a letter for reconciliation and forgiveness. Justice and prudence would direct Paul to this express notice of her, who might be helpful in furthering the good ends of his writing. She is set before Archippus, as more concerned, and having more interest. These are the principal parties written to. The less principal are, Archippus, and the church in Philemon's house. Archippus was a minister in the church of Colosse, Philemon's friend, and probably co-pastor with him; Paul might think him one whom Philemon would advise with, and, therefore, fit to put in the inscription of the letter, with the adjunct of fellow-soldier. To these it is added, And to the church in thy house, his whole family, in which the worship of God was kept up, so that he had, as it were, a church in his house. Observe, Families which generally may be most pious and orderly, may yet have one or other in them impious and wicked. This was the aggravation of Onesimus' sin, that it was where he might and should have learned better; it is likely he was secret in his misconduct, till his flight discovered him. No doubt Philemon had taught him better. For the religious worship and order kept up in it, his house is called a church; and such should all families be,—nurseries of religion, societies where God is called on, his Word read, sabbaths observed, and the members instructed in the knowledge of Him, and of their duty to Him; neglect of this is followed with ignorance and all corruption.

NOTES. V. 1, 2. The apostle did not intend to write authoritative to Philemon, and therefore he only styled himself 'a prisoner of Jesus Christ;' 8—11. Eph. 3:1—7. 4:1—6. Though Philemon is called a 'fellow-laborer,' it is not certain he was a minister; perhaps he served the cause of Christ by active diligence in another manner. (Note, Phil. 4:1—3.) The beloved Apphia is generally supposed to have been his wife, though some think she was his sister. Archippus, Col. 4:17. is thought to have been the son or near relation of Philemon. SCOTT.

6 That <sup>g</sup> the communication of thy faith may become effectual <sup>b</sup> by the acknowledging of every <sup>i</sup> good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus.

7 For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed <sup>j</sup> by thee, brother.

8 Wherefore, though <sup>k</sup> I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient,

9 Yet for love's sake I rather beseech <sup>l</sup> thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ;

10 I beseech thee for my son <sup>m</sup> Onesimus, whom I have begotten <sup>n</sup> in my bonds:

Philemon's house was a church: and Paul, for some concern all might have in this matter of Onesimus', directs to them all; that their affection, as well as Philemon's, might return to him; and that in their way and place they might further, and not hinder, the reconciliation wished and sought. Desirable it is, that all in a family be well affected towards one another, for furthering their particular and the common good and benefit of all. Next to this inscription is, the apostle's salutation of those named by him.

V. 3. This is the token in every epistle; so the apostle writes. And in this is summarily all good, and from this one Fountain, God, the Father, Son, and Spirit, all comes; for the Holy Spirit also is understood, though not named. After this salutation of the apostle to Philemon, and his friends and family, for better making way still for his suit to him,

He expresses the singular affection he had for him, by thanksgiving and prayer to God in his behalf, and the great joy for the many good things he knew and heard to be in him, in the four next following verses.

V. 4-7. The apostle's thanksgiving and prayer here for Philemon, are set forth by the object, circumstance, and matter of them, with the way whereby much of the knowledge of Philemon's goodness came to Him.

1. Here is the object of Paul's praises and prayers for Philemon. Observe, It is the privilege of good men, that in their praises and prayers they come to God as their God: Our God, we thank thee, said David; and I thank my God, said Paul. We should offer prayer and praise, not for ourselves only, but for others, also; we must be affected with joy and thankfulness for any good in them, or done by them, or bestowed on them, as far as is known to us, and seek for them what they need. In this lies no little part of the communion of saints. Paul, in his private thanksgivings and prayers, was often particular in remembering his friends; and this is a mean of exercising love, and obtaining good for others. Strive with me, by your prayers to God for me, said the apostle: and what he desired for himself he surely practiced on behalf of others; so should all. Pray one for another, says James, 5: 16.

2. Here is the circumstance; Always making mention of thee. Always, usually, not once or twice only, but frequently. So must we remember Christian friends, much and often, as their case may need, bearing them in our thoughts, and on our hearts, before our God.

3. Here is the matter both of his praises and prayers, in reference to Philemon.

He thanks God for the love which he heard Philemon had toward the Lord Jesus, and for his faith in Christ, also. He praises God likewise for his love to all the saints. And the two must go together. Thus he joins them, in Col. 1:3, 4. Different sentiments and ways in what is not essential, will not make difference of affection, as to the truth; though difference in the degrees of love will be according as more or less of that image is discerned. Mere external differences are nothing here. Paul calls a poor converted slave his bowels. We must love, as God does, all saints. This was what he inquired after concerning his friends, the truth, and growth, and fruitfulness of their graces, their faith in Christ, and love to Him and to all the saints. Therefore,

(2.) The apostle joins prayer with his praises, that the fruits of Philemon's faith and love might be more and more conspicuous, so as that the communication of them might constrain others to the acknowledgment of all the good things that were in him and in his house toward Christ Jesus, v. 6.

4. He adds a reason, both that of his prayer and praises, v. 7. The good thou hast done and still doest, is abundant matter of joy and comfort to me and others, who therefore desire ye may continue and abound in such good fruits more and more, to God's honor and the credit of religion, 2 Cor. 9: 12.

Thus far, the preface. Now comes the main business,—to plead with Philemon in behalf of Onesimus, to receive him and be reconciled to him. Many arguments he urges to this purpose, from v. 8. to 21. inclusive.

V. 8, 9. Here, the 1st Argument, from what was before noted, is carried in the illative wherefore, v. 8. 'Seeing so much good is reported of thee, and found in thee, especially thy love to all saints, now let me see it on a fresh and further occasion, in forgiving and receiving him who is now a convert, and so a saint indeed, and meet for thy favor and love. Observe, A disposition to do good, together with past instances and expressions of it, is a good handle to take hold on for pressing unto more.

2d Argument, is, from the authority of him now making this request, I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient. The apostles had, under Christ, great power in the church over the ordinary ministers, and were to be obeyed; which Philemon should consider; but the apostle would not in this instance act up to it. Observe, Ministers, whatever their power, are to use prudence in the exercise of it, godly wisdom and discretion. Wherefore, this may be a

3d Argument, Waving the authority, he chooses to entreat, v. 9. Observe, It is no disparagement for those who have power, sometimes even to beseech, where, in strictness of right, they might command; so does Paul, here, which doubtless must carry engaging influence with it. And especially which may be a

4th Argument, When any circumstance of the person pleading gives additional force to his petition, as here; Being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ. Years bespeak respect; and the motions of such, in things lawful and fit, should be received with regard. The request of an aged apostle, and now suffering for Christ and his Gospel, should be tenderly considered. He makes also a 5th Argument, from the spiritual relation now between Onesimus and himself.

V. 10. 'Though of right, and in civil respect, he be thy servant; yet in a spiritual sense he is now a son to me, God having made me the instrument of his conversion, even here where I am a prisoner for Christ's sake.' The apostle lays an emphasis here: My son whom I have begotten in my bonds; he was dear to him, and he hoped would be so to Philemon, under that consideration. And a

6th Argument, is, from Philemon's own interest.

V. 11. (1.) Observe, Unsanctified persons are unprofitable persons; they answer not the great end of their being and relations. Grace makes good for somewhat. There seems an allusion to the name Onesimus, which signifies profitable. Now he will answer to his name. It may be noted also how softly Paul here speaks! Not that Onesimus' sin was small, or that he or any would take it so; but, having been humbled for it, the apostle now would not sink his spirit by continuing to load and burden him therewith, but speaks thus tenderly with Philemon, not to make severe reflections on his servant's misconduct, but to forgive. (2.) Observe, What happy changes conver-

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rom. 1:5-7) 'Hence it appears, that the nature of the Father, and of the Son, is the same; seeing the Son can do that which the Father doeth, and the Father is said to do that which the Son doeth.' Jerome.

V. 4-7. The obvious meaning of the passage requires a transposition of the words, which arise from an arrangement, not at all unsuitable to the Gr. language, though it appears rather harsh in an English tr. The apostle also prayed, 'that the communication of Philemon's faith might become effectual, &c.' Some explain this of his liberal communication from his temporal affluence, being made 'effectual' for the relief of the saints, and for the evident demonstration of his faith, from which it sprung. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that his communion or participation of faith in Christ might be effectual in regulating his own temper and conduct. But, though both these senses may be contained in the words, they seem to have a still further meaning. The apostle probably prayed, that Philemon's endeavors to 'communicate' his faith in Christ to those around him, might be rendered effectual, through the evident excellency of his own example, and that of his family; so that men might be induced to acknowledge the reality and value 'of every good thing which was in them,' by means of their relation to Christ, and thus to entertain a favorable opinion of that religion, which produced such beneficial effects on the conduct of those who embraced it. Mat. 5:14-16. 1 Pet. 2:12. This he trusted would be the case, for he 'had great joy' and comfort, in the accounts that he heard of his liberal love, by which the urgent necessities of Christians and ministers were supplied; so that, while their bodies were refreshed at his expense, their hearts were also rejoiced by his good example and pious conversation; and therefore the apostle cordially owned him, and greatly loved him, as his brother in the Gospel. The word 'brother,' placed thus at the end of a sentence, is peculiarly emphatical, and expressive of the most entire cordiality.

V. 8-11. In the original (10) Onesimus is mentioned at the close of the sentence, that the suspense and most affectionate introduction might prepare Philemon to read a name, which could scarcely fail of being associated in his mind with unfavorable ideas. 'Onesimus' signifies, profitable; in allusion to which, the apostle allowed, that he had not formerly deserved that name, having been 'unprofitable;' probably he had been unfaithful, dishonest, and unruly, perhaps addicted to other vices. This the apostle seems to have known from his confession. Id.

(9.) Paul the aged.] About 53; so Doddr. Whitby says, about 63. And Doddr. adds, that the reader, if not satisfied with either, may take any medium between the two, as he pleases.

12 Whom I have sent again : thou therefore receive him, that is, mine own bowels ;

13 Whom I would have retained with me, that ° in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel :

14 But without thy mind would I do nothing ; that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but <sup>p</sup> willingly.

15 For <sup>q</sup> perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him for ever ;

16 Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother <sup>r</sup> beloved, specially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the <sup>s</sup> flesh, and in the Lord ?

17 If thou count me therefore a <sup>t</sup> partner, receive him as myself.

18 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account ;

19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it : albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides.

sion makes; of evil, good; of unprofitable, useful! Religious servants are a treasure in a family. Such will make conscience of their time and trusts, promoting the interests of those whom they serve, and managing all they can for the best. This then is the argument here urged; 'It will now be for thy advantage to receive him; thus changed, as he is, thou mayest expect him a dutiful and faithful servant, though in time past he was not so.' Whereupon, as a 7th Argument, He urges Philemon from the strong affection he had to Onesimus. He had mentioned the spiritual relation before, my son begotten in my bonds; and now he signifies how dear he was to him.

V. 12. 'I love him as I do myself, and have sent him back to thee for this end, that thou shouldst receive him; do it therefore for my sake, receive him as one thus dear to me.' Observe, Even good men may sometimes need great earnestness and entreaty to lay their passions, let go their resentments, and forgive those who have injured and offended them. Some have thought Philemon, being a Phrygian, might perhaps be naturally of a rough and difficult temper, and thence need no little pains in touching all the springs that might move him to forgiveness and reconciliation; but rather should we strive to be like God, who is slow to anger, and ready to forgive, and abundant in pardons. And again, an 8th Argument, is, from the apostle's denying himself in sending back Onesimus; though he might have presumed on Philemon's leave to detain him longer, yet he would not.

V. 13, 14. Now in prison, Paul wanted a friend or servant to assist him, and therefore would have detained Onesimus; Philemon himself, he might have presumed, had he requested it, would not have refused; much less would he be unwilling his servant should assist him in his stead; yet Paul would not take this liberty. Observe, Good deeds are most acceptable to God and man, when done with most freedom. And Paul herein, notwithstanding his apostolical power, would show what regard he had to civil rights, which Christianity does by no means supersede or weaken, but rather confirm and strengthen. He might indeed have presumed on Philemon's willingness; but, notwithstanding his need, he would deny himself rather than take that way. And he argues further;

9th Argument, That such a change was now wrought in Onesimus, that Philemon needed not fear his ever running from him, or injuring him any more. There are those of whom Solomon says, If thou deliver them, thou must do it again, Prov. 19:19. but the change wrought in Onesimus was such, that he would never again need one thus to intercede for him.

V. 15. Charity would so hope, yea, so it would be; yet the apostle speaks cautiously, that none might be bold to make another such experiment, in expectation of a like gracious issue. Observe, In matters that may be wrested to ill, ministers must speak warily, that kind providences of God towards sinners be not abused, to encouragements to sin, or abatements of just abhorrence of it; Perhaps he therefore departed from thee for a season, &c. Observe, How softly still the sins of penitents are spoken of; he calls it a departure for a season, instead of giving it the term it deserved. When we speak of the nature of any sin or offence against God, the evil of it is not to be lessened; but, in the person of a penitent sinner, as God covers it, so must we. Such as are true penitents will not return to folly. Observe, The wisdom, goodness, and power of God, in causing that to end so happily, which was begun and carried on for some time so wickedly; thus working so good and great a change in a poor vassal, who was so far gone in evil ways, who had wronged a master so good, had run from a family so pious, from the means of grace, the church in his house; that he should be led into the way of salvation, who had fled from it, and find means made effectual at Rome, who had been hardened under them at Colosse. What riches are here of divine grace! None so low, or mean, or vile, as utterly to be despaired of. God can meet with them when running from Him; can make means effectual at one time and place, which have not been so at another. So was it in this instance of Onesimus. So God often brings gain to his people out of their losses. And beside interest, a 10th Argument is taken from the capacity under which Onesimus now would return, and must be received by Philemon.

V. 16. 'Not now as a servant, that is, not merely or so much, but above a servant, in a spiritual respect, a brother beloved, one to be owned as a brother in Christ, and to be loved as such, on account of this holy change wrought in him, and one therefore who will be useful unto thee, on better principles and in a better manner, than before. Observe, There is a spiritual brotherhood between all true believers, however differenced in civil and outward respects; they all are children of the same heavenly Father, have a right to the same spiritual privileges and benefits, must love and do all good offices to and for one another as brethren, though still in the same rank, and degree, and station, wherein they were called. Observe, Religious servants are more than mere ordinary servants; they have grace in their hearts, and have found grace in God's sight, and so will in the sight of religious masters. Good ministers love not so much according to the outward good they receive, as the spiritual good they do. Paul called Onesimus his own bowels, and other converts his joy and crown. This argument is strengthened by another, the 11th Argument, From the communion of saints.

V. 17. There is a fellowship among saints; they have interest one in another, and must love and act accordingly.

But why such concern and earnestness for a servant, a slave, and such a one as had misbehaved? Answer, Onesimus being now penitent, it was doubtless to encourage him, and to support him in returning to his master. Wise and good ministers will have great and tender care of young converts, to encourage and hearten them to their duty. Objection, But Onesimus had wronged as well as offended his master. The answer to this makes a

V. 18, 19. Here are three things:

(1.) A confession of Onesimus' debt to Philemon; If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought. It is not an if of doubting, but of illation and concession; seeing he hath wronged thee, and thereby is become indebted to thee; such an if as Col. 3:1. and 2 Pet. 2:4. &c. Observe, True penitents will be ingenuous in owning their faults, as doubtless Onesimus had been to Paul, on his being awakened, and brought to repentance; especially is this to be done in cases of injury to others. Onesimus, by Paul, owns the wrong. And,

(2.) Paul here engages for satisfaction; Put that on my account. Whence, [1.] Observe, The communion of saints does not destroy distinction of property: Onesimus, now converted, and become a brother beloved, is yet Philemon's servant still, and indebted to him for wrongs he had done, and not to be discharged but by free and voluntary remission, or on reparation made by himself, or some other in his behalf; which part, rather than fail, the apostle undertakes for him. Upon which, [2.] Observe, Suretyship is not, in all cases, unlawful, but in some, is a good and merciful undertaking. Only know the person and case; be not surety for a stranger, Prov. 11:15. and go not beyond ability. And how happy for us, that Christ would be made the Surety of a better covenant, Heb. 7:22. that He would be made Sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him! And, [3.] Observe, Formal securities by writing, as well as by word and promise, may be required and given. Persons die, and words may be forgotten or mistaken; writing better preserves right and peace, and has been in use with good persons, as well as others, in all ages, Jer. 32:9. &c. Luke 16:5-7. It was much that Paul, who lived on contributions himself, would undertake to make good all loss by an evil servant to his master; but hereby he expresses his real and great affection for Onesimus, and his full belief of the sincerity of his conversion: he might also hope, that, notwithstanding this generous offer, Philemon would not insist on it, but freely remit all; considering,

V. 12-16. Onesimus was Philemon's legal property, and Paul had required and prevailed with Onesimus to return to him, having made sufficient trial of his sincerity; and he requested Philemon to receive him, with the same kindness, as he would the aged apostle's 'own son according to the flesh'; being equally dear to him, as his spiritual child. He would gladly have kept him at Rome, but would not do anything of this kind without his consent, lest he should seem to extort the benefit, and Philemon should appear to act from 'necessity,' rather than 'from a willing mind.' 2 Cor. 9:1-7.

SCOTT.

V. 17-21. It is generally observed, that this is a plain instance of a debt, being imputed to one, which was contracted by another; and of one by a voluntary engagement becoming answerable for the misconduct of another, that the latter might be exempted from the punishment due to his crimes, and partake of benefits to which he had no right. This accords to the doctrine of Christ's voluntary bearing [of] the punishment of our sins, that we might receive the reward of his righteousness, by a reciprocal imputation.—Perhaps the apostle understood, that Philemon had expressed some sharpness concerning Onesimus' conduct, or suspicion of his sincerity in his professed repentance; or knowing him to be naturally somewhat severe in his temper, he might fear lest he should 20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refresh <sup>u</sup> my bowels in the Lord.

(3.) The reason of things between him and Philemon; 'Albeit,' &c. Modesty in self-praises is true praise. The apostle glances at the benefits he had conferred on Philemon; and intimates, that what he asked in behalf of Onesimus, would be as nothing in return. Observe, How great the endearments are between ministers and those toward whom their endeavors have been blessed to their conversion, or spiritual edification! Gal. 4:15. so, 1 Thes. 2:8. By way of allusion, this may illustrate Christ's undertaking for us: we were revolted from God, and by sin had wronged Him, but Christ undertakes to make satisfaction, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us unto God. Farther, a

13th Argument is, from the joy and comfort the apostle thereby would have on Philemon's own account, as well as that of Onesimus, in such a seasonable and acceptable fruit of Philemon's faith and obedience.

V. 20. Philemon was Paul's son in the faith, yet he entreats him as a brother; Onesimus, a poor slave, yet he solicits for him as if he were seeking some great thing for himself. How pathetic is he! 'Yea, brother, or O my brother; (it is an adverb of wishing or desiring;) let me have joy of thee in the Lord. Thou knowest that I am now a prisoner of the Lord, for his sake and cause, and need all the comfort and support that my friends in Christ can give me; now this will be joy to me; I shall have joy of thee in the Lord, as seeing such an evidence and fruit of thy own Christian faith and love, and on Onesimus' account, who hereby will be relieved and encouraged.' Refresh my bowels in the Lord. No carnal, selfish respect actuates me, but that which is pleasing to Christ, and in which He may have honor. His last, and 14th Argument, lies in his good hope and opinion which he expresses of Philemon.

V. 21. Good thoughts and expectations of us more strongly move and engage to do the things expected from us. Observe, Good persons will be ready for good works, and not narrow and pinching, but abundant in them, Isa. 32:8.

Now he comes to the conclusions; where,

1. He signifies his good hope of deliverance, through their prayers, and that shortly he might see them, desiring Philemon to make provision for him.

V. 22. But withal, or moreover. He comes to another thing, yet, as may seem, not without some eye to the matter he had been upon, that might be furthered by this intimation, that he hoped he should himself soon follow, and know the effect. (1.) Prepare a lodging; under this all necessities for a stranger are included. Hospitality is a great Christian duty, especially in ministers, and towards ministers, such as the apostle was, coming out of such dangers and sufferings for Christ and his Gospel. It is an honorable title he gives Gaius, Rom. 16:23. Onesiphorus he also affectionately remembered on this account, 2 Tim. 1:16. (2.) The ground of the apostle's request; For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you. The benefit of prayer he had often found, and hoped he should again, for deliverance and liberty to come to them. Our dependence is on God for life and liberty, and opportunity of service; yet this must be with the use of means, prayer especially, though no other should be at hand. The fervent effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much. Prayer of people for ministers, especially when in distress and danger, is their great duty; ministers need and request it. Paul, though an apostle, did so [often] with much earnestness, Rom. 15:30. 2 Cor. 1:11. Eph. 6:18, 19. 1 Thess. 5:25. The least may this way be helpful to the greatest. In praying for faithful ministers, people in effect pray for themselves. 'I trust I shall be given unto you; for your service, and comfort, and edification in Christ,' see 2 Cor. 4:5.

2. He sends salutations from a fellow-prisoner, and four more, his fellow-laborers:

V. 23, 24. Saluting is wishing health and peace. Christianity is no enemy to courtesy, but enjoins it, 1 Pet. 3:8. It is a mere expression of love and respect, and a mean of preserving and nourishing it. Epaphras was of Colosse, and so countryman and fellow-citizen with Philemon; by office, he seems to have been an evangelist, who labored among the Colossians, if not the first converter of them, for whom he had special affection. A very eminent person therefore this was, who, being at Rome, perhaps accompanying Paul, and laboring in the same work, was confined in the same prison, and for the same cause. God sometimes lightens the sufferings of his servants by the communion of saints, the sweet fellowship they have one with another in their bonds. Never more enjoyment of God have they found, than when suffering together for God. So Paul and Silas, when in the stocks. Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-laborers. The mention of these seems in a manner to interest them in the business of the letter. Marcus was cousin of Barnabas, and son of Mary, who was so hospitable to the saints at Jerusalem, Col. 4:10. Acts 12:12. and whose house was the place of meeting for prayer and worship of God. Some failing seems to have been in him when Paul and he parted, yet with Barnabas he went on with his work; and here Paul and he, we perceive, were reconciled, and differences forgotten, 2 Tim. 4:11. Aristarchus is mentioned with Marcus, Col. 4:10. and, speaking there of Marcus, he adds, touching whom ye received commandments; if he come unto you, receive him; an evidence that he himself had received him, and was reconciled to him. Next is Demas, who, hitherto, it seems, appeared not faulty, though, 2 Tim. 4:10. he is censured as having forsaken Paul, from love of this present world. But how far his forsaking was, whether total from his work and profession, or partially only; and whether he repented, and returned to his duty, Scripture is silent, and so must we be: no mark of disgrace lay on him here, but he is joined with others who were faithful, as he is also in Col. 4:14. Lucas is the last, that beloved physician and evangelist, who came to Rome companion with Paul, Col. 4:14. 2 Tim. 4:11. He was Paul's associate in his greatest dangers, and his fellow-laborer.

3. The closing prayer and benediction.

V. 25. Your spirit; not Philemon's only, but of all who were named in the inscription. With your spirit with you; the soul or spirit being the immediate seat of grace, whence it influences the whole man, and flows out in gracious and holy actings. All the house saluted are here joined in the closing benediction, the more to remind and quicken all to further the end of the epistle.

Amen is added, not only for strong and affectionate summing up the prayer and wish, so let it be; but as an expression of faith that it will be heard, so shall it be. And what more than the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ would sweeten and mollify their spirits, Philemon's especially, and take off too deep and keen resentments of injuries, and dispose to forgive others as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us!

PRACT. OBS. Faithful ministers have great joy and comfort in that little company of affluent Christians, whose 'love abounds' in liberality to all men; and when 'the bowels of the saints are refreshed by them,' and their wants generously supplied.—It is by no means proper to exercise authority on every occasion, even when ministers may be 'bold to enjoin what is convenient.' It is frequently far more prudent, for love's sake, to beseech even juniors and inferiors, especially when it may be supposed, they will be reluctant to what is required, and when it may be difficult to convince them of its indispensable obligation. In such circumstances, wisdom and humility will teach the aged and experienced to become willingly the obliged parties, when they might assume a higher tone.—In speaking to persons about their sins, for their humiliation, the heinous nature and manifold aggravations of them should be insisted on; but in mentioning them to others, who are disposed to severity or resentment, we should soften and extenuate as far as truth will permit; and the subject ought to be introduced with all the tenderness and caution imaginable, that everything may tend to conciliate, and nothing to exasperate, [or excite selfishness, as pride, triumph, &c.]—No prospect of usefulness should induce ministers to allow their converts to neglect relative obligations, or to fail of obedience to their superiors. One great evidence of true repentance consists in returning to the practice of those duties which had been neglected; and even liberty to engage in other services should be sought from those concerned; not as it were of necessity, but by their willing consent. We know not for what services God may intend those, whom He has marvellously converted; having, therefore, given our judgment, and used proper means, we should leave all things to his determination, in whose hand are the hearts of all the children of men. Had not the Lord overruled some of our ungodly projects, the writer and many readers may say, with humble gratitude, our destruction must have been the inevitable consequence; though, through that gracious interposition, they eventually proved the occasion of our being brought into the way of salvation and of usefulness. Sc.

punish him, as the laws permitted masters to do [to] their slaves in such cases, which would not only have been grievous to Onesimus, but disgraceful to the Gospel, and to Philemon himself.—We can hardly doubt, that Philemon, on this, forgave Onesimus, received him with kindness, remitted what he owed to him, and afterwards gave him his liberty, that he might attend on the apostle. His appointment with Tychicus to deliver the epistle to the Colossians seems to intimate, that Paul meant to employ him as a minister, which probably was afterwards done. Sc.

(20) Refresh my bowels. The original is wonderfully emphatic, signifying to appease or quiet, which strongly intimates the commotion he felt, through the ardor of his concern for Onesimus. Comp. v. 7. where the same word is used, and seems to be referred to here with pe-

How charming and delicate his address! Let his example be imitated by those in superior stations and relations in life [and especially by those who hold the fearfully responsible station of masters]; and let them learn, from the tenderness such a man expresses for this poor slave, in whom he traced the appearance of a truly Christian temper, [their duty] to interest themselves in the happiness of those whose rank is far beneath their own. Well may such a care be expected, when we can look upon such as brethren beloved in the Lord, and partakers with us in the same Savior and hope of the Gospel.' Ed.

OF THE
EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. W. Tong.)

CONCERNING this epistle we must inquire,

I. Into the divine authority of it; this has been questioned by some, as the Arians, who deny the Godhead and Self-existence of Christ; and the Socinians, who deny his Satisfaction: but, after all the attempts of such men to disparage this epistle, the divine original of it shines forth with those strong and unclouded rays, that he who runs may read it as an eminent part of the canon of Scripture. The divinity of the matter, the sublimity of the style, the excellency of the design, the harmony of this with other parts of Scripture, and its general reception in the church of God in all ages,—these are the evidences of its divine authority.

II. As to the divine amanuensis, or penman of this epistle, we are not so certain; it does not bear the name of any, as the rest of the epistles do, and there has been some dispute among the learned to whom they should ascribe it. Some have assigned it to Clemens of Rome; others to Luke; and many to Barnabas; but it is generally assigned to the apostle Paul.* In the primitive times it was generally ascribed to him, and the style and scope of it very well agree with his spirit. Some think Peter refers to it, and proves Paul to be the penman of it, by telling the Hebrews, to whom he wrote, of Paul's having written to them, 2 Pet. 3:15. We read of no other epistle he ever wrote them but this. And though it has been objected, that, since Paul put his name to all his other epistles, he would not have omitted it here; yet others have well answered, that he, being the apostle of the Gentiles, who were odious to the Jews, might think fit to conceal his name, lest their prejudices against him might hinder them from reading and weighing it as they ought to do.

III. As to the scope and design of this epistle, it is very evident, that it was clearly to inform the minds, and strongly to confirm the judgment of the Hebrews in the transcendent excellency of the gospel above the law, and so to take them off from the ceremonies of the law, to which they were so wedded, of which they were so fond, that they even doted on them. Those of them who were Christians, retained too much of the old leaven, and the design of this epistle was, [further,] to persuade and press them to a constant adherence to the Christian's faith, and perseverance in it, notwithstanding all sufferings in so doing. In order to this, he speaks much of the excellency of the Author of the Gospel, the glorious Jesus, whose honor he advances, and whom he justly prefers before all others, showing Him to be All in all, and this in lofty strains of holy rhetoric. It must be acknowledged, that there are many things in this epistle hard to be understood, but the sweetness we shall find herein will make us abundant amends for all the pains we take to understand it. And, indeed, if we compare all the epistles of the N. T. we shall not find any of them more replenished with divine, heavenly matter, than this to the Hebrews.

HENRY.

Origen and some others were of opinion, that the epistle was written in the Hebrew or Syriac language; and translated into Greek by Clement, or Luke: but, if this had been the case, it can hardly be supposed, that no one copy of the Hebrew epistle should be mentioned as extant in their days, and as seen by them.—The quotations from the O. T. are generally taken from the Sept., even where that version in some degree varies from the Heb.: but this would scarcely have taken place, had the epistle been written in Heb.—The Heb. names are interpreted also in Greek, in a manner, that is not at all like the addition of a translator. The apostle, doubtless, supposed that the epistle would circulate widely among his countrymen, who spoke Greek; and among Christians in general, as well as among the Hebrews; and therefore, probably, he wrote in Greek, as more generally in use at that time, than any other language in the world: and, as it seems to have been written principally for the more learned of the Hebrews, and the teachers in the first instance; the circumstance, that the unlearned in Judea could not read it, would not counterbalance the advantages of its being legible by such numbers in every other place. For even in Judea the teachers would make it known to the common people: and the time was at hand when both Jews and Christians would be removed from the settlements in that country.—The Hebrews were the Jews in Judea, and those who spoke a dialect of the Heb.: and to such of them, as professed Christianity, the epistle was addressed; and probably sent to Jerusalem, to the rulers and pastors of the church in that city: yet the writer evidently expected, that the unconverted Jews, also, would read it; and their conviction and instruction seem to have been a leading part of his object in writing it.—It opens with a declaration of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and proofs from the O. T. that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels. It then shows his superiority to Moses and other eminent men of the nation; proves, by the most unanswerable arguments, that in Him the types of the law had their full accomplishment; that He was the substance of all those shadows; and that the ancient Scriptures taught Israel to expect an entirely new dispensation, priesthood, and covenant, under the reign of the Messiah. These reasonings are interspersed and closed with most solemn and affectionate warnings and exhortations, addressed to different descriptions of persons. At length, the writer shows the nature, efficacy, and triumphs of faith; by which all the saints in former ages had been accepted by God, and enabled to obey, suffer, and do exploits in defence of their holy religion: after which, he adds various instructions, admonitions, encouragements, and exhortations; and then concludes with the customary salutations and benedictions.

* The general testimony of antiquity, the current tradition of the church, and the judgment of the most competent modern critics, determine this epistle to have been written by Paul; though some, both in former and latter times, have thought otherwise. "The epistle of Paul." Thus we find it written in all our manuscripts, one only excepted, in which it is only, "The epistle to the Hebrews." Beza.—It is evident, that this epistle was generally received in ancient times, by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire. In particular, Clement of Alexandria, before the end of the 2d century, received this epistle as St. Paul's, and quoted it frequently, and without any doubt or hesitation.—It is not expressly quoted as St. Paul's, by any of the Latin writers in the first three centuries. However, it was known to Irenæus and Tertullian.—It is manifest, that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries. Lardner.—Origen, who held some peculiar notions concerning it, says, "The ancients did not rashly hand it down as St. Paul's."—It is very certain, that the churches and writers, who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, or at least with their successors.—Since this tradition was ancient, in the times of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, about 130 years after the epistle was written; it must have had its rise in the days of Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested. Hallet, in Mackn.—The doubts, which have been entertained on this subject, seem principally to have arisen from the circumstance, of the apostle's name not being affixed to it, according to his custom in all his other epistles.—But, on the contrary, I contend, from this very circumstance, that it belongs to Paul rather than to any other person. For why should any other person have omitted his name? Paul, however, knew that his name was hated at Jerusalem. Beza.—The apostle intended to prove the doctrines of Christianity, and the changes which it had introduced, and would introduce, to be entirely consistent with 'the oracles of God,' as received by the Jews: and either clearly predicted, or evidently typified, or at least sufficiently intimated, by them; so that any man, who fully understood the O. T., must have expected the substance of what was taught by Christ and his apostles, and the events which had occurred. It is, therefore, highly probable, that he expressly aimed to write an epistle, which might be put into the hands either of Judaizing Christians, or unbelieving Jews, and read by them, without any prejudice, on account of the person who wrote it: let them impartially consider his arguments. Pref. to Est. It is however evident, that he supposed some of the Hebrews would know from whom it came. 10:34. 13:19, 23, 24. But these intimations are not given till the argumentative part of the epistle is ended; and they would not be clearly understood by any but the apostle's friends.—The writer's connexion with Timothy, and his residence in Italy, tend to confirm the ancient tradition: and the other objections, as the supposition that the style is more elegant than Paul's; and that he uses expressions, which imply that he received his doctrine from those who heard Christ, and not by immediate revelation, &c. appear very vague and frivolous. He might, perhaps, bestow more pains in this epistle, concerning the style, than he did when he wrote to other churches: but, in fact, many competent judges are of opinion, that it is not more elegant. Certainly the internal evidence, arising from the writer's manner of expressing himself, and his reasoning, and things of a similar nature, corroborate the opinion, that Paul was the author: and if he thought it prudent to write, as a converted Jew to his countrymen, and not as an apostle, who insisted on his authority; he must of course join himself with the other Jewish converts, and not distinguish himself from them, as having received his doctrine immediately from Christ. (Comp. 2:4. with 1 Pet. 4:3.)

SCOTT.

—The internal excellency of this epistle, as connecting the O. Test. and the New in the most convincing and instructive manner, and elucidating both more fully than any other epistle, or perhaps than all of them, added to other arguments, puts the divine inspiration of it beyond doubt. We here find the great doctrines, which we have elsewhere been considering, stated, proved, and applied to practical purposes, with peculiar animation, energy, and persuasion. It is supposed to have been written at the close of the apostle's first imprisonment at Rome, when he either was set at liberty, or daily expected it.*

SCOTT.

* Some of Professor Stuart's conclusions respecting the epistle are the following: that it is an epistle, and not an essay or homily; that it was inscribed to some particular church, and that not the church in Galatia, nor that at Thessalonica,—that it was addressed, not to the sojourners in Asia Minor, nor to the church at Corinth,—nor was it sent to Spain, nor to Rome,—nor to the church in general in Palestine,—but probably to the church at Cesarea. That it was by Paul, and not by Barnabas, Luke, Clement of Rome, or Apollon, he argues from circumstances mentioned in the epistle, from similarity of sentiment and doctrine with the known epistles of Paul, also from the form, method, style, and diction of the composition. As to the language in which it was written, he concludes in favor of the Greek. Ep.—“If then Paul was the author of this epistle, the time when, and the place where, it was written, may be easily ascertained; for the salutation from the saints in Italy, ch. 13:24. and his promise of seeing the Hebrews shortly, v. 23. plainly intimate, that his first imprisonment at Rome was then terminated, or on the point of being so. Consequently it was written from Italy, perhaps from Rome, soon after the epistles to the Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, either at the end of A. D. 62. or more probably in the beginning of the year 63.” GREENF.—“Hales considers this epistle a masterly supplement to the epistles to the Romans and Galatians, and a luminous commentary on them; showing, by a connected chain of argument, that all the legal dispensation was originally designed to be superseded by the new and better covenant of the Christian dispensation. And, as Stuart observes, while it contains many things appropriate to the Hebrews of early times, it also contains many which can never cease to interest the church of God, while Christianity exists in the world.” Henry, abr.—Shuttleworth says, “The tendency of the apostle's reasoning is to show, that no Jew who really believes in the authority of his own sacred books, (the Old Testament,) if he reasons consistently, and adopts the inferences necessarily deducible from them, could ultimately refuse his assent to the truth of the Christian dispensation, or fail of perceiving, that in the person of the Redeemer, all the types and prophecies of the Jewish writings, had effectually found their final completion. The point at issue is established by an appeal to those very peculiar opinions and principles, which the parties to be convinced have, above all others, the most imperative obligation to admit. The great and primary truth which it is the object of this epistle to enforce, is, the Divinity of our blessed Savior, with the obvious inference deducible from that doctrine, namely, the complete sufficiency of his one great expiation for sin.” HENRY, abr.

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Here the apostle begins with a general declaration of the excellency of the gospel-dispensation above that of the law, which he demonstrates from the different way and manner of God's communicating Himself and his mind and will to men, in the one and in the other. Observe,

How God communicated Himself and his will to men, I. Under the O. T. 1. The persons by whom God spake his mind under the O. T.; that is, the prophets, persons chosen of God, and qualified by Him, for that office of revealing the will of God to men. 2. The persons to whom God spake by the prophets; to the fathers, to all the Old Test. saints. 3. The order in which God spake to men in times before the Gospel; He spake at sundry times and in divers manners. (1.) At sundry times, or by several parts, as the word signifies, which may refer either to the several ages of the O. T. dispensation,—the patriarchal, the Mosaic-al, and the prophetic; or to the several gradual openings of his mind concerning the Redeemer: to Adam, Abraham, Jacob, David, Micah, and Isaiah. (2.) In divers manners, according to the different ways in which God thought fit to communicate his mind to his prophets, by the illapses of his Spirit, by dreams, by visions, by an audible voice, and by legible characters under his own hand, as when He wrote the ten commandments. Of some of these different ways God Himself gave an account in Num. 12:6, 7. Observe,

II. Under the New Test. dispensation, these last days, as they are called, i. e. either toward the end of the world, or the end of the Jewish state. The times of the Gospel are the last times, the gospel-revelation is the last we are to expect from God: now we must expect no new revelation, but only more of the Spirit of Christ to help us better to understand what is already revealed. And herein consists the excellency of the gospel-revelation above the former:

1. It is the final, the finishing revelation, so that now we may rejoice in a complete revelation of the will of God, both preceptive and providential, so far as is necessary for us to know, in order to our direction and comfort.

2. It is a revelation God has made by his Son, the most excellent Messenger ever sent into the world, far superior to all the ancient patriarchs and prophets, by whom God communicated Himself to his people in former times. Here we have an account of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(I.) The glory of his office, and that in three respects:

God hath appointed Him to be Heir of all things; i. e. to be the sovereign Lord of all, the absolute Disposer, Director, and Governor of all persons and of all things, Ps. 2:6, 7. Mat. 28:18. John 5:22. By Him God made the worlds, both visible and invisible, the heavens and the earth; not as an instrumental Cause, but as his essential Word and Wisdom. He upholds all things by the Word of his power; He keeps the world from dissolving, by Him all things consist; the weight of the whole creation is laid on Christ, He supports the whole and all the parts.

(2.) From hence the apostle passes to the glory of the person of Christ, who was able to execute such an office, v. 2. He is, in person, the Son of God, the only-begotten Son of God, and, as such, must have the same nature. This personal distinction always supposes one and the same nature. Every son of man is man; were not the nature the same, the generation would be monstrous. The person of the Son is the glory of the Father, shining forth with a truly divine splendor, God manifest in the flesh. The person of the Son is the true image and character of the person of the Father; being of the same nature, He must bear the same image and likeness. He that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father; i. e. the same Being. He that hath known the Son, hath known the Father, John. 14:7—9. For the Son is in the Father, and the Father in the Son; the personal distinction is no other than will consist with essential union. This is the glory of the person of Christ; the fulness of the Godhead dwells, not typically, but really, in Him.

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The Hebrews allowed the divine authority of the O. T.; and therefore the writer of this epistle waved the mention of his apostolical authority, and reasoned with them principally from their own scriptures: and he thought it best to conceal his name; that none might be deterred by it from reading his arguments, or induced to receive them with prejudice. He therefore entered on his subject without any introduction.—“By the prophets,” were men of the same fallen nature with their brethren.—“By his Son.”—The eternal Word, or Son of God, who had at length “become flesh, and dwelt among” men, and among the Jews almost exclusively, to fulfill ancient prophecies and promises, and to give the most complete and explicit revelation of God, and of his truth and will, to mankind; as well as to procure salvation for them.—This glorious Person the Father had appointed “Heir of all things.” As the co-equal Son of God, the government of all worlds by original right was vested in Him—possessing the essential perfections of the Deity, He was capable of exercising universal authority, which no mere creature could have done; and He had been appointed by the Father, in respect of his assumed manhood, to rule over all worlds on the mediatorial throne, with uncontrolled dominion and unrivalled glory. Thus He inherited all things; and no creature could have any inheritance of power, honor, or felicity, except as derived from Him, and held in subordination to Him. 2:5—9. Ps. 2:7—12. Is. 9:6,7. Matt. 28:18. John 5:20—24. Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Eph. 1:15—23. Phil. 2:9—11. This appointment had the more evident propriety, in that “by Him also God made the worlds:” being One with the Father and the eternal Spirit, in essence, power, and counsel, He had been the immediate Creator of the heavens and the earth, and of every order of beings in the universe. Prov. 8:22—30. John 1:1—3. 1 Cor.

8:4—6. Col. 1:15—17. The idea of a created agent, by whom God made all things, which some have endeavored to support from this text, is so absurd in itself, as well as contrary to other scriptures, that it is astonishing it could ever have been adopted. Is. 44:24. 45:12,13. The apostle evidently meant, that God now spake to men, by that same glorious Person, who had been the immediate Creator of the world, and who was also exalted to the mediatorial throne, as “Heir of all things.” “I believe, it is as impossible to understand, how a man should have this empire over all things in heaven and earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man; as it is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity.” Whitby.—Sundry times. (1.) Here only. One part of the O. T. was given at one time, and another at another time.—In divers manners.] Here only. Referring to different methods of communication.

SCOTT.

(1.) Divers manners.] Mackn. refers this, not to the different manners in which God revealed Himself to the prophets, such as dreams, &c. but to the different ways in which the prophets communicated the different revelations they received, to the fathers, in types and figures, significant actions, &c. as well as in plain language. Ed.

(2.) By his Son &c.] “This is no argument, that God did not speak by Christ before; but only that it was not in so clear and express a manner.” DODDR. Stuart says, “not by his Son incarnate, as possessing our nature and addressing us in it. As the Logos, or in his divine nature, He did make revelations to the ancient church, as may be inferred from John 12:41. 1 Cor. 10:4—9.” Ep.—Worlds.] “There seems a great preponderance of evidence, in favor of the common interpretation, “the whole material world,” rather than “periods of time.”

3 Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

4 Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they.

(3.) From the glory of the person of Christ, he proceeds to mention the glory of his grace; his condescension itself was truly glorious. His sufferings had this great honor in them, to be a full satisfaction for the sins of his people; by Himself He purged away our sins, i. e. by the proper innate merit of his death and bloodshed, by their infinite intrinsic value; Himself, the glory of his person and nature, gave to his sufferings such merit as was a sufficient reparation of honor to God, who had suffered an infinite injury and affront by the sins of men.

(4.) From the glory of his sufferings we are at length led to consider the glory of his exaltation; when by Himself He had purged away our sins, He sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, at his Father's right hand. As Mediator and Redeemer, He is invested with the highest honor, authority, and activity, for the good of his people; the Father now does all things by Him, and receives all the services of his people from Him. Having assumed our nature, and suffered in it on earth, He has taken it up with Him to heaven.

Now it was by no less a Person than this, that God has in these last days spoken to men; the dignity of the Messenger gives authority and excellency to the message; therefore, the dispensation of the gospel must needs very far exceed the dispensation of the law.

V. 4-9. The apostle having proved the pre-eminence of the gospel above the law, from the pre-eminence of the Lord Jesus Christ above the prophets, now proceeds to show, that He is not only much superior to the prophets, but to the angels themselves. In this he obviates an objection the Jewish zealots would be ready to make, that the law was not only delivered by men, but ordained by angels, Gal. 3:19. the hosts of heaven having been drawn forth to attend the Lord Jehovah on that awful occasion. Now the angels are very glorious beings, and we know of no being but God Himself that is higher than they; therefore that law that was ordained by angels, ought to be held in great esteem.

To weaken this argument, the writer proceeds to state the comparison between Jesus Christ and the holy angels, both in nature and office, and to prove that Christ is vastly superior to the angels themselves. Here, observe,

I. The superior nature of Christ is proved from his superior name. The Scripture does not give high and glorious titles without a real foundation and reason in nature;

nor when it is said, Christ was made so much better than the angels, are we to imagine He was a mere creature, as the angels are; the original word, when joined with an adjective, is nowhere to be rendered created, and here may very well be read, being more excellent, as the Syriac version hath it. We read, as we read it elsewhere, let God be true, not made so, but acknowledged to be so.

II. The superiority of the name and nature of Christ above the angels is declared in the Holy Scriptures, and to be deduced from thence. We should know little or nothing of Christ or angels, without the Scriptures; and we must therefore be determined by them in our conceptions of the one and the other.

Here, several passages of Scripture are cited, in which things are said of Christ that were never said of the angels. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee, Ps. 2:7. which refers either to his eternal generation, or to his resurrection, or to his solemn inauguration into his glorious kingdom at his ascension and session at the right hand of the Father. Now this was never said of angels; therefore, by inheritance, He has a more excellent nature and name than they. Again, Of Christ, but never of angels, it is said, I will be to Him a Father, and He shall be to Me a Son; taken from 2 Sam. 7:14. Not only, 'I am his Father, and He is my Son by nature and eternal promanation;' but, 'I will be his Father, and He shall be my Son, by wonderful conception, and this his Sonship shall be the fountain and foundation of every gracious relation between Me and fallen man.'

It is said of Christ, When God bringeth his First-begotten into the world, let all the angels of God worship Him: i. e. either at his nativity, or at his ascension, or when God shall bring Him again into the world, to judge the world, then let the highest creatures worship Him. The proof of this is

V. 3, 4. The essence of the Deity is, and must be, invisible to man: John 1:18. 1 Tim. 6:13-16. but 'the only begotten Son,' of whom the writer spoke, had been appointed to make known his glory and perfections: being 'one with the Father,' and equal to Him in the divine nature; and being also distinct from Him, as to his personal subsistence. By assuming human nature He became 'the brightness of the divine glory,' or the shining forth of the glory of God to mankind; and He so made known the perfections of the Godhead to them, that 'He who saw the Son saw the Father also.' John 5:17-19. 10:26-31,32-39. 12:44-50. 14:7-14. 17:20,21. For the Son was 'the express Image,' or the character of the Father's Person, or subsistence; and showed every part of the nature and perfections of God to man, with the greatest exactness, and in the most effectual manner possible; so that, in proportion as any man knows Christ, in his Person, character, and salvation, he knows the Father also; and he that knows not Christ, has no real knowledge of God. Mat. 11:27. Lu. 10:21,22. 2 Cor. 4:3-6. Col. 1:15-17. 1 John 2:20-25. ... This interpretation coincides with that, which has already been given of similar passages; but it differs, in some degree, from that of several eminent evangelical expositors: for they suppose that the expressions, 'the Brightness of his glory,' and 'the character of his subsistence,' are illustrations, taken from external objects, of the eternal generation of Christ, and his equality with the Father in the Godhead. But though the author is decidedly of opinion, that Christ is called the only Son of God, in respect of his divine nature; and therefore allows the eternal generation, as well as the equality of the Son with the Father: yet he does not think that the Scripture contains any illustrations of these mysteries; or that we are taught to form any ideas of the manner, in which they subsist; but rather to receive them in implicit faith, as the revelation of God, and to adore them as absolutely incomprehensible by us in our present state. He, therefore, supposes these expressions to signify the manifestation of the glory, character, and perfection of 'the invisible God' to man, in and by the Person of his incarnate Son; whose original equality with the Father in his divine nature, and his voluntary assumption of the human nature, concurred in rendering Him the proper medium, so to speak, through which we might see the 'effulgency,' or shining forth of the divine glory; and become acquainted with the perfections and subsistence of God, in the best manner, of which in our present condition we are capable. He is also confirmed in this view of the passage, by finding, that the venerable reformer, Beza, interprets it in the same manner, and makes the same objections to the other interpretations: except, that he translates the word hypostasis, persona, 'person;' I think, improperly, for the subsistence of the Deity, not the personal distinction of the Father and the Son, seems to be intended.—The brightness.] Apauasma: here only. DODD., after LEIGH.

V. 5-7. In the preceding vs. the apostle had stated the outlines of that doctrine, on which he meant more largely to discourse; and, having declared the personal and mediatorial superiority and high pre-eminence of 'the Son of God' above angels, he proceeded to show, that the O. T. prophecies spoke of the promised Messiah in similar language. As we are satisfied, by abundant evidence, that the writers of the N. T. were equally inspired with those of the Old; their expositions are to us of equal authority with the original passages, which they adduce. But when the apostle reasoned with the Hebrews out of their Scriptures, he doubtless quoted them in that sense, in which most of them had been used to understand them, or in which it might be proved they ought to be understood. Had not the more learned Jews, at the time when the epistle was written, been accustomed to understand the texts here brought forward, in the sense which the apostle affixes to them, he would scarcely have adduced them, as proofs of his doctrine, without hesitation, in an argumentative treatise, which he knew must pass the ordeal of the strictest examination, by the most prejudiced and hostile persons. Now, if they were sufficient proofs to the persons immediately addressed, they must be sufficient for all, who consider the writer as fully knowing, by divine inspiration, both the doctrine of Christ, and the true meaning of the Scriptures; though the context might otherwise, in some instances, have led us to suppose them instructive accommodations; and though the Jews, in subsequent ages, to evade the writer's conclusion, have (as it might previously have been expected) attempted to put another construction on them.—We have before briefly considered the Scriptures quoted; yet it is necessary here again to examine them. The first is brought from an evident prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom. JEHOVAH had in it addressed the Messiah, in such language, as had never been used to any angel. The words quoted were spoken above a thousand years before the birth of Jesus, and were the declaration of a preceding decree; they must therefore relate to his Sonship, or eternal generation; for the subsequent production of his human nature, by the power of the Holy Spirit, would not give Him that essential and original superiority to the angels, which the argument here evidently required. Nor could his appointment to the office of Messiah be meant by the words, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee;' as that appointment was the consequence, rather than the cause, of his superiority to the angels; He was advanced above them, 'as He had inherited a more excellent name than they;' and his Sonship is plainly denoted to be a participation of the Father's nature, and not merely a communication of existence by an act of creating power, or adoption by an act of special grace. Ps. 2:7-12. Acts 13:24-37.—The next quotation appears primarily to have been meant of Solomon, 2 S. 7:12-16. but Solomon was a most remarkable type of the Messiah, as the Jews in general must know; so that when JEHOVAH said of Him, in so peculiar and distinguishing a sense, 'I will be to Him a Father, and He shall be to Me a Son,' it must be obvious that this, in its fullest meaning, was to be understood of the Antitype rather than of the type.—'Worship Him, all ye gods.' Ps. 97:3-7. Though the magistrates and grandees of the earth might be included, yet all the angels of God were evidently intended also. But JEHOVAH had never ... commanded other

8 But unto the Son he saith,
 "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom:

9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

10 And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the works of thy hands:

11 They shall perish, but thou remainest: and they all shall wax old as doth a garment;

12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

n Ps. 45:6,7. o rightness, or, straitness. p Ps. 102:25.

Ps. 97:7. And, once more, God has said of Christ, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever, &c. v. 8—12. But of the angels He has only said, that He hath made them spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire, v. 7.
 How vast, then, the inferiority of the angels to Christ! What does God say here of the angels? They are his ministers. We have it, Ps. 104:4. where it seems to be more immediately spoken of the winds and lightning, but is here applied to the angels, whose agency the Divine Providence makes use of in the winds, and in thunder and lightning.
 In office, angels are God's ministers, or servants, to do his pleasure; it is his glory that He has such servants; yet more so that He does not need them. In qualifications, He makes them what they are, He endows them with light and zeal, with activity and ability, readiness and resolution to do his pleasure:
 they are no more than what God has made them to be, and they are servants to the Son as well as to the Father. But,

Observe, How much greater things are said of Christ by the Father. Two passages are quoted, one, Ps. 45:6, 7. where God declares of Christ, 1. His true and real divinity, calling Him God, O God. 2. His dignity and dominion, as having a throne, a kingdom, and a sceptre of that kingdom. 3.
 The eternal duration of the dominion and dignity of Christ, founded on the divinity of his Person. This distinguishes Christ's throne from all earthly thrones; they are tottering, and will at length tumble down; but the throne of Christ shall be as the days of heaven. 4. The perfect equity of his administration, and of the execution of his power, through all the parts of his government, v. 8.

 He came righteously to the sceptre, and He uses it in perfect righteousness; the righteousness of his government proceeds from an essential, eternal love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity, not merely from considerations of prudence or interest, v. 9. Christ came to fulfil all righteousness, to bring in an everlasting righteousness. 5. How He was qualified for the office of Mediator, and was installed and confirmed in it, v. 9.

(1.) Christ has the name Messiah from his being anointed. God's anointing of Christ signifies both his qualifying of Him for the office of the Mediator with the Holy Spirit, and likewise his inauguration of Him into the office, as prophets, priests, and kings were, by anointing. God, even thy God, imports his confirmation in office by the covenant of redemption and peace, that was between the Father and the Son. God is the God of Christ, as Christ is Man and Mediator.

(2.) This anointing of Christ was with the oil of gladness, which signifies both the gladness and cheerfulness with which Christ undertook and went through the office of Mediator, and also that joy which was set before Him, as the reward of his service and sufferings; that crown of glory and gladness which He should wear for ever, after the suffering of death.

(3.) This anointing of Christ was above the anointing of his fellows; God, even thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. Who are Christ's fellows? Has He any equals? Not as God, except the Father and Spirit, but these are not here meant. As Man, He has his fellows, and as an anointed Person; but his unction is beyond all theirs, whether angels or prophets, priests, and kings, above saints, who are his brethren, above any ever anointed with oil, to be employed in the service of God on earth. All God's other anointed ones had only the Spirit in a certain measure; Christ had the Spirit above measure, without any limitation. None therefore goes through his work as Christ did, none takes so much pleasure in it as Christ does; for He was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows.

The other passage of Scripture, in which [appears] the superior excellence of Christ to the angels, is taken out of Ps. 102:25—

 27. and is thus recited here:

V. 10—12. In these vs. the omnipotence of the Lord Jesus Christ is declared, as it appears both in creating the world, and in changing it.

1. In creating the world, v. 10. The Lord Christ had the original right to govern the world, because He made the world in the beginning; his right, as Mediator, was by commission from the Father; his right, as God with the Father, was absolute, resulting from his creating power. This power
 He had before the beginning of the world, and He exerted it in giving a beginning and being to the world. He must therefore be no part of the world Himself, for then He must give Himself a beginning. He was before all things, and by Him all things consist, Col. 1:17. He was not only above all things in condition, but before all things in existence; and therefore must be God, and self-existent. He not only founded the earth, but the heavens, too, are the work of his hands both the habitation and the inhabitants, the hosts of heaven, the angels themselves; therefore He must needs be infinitely super-prior to them.

2. In changing the world He has made; and here the mutability of this world is brought in to illustrate the immutability of Christ.

(1.) This world is mutable; all created nature is so; this world has passed through many changes, and shall pass through more;
 all these are by the permission and under the direction of Christ, who made the world,
 v. 11, 12: Not only men and beasts and trees grow old, but this world itself grows old, and is hastening to its dissolution. But then its dissolution shall not be its utter destruction, but its change. Christ will fold it up as a garment not to be abused any longer, not to be any longer used so as it has been.
 We look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Let the consideration of this wean us from the present world, and make us watchful, diligent, and desirous of that better world; and let us wait on Christ, to change us into a meetness for that new world that is approaching; we cannot enter into it till we be new creatures.

(2.) Christ is immutable. Thus the Father here testifies of Him, Thou remainest, thy years shall not fail. Christ is the same in Himself, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; and the same to his people in all the changes of time. This may well support all who have an interest in Christ, under all the rational creatures to worship them, nay, He had most peremptorily for-bidden the worship of any creature; yet He required the most exalted of them to worship his Son, even when brought into this world to dwell in human nature! A most decided proof of an infinite disparity between Christ and the highest angels. Rev. 19:9, 10.—'When He introduceth the First-born into the world, He saith, "Let all God's messengers worship Him; whereas, concerning messengers He saith, "Who maketh winds his messengers, and framing fire his ministers." Campbell.—This construction, indeed, accords to the scope of the passage in the Psalms, as describing the different parts of the creation, executing the Creator's mandates; yet the apostle's quotation requires us to explain the passage of the ministrations of angels. The learned writer supposes the apostle's argument to rest, in part, on the difference between messenger, and Son; the former term being used even of inanimate beings; the latter appropriate to the divine Savior.—The first and second quotations are exactly from the Sept., which accords to the Heb. 2 Sam. 7:14. Ps.

 2:7. The third is nearly from the Sept. only changing the second person into the third, and putting 'the angels of God,' instead of 'his angels'; and it varies from the Heb. Ps. 97:7.—The very words of the apostle occur in the Sept. Deut. 32:41. but there is nothing answering to them in the Heb. The last quotation is nearly from the Sept. which accords to the Heb. Ps. 104:4.

(5.) Thou art my Son, &c. [It is evident that this and the rest of the passage here quoted, must refer to Christ in their original sense, and in the strictest propriety of interpretation.]

V. 8, 9. Some suppose, that angels were meant by Christ's fellows, because the apostle was proving his superiority to angels; but He never bore 'the nature of angels,' and partaking of the same nature seems to be the meaning of the expression. 2:16—18. The quotation was full to the apostle's purpose, by proving that JEREMIAH spoke of the Messiah, in such language, as He never used concerning angels; and the Psalmist, from whom he adduced his proof, spoke of the Messiah as incarnate, of his espousing the church to Himself, and of believers as the companions of the glorious King. They were indeed 'anointed with the oil of gladness,' for his sake; but He far more than they all, even as his excellency and dignity exceeded theirs. Ps. 45:—'They, who imagine this Ps. is an epithalamium, on Solomon's marrying Pharaoh's daughter, must suppose, that it is foretold, . . . that Solomon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he would set up for princes and rulers, up and down the world (16). But this cannot be true; for, beside that we read not of any children Solomon had by Pharaoh's daughter, . . . Rehoboam, who succeeded him, was the son of Naamah, an Ammonitess. And so far was he from being able to set up his sons to rule over other countries, that it was with great difficulty, his successors kept two tribes of the twelve steadfast to them.—Certainly, "a greater than Solomon was here." Bp. Pierce. (?)—Very many other suppositions, by which the prophecies, concerning Christ, are explained away, or evaded, by men called Christians, might be shown to be equally absurd.—The quotation is nearly from the Sept. which accords to the Heb.

(3.) Hast loved righteousness. [I think it refers to the unparalleled instance of the love of moral rectitude, which Christ hath given in becoming a sacrifice for sin, by his atonement; doing more [to evince that love] than ever did any other rational agent.]

V. 10—12. Ps. 102:25—28. The Ps. whence these vs. are quoted, seems to be a prayer of the afflicted church of Israel, for the coming of her expected Deliverer; yet we might not have discovered, that the Son 'of God' was personally addressed, had not the apostle led our attention to it in this view. But, considering it in connexion with other scriptures, and remembering that the ancient prophets continually spoke of their expected Messiah, as their great Deliverer from all enemies and troubles, we shall perceive a propriety in the church, under affliction, addressing herself to Him, as her unchangeable Friend.—
 Probably, the Hebrews in general were prepared to understand this Psalm, as well as the others, of the Messiah; it is, however, to us a most explicit testimony to the Deity of Christ, as One with the Father, the Creator of all things. (10) Thou, Lord, &c. The quotation is taken from the Sept. which exactly accords to the Heb.; except that the word, rendered in our version, 'change,' is translated elizeis, fold up; but the Alexandrian copy of the Sept., and some copies of the N.
 T., read, allazeis, change.

13 But to which of the angels said he at any time, <sup>a</sup> Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool?

14 Are they not all ministering <sup>r</sup> spirits, sent forth <sup>s</sup> to minister for them who shall be heirs <sup>t</sup> of salvation?

CHAP. II.

<sup>1</sup> We ought to be obedient to Christ Jesus, <sup>5</sup> and that because He vouchsafed to take our nature upon Him, <sup>14</sup> as it was necessary.

THEREFORE we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should <sup>a</sup> let them slip.

V. 13, 14. This concludes the comparison between Christ and the angels, and the preference of Christ to them; God never said to the angels what He has said to Christ:

1. To Christ He has said, 'Sit Thou at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool.' Ps. 110:1. Receive Thou glory, dominion, and rest; and remain in the administration of thy mediatorial kingdom, until all thine enemies shall either be made thy friends by conversion, or thy footstool.<sup>2</sup> Note, Christ Jesus has his enemies, enemies even among men; enemies to his sovereignty, to his cause, to his people. Let us not think it strange if we have our enemies. Yet all Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool, either by humble submission, or by utter destruction. God the Father has undertaken for this; and, though it be not done presently, it shall certainly be done. Christ shall go on to rule and reign till this is done; and it becomes his people to go on in their duty, being what He would have them to be, doing what He would have them to do, avoiding what He would have them to avoid, bearing what He would have them to bear, till He makes them conquerors, and more than conquerors, over all their spiritual enemies.

2. God has said of the angels, They are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be the heirs of salvation. Note, Angels, in their nature, are spirits, without bodies or inclination to bodies; yet can assume bodies, and appear in them, when God pleases: in office, they are ministering spirits.

PRACT. OBS. We can never sufficiently bless our God, that He has, in so many ways, and with such increasing clearness, spoken, concerning salvation, to us wretched sinners; and especially that He has sent the message of mercy to us, by his 'well-beloved Son,' whose dignity gives peculiar authority to every appointment, and certainty to every Christ, as-Mediator, is the great Minister of God in the great work of redemption. The Holy Spirit is the great Minister of God and Christ in the application of this redemption. - Angels are ministering spirits under the blessed Trinity, to execute the divine will and pleasure; they are the ministers of Divine Providence, ministers to them who shall be the heirs of salvation. Here observe, (1.) The description given of the saints; they are heirs of salvation; at present they are under age, heirs, not inheritors. (2.) The dignity and privilege of the saints; the angels are sent forth to minister for them. Bless God for the ministration of angels, keep in God's way, and take the comfort of this promise, that He will give his angels charge over you, to keep you in all your ways. They shall hear you up in their hands, lest you dash your feet against a stone, Ps. 91: 11, 12.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. Here we have the application of the truths before asserted and proved; this is brought in by the illative particle therefore. The application is both by way of exhortation and argument.

I. By way of exhortation, v. 1. The great concern of every one under the Gospel is, to give the most earnest heed to all gospel-discoveries and directions; to embrace them in our hearts and affections, to retain them in our memories, and finally to regulate our words and actions according to them.

II. By way of argument, he adds strong motives to enforce the exhortation:

1. From the great loss we shall sustain, if we do not take this earnest heed to the things we have heard; we shall let them slip. They will leak, and run out of our heads, lips, and lives, and we shall be great losers by our neglect. This consideration should be a strong motive both to our attention to the Gospel, and our retention of it; and, indeed, if we do not well attend, we shall not long retain, the Word of God; slight hearers will soon be forgetful hearers, [for memory is the daughter of attention.]

2. Another argument is taken from the dreadful punishment we shall incur, if we do not do this duty; a more dreadful punishment than those fell under who neglected and disobeyed the law, v. 2, 3. Here observe,

(1.) How the law is described: it is said to be the word spoken by angels, because given by the ministration of angels, they sounding the trumpet, and perhaps forming the words according to God's direction; as they shall sound the trumpet a second time, and gather all to his tribunal at last. And this law is declared to be steadfast; like the promise, it is truth and faithfulness, and will abide and have its force, whether men obey it or no; for every transgression and disobedience will receive a just recompense of reward. Observe, The severest punishment God ever inflicted on sinners is no more than what sin deserves, a just recompense of reward; punishments are as just, and as much due to sin, as rewards are to obedience, yea, more due than rewards are to imperfect obedience.

truth and promise. ... Let us not then perversely and ungratefully refuse Him our adorations, whilst 'all the angels of God worship Him.' For our salvation He abased Himself, that He might 'redeem us to God with his blood,' and shall we, on that account, refuse to adore and 'honor Him, even as we honor the Father that sent Him?' SCOTT.

V. 14. 'How different the station and employment of angels, from that of the Messiah! They, however, are here evidently regarded as real intelligent beings. Far to have instituted a comparison between the Son of God, and mere abstract qualities, or imaginary beings would seem inapposite to any serious purpose; and how could such be represented as worshipping the Son of God, or ministering to the saints?' SR.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle, in the midst of his argument, paused, as it were, after the proof of Christ's pre-eminent dignity, to make some application of his doctrine. The Hebrews, and all to whom the Gospel came, 'ought to give the more earnest,' believing, and obedient attention to what they had heard, because of the majesty of the Speaker, and the gracious nature of his words. Mat. 17:5—8. Acts 3:22—23.

SCOTT.

(2.) How the Gospel is described: it is salvation, a great salvation; so great salvation, that no other can compare with it; so great, that none can fully express, no, nor yet conceive, how great it is. It discovers a great Savior, shows how we may be saved from great sin and great misery, and be restored to great holiness and so to great happiness. It discovers a great Sanctifier, to qualify us for salvation, and to bring us to the Savior; the Gospel unfolds a great and excellent dispensation of grace, a new covenant, secured to all who come into the bond of it.

(3.) How sinning against the Gospel is described; it is declared to be a neglect of this great salvation, it is a contempt put on the saving grace of God in Christ, making light of it, not caring for it, not thinking it worth their while to acquaint themselves with it; not regarding either the worth of gospel-grace, or their own want of it, and undone state without it; not using their endeavors to discern the truth of it, and assent to it, nor to discern the goodness of it, so as to approve of it, or apply it to themselves.

(4.) How the misery of such sinners is described; it is declared to be unavoidable, v. 3. Despisers of this salvation are condemned already, under arrest, and in the hands of justice. So they were by the sin of Adam; and they have strengthened their hands by their personal transgression, John 3:18. nor is there any escape, but by accepting the great salvation discovered in the Gospel; as for those who neglect it, the wrath of God is upon them, and it abides upon them. And there is a yet more aggravated curse and condemnation waiting those who despise the grace of God in Christ, the unavoidableness of whose misery is here expressed by way of question; How shall we escape? It is an appeal to universal reason, to the consciences of sinners themselves; and it intimates, that the neglecters of this great salvation will be left not only without power, but without plea and excuse, at the judgment-day; if they be asked, what they have to say, that the sentence should not be executed on them, they will be speechless, and self-condemned by their own consciences, even to a greater degree of misery than those fell under who neglected the authority of the law, or sinned without the law.

3. Another argument, to enforce the exhortation, is taken from the dignity and excellency of the Person by whom the Gospel began to be spoken, v. 3. that is, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is Jehovah, the Lord of life and glory, Lord of all: this great Lord of all was the first who began to speak it plainly and clearly, without types and shadows, as it was before He came. Now, surely, it may be expected that all will reverence this Lord, and take heed to a Gospel that began to be spoken by One who spoke so as never man spoke.

4. Another argument is taken from the character of those who were witnesses to Christ and the Gospel, v. 3, 4. Observe, (1.) The promulgation of the Gospel was continued and confirmed by those who heard Christ, by the evangelists and apostles, who

(1.) Abresch, in Bloomf., thinks ch. I ought to end with v. 4. which Bloomf., after Chrys., approves. Ed.—Let them slip. Pass by, or neglect,—not attend to diligently: comp. transgression, v. 3.—So great. Can we conceive of a stronger appeal to the moral constitution of man, than the atonement! 'The whole warning, vs. 1—4, is, "Beware ye do not slight the gospel, whose threatenings are more to be dreaded than those of the law; inasmuch as the Gospel is a revelation of a higher nature, [appealing to love, &c. rather than fear,] and has been confirmed by more striking and more abundant miracles wrought by divine power.'" STUART. To resist (after God has put a man into a highly favorable condition) strong spiritual influences, is a greater sin than to resist weaker ones, exhibited in a less favorable state of the individual.

4 God <sup>f</sup> also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and <sup>g</sup> gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak.

6 But one in a certain place testified, saying, <sup>h</sup> What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or <sup>i</sup> the son of man, that thou visitest him?

7 Thou madest him <sup>j</sup> a little lower than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of thy hands:

8 Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him.

10 For it became <sup>o</sup> him, for <sup>p</sup> whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain <sup>q</sup> of their salvation <sup>r</sup> perfect through sufferings.

were eye and earwitnesses of what Jesus Christ began both to do and to teach, Acts 1: 1. (2.) God Himself bore witness to those who were witnesses for Christ; He testified that they were authorized and sent by Him to preach Christ, and salvation by Him, to the world. And how did He bear them witness? Not only by giving them great peace in their own minds, great patience under all their sufferings, and unspeakable courage and joy; but by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his will: by signs, signs of his gracious presence with them, and of his power working by them: by wonders; works quite beyond the power of nature, and out of the course of nature: by divers miracles, mighty works, in which an almighty agency appeared beyond all reasonable controversy: and by gifts of the Holy Ghost, qualifying, enabling, and exciting them to do the work to which they were called; divisions or distributions of the Holy Ghost, diversities of gifts, 1 Cor. 12: 4. &c. And all this according to God's own will. It was the will of God we should have sure footing for our faith, and a strong foundation for our hope, in receiving the Gospel. As at the giving forth of the law there were signs and wonders, by which God testified the authority and excellency of it; so He witnessed to the gospel by more and greater miracles, as to a more excellent and abiding dispensation.

V. 5—9. The apostle having made this serious application of the doctrine of the personal excellency of Christ above the angels, now returns to that pleasant subject again, and pursues it further, v. 5.

1. Here the apostle lays down a negative proposition, including a positive one; that the state of the gospel-church, which is here called the world to come, is not subjected to the angels, but under the special care and direction of the Redeemer Himself. God does not make that use of the ministration of angels, to give the gospel as He did the law, which was the state of the old or antiquated world. This new world is committed to Christ, and only put in absolute subjection to Him in all spiritual and eternal concerns. Christ has the administration of the gospel-church, which at once speaks Christ's honor, and the church's happiness and safety. It is certain that neither the first creation of the gospel-church, nor its after-edification or administration, nor its final judgment and perfection, is committed to the angels, but to Christ. God would not put so great a trust in his holy ones; his angels were too weak for such a charge.

II. We have a scripture-account of that blessed Jesus, to whom the gospel-world is put into subjection, taken from Ps. 8: 4—6. These words are to be considered both as applicable to mankind in general, and as applied here to the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. As applicable to mankind in general; where we have an affectionate, thankful expostulation with the great God concerning his wonderful condescension and kindness to the sons of men; in remembering them in the counsels of divine love; in visiting them with purposes of favor; in making man the head of all the creatures in this lower world; in crowning him with glory and honor, the honor of having noble powers and faculties of soul, excellent organs and parts of body, whereby he is allied to both worlds, capable of serving the interests of both worlds, and of enjoying the happiness of both; and, finally, in giving him right to and dominion over the inferior creatures, which continued so long as he continued his allegiance and duty to God.

2. This is here plainly applied to the Lord Jesus Christ; and the whole that is here said, can only be applied to Him, v. 8, 9. The moving cause of all the kindness God shows to men, in giving Christ for them and to them, is the grace of God: God was mindful of Christ for us in the covenant of redemption, and visited Him on our account; in order to which, God had made Him a little lower than the angels, that He might suffer and humble Himself to death, and so by his sufferings make satisfaction, tasting death for every man, sensibly feeling and undergoing the bitter agonies of that shameful, painful, and cursed death of the cross, hereby putting all mankind into a new state of trial; and thus accomplishing that ancient scripture, in Christ, that He was crowned with glory and honor, which never was so accomplished or fulfilled in any mere man that ever was upon earth. And now, having mentioned the death of Christ, the apostle proceeds.

V. 10—13. The apostle here prevents and removes the scandal of the cross, by showing both how it became God, that Christ should suffer, and how much man should be benefited by those sufferings.

1. How it became God, that Christ should suffer, v. 10. Where, 1. God is described as the final End and first Cause of all things, and as such it became Him to secure his own glory in all that He did, not only to act so that He might in nothing dishonor Himself, but that He might from everything have a revenue of glory. 2. He is declared to have acted up to this glorious character in the work of redemption, as to the choice both of the end and of the means.

(1.) In the choice of the end; and that was, to bring many sons to glory; to present glory in enjoying the glorious privileges of the Gospel, and to future glory in heaven, which will be glory indeed, an exceeding, eternal weight of glory.

(2.) In the choice of the means; i. e. in finding out such a Person as should be the Captain of our salvation, and in making this Captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings. God the Father made the Lord Jesus Christ the Captain of our salvation; i. e. He consecrated, appointed Him to that office, gave Him a commission for it; and He made Him perfect in it, perfect in wisdom, courage, strength, and sufferings. The

V. 5—9. The argument concerning the Messiah's superiority to the angels, is here resumed. 'The world to come' is supposed to have been a phrase in use among the Jews, denoting the times of the Messiah. This period began at the first coming of Christ, and will continue till his second coming. The words, however, do not occur elsewhere; and some think, that the apostle alludes to the words of the prophet, concerning 'new heavens and a new earth.' Is. 65:17—19. This includes the dispensation of the Messiah, and the millennium, as connected with heavenly happiness.—(9) A little lower.] Many expositors suppose the original to mean, 'lower for a short time,' i. e. during the term of our Lord's humiliation on earth; but the use of the same word in v. 7, determines its sense here, and there it can have no reference to time, unless we explain the Ps. as a prophecy of Christ exclusively, without allowing that either Adam, or his posterity, were at all intended. It is indeed argued, that Jesus was made, in human nature, immensely lower than the angels, 'being despised and rejected of men,' and considered as one of the most abject of the human race. This objection, however, seems to be of no validity, for his real dignity and excellency as man, and not the opinion of others concerning Him, are meant. He was, in human nature, as the 'first Adam' had been, 'a little lower than the angels;' and, being made like us in all things, sin alone excepted, He became capable of suffering and death, from which angels are exempted. In these respects He was 'made a little lower than the angels;' but in all other things, He, even as man in his lowest humiliation, was little lower than they, being immensely superior to all others of the human race, not excepting Adam himself before the fall.—Taste death.] Some explain these words as signifying the pain our Lord endured in dying; and others, as marking the short time He continued dead; but the expression seems to have been in use among the Jews, as merely denoting to die. (M. R. a.) The quotation is from the Sept.; but that entirely corresponds with the [516]

Heb., except as it tr. Elohim, (often rendered gods.) by the word 'angels,' as it does in many other places; and the word God is substituted, in the tr. of the last quotation, for Jehovan in the Hebrew. SCOTT.
(5.) World to come.] Doddr. explains this of 'the kingdom of the Messiah, which extends not only to earth, but to heaven.' ED.
(6.) One in a certain place.] 'It is evident there is nothing in the 8th Ps. by which, independent of the apostle's authority, it could be known to belong to the Messiah. I, therefore, choose to understand this as an allusion to what in its original intent is a description of the dignity and glory of human nature, and not a prophecy of the Messiah.' Doddr.—Stuart takes the same view of the Ps.—Bp. Middleton, in Bl., and Bl. after him, understand it in a 'twofold sense,' first of Adam and next of Christ, in which last sense it applies here. —Mackn. understands it primarily and wholly of Christ, and refers to Mat. 21:15, 16. 15.
(9.) Stuart tr. 'But we see Jesus, who was made but little inferior to the angels, crowned with glory and honor on account of the sufferings of death, after that He had, by the grace of God, tasted death for all, i. e. for Jew and Gentile.' ID.
V. 10—13. Whatever the Jews might object to the sufferings and crucifixion of Him, who was preached to them as the Messiah; yet it certainly 'became' the eternal God, for whose glory, and by whose power, all things were created, and are upheld and governed, to adopt this method. It had not only pleased Him as a Sovereign to do this; but it was admirably suited to manifest the glory of all his perfections; yea, it was necessary for the harmonious display of them, [and to make the most effectual, and controlling, and exciting impression on humanity, as God had constituted it.] Having, therefore, purposed to predestinate to the adoption of children an innumerable company of Adam's fallen race, (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) He was pleased, in his infinite wisdom and love, to appoint them 'a Captain,' who should call them forth out of 16 For verily ' he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a ' merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people:

excellent Dr. Owen observes, that the Lord Christ, being consecrated and perfected through suffering, has consecrated the way of suffering for all his followers to pass through unto glory; and hereby their sufferings are made necessary and unavoidable, they are hereby made honorable, useful, and profitable.

II. He shows how much they would be benefited by the cross and sufferings of Christ; as there was nothing unbecoming God and Christ, so there was that which would be very beneficial to men, in these sufferings. Hereby they are brought into a near union with Christ, and into a very endearing relation.

I. Into a near union, II. Observe, Christ is He that sanctifieth; He has purchased and sent the sanctifying Spirit; He is the Head of all sanctifying influences. The Spirit sanctifieth as the Spirit of Christ. In the work of sanctification, Christ the Agent, and Christians the recipient subjects, are all of one: all are of one heavenly Father, their state of sin and misery, and lead them through life and death, to his eternal glory; for the word rendered 'in bringing,' agrees with that tr. 'Captain.'—Many things; in Is. 8: are evidently prophetic of the Messiah, and, as such, are quoted repeatedly in the N. T., and, no doubt, the text here adduced was understood of Him, by the learned Jews. For the apostle was well acquainted with their sentiments, and would not have quoted it, in a sense different from the usual interpretation, in an argumentative discourse, without attempting to establish the new interpretation by cogent reasonings. (Note, 1:5-7.—The quotations are all from the Sept., which does not materially vary from the Heb. S.

V. 14, 15. Whatever pride, ambition, and desperate passions, united with unbelief, may sometimes effect or perpetrate, the fear of death is universal, and, in some degree, enslaves all mankind; the juster apprehensions men have of God and eternal things, the greater must be their dread of death, and its awful consequences, except as faith in Christ deliver them. Many of those, who have been enslaved by it, during the former part of their lives, or at least from the time when they began seriously to reflect on the subject, are actually delivered from their terror by the Gospel, and habitually think of dying with great composure and satisfaction. Many, who do not before rise superior to their terrors, are entirely freed from them at that critical season; and even those believers, who fear death to the last, (as some perhaps do, will be the more amazed at their deliverance, when, by the stroke, which they dreaded all their lifetime, they find themselves perfectly freed from all which they groaned under and hated, and admitted to a felicity exceeding their largest expectations.—(15) Through death.] 'Had not this been added, the apostle might have seemed to speak very absurdly; for must God become Man, in order to conquer the devil? Assuredly, here was and that is God; and of one earthly father, Adam. Christ and believers are of one Spirit, a holy and heavenly disposition; of the same mind, though not in the same measure; the same Spirit informs and actuates the Head and all the members.

2. Into an endearing relation. This results from the union. And here first he declares what this relation is, and then he quotes three texts out of the O. T. to illustrate and prove it.

(1.) He declares what this relation is; He and believers being all of one, He therefore is not ashamed to call them brethren. Observe, Christ will never be ashamed of any that are not ashamed of Him, and who take care not to be a shame and reproach to Him and to themselves.

(2.) He illustrates this from three texts of Scripture. The first is Ps. 22:22. In this Psalm it is foretold, that Christ should have a church, or congregation, in the world, and that these should not only be brethren to one another, but to Christ Himself. To these He would declare his Father's name, that is, his nature and attributes, his mind and will: this He did in his own Person, while He dwelt among us, and by his Spirit poured out on his disciples, enabling them to spread the knowledge of God in the world from one generation to another, to the end of the world, and to the praise and glory of his Father.

The second scripture is, Ps. 18:2. That Ps. sets forth the troubles David, as a type of Christ, met with, and how he in all his troubles put his trust in God. Christ suffered and trusted as our Head and President. His brethren must suffer and trust too.

The third scripture is, Is. 8:18. This proves Christ really and truly Man, for parents and children are of the same nature; children were given Him of the Father, in the counsel of his eternal love, and that covenant of peace that was between them. And they are given to Christ at their conversion. When they take hold of his covenant, then Christ receives them, rules over them, rejoices in them, perfects all their affairs, takes them up to heaven, and there presents them to his Father; Behold, I and the children which Thou hast given Me.—

V. 14-18. Here the apostle proceeds to assert the incarnation of Christ, as taking on Him not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham; and he shows the reason and design of his so doing.

I. The incarnation of Christ is asserted, v. 16. Though as God He pre-existed from all eternity, yet in the fulness of time He took our nature into union with his divine nature, and became really and truly Man. He did not lay hold of angels, but He laid hold of the seed of Abraham. The angels fell, and He let them go, and lie under the desert, defilement, and dominion of their sin, without hope or help; but resolving to recover the seed of Abraham, and raise them up from their fallen state, He took on Him the human nature from one descended from the loins of Abraham; that the same that had sinned, might suffer, to restore human nature to a state of hope and trial; and all that accepted of mercy, to a state of special favor and salvation. Now there is hope and help for the chief of sinners in and through Christ. Let us all then know the day of our gracious visitation, and improve that distinguishing mercy which has been shown to fallen men, not to the fallen angels.

II. The reasons and designs of Christ's incarnation are declared, v. 14, 15. No higher nor lower nature than man's that had sinned, could so suffer for the sin of man as to satisfy the justice of God, and raise man up to a state of hope, and make believers the children of God, and so brethren to Christ. So He became Man, that He might die; as God, He could not die, therefore He assumes another nature and state. Here the wonderful love of God appeared, that, when Christ knew what He must suffer, in our nature, and how He must die in it, yet He so readily took it upon Him. And it was, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, v. 14. The devil was the first sinner, the first tempter, sin was the procuring cause of death; so he may be said to have the power of death, as he draws men into sin, the ways whereof are death, and as he is often permitted to terrify the consciences of men with the fear of death, and as he is the executioner of divine justice, halting their souls from their bodies to the tribunal of God, there to receive their doom; and then being their tormentor, as he was before their tempter; in these respects he may be said to have had the power of death. But now Christ has so far destroyed him, that he can keep none under the power of spiritual death; nor can he draw any into sin, nor require the soul of any from the body, nor execute the sentence on any, but those who choose and continue to be his willing slaves, and persist in their enmity to God.

Christ came, that He might deliver his own people from the slavish fear of death that they are often subject to. This may refer to the Old Testament saints, who were more under need rather of strength than of weakness. The apostle therefore declares, that to render this victory the most glorious, it was peculiarly suitable, that Satan, the conqueror of man, should be laid prostrate by a Man; and so, by the very death of a Man, he might be destroyed, as by his own weapons.—Understand death, as joined with the wrath of God, which, without Christ it must necessarily be; nor can anything be conceived more miserable, than to be under the perpetual slavery of this dread and horror.' BEZA.

(15.) Fear of death.] 'Fear of that condemnation or punishment, to which sin exposes men; not the fear of natural death; an evil from which no precautions can deliver us, and which Christians, as well as others, must suffer, notwithstanding the death of Christ.' STUART.

V. 16-18. The introductory words of this passage are differently interpreted. Our tr. explains them of our Lord's assuming, not 'the nature of angels,' but our nature, in order to be our Brother, Surety, and Savior; and the mention of the seed of Abraham, from whom He descended, favors this interpretation; but the margin, and indeed a great majority of commentators, suppose the apostle to mean, that the eternal Son of God, when angels sinned, did not 'take hold' of them, to preserve them from final perdition; but He 'took hold' of fallen man, to rescue him from this dreadful doom; and this, indeed, lays the firmer foundation for the subsequent inference. 'The seed of Abraham' however, on this interpretation, cannot mean all the natural descendants of Abraham, nor any of them exclusively; but must be understood of Abraham's believing seed, whether Jews or Gentiles; and this, though it accords to the apostle's manner in other places, Rom. 4:11-25. Gal. 3:26-29. is not thought a natural exposition in his present argument.—The difference, indeed, is not great, between the two interpretations.—The ends of Christ's humiliation, death, and exaltation, are set forth in this ch.—To 'taste death for every man,' to 'become the Captain of our salvation,' and to 'lead us to glory,' to 'sanctify us,' to 'destroy a spirit of bondage, because life and immortality were not so fully brought to light as now they are by the Gospel. Or it may refer to all the people of God, whether under the O. T. or the New, whose minds are often in perplexing fears about death and eternity. Death now to them is not Satan's servant, but Christ's servant. Lastly, Christ must be made like unto his brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to the justice and honor of God, and to the support and comfort of his people. He must be faithful to God, and merciful to men.

1. In things pertaining to God; to make all the attributes of the divine nature, and all the Persons subsisting therein, harmonize in man's recovery, and fully to reconcile God and man.

PRACT. OBS. The judgments of God under the new dispensation are chiefly spiritual; but they are on that account the more to be dreaded for character is all we carry out from this world into eternity; and 'if they who despised Moses' law died without mercy,' 'how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation,' as that which Christ has wrought for us, and revealed in his gospel? Blessed be God, this salvation is so great and perfect, that nothing, except our neglect of it, in one way or another, can exclude us from its eternal advantages; so that the trembling penitent, who is ready to think himself too criminal to be pardoned, or too polluted to be cleansed, may come to Christ with cheerful confidence, and expect from Him the free gift of all which can be needful for him; and even those who are conscious of having hitherto neglected so great salvation, may hope for the pardon of that atrocious guilt in the same manner, being assured, that 'where sin hath abounded, grace shall much more abound.'—The glorious God has done wonderful things for us, in creation and providence, for which, alas! we have made the basest returns; but He was 'mindful of us, and visited us,' in the most surprising manner, when He gave his own Son, to be 'made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death,' in our nature and for our salvation; that, being 'crowned with glory and honor,' and having all 'power given to Him in heaven and earth,' He might rescue every man, who believes in Him, from all the effects of original and actual sin, and raise him to far higher dignity, than what was lost by Adam's transgression. Rom. 5:12—19. 8:32—34. 1 John 4:9—12

death, and him that had the power of death,' to deliver us from the bondage of the devil, and the fear of death, to become our 'High Priest, to make reconciliation for our iniquity,' having 'by Himself purged our sins.' (1:3.) What unutterable blessings are these, flowing to us from 'the grace of God, in Christ our Lord?' and what do they imply concerning the natural state of fallen man?—(17) It behooved Him. He ought, or owed, as having undertaken to be our Surety. Philim. 17—21. Sc.

(16.) He took not, &c. He did not extend aid at all to the angels. —He took, &c. He came to the aid of man.—The writer here does not deny Christ's assumption of an angelic nature; but if the argument be, that Jesus assumed the human nature, because He was to aid men and not angels, then this v. contains a reason why the Savior did and should take on Him the nature of man, viz. that it was altogether accordant with the great object of his mission. STUART.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—6. From what had been advanced and proved, concerning the superiority of the Messiah to the angels, and his dignity as the incarnate Son of God, the apostle next took occasion to call the attention of the Hebrews to the offices, which He performed for the benefit of his church.—As 'every house' is contrived, erected, furnished, and prepared for a habitation, by some person, whose skill and intelligence are visible in it; so 'He, who built all things,' as Creator, and arranged all things in the church of Israel, could be no other than God Himself. This honor the Messiah possessed: Acts 7:37—43. and this glorious Person had at length appeared in human nature, as the Apostle, or Prophet, of the Father, to introduce a new dispensation, and terminate the old one.—The words tr. 'made all things,' may rather their support and comfort, v. 18. He is a sympathizing Physician, tender and skilful; He knows how to deal with tempted, sorrowful souls, because He has been Himself sick of the same disease, not of sin, but of temptation and trouble of soul; and He is ready and willing to succor those who apply themselves to Him.

CHAP. III. V. 1—6. In these vs. we have the application of that doctrine laid down in the close of the last ch., concerning the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And observe,

I. In how fervent and affectionate a manner the apostle exhorts Christians to think closely and seriously of this High Priest; and surely no one deserves our consideration more than He. That this exhortation might be made the more effectual, observe,

1. The honorable compellation used toward those to whom he wrote; Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling. Brethren, not only my brethren, but the brethren of Christ, and in Him brethren to all the saints. Holy brethren; holy not only in profession and title, but in principle and practice, in heart and life. This has been turned by some to scorn; but let those thus despised labor to be holy brethren indeed, and they need not to be ashamed of the title, nor dread the scoffs of the profane. The day, alas! for them, is coming, when those that scorn would count it their greatest honor and happiness to be taken into this sacred brotherhood. Partakers of the heavenly calling; partakers of the means, and Spirit of grace, from heaven, and by which Christians are effectually called out of darkness into marvellous light; that calling which [through Christ's clothing Himself with humanity for our Redemption] brings down heaven into the souls of men, raises them up to a heavenly temper and conversation, and prepares them to live for ever [in Christ] with God in heaven.

2. The titles he gives to Christ, whom he would have them consider,

(1.) As the Apostle of our profession, the prime Minister of the gospel-church, a Messenger, and a Principal Messenger, sent of God to men, on the most important errand, the great Revealer of the faith we profess to hold, and of the hope we profess to have. (2.) Not only the Apostle, but the High Priest too, of our profession, the Chief Officer of the O. T. as well as the New, the Head of the church in every state, and under each dispensation, on whose satisfaction and intercession we profess to depend for pardon of sin, and acceptance with God. (3.) As Christ, the Messiah, anointed and every way qualified for the office both of Apostle and High Priest. (4.) As Jesus, our Savior, our Healer, the Great Physician of souls, typified by the brazen serpent Moses lifted up in the wilderness, that those who were stung by the fiery serpents, might look to Him, and be saved.

II. We have the duty we owe to Him who bears all these high and honorable titles, and that is, to consider Him as thus characterized. Consider what He is in Himself, what He is to us, and what He will be to us hereafter and for ever; consider Him, fix your thoughts on Him with the greatest attention, and act toward Him accordingly, look unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of your faith. Many profess faith in Christ, who have not a due consideration for Him. Close and serious consideration of Christ would increase our acquaintance with Him, and engage our love and our obedience to Him, and reliance on Him. Even holy brethren, and partakers of the heavenly calling, need to stir up one another to think more of Christ than they do; the best of his people think too seldom and too slightly of Him. We must consider Christ as He is described to us in the Scriptures, and form our apprehensions of Him from thence, not from any vain conceptions and fancies of our own.

Whatever the proud, carnal, and unbelieving may imagine or object, the spiritual mind will perceive peculiar glory in the cross of Christ, and be satisfied, that 'it became Him,' (who in all things makes the manifestation of the glory of his own perfections his chief end,) 'in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Author of their salvation perfect through sufferings.' And what advantages may we not expect, from so powerful and gracious a Friend and Brother? Mat. 12:16—50. John 15:12—16.—Let sinners, who dread death, and use a variety of methods to banish their terrors, no longer attempt to outrave or repress them; let them not grow outrageous or licentious, through despair; nor let them expect help from the world or human inventions; but let them seek pardon, and peace, and grace, and lively hope of heaven, by faith in Him who died and rose again. Col. 1:9—14. Let the trembling believer frequently meditate on the love of Christ, and on his cross, his sepulchre, his resurrection, and his glory; and thus, in simple dependence and obedience, let him wait for more complete deliverance 'from the fear of death,' and from that last enemy himself, in the Lord's appointed time. And let the afflicted and tempted, instead of yielding to despondency, or giving place to the devil, (as if their harassing temptations rendered it improper for them to come to the Lord with their prayers,) remember, that the Savior 'suffered being tempted,' in order that He might be 'able to succor them that are tempted,' that He has infinite power and compassion, and that He only waits to be called in to their help, by fervent, persevering prayer. SCOTT.

relate to the formation of the church, than to the creation of the world; yet there can be no reasonable doubt, that the apostle purposely intimated, that He who formed the church, also created the world; and certainly He asserted that Christ, whether as Former and Ruler of the church, or Creator of all things, is God. SCOTT.

(1.) 'The transition here from one topic to another, is almost insensible, under the form of a deduction from the preceding discussion.' STUART. 'Nothing could better suit the apostle's design of establishing the Hebrew Christians, than to compare together the respective founders of the O. T. dispensations. He consequently observes, vs. 1—4. that both Christ and Moses were faithful to God in the discharge of their offices; but that Christ was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as the founder, and ruler of the house, or church, hath more honor than the house, or any eminent servant in it, such as Moses was. For He that hath formed the church, and ordered all things relative to it, is God. He adds, v. 5, 6. that Moses indeed was faithful in all things relative to God's house, the Jewish church: but it was as a servant, and in a typical economy, designed for a testimony of the things afterwards to be revealed; but that Christ was faithful as a Son over his house, the gospel-church; of whose house we who believe are members, whether Jews or Gentiles, if we hold fast our confidence and the rejoicing of the Christian hope firm unto the end.' M'LEAN, in Williams. So, in the main, Stuart and Bl.—Apostle and High Priest. 'Both are properly mentioned, as the author was to show that, as an Apostle, Christ was superior to Moses, and as an High Priest, to Aaron.—Apostle signifies Messenger.' DODD.

4 For every house is builded by some man; but he that built all things is God.

5 And Moses <sup>e</sup> verily was faithful in all his house, as a <sup>f</sup> servant, for a testimony of <sup>g</sup> those things which were to be spoken after;

6 But Christ as a Son <sup>h</sup> over his own house; whose house <sup>i</sup> are we, if <sup>j</sup> we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

[Practical Observations.]

7 Wherefore, (as the Holy Ghost saith, <sup>k</sup> To-day if ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness;

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years:

10 Wherefore, I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway err in their heart; and they have not known my ways.

11 So I swear in my wrath, <sup>l</sup> They shall not enter into my rest,)

12 Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil <sup>m</sup> heart of unbelief, in departing <sup>n</sup> from the living God.

13 But exhort <sup>o</sup> one another daily, while it is called To-day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.

III. We have several arguments drawn up to enforce this duty of considering Christ the Apostle and High Priest of our profession. The first is taken from his fidelity, v. 2. He was faithful to Him that appointed Him, as Moses was in all his house. God the Father has sent and sealed Him to the office of Mediator, and He is faithful to that appointment, punctually and fully executing the trust reposed in Him by his Father and by his people. He is as faithful to Him that appointed Him, as Moses was in his office to the Jewish church in the O. T.; and this was a proper argument to urge on the Jews,

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-6. All who hear and profess the Gospel should be 'holy brethren;' and all who are 'partakers of the heavenly calling' will be sanctified, and united in love, [if not in opinion,] according to their measure of faith.—The stewards and servants of God are required to be faithful in all things intrusted to them, and many have been approved as such by their common Lord. 1 Cor. 4:1, 2. 1 Tim. 1:12-14. But the eternal Son of God is 'counted worthy of more honor,' than any or all of his servants. . . . As therefore they are most absurd, who allow 'every house to be builded of some man,' and yet atheistically ascribe the glorious creation around them to chance or necessity, (4.) Doddr. understands this in relation generally to 'the works of creation and providence.' Bl. gives the sense thus: 'Every family has its head, or master, who provides for its welfare. But God is the supreme Paterfamilias, to whom his people, whether under the old or the new covenant, owe their origin, and who sent both Christ and Moses.' Stuart understands the all things of 'dispensations, i. e. both Jewish and Christian,' which sense he thinks demanded by the context. Ed.

(5.) For a testimony, &c. 'I. e. to make disclosures to the Israelites, of things to be revealed during the Mosaic period; or he was to be the instrument of delivering to the people divine communications, or, he was to teach them in matters of religion.' STUART.—'A testimony of things afterwards to be mentioned;' namely, by Christ and his apostles'. WILLIAMS.

V. 7-13. This address was directed to those professed Christians, who were in danger of apostatizing, or who did not seem in earnest in their religion, but it was likewise peculiarly suited to excite the attention of such Jews, also, as might read it. The example of their unbelieving progenitors, and the words of their own Scriptures respecting them, were adduced with great propriety, and power of conviction, on this occasion. Ps. 95:7-11.—'Seeing Moses, the servant, could not be despised with impunity, let them consider what punishment they must endure, if they despised the Son of God, to whom Moses himself invites them.' Beza. The apostle's reasoning, like that of Stephen, (Notes, who had so high an opinion of the faithfulness of Moses, and yet his faithfulness was but typical of Christ's. Another argument is taken from the superior glory and excellence of Christ above Moses, v. 3-6. Christ was a Maker of the house, Moses but a member in it. By the house we understand the church of God. Christ is the Maker of this house of the church in all ages; He is the Maker of all things; for He is God, and no one less than God could build the church, either lay the foundation, or carry on the superstructure. Christ was the Master of this house, as well as the Maker, v. 5, 6. This house is styled his house, as the Son of God. Moses was only a faithful servant, for a testimony of those things that were to be spoken after; Christ, as the eternal Son of God, is the rightful Owner and Sovereign Ruler of the church; therefore Christ is worthy of more glory than Moses, and of greater regard and consideration. This argument the apostle accommodates to himself and all true believers, v. 6. whose house we are; each of us personally, as we are the temples of the Holy Ghost, and Christ dwells in us by faith; He characterizes the persons who constitute this house; they are those who confide, and rejoice to the end; maintain a bold and open profession of the truths of the Gospel, and live upon and up to their hopes of grace and glory, built upon them, so as to have a holy rejoicing in them to the end, notwithstanding all they meet with in so doing. So you see there must not only be a setting out well in the ways of Christ, but steadfastness and perseverance to the end. Those who would partake of the dignity and privileges of the household of Christ, must receive the truths of the Gospel into their heads and hearts, build their hopes of happiness upon them, and make an open profession of them. They must so live up to them as to keep their evidences clear, and rejoice in hope, and then they must in all persevere to the end.

V. 7-19. Here the apostle proceeds, pressing on them serious counsels and cautions, to the close of the ch.; and he recites Ps. 95:7, &c. where observe,

I. He counsels them to give a speedy, present attention to the call of Christ, v. 7.

II. He cautions them against hardening their hearts, turning the deaf ear to the calls and counsels of Christ, v. 8.

III. He warns them, by example of the Israelites, their fathers, in the wilderness, v. 8, 9, referring to that remarkable passage at Massah Meribah, Ex. 17:2-7. Observe, Days of temptation are often days of so they reason little, if at all better, who allow Christ to be the Author of life, holiness, wisdom, strength, and salvation, to the multitudes of his people, and yet deny his real Deity.—All prophets and apostles acted as servants 'in the house' of another, to bear testimony to Christ, and to honor Him; but He appeared, to direct and govern all things, with unlimited sovereignty, as 'a Son over his own house.' May we then belong to this spiritual building, and manifest that we do so, by 'holding fast our confidence, and the rejoicing of our hope' in Christ, steadfast, through all trials, even to the end! provocation. To provoke God, when He is trying us, and letting us see that we entirely depend and immediately live on Him, is a provocation with a witness. The hardening of our hearts is the spring of all our other sins. The sins of others, especially our relations, should be a warning to us. As to the sin of the fathers of the Jews, here reflected on, it was very aggravated: they were now delivered from Egypt, though not yet in Canaan; and they were immediately dependent on God, from day to day, in the wilderness; yet they tempted, provoked, and distrusted God, and murmured against Moses; and thus they continued to do forty years: these were heinous aggravations, the source and spring of which were, they erred in their hearts, [their wills or affections were not in order, and so they] did not know God's ways, though He had walked before them; they did not observe either his providences or his ordinances in a right manner. At these sins God had just and great resentment, and yet He exercised great patience toward them, v. 10. Note, God is loath to destroy his people in or for their sin, He waits long to be gracious to them; yet He keeps an exact account of the time people go on sinning against Him, and at length, if they continue to grieve the Spirit of God, their sins shall be made grievous to themselves, in judgment or mercy. Observe, God's wrath will discover itself in its righteous resolution to destroy the impenitent; He will swear in his wrath, not rashly, but righteously, and his wrath will make their condition a restless condition; there is no resting under the wrath of God.

IV. What use the apostle makes of their awful example, v. 12, 13, &c. He gives the Hebrews,

1. A proper caution; the word is, Take heed, look to it; 'For see, Christ is Head of the church, a much greater person than Moses, and your contempt of Him must be a greater sin than their contempt of Moses; so you are in danger of falling under a severer sentence than they.' Observe, The ruin of others should be warnings to us; Israel's fall should for ever be a warning to all who come after them, 1 Cor. 10:11. Take heed; all who would get safe to heaven must look about them.

2. He enforces the admonition with an affectionate compellation; 'Brethren, not only in the flesh, but in the Lord; brethren whom I love, and for whose welfare I labor and long.' And here he enlarges on the matter of the admonition; Take heed, &c. Where observe, A heart of unbelief is an

This had excluded the generation which came out of Egypt from Canaan, in the days of Moses; David, many ages after, was inspired by the Holy Spirit, to warn the Israelites against imitating their unbelieving progenitors, and forfeiting spiritual blessings; and the writer of the epistle warns his contemporaries, not to exclude themselves from heaven, in the same manner, as their ancestors were excluded from Canaan. In this view, there is a vast energy in the warning and exhortation.—(7) As the Holy Ghost saith. How decidedly this attests the book of Psalms to be the Word of God, and not merely of David, or any other man! evil heart. Unbelief is a great sin, it vitiates the heart. An evil heart of unbelief is at the bottom of all our sinful departures from God; it is a leading step to apostasy; if once we allow ourselves to distrust God, we may soon desert Him. Christian brethren have need to be cautioned against apostasy. Let them that think they stand, take heed lest they fall.

3. He subjoins good counsel to the caution, and advises them to that which would be a remedy against this evil heart of unbelief,—that they should exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day, v. 13. Ob-

PRACT. OBS. V. 7—19. Alas! what numbers of professed Christians are as far from the power of true religion, as the Israelites were in the days of Moses, or the Jews in those of Paul! The Holy Spirit therefore still says to them; 'To-day, if ye will hear the voice of God,' and 'submit to his righteousness, and authority, do not harden your hearts.'—While sinners are procrastinating, God may be about to say, 'This night shall your souls be required of you.' Luke 12:15—21. 13:22—30. How infatuated then must they be, to close their eyes and harden their hearts against conviction, to run into dissipation and worldly lusts, to yield to selfishness and sloth, and to make delays, in such a perilous situation! Prov. 6:1—5. Let such triflers and loiterers, on the brink of the bottomless pit, look well to themselves, for evil is be-

V. 14—19. Contemplating the immense advantages of perseverance, and the tremendous consequences of apostasy, they should consider the words of the Holy Spirit as addressed immediately to themselves. For, though the whole nation of Israel had been brought out of Egypt, to hear the will of God from Moses, yet some of them, (how vast a proportion it was not necessary to state,) provoked God to exclude them from Canaan. 1 Cor. 10:1—10. Jude 5—8. Yet God had not failed of performing his promises, when He excluded that generation from Canaan, neither was this inconsistent with his justice; for 'with whom was He grieved,' but with those obstinate transgressors who always rebelled against Him? He therefore cut them off, while his promises were performed to the remnant of believers, and to the children of the rebels, as they would also be in the present case. Ps. 90: Title. 7—17. In that particular instance, when 'He sware in his wrath, that they should not enter into his rest,' the tremendous sentence included none but the unbelievers; so that they could not enter into Canaan 'because of their unbelief;' nor could the Hebrews, whom the writer addressed, by any possible means enter heaven, unless they believed in Jesus Christ.—(15) While it is said, &c. [This sentence is noble, from which we learn, that the words of the prophets did not pertain to that one time, but that God, even at this day, invites us to Himself, by setting the writings of the prophets before us.] Beza. This is directly opposite to the conduct of many modern expositors and theologians, who labor strenuously to prove, that the language of the sacred writers, in many places, was intended for certain descriptions of persons in their own time, and is but little, if at all, applicable to us, who are placed in very different circumstances. But, in reality, it is of comparatively small importance to us, as to religion, what the meaning of any passage in Scripture may be; if we are not concerned in it, and can, in our situation, derive no instruction, encouragement, or warning from it; and the grand use of both exposition and preaching, is, to show how we may apply each part of Scripture warrantably to our own cases, according to serve, We should be doing all the good we can to one another while we are together, which will be but a short and uncertain time; since to-morrow is none of ours, we must make the best improvement of this day; if Christians do not exhort one another daily, they will be in danger of being hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. Note, There is great deceitfulness in sin; it appears fair, but is filthy; pleasant, but is pernicious; it promises much but performs nothing. The deceitfulness of sin is of a hardening nature to the soul; one sin allowed, prepares for another; every act of sin confirms the habit; sinning against conscience is the way to sear the conscience; therefore it should be the great concern of every one to exhort himself and others to beware of sin.

4. He comforts those who not only set out well, but hold on well, and hold out to the end, v. 14. The saints' privilege is, they are made partakers of Christ, that is, of the spirit, nature, graces, righteousness, and life of Christ; they are interested in all that is Christ's, in all that He is, in all that He has done, or can do. The condition on which they hold that privilege is, their perseverance in the bold and open profession and practice of Christ and Christianity unto the end. Not but they shall persevere, being kept by God's power, but to be pressed thus to it, is one mean by which Christ helps his people to persevere. This tends to make them watchful and diligent, and so keeps them from apostasy. Here observe, Many who in the beginning of their profession show a great deal of courage and confidence, do not hold it fast to the end. Perseverance in faith is the best evidence of the sincerity of our faith.

5. The apostle resumes what he had quoted before from Ps. 95:7, &c. and applies it close to those of that generation, v. 15, 16, &c. He tells them, that though some who had heard the voice of God, did provoke Him, yet all did not; some there were who believed, which, if they would do, they must hear his voice without delay. God will have a remnant that shall be obedient to his voice, and He will take care of such,

6. And Lastly, The apostle puts some queries upon what had been before mentioned, and gives proper answers, v. 17—19. From whence, observe, God is only grieved with those of his people who sin against Him, and continue in sin. God is grieved and provoked most by sins publicly committed, by the generality of a nation; God grieves long, and bears long, when pressed with the weight of general and prevailing wickedness; yet He will at length ease Himself of public offenders by public judgments. Unbelief (and rebellion which is the consequent of it) is the great damning sin of the world, especially of those who have a revelation of the mind and will of God. This sin shuts up the heart of God, and the gate of heaven; it lays them under the wrath and curse of God, and leaves them there; so that in truth and justice to Himself, [and his universe,] He is obliged to cast them off for ever.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—10. Here, 1. The apostle declares our privileges by Christ under the gospel not only as great, but greater than those enjoyed under the Mosaic law. He specifies, that we have a promise left us of entering into his rest; i. e. of entering into a covenant relation to Christ, and a state of communion with God through Christ, and of growing up therein, till made perfect in glory.

2. He demonstrates the truth of his assertion, that we have as great advantages as they had, v. 2. The best privileges the ancient Jews had, were, the sacrifices and ceremonies of the O. T. the Gospel of that dispensation; and whatever was excellent in it, was, the respect it had to Christ. Now if this was their highest privilege, we are not inferior to them; for we have the Gospel as well as they, and in greater purity and perspicuity than they had.

3. He assigns the reason why so few of the ancient Jews profited by that dispensation of the Gospel which they enjoyed, and that was their want of faith, v. 2. Observe, The Word is preached to us, that we may fore them.—We all, however, have need to exhort one another daily, or while the day of life and grace continues, lest sin should first deceive, and then harden us; till negligences and offences, in lighter things, terminate in more daring crimes, or open apostasy.—The happiness of being 'partakers of Christ,' as our complete Salvation and eternal Portion, and the fear of God's wrath and eternal misery, combine to put us on our guard against hypocrisy and apostasy, and to excite us to persevere in the life of obedient faith. Let us then beware of trusting to outward privileges or profession; remembering that unbelief and disobedience will exclude men from God's promised rest, and that nothing else can do it.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The awful justice of JEREMIAH towards his ancient people, when they 'believed not,' 3:14—19, called emphatically on their descendants 'to fear,' with a humble and jealous distrust of their own hearts, a diligent, self-examining attention to every mean of grace, and a careful watchfulness against temptation, lest they should fall under a still more terrible condemnation.—'He proves . . . that the promise, to give Abraham and his Seed the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, was really a promise to give believers, of all nations, the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem; and that the oath which excluded the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness from Canaan, likewise excluded from the heavenly country all that continue in their sins. So that, in this profit by it, may gain spiritual riches by it; yet there have been, in all ages, many unprofitable hearers. What is at the bottom of all our unprofitableness under the Word is our unbelief; we do not mix faith with what we hear; it is faith in the hearer that is the life of the Word. Though the preacher believes, and endeavors to speak as one who does so; yet, if the hearers have not faith to mix with the Word, they will be never the better for it.

2 For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word <sup>b</sup> preached did not profit them, <sup>c</sup> not being mixed with faith in them that heard it.

4. On these considerations the apostle grounds his repeated, earnest counsel, that they who enjoy the Gospel should maintain a holy fear, lest latent unbelief should rob them of the benefit of the Word, and of that spiritual rest tendered in the Gospel, v. 1. Observe, Grace and glory are attainable by all under the Gospel; yet those who may attain them may also fall short by unbelief. This is a dreadful thing, and one good mean to prevent it is, to maintain a holy and a religious fear lest we should fall short. This will make us vigilant and diligent, sincere and serious; this will put us on examining our faith, and exercising it; whereas, presumption is the high road to ruin.

5. The apostle confirms the happiness of all who truly believe the Gospel; and that, (1.) By asserting so positively the truth of it, from the experience of himself and others, v. 3. 'We who have believed, do enter into rest; into a blessed union with Christ, and into a communion with God through Christ; in this state we actually enjoy many sweet communications of pardon of sin, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and earnestness of glory, resting from the servitude of sin, and reposing ourselves in God till we are prepared to rest with Him in heaven.' (2.) He illustrates and confirms it, that they who believe, are thus happy, and do enter into rest; from God's finishing his work of creation, and so entering into his rest, v. 3, 4. appointing our first parents to rest also the seventh day in God; from his continuing the observance of the Sabbath, after the fall, and the revelation of a Redeemer; from his proposing Canaan as a typical rest for the Jews, into which those who believed, Caleb and Joshua, did actually enter; and from the certainty of another rest besides that seventh day of rest instituted and observed both before and after the fall, and besides that typical Canaan,—rest which most of the Jews fell short of by unbelief; for the Psalmist has spoken of another day and another rest. From whence it is evident, that there is a more spiritual and excellent Sabbath remaining for the people of God, than that into which Joshua led the Jews, v. 6—9. a rest of grace and comfort, and holiness, in the gospel-state, and a rest in glory; the everlasting sabbatism of heaven, which is the repose and perfection of nature and grace too, where the people of God shall enjoy the end of their faith, and the Object of all their desires. The whole is further proved from the glorious Forerunners who have actually taken possession of this rest,—God and Christ. It is certain, God, after creating the world in six days, entered into his rest; and Christ, when He had finished the work of our redemption, entered into his rest; and these were not only examples, but earnestness, that believers shall enter into their rest, v. 10. Every true believer hath ceased from his own works of sin, from relying on his own works of righteousness, and from the burdensome works of the law; as God and Christ have ceased from their works of creation and redemption.

6. The apostle confirms the misery of those who do not believe; they shall never enter into this spiritual rest, either of grace here or glory hereafter. As sure as God is

SCOTT.
(1—9.) 'The writer having appealed to the example, and consequences of unbelief among the Israelites of old in the wilderness, proceeds now to confirm the application of what he had been saying, and to remove objections; one, that the rest spoken of in the O. T., meant only the quiet possession of Canaan; the other, that the ancient Israelites were excluded from the promised rest, on account of murmuring and rebellion, crimes not charged on those whom he addressed. He asserts that the promise of entering into the rest, still remains addressed to the Hebrew Christians, as it was to the Israelites of old. This he repeats, v. 2. and adds, that the ancient Hebrews failed to obtain the proffered blessings through unbelief. In v. 3. he says, believers now enter into the same kind of rest as was anciently proffered, and that such as God enjoyed, after He had completed the creation of the world; consequently spiritual, heavenly rest. This is plain, (he goes on to show, v. 4.) from Scripture, from Gen. 2:2. and Ps. 95:11. where it is involved in the very form of expression, viz. MY rest, v. 5. Now since God would not provide a rest altogether in vain, and some must enjoy it, and they to whom it was proffered, lost it through unbelief,—[it follows that believers only can attain it.] This last is not expressed, but left to be supplied by the reader, from v. 2, 3. The object of v. 6. is, to intimate, that unbelief was the sin which excluded from the rest. But some might still doubt. He therefore, v. 7. appeals to David, (who lived nearly 500 yrs. after Canaan had been occupied by Israel,) speaking of a definite time, then present, in which he warns his contemporaries against losing the rest God had promised to the believing and obedient. "Now," adds he, "if Joshua, who gave Israel Canaan, had given them the rest to which the Scripture refers, where it speaks of God's rest," [my rest, v. 3.] "then David could not have spoken, so long after, of a rest still proffered to Israel, from which the unbelieving would be excluded, v. 9." Hence he concludes, that the rest spoken of is not of a temporal but spiritual nature, and that there remains a rest for the people of God, i. e. believers. V. 10. states, that the main object of the writer in vs. 1—9. is, to prove the spiritual and abiding nature of the proffered rest; "For," says he, "he who enters into his [God's] rest, rests from his own labors, as God did from his." That is, he who attains to the rest proffered in the time of David, and to the more ancient Israelites in the wilderness, attains to a rest like that of God, Gen. 2:2. i. e. he will rest from the toils, and trials, and sorrows of a probationary state, and enjoy a happiness heavenly and divine, in a better world above. As to the mode of reasoning, if any should think the argument from the O. T. less forcible to establish promises of rest in a future world, than are supplied perhaps by his own mind from the N. T., let him remember, the N. T. was not then in hand to be appealed to,—not to say, that, to Hebrew Christians, the argument from the O. T. was the more appropriate, the O. T. being peculiarly their Scriptures. The whole argument is, indeed, in some sense argumentum ad hominem; but there is nothing of allegorizing, and the writer plainly labors to show, that rest in the land of Canaan could not possibly have been meant by the Psalmist. The future punishment of the unbelieving Israelites is clearly intimated, by the exclusion from heavenly, spiritual rest, which is threatened.'

STUART.

(2.) 'A church-going man, who is not also a man of prayer, has no better reason to expect spiritual benefit, than a husbandman has to expect a harvest, who plants his grain and leaves his field an unfenced common. It is he who enters his closet before he comes to the house of God, and prays in secret before he takes his place in the public assembly, and keeps still praying while the Word is sounding powerfully in his ear, and forgets not another retreat to his private chamber, after dismissal from the courts of the Lord,—this is the man who grows, and thrives, under the ministration of the Word.' Rev. Dr. SKINNER.

V. 3—11. The apostle laid it down as a principle, that 'those who believe,' and they only, 'enter into rest,' even that rest which was especially intended.—It was evident that more than 'the rest of Canaan' was meant, in the Scriptures to which he referred; as God had said, 'If they shall enter into my rest,' with allusion to the Sabbath; though the works of creation from which He ceased, and in which He rested with infinite satisfaction, as being 'very good,' had been 'finished from the foundation of the world;' above 2500 years before He spake thus of the unbelieving Israelites: for it was thus written in a passage of Scripture, well known to the Hebrews, concerning the original institution of the Sabbath. Gen. 2:1, 2. Ex. 20:11. 31:13—17. And yet God said, so many ages after, that they 'should not enter into his rest.' Num. 14: 27—30. This implied that the rest of Israel, in Canaan, was a type of a more spiritual and sacred rest, satisfaction, and felicity, in Him and his glory, (in some degree resembling his own complacency in the perfect work of creation,) which would be conferred on his believing people. The exclusion of the generation from Canaan, implied that it remained for some others to enter in, which their posterity accordingly did; and the language denoted, that, while, through unbelief, numbers came short of the better rest of heaven, yet it was purposed that some should enter into it by faith. In confirmation of which, another day was limited, 'by the Holy Spirit in David,' many ages afterwards, during which believers would 'enter into rest,' but after which unbelievers would be irrevocably excluded. 3:7—13. This was addressed to those, who were actually in possession of the promised land, and at the height of their prosperity as a nation; it therefore evidently related to another and better rest than that of Canaan; from which unbelief would exclude even the inhabitants of that good land. For if 'Jesus,' (or Joshua, as it would have been better rendered, to prevent mistake and ambiguity,) had given Israel the true rest intended for believers; God would not so long after have spoken 'of another day.' Joshua had indeed given Israel rest, from the fatigues and wanderings of the desert, and from the hardships and perils of war, by their settlement in Canaan; Josh. 23:1. yet there evidently 'remained for the people of God' another and better rest, even the keeping of a perpetual and most blessed Sabbath; for the word is changed, to express the idea the more strongly. This was reserved for them in heaven, where they have done with sin, temptation, pain, conflict, fear, death, labor, and disappointment; and enjoy uninterrupted, unalloyed, ineffable, and eternal delight in God, and [undisturbed activity in] his holy worship and service.—This point the apostle argued from the O. T. so carefully, because the Sadducees entirely denied, that any better recompense than temporal prosperity was to be expected; and the Jews in general were prone to overlook the spiritual blessings proposed to them, in the promises made to their fathers, and to confine their thoughts wholly to the temporal sanctions of the national covenant, made with them at Sinai. Ex. 19:1.—The application, (v. 11.) by the singular pronoun, is rendered a warning to entered into his rest, so sure obstinate unbelievers shall be excluded; as sure as the unbelieving Jews fell in the wilderness, and never reached the Promised Land, so sure unbelievers shall fall into destruction, and never reach heaven; as sure as Joshua, the great captain of the Jews, could not give them possession of Canaan, because of their unbelief, notwithstanding his eminent valor and conduct, so sure even Jesus Himself, the Captain of our salvation, notwithstanding all that fulness of grace and strength that dwells in Him, will not, cannot, give to final unbelievers either spiritual or eternal rest: it remains only for the people of God; others, by their sin, abandon themselves to eternal restlessness.

V. 11—16. In this latter part of the ch. the apostle concludes, first, with a serious, repeated exhortation, and then with proper and powerful motives.

1. A serious exhortation, v. 11. Observe, 1. The end proposed,—rest spiritual and eternal; the rest of grace here, and glory hereafter; in Christ on earth, with Christ in heaven. 2. The way to this end prescribed,—labor, diligent labor; this is the only way to rest; they who will not work now, shall not rest hereafter. Thus should Christians call on themselves, and one another, to be diligent in duty; and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

11. Here we have proper and powerful motives to make the advice effectual, which are drawn,

1. From the dreadful example of those who have already perished by unbelief, lest any man fall, &c. To have seen so many fall before us, will be a great aggravation of our sin, if we will not take warning by them.

2. From the great help and advantage we may have from the Word of God, to strengthen our faith, and excite our diligence, that we may obtain this rest, v. 12. By the Word of God, understand either the essential or the written Word: the essential Word, as John 1:1. indeed, what is said in this verse is true of the Lord Jesus Christ; but most understand it of the written Word, the Holy Scriptures, which are the Word of God. That is quick; very lively and active, in seizing the conscience, cutting the sinner to the heart, comforting him, and binding up the wounds of the soul. They know not the Word of God, who call it a dead letter; it is not only quick, but quickening; it is a vital light, a living word. It is powerful. When God sets it home by his Spirit, it convinces powerfully, converts powerfully, comforts powerfully. It is sharper than any two-edged sword; it is the sword of the Spirit, Eph. 6:17. the two-edged sword that cometh out of the mouth of Christ, Rev. 1:16. it enters where no other sword can, and makes a more critical dissection. It pierces to the dividing asunder of the soul and the spirit, the soul and its habitual prevailing temper; it makes a proud soul humble, a perverse spirit meek and obedient. Those sinful habits that are become, as it were, natural to the soul, and in a manner one with it, are separated and cut off by this sword. It cuts off ignorance from the understanding, rebellion from the will, enmity from the mind, which, when carnal, [or selfish,] is enmity itself against God. This sword divides between the joints and the marrow, the most secret, close, and intimate parts of the body; this sword can cut off the lusts of the flesh, as well as the lusts of the mind, and make men willing to undergo the sharpest operation to mortify sin. It is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, even the most secret and remote thoughts and designs. It will discover to men the variety of their thoughts and purposes, the vileness of them, the bad principles they are actuated by, the sinister [selfish] and sinful ends they act to. The Word will turn the inside of a sinner out, and let him see all that is in his heart. Now such a Word as this must needs be a great help to our faith and obedience.

3. From the perfections of the Lord Jesus Christ, both of his person and office. (1.) His Person, particularly his omniscience, v. 13. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight. This is agreeable to what Christ speaks of Himself, Rev. 2:23. The motions and workings of our heads and hearts may be called creatures of our own; but these are open and manifest to Him with whom we have to do, as the Object of our worship, and the High Priest of our profes-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. Blessed be God, that 'the Gospel is preached to us,' even as to the primitive Christians, and far more clearly than to Israel of old. 'Exceedingly great and precious promises' are 'given to us,' of entering into 'the heavenly rest;' yet we should 'rejoice with trembling,' in our outward advantages, lest any of us should be found at last to come short of the blessing, and to sink under proportionably deeper condemnation, through unbelief. Nay, it is a very dreadful consequence of a wavering profession, or an inconsistent or negligent conduct, that it often causes men to 'seem to come short,' even when they are launching into eternity; they leave the world in gloomy doubt, and their survivors in distressing uncertainty, whether they are gone to heaven or to hell. Let us then 'give diligence, that we may have an abundant entrance ministered to us into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord.' (Note, 2 Pet. 1:10, 11.)—Under every dispensation, God has declared man's rest to be in Him, and in his love, as the only suitable and sufficient happiness of the soul, and faith in his promises, through his Son, as the only way of 'entering into that rest.'—Let sinners then 'labor to enter into this rest,' lest they should fall after the example' of ancient unbelievers, and perish with heaven before their eyes; let believers abide in Christ by faith and obedience, and learn to delight in his holy day, and sacred ordinances, as earnest of their expected eternal Sabbath, and preparations for it; let them bear up under fatigues and hardships, in the prospect of heavenly rest; and, if ever drawn aside, let them recollect these things, and say to themselves, 'Return unto thy rest, O my soul.' Ps. 116:7. P. O. 1—9.

each individual.—The apostle's reasoning, from the O. T., concerning another rest, entirely distinct from the rest in Canaan; even 'the keeping of a Sabbath reserved for the people of God,' which unbelievers even in Canaan came short of, is conclusive against all those moderns, who labor to prove, that the doctrine of a future state of righteous retribution was no part of the religion of Israel, as well as against the ancient Sadducees. The proof of this doctrine, from comparing two passages in the books of Moses, with one in the Psalms, is as clear and conclusive, as our Lord's proof of the resurrection, by what JENOVAN said to Moses from the bush: (Note, Mat. 22:22—33.) and probably the apostle knew the Pharisees in general would have allowed, that all who rejected it 'erred, not knowing the Scriptures.'

SCOTT.

(9, 10.) 'I am of opinion, with some eminent critics, that we have in these vs. direct intimation and express authority, for the change of the Sabbath, (from the 7th to the 1st day of the week.) "There remaineth therefore a sabbatism (or the keeping of a Sabbath) to the people of God; for he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his." The word in the original, translated rest, is sabbatismos, being different from the word so translated throughout the whole of the preceding and subsequent context,—which is anapausis. I am perfectly satisfied as to the meaning of the passage, as an intended and explicit declaration of the change of the Sabbath.' Rev. Dr. WARDLAW.

(10.) His rest.] 'I. e. God's rest. There is no more dilleulity in calling that rest, which is promised to believers, the rest of God, than there is in saying, that man "was formed in his image;" that Christians "are made partakers of the divine nature;" or, that "we shall be like Him, when we shall see Him as He is." The rest of God, is rest like that which God enjoys.'

STUART.

(11.) 'What doctrine (than that of future punishment) can better alarm the careless professor? How much will the fear of his Father's wrath, quicken the child of God in making his calling and election sure! The more he is afraid of God's righteous judgments, the more will he strive, with a filial spirit, to work out his salvation. What like this doctrine can impress on saints their everlasting obligations to Christ? Can they feel that He has redeemed them from endless perdition, and not abound in love and praise? And what can make them so deeply anxious for sinners, as the sense of eternal misery which awaits the impenitent? What fervent prayers must it excite for their conversion! Who can realize their danger, and yet do nothing for their salvation? [522]

The doctrine of endless punishment is, therefore, of great practical influence.' Rev. Dr. CHURCH.

BLOOMER.

V. 12, 13. It has been greatly controverted, whether the Holy Scriptures, or the personal 'Word of God,' be spoken of in these vs., but Paul never calls our Lord by that title, and it appears to me, that the apostle meant the written Word; and that he made a gradual transition from the word spoken, to Him who spake it.—By exhibiting the glory of the divine perfections, men's relations and obligations to the great Creator, the spirituality, extent, excellency, and sanction of the law, the evil and desert of sin, and the depravity of the human heart, in a variety of ways, and a multiplicity of experiments, it forces conviction of guilt and danger on the sinner, and compels him, as it were, to condemn himself and seek deliverance; nor can any kind of delusion or hypocrisy stand before its penetrating energy, when experimentally and fully preached, and applied to the hearts of men according to their various characters: being, in plain language, a 'discerner' of men's most secret thoughts and intentions, so that it often shows them their most hidden purposes, and makes them afraid of being openly named and exposed, as if the preacher knew their hearts, far better than they did themselves, and had a register before him even of those sins which they have forgotten. Mat. 7:23, 29. John 8:3—11. 1 Cor. 14:20—25. 2 Cor. 4:1, 2. 10:1—6.—The expressions 'naked and opened,' are supposed to refer to the sacrifices, which were flayed, and opened, and left down the spine; [note, Gen. 15:10.] and then every part of the body and of the intestines which were before concealed, was exposed to the exact inspection of the priest. Sc.

(12.) Dividing, &c.] 'Allusion is rightly recognised here to the priests (in sanctification) cutting the victim down to the back-bone, so as to search every bone and part, that all might be found pure before the sacrifice. At the same time, it is not improbable there may be allusion to that most horrible exercise of the machaira distomos, by which (as we find from classical writers) a man was sometimes absolutely cut in two, down the back-bone.' BLOOMER.—The most approved commentators generally understand by Word, in this verse, not the Logos, or Son of God, but the Word of God, i. e. the Bible, and especially the commination or threatening of God.

14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

15 For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

sion ; and as the high priest inspected the sacrificed beasts, cut them up, [directly through the back-bone, from end to end,] to see whether they were sound at heart ; so all things are thus dissected, and lie open to the piercing eye of our great High Priest. Some read the words, to whom with us there is an account or reckoning. This omniscience of Christ, and the account we owe of ourselves to Him, should engage us to persevere in faith and obedience till He has perfected all our affairs. (2.) We have an account of the excellency and perfection of Christ, as to his office, and this particular office of our High Priest. The apostle first instructs Christians in the knowledge of their High Priest, what kind of Priest He is, and then puts them in mind of the duty they owe on this account.

[1.] What a kind of High Priest Christ is, v. 14. that is, 1st. A great High Priest, much greater than Aaron, or any of the priests of his order. The greatness of our High Priest is set forth, 1. By his being passed PRACT. OBS. V. 12-16. Instead of objecting to a heart-searching ministry, and choosing such lifeless, feeble instructions, as are more like a shaken reed, than 'a two-edged sword,' let us lay open our inmost souls to the piercing strokes of the distinguishing Word of God, that we may learn our need of that great High Priest, even the Son of God, who now pleads for us before his Father's throne in heaven. In proportion as we know and condemn ourselves, and abhor our sins, He will become more and more precious to our souls, and we shall cleave to Him more constantly. Let us then approach continually to 'the throne of grace,' where our reconciled God deems it his peculiar honor to pardon rebels.

(11.) 'The writer now proceeds to the consideration of a subject introduced, ch. 5:1. where he calls Christ the High Priest of the Christian religion. As apostle and perfect of God's house, he had already compared Him with Moses, 3:2-6. and grounded on the result a very solemn and affectionate warning against unbelief, 3:7-19. To encourage the Hebrew Christians, he had spoken also of the rest [see on 4:1-3.] which remains for the people of God, and warned them in view of that against the same penalty. 4:11-13. Now, therefore, having completed the former comparison, he proceeds to the latter, and compares Christ as High Priest with the Levitical order of priesthood, which comparison extends to 10:13. the end of the doctrinal part of the epistle.—The comparison of Christ with angels, ch. 1. is short ; that with Moses, ch. 3. still shorter ; but this, with the Aeronical priesthood, makes up the body of the epistle ; not because the Jews exalted the High Priest above Moses, for this they did not, though they held the office sacred ; but because Christ, in the office of High Priest, performed that peculiar duty, which of all others made Him what He was, the Savior of sinners, the REDEEMER of lost men ; because, as Priest, He offered an expiatory sacrifice, which takes away the sins of the world and makes Him the propitiator of their offences.—No part of the Scriptures explain the nature and object of the Jewish ritual, in a manner so spiritual, so satisfactory, so clear, so worthy of God, and so profitably to us, as chs. 5-10. of this epistle. As a key to the O. T. they deserve the most attentive and thorough study, by all who would understand the Bible. As a

into the heavens. The high priest under the law, once a year, went out of the people's sight, into the holiest of all, where were the sacred signals of the presence of God ; but Christ once for all is passed into the heavens, to take the government of all on Him, to send the Spirit to prepare a place for his people, and to make intercession for them. 2. By his name, Jesus ; a Physician and a Savior, and one of a divine nature ; and, therefore, having divine perfection, able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by Him. 2lly. He is not only a great, but a gracious High Priest, merciful, compassionate, and sympathizing with his people, v. 15. Though so great, He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities in such a manner as none else can be ; for He was Himself tried with all the affliction and trouble incident to our nature in its fallen state ; and this, not only that He might be able to satisfy for us, but to sympathize with us. But, then, 3lly. He is a sinless High Priest. He was in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin. We seldom meet with temptations but they give us some shock ; but our great High Priest came off clear in his encounter with the devil, who could neither find any sin in Him, nor fix any stain on Him. He was tried severely by the Father. It pleased the Lord to bruise Him ; yet He sinned not ; He was holy, harmless, and undefiled ; and such a High Priest became us. Having thus told us what a one our High Priest is, the apostle proceeds to show us,

[2.] How we should demean ourselves toward Him,

1st. Let us hold fast our profession of faith in Him, v. 14. never deny Him, never be ashamed of Him before men. Let us hold fast the enlightening doctrines of Christianity in our heads, the enlivening principles of it in our hearts, the open profession of it in our lips, and our practical and universal subjection to it in our lives.

2lly. We should encourage ourselves by the excellency of our High Priest, to come boldly to the throne of grace, v. 16. A throne speaks authority, awe, and reverence ; a throne of grace, great encouragement, even to the chief of sinners. There grace reigns, and acts, with sovereign freedom, power, and bounty. It is our duty and interest to be often found before this throne of grace, waiting on the Lord in all the duties of his worship, private and public. Our business and errand there should be, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. And, beside the daily and to answer the prayers of those who supplicate his favor in the name of his beloved Son ; let us improve the day of his patience, and approach in his appointed way ; let us come with believing boldness, as well as with adoring reverence and humble repentance ; let us seek for mercy to pardon our sins, to compassionate our miseries, and to supply our necessities ; and let us supplicate grace sufficient for us, in all our trials and temptations, and to enable us for the service of every day ; thus waiting, as humble penitents, at 'the throne of grace,' which is our best preparation for appearing before the tribunal of our omniscient and holy Judge.

statement and vindication of the great work of Christ, and the atonement He made for sin, they stand in the first rank of all the scriptural writings. hands, as the great agent between God and man. (2.) That he might offer sacrifices for sin; that is, the offerings appointed to make atonement. Thus Christ is constituted a High Priest for both these ends. Our good deeds must be presented by Christ, to render ourselves and them acceptable; and our ill deeds must be expiated by the sacrifice of Himself, that they may not condemn and destroy us.

4. How this high priest must be qualified, v. 2. (1.) He must be one that can have compassion on two sorts of persons; the ignorant, or those guilty of sins of ignorance; and those that are out of the way, the way of truth, duty, and happiness; he must have pity to intercede with God for them, and a divine tenderness and patience to instruct and lead them back into the right way. (2.) He must also be compassed with infirmity; and so be able to sympathize with us. Thus Christ was qualified; and this gives us great encouragement to apply ourselves to Him under every affliction; for in all the afflictions of his people He is afflicted.

5. How the high priest was to be called of God; he must have both an internal and an external call; for no man taketh this honor to himself, v. 4. that is, no man ought to do it, no man can do it legally; if any does it, he must be reckoned an usurper, and treated accordingly. Here, observe, It is a very great honor to be employed to stand between God and man, one while representing God and his will to men, at another time representing man and his case to God; and dealing between them about matters of the highest importance, intrusted on both sides with the honor of God, and the happiness of man. Observe, God is the Fountain of all honor, especially true spiritual honor; also of true authority, whether He calls any to the priesthood in an extraordinary way, as He did Aaron, or in an ordinary way, as He called his successors. Those only can expect assistance from God, and acceptance with Him, that are called of God; others may expect a blast instead of a blessing.

6. How this is brought home and applied to Christ, v. 5. Observe, here, Though Christ reckoned it his glory to be made a High Priest, yet He would not assume that glory to Himself. He could truly say, I seek not mine own glory, John 8:50. As God, He was not capable of any additional glory, but as Man and Mediator He did not run without being sent; and if He did not, surely others should be afraid to do it.

7. The apostle prefers Christ before Aaron, both in the manner of his call, and in the holiness of his person. In his call God said unto Him, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee, Ps. 2:7. referring both to his eternal generation as God, his wonderful conception as Man, and his perfect qualification as Mediator. Now God never said thus to Aaron. Another expression God used in the call of Christ, we have Ps. 110:4. here, v. 6. God the Father appointed Him a Priest of a higher order than that of Aaron; the priesthood of Aaron was to be but temporary; that of Christ, perpetual; Aaron's successive; Christ's, after the order of Melchisedec, personal, and perpetual, He being without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, as more largely, ch. 7. Christ is here preferred to Aaron in the holiness of his Person. Other priests were to offer up sacrifices, as for the sins of others, so for themselves, v. 3. But Christ needed not to offer for sins for Himself, for He had done no violence, neither was there any deceit in his mouth, Is. 53:9. And such a High Priest became us.

8. We have an account of Christ's discharge of this his office, and of the consequences of that discharge, v. 7-9.

(1.) The discharge of his office, v. 7. For a time He took to Himself flesh, that He might suffer and die for us; in which He prayed, especially in his agony, and was heard, heard in that He feared. His human nature was ready to sink, and would have sunk, had He been quite forsaken in point of help and comfort from God; but He was heard in this, He was supported under the agonies of death, carried through death; and they that are thus saved from death shall be fully delivered at last by a glorious resurrection, of which the resurrection of Christ was the earnest and first-fruits.

(2.) The consequences of this discharge of his office, v. 8, 9, &c. By these, his sufferings, He learned obedience, though a Son, v. 8. though never disobedient, yet He never performed such an act of obedience as when He became obedient to death, even to the death of the cross. Here, as in prayer and supplication, He has left us an example, that we should learn by all our afflictions a humble obedience to the will of God. We need affliction, to teach us submission. By these, his sufferings, He was made perfect, and became the Author of eternal salvation to all who obey Him, v. 9. Christ, by his sufferings, was consecrated to his office, consecrated by his own blood. By his sufferings He consummated that part of his office which was to be performed on earth, making

V. 5, 6. The Jews had paid far more regard to the predictions of his kingdom, than to those of his priesthood, through their prejudices of the Levitical law.—Some expositors, interpreting the expression, 'This day have I begotten Thee,' of Christ's resurrection, (though that was only the proof, and not in any sense the cause or origin of his Sonship, Acts 13:24-37.) have argued, that He did not officiate as a Priest, till after He arose from the dead, as if offering Himself as a Sacrifice for sin was no part of his priestly office! But the typical meaning of the legal ceremonies, will sufficiently expose the gross absurdity of this supposition, as we proceed with the subject.—The quotations are from the Sept., which accords to the Heb. Ps. 2:7. 110:4.

(5.) Christ glorified not, &c. [He did not assume the mediatorial office without divine authority, nor affect to appear, before his time, in the pomp and splendor of it.]

(6.) Another place. [Ps. 110:4. The object of the quotation is simply to prove, that the office of high priest was conferred on Christ by divine appointment. Comp. v. 4. The particulars of the comparison, in respect to the priesthood of Christ and Melchisedec, are suspended, till the writer has introduced other considerations relative to Christ, as a Priest, 5:7-9. and given vent to his feelings of concern for those whom he addressed, by suggesting various considerations, adapted to reprove, 5:11-14. to warn, 6:1-9. as well as to excite and animate them, 6:10-20.]

V. 7-10. Our Lord, though perfectly free from all sin, came as near to the condition of a sinner as He possibly could. This was 'in the days of his flesh,' subsequent to his incarnation, and previous to his exaltation; when his human nature became incapable of suffering, and was made inconceivably glorious. 1 Cor. 15:50-51. Phil 3:20, 21. 'Was heard, &c.' 'Because of his piety,' his reverence of the divine Majesty, his love, and his zeal for the glory of the Father; or, as many commentators explain it, 'He was heard, and delivered from his fear.' No doubt the most distressing dread of that awful wrath of God against our sins, which He had undertaken to endure, was one cause of our Lord's agony in the garden. This might well oppress his human soul, without his having the least apprehension, that He should finally sink under it, or come short of 'the joy set before Him;' or the least distrust of the Father's faithfulness to his engagement,—without any defect in his patience and submission, or any degree of sin. For the prospect of the temporary and even transient enduring of such a load of guilt and wrath was sufficient to excite the most overwhelming consternation. John 12:27-33. Thus, it appeared, that He had communion with his brethren in the passion, or feeling, most foreign to the divine nature, even fear, which is never ascribed to God, as many others are; and that He could sympathize with them in it, and deliver them from it. And, indeed, though He was not delivered from dying, but willingly submitted to it; yet He was delivered from that agonizing terror, which dictated his 'supplications with strong crying and tears,' and was afterwards calm and composed under his heaviest sufferings.—Learned men have clearly shown, by pertinent examples, that the words may well bear this sense; and it seems more exactly to suit the apostle's argument. Our Lord was not indeed spared, or exempted from any part of his expiatory sufferings, concerning which He said, notwithstanding the strong reluctance of his holy human nature to such exquisite and complicated sufferings, 'Thy will be done;' knowing that it was 'not possible for that cup to pass from Him,' consistently with the glory of the Father, and the salvation of his people. Yet the horror of his mind was allayed; He was strengthened to support the immense weight of suffering which was laid upon Him; his sacrifice was accepted for his people; He was raised from the dead, exalted to the mediatorial throne, and invested with the power of 'saving to the uttermost all who come to God through Him.' Even when 'the Son of God' Himself was appointed to the high priesthood, He learned the difficulty of obeying the divine commandments, in the present circumstances of human nature, amidst the temptations and trials to which men are exposed; of this He acquired an experimental knowledge, as far as could consist with sinless perfection, and even his perfect obedience became more exalted and honorable, through his whole life, by the enlargement of his human powers, and by the things which He suffered; so that his zeal and love were never so admirable and astonishing, as when He agonized in the garden, and hung upon the cross.—It is observable, that Melchisedec is never mentioned in the Old Test. after the account of his meeting with Abraham, as recorded in Genesis; except in Ps. 110. and never in the New Test. except in the apostle's argument in this epistle concerning the high priesthood of Christ; a subject of infinite importance, and proved beyond all reasonable doubt, by this single argument. 7:1-22. How much may depend on a detached testimony of Scripture, which superficial readers pass over unobserved, and to which perhaps very few carefully attend! Sc.

PRACT. OBS. Fallen men cannot approach God, except on 'a mercy-seat' through a high priest, and by a sacrifice for sin; but 'a priest, who was encompassed with infirmity,' and needed to offer sacrifice for himself, however he might compassionate the ignorant and transgressors, could never be an effectual advocate with God for them. Indeed, in the more ordinary work of the ministry, the consciousness of our own sinfulness and unworthiness is well suited to render us tender to the weak, the erroneous, the tempted, and the fallen, 'seeing we ourselves are compassed with infirmity;' and, though this service differs widely from that of the priests under the law, yet no man should take it upon him, till it appear to other competent persons, as well as himself, that 'he is called of God' to it.—Christ alone is qualified and authorized to be our High Priest his dignity and excellency, as the Son of God, and his appointment by the Father to that office, give efficacy to his ministrations. . . . His obedience in our nature encourages our attempts to obey, and our expectations of support and comfort, under all the temptations and sufferings to which we are exposed; for 'being made perfect' for this great work, 'He is become the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him.' But do we obediently receive his instructions as our Prophet, trust in his sacrifice and intercession as our Priest, and make his commandments the rule of our conduct, as the

the Author,—the grand Cause of their salvation, and they shall own Him as such for ever.

V. 10—14. Here the apostle returns to what he had, in v. 6. cited out of Ps. 110. concerning the peculiar order of the priesthood of Christ, that is, the order of Melchisedec. And here,

1. He declares he had many things he could not say to them concerning this mysterious person called Melchisedec, whose priesthood was eternal; and therefore the salvation procured thereby should be eternal also. Some think, he means, that the things hard to be uttered, were not so much concerning Melchisedec himself, as concerning Christ, of whom Melchisedec was the type.

2. He assigns the reason why he said not the things he had to say, concerning Christ, our Melchisedec, and what it was that made it so difficult for him to utter them, and that was, the dulness of the Hebrews to whom he wrote; Ye are dull of hearing. There is a difficulty in the things themselves, and ministers may be weak to speak clearly about them; but generally the fault is in the hearers; dull hearers make preaching difficult, and even those who have some faith, may be dull hearers.

3. He insists on the faultiness of this infirmity of theirs; it was not a mere natural infirmity, but a sinful infirmity, and more in them than others, by reason of the singular advantages they had enjoyed for improving in the knowledge of Christ, v. 12. Proficiency might have been reasonably expected from these Hebrews, and from those to whom much is given, much is expected. Observe, the sad disappointment of those just expectations; Ye have need that one should teach you again, &c. Some persons, instead of going forward in Christian knowledge, forget the very first principles they had learned long ago; and, indeed, they that are not improving under the means of grace, will be losing. It is a sin and shame for persons that are men, for their age and standing in the church, to be children and babes in understanding.

4. The apostle shows how the various doctrines of the Gospel must be dispensed to different persons. There are in the church babes, and persons of full age, v. 12—14. and there are in the Gospel, milk, and strong meat. Observe, Babes, unskilful in the Word of righteousness, must be fed with milk, the plainest truths, and these in the plainest manner, Isa. 28:10. Christ despises not his babes; He has provided suitable food for them. It is good to be babes in Christ, but we should endeavor to pass the infant state; we should always remain in malice children, but in understanding we should grow up to a manly maturity. There is strong meat for those that are of full age, v. 14. The deeper mysteries of religion belong to those who have learned first principles, and well improved them. Observe, There have been always in the Christian state children, young men, and fathers. Every true Christian, having received a principle of spiritual life from God, stands in need of nourishment to preserve that life. The Word of God is food and nourishment to the life. It is the wisdom of ministers rightly to divide the Word of truth, and to give to every one his portion; milk to babes, and strong meat to those of full age. There are spiritual senses, as well as those that are natural; and it is by use and exercise that these are improved, made more quick and strong to taste the sweetness of what is good and true, and the bitterness of what is false and evil. Not only reason and faith, but spiritual sense, will teach men to distinguish between what is pleasing and what is provoking to God, between what is helpful and what is hurtful to our own souls.

the cross, we can never fully know; but we may conclude they were very dreadful, from the complaint forced from Him. Mat. 27:46. Mark 15:34. It is indeed unaccountable by any ordinary principles, applicable to virtuous sufferers, that a character such as that of Jesus, pure, unmoved by opposition and continually, and persecution, and unawed by threatening and danger, should exhibit such an oppressive, overwhelming sense of pain and distress; while thousands of men, nay, thousands of the more delicate sex, in prospect of like or apparently greater sufferings, have been perfectly calm, collected, and even triumphant.—Who then can regard Jesus as a simple sufferer in the ordinary way, on the cross, and explain the mysteries of his dreadful horror, before and during the hours of crucifixion? And what was it, in respect to which He was heard, or delivered? Not the sufferings of the cross, for these He endured.—The context necessarily limits the hearing, or deliverance, to something in his petitions which appertained to suffering, which was an object of deal. What could it be but the dread of sinking under the agony of being deserted by his Father? Mat. 27:46. subjects of his kingdom? To those who thus come to Him, and yield themselves to Him, and to those alone, He will be ‘the Author of eternal salvation.’ Of this great High Priest, and of his merits, grace, and authority, ministers have many things to say, which they will not be able to utter in a proper manner, unless ‘He give them a month and wisdom,’ for that purpose; and men’s prejudices are so many and so strong, that they are generally more ready to take offence, than to receive instruction. Nor are professed Christians, even old professors of evangelical doctrine, so docile as might be expected; many are far from that spiritual maturity, which is proportioned to the time, during which they have attended to the Gospel. These things are very discouraging; but we should still exercise patience and meekness, and ‘seek out acceptable words,’ in which to convey instructions in the best manner we can.—We ought indeed to begin with simpler truths, and so gradually proceed to such as are more deep and perplexing; and to employ ourselves peculiarly about first principles, by an experimental and practical improvement of the truth; thus we shall gradually be matured in judgment, and enabled to digest strong meat; and our spiritual senses will be habituated to a just and exact discernment of good and evil, which will greatly tend to our stability, comfort, and fruitfulness in the faith of Christ. V. 11—14. Every man, who could only receive the simpler and more common truths of religion, without applying his mind to the more experimental and exalted parts of it, must be considered as a babe in Christ, how long soever he had professed the Gospel, being evidently ‘unskilful in the Word of righteousness.’ But the more sublime doctrines of Christianity, which immediately related to the counsels of God for his own glory, and the display of his perfections by the redemption of Christ, and which indeed were obscurely intimated in the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, were as ‘strong meat’ for those who were matured in knowledge, judgment, and experience, being the proper nourishment of their faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections.—(12) Principles.] ‘The elements of the beginning of the oracles of God,’ a contrast to ‘the elements of this world,’ ‘the beggarly elements’ of human traditions, and abolished ceremonies.—(13) Word of righteousness.] Or that Word, by which men are shown the way of righteousness, both ‘the righteousness of faith’ for justification, and ‘the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience.’ SCOTT.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—8. 1. We have here the apostle's advice to the Hebrews to go on and make progress in their spiritual life; and for their greater encouragement, he puts himself with them, Let us go on. But how, in order to growth, must Christians leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ? they must not lose, despise, forget them; no, they must lay them up in their hearts, as the foundation of all their profession and expectation; but they must not rest in them, not be always laying the foundation, they must go on, and build upon it. Some were but weak, yet others had gained more strength; and they must be provided for suitably. Grown Christians must be willing to hear the plainest truths preached, for the sake of the weak; so the weak must also be willing to hear the more difficult and mysterious truths preached, for the sake of those who are strong. He hoped they would be growing in their spiritual strength and stature, and so be able to digest stronger meat. The apostle mentions several foundation-principles, which must be well laid at first, and then built upon; these are six.

(1.) Repentance from dead works, that is, conversion and regeneration, repentance from a spiritually dead state and course; as if he had said, 'Your minds were changed by conversion, and so were your lives. Take care that you return not to sin again, for then you must lay again the foundation; there must be a second conversion; a repenting not only of, but from, dead works.'

(2.) Faith toward God; a firm belief of his existence, nature, attributes, and perfections, the trinity of persons in the unity of essence, the whole mind and will of God as revealed in his Word, particularly what relates to the Lord Jesus Christ. Observe, Repentance from dead works, and faith toward God, always go together. Both are foundation-principles, which should be once well laid, but never pulled up, so as to need to be laid over again; we must not relapse into infidelity.

(3.) The doctrine of baptisms, that is, of being baptized by a minister of Christ with water, in the Name of the Trinity, as the initiating sign or seal of the covenant of grace; and of an inward baptism of the Spirit sprinkling the blood of Christ on the soul, for justification, and the graces of the Spirit for sanctification. This is a foundation to be rightly laid, and daily remembered, but not repeated.

(4.) Laying on of hands; either on persons passing solemnly from their initiated state by baptism to the confirmed state, by returning the answer of a good conscience toward God, and sitting down at the Lord's table. This passing to complete church-membership, was performed by laying on of hands, which the extraordinary conveyance of the gift of the Holy Ghost continued. This once done, all are obliged to abide by, and not to need another solemn admission, as at first, but to go on, and grow up, in Christ. Or by this may be meant, ordination to the ministerial office, by fasting and prayer, with laying on of the hands of the presbytery; and this is to be done but once.

(5.) The resurrection of the dead, that is, of dead bodies; and their re-union with their souls, to be eternal companions in weal or woe, according as their state was toward God when they died, and the course of life they led in this world.

(6.) Eternal judgment, determining the soul of every one, when it leaves the body at death, and both soul and body at the last day, to their eternal state.

These are the great foundation-principles ministers should clearly and convincingly unfold, and closely apply. In these the people should be well instructed and established, and from these they must never depart; without these, the other parts of religion have no foundation to support them.

2. The apostle declares his readiness and resolution to assist the Hebrews in building themselves up on these foundations till they arrive at perfection, v. 3. hereby teaching them, that resolution is very necessary, in order to progress in religion, and that made in the sincerity of our hearts, and in a humble dependence on God, both for strength, assistance, and righteousness; acceptance, time, and opportunity. Ministers should not only teach people what to do, but go before them, and along with them, in the way of duty.

3. He shows that this spiritual growth is the surest way to prevent apostasy. And here,

(1.) He shows how far persons may go in religion, and, after all, fall away, and perish for ever, v. 4, 5. They may be enlightened. Some of the ancients understand this of their being baptized; but it is rather

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. Dead works.] Such as are done by men dead in sin, and which expose them to the condemnation of eternal death. — Baptisms.] Either the various legal washings, whether by immersion, ablution, or sprinkling, or John's baptism, and that of Christ, which were distinct from each other, or the traditional baptisms of the Pharisees, 9:8—10. Mat. 3:5, 6. 15:1, 2. Mark. 7:3, 4. John 2:22—26. — Some expositors explain these 'principles of the doctrine of Christ,' as relating wholly to instructions contained in the Old Test., concerning the Messiah's kingdom; and some confine them exclusively to the new dispensation. Others, favoring the former scheme, interpret 'the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands,' to signify the legal purifications, and the laying on of the hands of the offerer on the head of the sacrifice, as typical of repentance and faith, including the words in a parenthesis. But, understanding by 'principles,' not the most fundamental truths, or parts of Christianity, but the introductory elements, the lower and easier beginnings of it, as letters are the first principles, or elements, or beginning of learning, we may see a propriety in the interpretation above given. Some of the things mentioned were, though most important in themselves, yet the more obvious and simple parts of Christianity, and the others were external, connected with the first profession of it, on which the Jews were apt to lay far more stress than they ought to have done; and it was obvious for the apostle to mention those, when he would call them off from the introductory elements of Christianity, to its more sublime and spiritual doctrines. — (2) Eternal judgment.] Mat. 25:46. 25:41—46. 'Interpreters observe, that the doctrine of Origen, touching the period of the torments of the damned, is here condemned; and indeed the primitive fathers, not Origen himself excepted, taught the contrary. — If we do not the will of Christ, says Clemens Romanus, nothing will deliver us from eternal punishment. ... The punishment of the damned, says Justin Martyr, is endless punishment, and torment in eternal fire. Irenaeus, in his symbol of faith, makes this one article, That Christ would send the ungodly and unjust into everlasting fire. — Tertullian declares, that all wicked men are appointed to eternal torments; and if any man, says he, thinks the wicked are to be consumed, and not punished, let him remember, that hell-fire is styled eternal, because designed for eternal punishment, and their substance will remain for ever, whose punishment doth so. Cyprian saith, that the souls of the wicked are kept, with their bodies, to be grieved with endless torments. There is no measure nor end of their torments, saith Minutius. Lastly, Origen reckons this among the doctrines defined by the church; That every soul, when it goes out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of eternal life and bliss, if its deeds have rendered it fit for life; or is to be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if its sins have deserved that state.' Whitby. Scott.

(1.) Perfection.] 'More eminent degrees of improvement in the doctrine of Christ.' Donnr. And so Owen, substantially, referring to 1 Cor. 2:6. Ed. — A maturer state, compared with the state of immaturity complained of, eh. 5:12—14. in which sense and connexion the reasoning is plain. STUART. — Bloomf. understands it of 'the doctrine of justification by faith, as the word of righteousness, eh. 5:13.' Grotius (also Rosenm.) 'of the interpretation of the figures of the O. T., which, by the dispensation of God, had all a bearing on the Gospel; and Carpzov. and Dwidorf, 'of Christ's priesthood, like that of Melchisedec.' —

Dead works.] 'The sins of unregenerate persons, called dead in respect of their nature and their end. — The expression is peculiar to this epistle.' OWEN. — 'Works producing death.' ROSEN. And so Stuart; or, as it may be, he says, 'vicious and sinful works.' — Calvin understands it of 'a formula of confession among catechumens when admitted to baptism, in which they acknowledged, they had formerly been strangers and aliens.' Ed.

(1—3.) Leaving, &c.] The connexion of argument here, Prof Stuart takes to be as follows: 'Christian brethren, who ought by this time to be qualified to be teachers, remain no longer in your present ignorance of religion; and let it be no longer necessary to teach you the first rudiments of Christian doctrine. God willing, we must make progress. Stationary we cannot remain; we must advance or recede. But guard well, I beseech you, against receding; for it is impossible, &c., v. 4—8.' Baptisms.] See note, at end of Heb.

(2.) Doctrine of baptisms.] 'Those instituted under the Mosaic dispensation, to inculcate moral purity on all who would draw near to God with acceptance; or that appointed by Christ, as the rite by which we enter into the church.' DODDR. So Rosenm., but with particular reference to 'the baptism of proselytes.' — Bloomf. sees no ground on which to form a decided opinion between this and other interpretations. — Calvin takes the words as 'in apposition,' and gives the sense thus: 'Not laying again the foundation of penitence and faith in God, and the resurrection of the dead; which is the doctrine of baptism and the imposition of hands. Therefore,' says he, 'if you include in a parenthesis the two members, "the doctrine of baptisms and the imposition of hands," the context flows better.' — Stuart takes the plural, baptisms, to be used for the singular, and refers to Jn. 1:13. 1 Cor. 7:2. 2 Cor. 7:3. for a similar use of other words. Storr, he says, supposes the term to be used in a kind of distributive sense; so the sentiment is, 'the doctrine that every believer must be baptized.' — The Syr. here, has the singular. — Lord Barrington understands the phrase of, 'the baptism of water and the effusion of the Holy Spirit, by which the first disciples among the Jews, and the first converts among the devout and idolatrous Gentiles, were initiated. He also explains, the laying on of hands, as referring to the immediate communication of spiritual gifts by means of the apostles, (and so Stuart, in this particular.) These, he thinks, were first principles, (in which also Stuart accords,) as baptism was the first entrance into the church, and laying on of hands, the great evidence of it, as faith and repentance are the substance of Christianity, and a resurrection and eternal judgment, the great motives leading men to embrace it. Ed. — The doctrine.] 'I. e. which is emblematically represented or signified in baptism, namely, our communion with, and conformity to Christ, in his death and resurrection, by the remission of sins, and the regenerating and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit.' M'LEAN, in Henry, abr.

(3.) This will we do, &c.] 'I. e. explain the more sublime doctrines of the Gospel, especially as they regard the O. T. and its accommodation to Christ, or the comparison of the history and economy of the old covenant with those of the new.' BLOOMF. — We.] 'The frequency with which the writer uses the first person plural, is worthy of remark. It gives a more delicate cast to his reproofs, and to his comminations.' STUART.

4 For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost,

5 And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,

6 If they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.

PRACT. OBS. V. I.—6. The first principles and 'rudiments of the doctrine of Christ,' should be accurately understood, before men attempt to learn the sublimer mysteries of the Gospel; yet they must not always be confined to them, but should be 'led on towards perfection,' both in knowledge, experience, and holiness.—We cannot but lament to see those, who once made a credible profession of the Gospel, turn back into the world and sin, and thus in a measure 'crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame;' as if, on trial, they found nothing in his salvation worthy of their constant regard! In general, we should warn and pray for such persons; but there are cases, in which we must let them alone, as having no prospect of their being 'renewed to repentance.' We should beware, and we ought to caution others, of every approach to so tremendous a precipice; yet in doing this, we should keep close to the Word of God, and be careful not to wound and terrify the weak, or discourage the fallen and penitent.—The

V. 4—6. It was the more proper to write, in the manner proposed, to the Hebrews, as those who adhered to Christianity had been sufficiently for a long time instructed in the introductory lessons; and those who had renounced it were in a most hopeless condition.—These vs. have caused immense perplexity and distress to many timid and conscientious Christians; and they have been supposed to contain a cogent objection to the doctrine of the believer's final perseverance. These things must be in a measure adverted to, in our examination of them. It should be remembered, that the apostle wrote in an age of miracles; and to the Hebrews, among whom the Holy Spirit was first poured out, in his extraordinary operations, as well as his renewing influences. Acts 2:37—40, 5:32, 6:8, 8:14—17, 10:44—48, 19:1—4. The persons whose case is described, had been 'once enlightened,' and had obtained that measure of knowledge concerning the truth and nature of Christianity, which enabled them to make a satisfactory profession of it, in order to their admission into the church; 'they had tasted the heavenly gift, and been made partakers of the Holy Ghost;' being at their baptism, or afterwards, by the laying on of the apostles' hands, endued with some measure of spiritual gifts, or miraculous powers; such as speaking with tongues, or discoursing with supernatural fluency on divine subjects; so that, in this respect, 'they had tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Spirit,' and their own experience proved to them the truth of the Gospel. They had moreover 'tasted of the good Word of God,' and their convictions, impressions, and affections, made them sensible that it was a 'good Word,' of a holy and salutary tendency, and that it was for their good to attend to it; and their purposes of doing so had produced such hopes and joys, as have been described in the case of the stony-ground hearer. Mat. 13:20—22, Mark 6:15—23. Thus they had tasted of 'the powers of the world to come,' in their temporary, realizing apprehensions of a future state, and of its happiness or misery; or, they had experienced the powers communicated, under the dispensation of the Messiah. All these things, except miraculous gifts, often take place in the hearts and consciences of men, in these days, who yet continue unregenerate. They have knowledge, convictions, fears, hopes, joys, and seasons of apparent earnestness, and deep concern about eternal things; and they are endued with such gifts as often make them acceptable and useful to others; but they are not truly humbled; they are not spiritually minded; religion is not their element and delight; they do not cordially receive Christ in all his offices, or sincerely love the spiritual excellency of his people, his ordinances, and commandments. In short, the old nature, the principle of selfishness, is impressed, affected, interested, alarmed, or pleased; but a new nature is not produced, and, therefore, 'in time of temptation they fall away.'—In respect of spiritual gifts, or the miraculous 'powers of the Holy Ghost,' our Lord most expressly declares, that He will reject many who had been partakers of them, saying to them, 'I never knew you.' Mat. 7:21—23, 1 Cor. 13:1—3.—Yet those who received gifts of this kind from Christ, through the laying on of the hands of his apostles, had a personal demonstration of the truth of Christianity, which the most enlightened apostates, in these days, can scarcely be supposed to have had; and, therefore, but few instances now occur, in which a conclusion concerning their state can be unreservedly drawn in the apostle's awful words, though the case of some may be nearly similar, and they alone are immediately concerned in them. 10:26, 27, 2 Tim. 4:14, 15, 1 John 5:16—18. If the persons, whom the apostle had thus characterized, (for he spake of none else,) had totally apostatized from Christianity, and were become its avowed enemies, it was not the minister's duty to bestow pains about them; it was found 'impossible to renew them to repentance,' and thus to 'restore them in the spirit of meekness.' For, considering the clear light against which they sinned in so desperate a manner, it might be concluded, that they had committed 'the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit,' and had ascribed his operations, and the miracles wrought, by themselves and by others, as well as the holy joys and experience of true believers, to a satanical influence. Mat. 12:31, 32. In fact, as far as they could, 'they crucified to themselves the Son of God afresh;' despitefully showing that they approved the conduct of those who nailed Him to the cross; they assented to their deed, and apparently wished it in their power to repeat his ignominy and torture; and they 'put Him to an open shame,' by renounc-

to be understood of notional knowledge and common illumination, of which persons may have a great deal, and yet come short of heaven, as Balaam, Numb. 24:3. They may taste of the heavenly gift, feel something of the efficacy of the Holy Spirit in his operations on their souls, causing them to taste something of religion, and yet be like persons in the market, who taste of what they will not come up to the price of, and so but take a taste, and leave it. They may be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, that is, of his extraordinary and miraculous gifts; they may have cast out devils in the name of Christ, and done many other mighty works. Such gifts in the apostolical age were sometimes bestowed on those who had no true saving grace. They may taste of the good

Word of God; they may have some relish of gospel-doctrines, may hear the Word with pleasure, remember it, and talk well of it, and yet never be cast into the form and mould of it, nor have it dwell richly in them. They may have tasted of the powers of the world to come, may have been under strong impressions concerning heaven and hell; have felt some desires of heaven, and dread of going to hell. These lengths hypocrites may go, and, after all, turn apostates. And, observe, It is not here said of them, that they were truly converted, or justified; there is more in true saving grace than in all here said of apostates. This therefore is no proof of the final apostasy of true saints. These indeed may fall frequently and foully, but yet not totally nor finally from God.

general invitations and promises of the Gospel include all, who are humbly willing to embrace them; humiliation and self-condemnation, when united with some hope and cries for mercy, are such tokens of God's 'renewing a man to repentance,' as should be pointed out to him, for his encouragement in expecting forgiveness. On the other hand, the self-confident should be taught, that knowledge, gifts, terrors, subsequent joys, and high affections, are no certain evidence of a man's conversion, without brokenness of heart, hatred of sin, a spiritual mind, and 'faith which worketh by love.' But those whom it is indeed 'impossible to renew unto repentance,' are commonly the last to think themselves in so awful a state; and such as are most harassed by fears of this kind, may generally be assured that this is not their case, whatever they have been, or done; unless they actually run into ungodliness and wickedness, through total desperation. SCOTT.

ing his religion, blaspheming his name, joining his enemies, and doing evil to his disciples. They were, therefore, to be considered, as given up to final obduracy, and left to the awful judgment of God.—This conclusion, however, by no means authorized ministers finally to exclude from the communion of the church, those apostates, who professed repentance, and appeared to be true penitents, much less did it warrant such rigor in less aggravated cases. In general, encouragement should be held forth to all, who appear penitent; nay, to induce the most obdurate to repentance; and means are in most cases to be used for the recovery of such as have most lamentably turned aside; though ill success will often discourage the benevolent endeavor. The very words, however, of this awful passage prove, that all who 'are renewed unto repentance' shall be pardoned; and that God leaves all to final impenitence, whom He determines not to save. Tim. 2:23—26. So that the trembling sinner, who pleads guilty, and cries for mercy, can have no ground for discouragement from this passage, fairly interpreted, whatever his crimes have been; for all who are 'renewed to repentance' are saved, and none else. Neither does it prove that any one, who is 'in Christ a new creature,' ever becomes a final apostate from Him. 3, 10.—(4) Impossible.] If God 'swear in his wrath that any man shall not enter into his rest,' 3:17—19, he is so given up to hardness of heart, that his case resembles that of fallen angels, or the damned; and the same impossibility of repentance takes place as exists in respect to them.—Enlightened.] 10:32, Lu. 11:36, Jn. 1:9, Eph. 1:18, 3:9, 2 Tim. 1:10, Rev. 12:1, 21:21—23, 22:5.—There is no scriptural ground for the ancient opinion, that baptism is meant; and most mischievous conclusions naturally are deducible from it; especially as to the state of those, who have sinned grievously after baptism. SCOTT.

'They had been taught the principles or doctrines of Christianity.—They had enjoyed the privileges or means of grace which the new religion afforded.—They had experienced, in general, various gifts and graces,—extraordinary influences,—bestowed by the Spirit.—They had cherished the hopes which the promises of the Gospel inspire.—They had witnessed, (and perhaps he means to say, some had experienced,) those special, miraculous powers, by which the Gospel was fully shown to be a religion from God; comp. 2:4. Thus they had the fullest evidence, internal and external, of the divine origin and nature of the Christian religion. Consequently, if they apostatized from it, there remained no hope of their recovery.'—Calvin seems to consider the several forms of expression here used, as descriptive rather of a single state of mind or experience. Hence he speaks of the apostle as calling 'the knowledge of the Gospel,' which these persons have, 'illumination,' 'taste of the heavenly gift,' &c. Tasted the good word.] Note, 2 Pet. 2:20, 21. But see above on v. 1—3.—'We have nothing here,' says McLEAN, 'but what may be found in the stony-ground hearers, Lu. 8:13, in those destitute of Christian love, 1 Cor. 13:1—3, and in such as Christ shall at last disown, as workers of iniquity. It is a distinguishing trait in God's children that they draw not back unto perdition, but believe to the saving of the soul, Heb. 10:39, and endure to the end, Mat. 24:13, Jn. 10:15, 17, 28, 29.'—Owen also is full to the same point, and that nothing can hence be concluded concerning real believers. So, in effect, Doddr., Rosenm., Bloomf., Diod., and Ernesti, nearly.—Rosenm. refers to Heb. 10:26, for an example of such as are here spoken of; understands the apostle as saying, he would not for such repeat the first elements of religion, presuming it would be in vain, such men being like bad ground, on which whatever is sown, is thrown away. This makes the connexion with v. 9, easy and natural. Stuart, however, and Calvin, apparently, understand the apostle as though he thought real Christians might thus fall away. 'For,' says Calvin, 'if any one ask, why the apostle makes mention of such apostasy, when he addresses believers,—fideles,—I answer, that, hereby, their danger may be seasonably pointed out, so that they

(2.) The apostle describes the dreadful ease of such as fall away after they had gone so far in the profession of religion. They declare that they approve of what the Jews did in crucifying Christ, and that they would be glad to do the same thing again, if in their power. This is the nature of apos-

tasy. It is impossible to renew them again unto repentance; very few instances can be given of those who have gone so far and fallen away, and yet ever have been brought to true repentance, such a repentance as is indeed a renovation of the soul. Some have thought this is the sin against the Holy Ghost, but without ground. The sin and misery of apostates is exemplified by a proper similitude, taken from the ground that after much cultivation brings forth nothing but briars and thorns, v. 8. To give this the greater force, here is observed the difference between good ground and bad. The good ground drinketh in the rain that cometh often upon it. Believers not only taste of the Word of God, but drink it in; and this good ground bringeth forth fruit answerable to the cost laid out, for the honor of Christ, and the comfort of his faithful ministers, who are, under Christ, dressers of the ground. But the bad ground bears briars and thorns; it is not only barren of good fruit, but fruitful in bad; unbelievers are fruitful in sin and wickedness; then such ground is rejected. God will concern Himself no more about such wicked apostates; will command the clouds that they rain no more upon them; such ground is nigh unto cursing; and its end is to be burned. Apostasy will be punished with everlasting burnings, the fire that shall never be quenched.

V. 9—20. The apostle, having applied himself to the fears of the Hebrews, to excite their diligence, and prevent their apostasy, now applies himself to their hopes, declares the good hope he had that they would persevere, and proposes the great encouragements they had in the way of their duty.

I. The good hope he had that they would endure to the end, v. 9. Observe, 1. There are things that accompany salvation, that are never separated from it; things that show the person to be in a state of salvation, and will issue in eternal salvation. 2. These things are better things than ever any hypocrite or apostate enjoyed. 3. It is our duty to hope well of those in whom nothing appears to the contrary. 4. Ministers must sometimes caution those of whose salvation they have good hopes. And those who have such hopes should yet consider seriously how fatal a disappointment it would be if they should fall short. Thus they are to work out their salvation with fear and trembling.

II. Arguments and encouragements to go on in the way of their duty. 1. That God had wrought a principle of holy love and charity in them, which had discovered itself in suitable works which would not be forgotten of God, v. 10. what is done to any in the name of God, shall not go unrewarded. 2. Those who expect a gracious reward for their labor of love, must continue in it as long as they have ability and opportunity. 3. Those who persevere in a diligent discharge of their duty, shall attain to the full assurance of hope in the end. Observe, Full assurance is a higher degree of hope; and is attainable by great diligence and perseverance.

III. Caution and counsel how to attain this full assurance of hope to the end. They should not be slothful; must not love their ease, nor lose their opportunities, but follow the good examples of those who had gone before, v. 12. Where learn, There are some who from assurance are gone to inherit the promises, are got safe to heaven. The way they came to the inheritance, was that of faith and patience. If we ever expect to PRACT. OBS. V. 7—12. A negligent and unfruitful profession of the Gospel, tends directly to the brink of that dreadful precipice above described.—Let us then fear, with humble caution and watchful prayer, in respect of ourselves, and let us hope the best of others that the case will admit of. Whilst we warn such as are in evident danger, we should encourage those, in whom we judge that the 'things which accompany salvation' are found. Ministers should frequently specify these, in an experimental and distinguishing manner; and, in respect of them, all should examine themselves, frequently and seriously, instead may take heed to themselves.' And Stuart answers to the same question, by saying, 'Because God treats Christians as free, rational agents; and guards them against defection, not by physical power, but by a moral mean adapted to their natures.' He adds, 'Whatever views may be adopted in explanation of this subject, there can be no doubt, that Christians are to be solemnly and earnestly warned against the danger of apostasy, and consequent final perdition.'

(6.) If they shall fall away. 'And have fallen, &c.' STUART.—'But have,' &c. ROSENM.—'And yet have,' &c. MACKN.—'If they fall totally away; which must certainly be the sense, or it would prove, contrary to the plainest fact, that it is impossible to recover Christians who have fallen into great and wilful sins.'

V. 7, 8. This was a solemn warning to professed Christians to beware, that they were not left to apostatize, as the punishment of their unfruitfulness.—(7) Herbs. Here only. All vegetable productions are included. SCOTT.

V. 9, 10. While the apostle spoke such awful and alarming truths, with reference to the case of those, to whom he knew them to be reasonable, he would not have it thought, he had an unfavorable opinion of the Hebrew Christians in general, or those whom he immediately addressed in particular. The expression [We are persuaded, &c.] is remarkable and emphatical; the things before spoke of (Note, 4—6.) might, or they might not, 'accompany,' or be inseparably connected with 'salvation'; but those things of which he now spoke, were always found in true converts, and never in any others.—'Nothing availeth in Christ . . . but faith which worketh by love,'—'but a new creation.' 'Hereby we know, that we are passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren.'—'To be spiritually minded is life and peace.' Mat. 5:3—12. Rom. 8:5—9. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15, 16. Eph. 2:4—10. 1 John 3:13—15. There is no intimation in the whole Bible, that any one, who ever had these things, came short of eternal salvation, or that any apostate ever possessed them. Labor of love, &c. The apostle especially referred, in this, to those Jewish converts, who had manifested their love to the name of God, as revealed in Christ, by their works, yea, their laborious services, and 'in ministering to the saints' for his sake. 10:32—34. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. Of this, a most admirable specimen had been given, after the day of Pentecost; and many of them still continued the same disinterested, self-denying conduct. ID.

(9.) May not this suggest, that the apostle had spoken to the possibility, and fear, perhaps, of there being among the Hebrews some hypocrites, or deceived persons, of the character described; and that he would not be understood as having implied, that 'real Christians' or true believers could thus fall away, even though it should be natural to address them as if in danger; and they are so addressed here and elsewhere in the sacred Scriptures? ID.

V. 11, 12. The apostle and his brethren earnestly desired and longed, that every one of those whom he addressed might thenceforth show the of perplexing themselves about those texts, which were inserted to serve as beacons, to warn the presumptuous against fatal rocks, and not to affright the humble and cautious.—We should earnestly desire, that we, and all who are called Christians, may 'give the same diligence' in such good works, as the most eminent saints in the primitive ages did. This is the scriptural way of acquiring and preserving 'the full assurance of hope,' to the end of our lives. Many have thus 'by faith and patience inherited the promises,' but no slothful professor of Christianity has any evidence that he is following them to heaven. SCOTT.

same attentive and disinterested 'diligence' in good works, which some had heretofore shown; that so evidencing his faith to be genuine, beyond all reason for doubt or hesitation, he might obtain and possess the 'full assurance of hope' in respect of his final salvation, to comfort him under all trials, even to the end of life. Thus the whole company would be distinguished from 'slothful,' unfruitful professors of Christianity, and be approved as 'imitators' of their pious progenitors; and of those Christians, who, by faith in the promises of God, and 'patient continuance in well-doing,' and in waiting his time of deliverance from trials, had at length entered into rest, and were actually enjoying that perfect felicity, in which all the promises of God to his people centered. 10:35—39.—This is a conclusive proof of the immediate happiness of believers after death, if the above be the true interpretation; and, after having maturely considered the other interpretations of the passage, which some learned men have given, the author hesitates not to say, that he considers them as absurd. He has no doubt the apostle meant to lead his readers to meditate on the happiness of Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and Job, and all others, who had on earth lived by faith in the promises of God, especially the great promise of a Savior, and eternal salvation by Him; had patiently waited, labored, and suffered, in the obedience of faith; and in consequence were, at the time when the apostle wrote this, inheriting the promises of God, of eternal blessings through Christ to all believers.—'Assurance of hope' (11) should be distinguished from 'the assurance of understanding,' Col. 2:1—4. and from 'the assurance of faith,' 10:19—22. He who so understands the Gospel, as to perceive the relation of each part to all the rest, and its use as a part of one grand design; in something of the same manner, that a skillful anatomist understands the use and office of every part of the human body, in relation to the whole, has 'the full assurance of understanding'; and those things which appear inconsistent, useless, or superfluous to others, he perceives essentially necessary to the system, or great design. The man who is fully convinced, that this consistent and harmonious, though complicated design, is the work and revelation of God, and has no doubt the things testified are true, that the promises and threatenings will be fulfilled, and that Christ will certainly save all true believers, has 'the full assurance of faith'; though he may, through misapprehension, or temptation, or other causes, doubt of his own personal interest in this salvation. But he who, beyond doubt or hesitation, is assured, that he himself is a true believer, interested in all the precious promises, sealed by the sanctifying Spirit, and 'a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed,' has 'the full assurance of hope.'—'The full assurance of faith' is the duty of every one; for he who doubts the truth of the testimony, or the faithfulness of the promises of God, questions his veracity; 1 Jn. 5:9, 10. but 'the full assurance of hope' must be obtained and preserved by diligence; and, though the want of it may generally be traced to a criminal source, it is not the proximate duty of every one, in fact of a very few. 1 Pet. 3:13—16. 2 Pet. 1:10, 11. A man may inherit as they do, we must follow in the same way: those who thus follow, shall overtake them at the end, and be partakers of the same blessedness.

IV. A clear, full account of the assured truth of the promises of God, v. 13. to the end. They are all confirmed by the oath of God, all founded in the eternal counsel of God, therefore may be depended on.

1. They are all confirmed by the oath of God. And here observe, he specifies the oath of God to Abraham; which, being sworn to

PRACT. OBS. V. 15—18. The privileges of the Gospel belong to the diligent and fruitful, who walk in the steps of Abraham, to whom the promises were made. These obtain an inward testimony, by the powerful operation of the Holy Spirit, and give abundant proof in their lives, that they are 'the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise.' Because their infirmities are many, and their trials great, their condescending and compassionate Father is 'willing more abundantly to show them the immutability of his counsel,' that, by his faithful Word and irrevocable oath, 'they might have a strong consolation, having fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them.' Indeed the Lord, having 'sworn by Himself, that He hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but that he should repent and live,' holds out abundant encouragement to all, whom He 'warns to flee from the wrath to come,' and invites to 'lay hold for refuge on the hope set before them.'

question, whether the paper in his possession be a genuine bank-bill, or a counterfeit; and yet have no doubt, either of the ability or willingness of the Directors of the Bank, to honor every genuine bank-bill.—'The full assurance of hope,' in the highest meaning of the words, is attained by comparatively few, and is seldom if ever preserved, without some degree of diminution or variation, through the remainder of life; but a prevailing assurance of acceptance, and of final salvation, is the privilege of all diligent and consistent Christians, and is, in them, seldom greatly interrupted, except by misapprehension, or by peculiar temptations and conflicts, or by their being betrayed into sin. SCOTT.

V. 13—15. The quotation is not made exactly from the Sept. nor does it entirely accord with the Heb. Gen. 22:16, 17. but it gives the general meaning, in words suited to the occasion. Id.

V. 16—20. No anchors can at all times secure the ship from driving, or being wrecked; but this hope in the divine promise, oath, and covenant, was so 'sure' in itself, and kept the possessor so 'steadfast' in his adherence to the truth and cause of God, that it always secured him from final ruin, and, in proportion to its vigorous exercise, from temporary failures also, and against the storms of incumbent temptations. Id.

(18.) 'By the two immutable things, the best commentators, ancient and modern, understand the promise of God, of itself immutable (see Rom. 11:29.) and the oath of God, added in condescension to human in-him as the father of the faithful, remains in full force to all true believers. Abraham, in due time, obtained the promise; it was made good to him after he had patiently endured; and so it will be to them. There is always an interval, sometimes a long and trying one, between the promise and the performance; but those who patiently endure, shall assuredly obtain the blessings promised, as sure as Abraham did. The end and design of an oath is, to make the promise sure, and to encourage those to whom it is made, to wait with patience till the time for performance comes, v. 16. So men swear by the greater, not by creatures, but by the Lord Himself, to end all dispute, either within our own breasts, or with others, especially with the Promiser. Now if God would condescend to take an oath to his people, He will surely remember the nature and design of it.

2. The promises of God are all founded in his eternal counsel. The promise of blessedness God has made to believers, is not a rash and hasty thing, but the result of his eternal purpose, a purpose agreed on in council, and settled there between the eternal Father, Son, and Spirit. These counsels of God can never be altered; for nothing new can arise to Him who sees the end from the beginning.

3. The promises of God, founded on these immutable counsels of God, and confirmed by the oath of God, may safely be depended on; for here we have two immutable things, the counsel and the oath of God, in which it is impossible for God to lie, contrary to his nature, as well as to his will. Here observe,

(1.) Who they are, to whom God has given such full security of happiness. The heirs of the promise, by inheritance, by virtue of their new birth, and union with Christ. We are all by nature children of wrath; it is by a new and heavenly birth that any are born heirs to the promise. They are such as have fled for refuge to the hope set before them; not to the cities of refuge, provided for persons pursued by the avenger of blood, but to a much better refuge prepared by the Gospel; a refuge for all sinners who shall have the heart to flee to it; yea, though they have been the chief of sinners.

(2.) What God's design toward them is, in giving them such securities,—that they might have strong consolation. Observe, God is concerned for the consolation of believers, as well as for their sanctification; the comforts of this world are too weak to bear up the soul under temptation, persecution, and death; but the consolations of the Lord are neither few nor small.

(3.) What use the people of God should make, of that most refreshing and comfortable hope of eternal blessedness that God has given them. This is, and must be, unto them, for an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast, &c. v. 19. Here, we are as a ship at sea, in danger of being cast away. Our souls are the vessels; the comforts, expectation, graces, and happiness of our souls the precious cargo; heaven is the harbor to which we sail; the temptations, persecutions, and afflictions we encounter, are the winds and waves that threaten our shipwreck. We have need of an anchor to keep us sure and steady, and that anchor is our gospel-hope; as in our day of battle it is our helmet, so in our stormy passage through this world it is our anchor. It is sure and steadfast; sure in its own nature, steadfast as to its Object, an anchor cast on the rock, the Rock of ages; not in the sands, but within the veil, and upon Christ. As He is entered within the veil, to intercede with God, in virtue of that sacrifice which He offered up without the veil, hope fastens on his sacrifice and intercession. As He is the Forerunner of his people, He is the Earnest and First-fruits of believers, both in his resurrection and in his ascension. And He abides there, a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec; whose priesthood shall never fail, till it has accomplished its whole work and design, which is the full and final happiness of all who have believed on Christ. This should engage us all to clear up our interest in Christ, that we may fix our hopes in Him as our Forerunner. Let us then love heaven the more on his account, and long to be there with Him, where we shall be for ever safe, and for ever satisfied.

CHAP. VII. The doctrine of the priestly office of Christ is so excellent in itself, and so essential a part of the Christian faith, that the apostle loves to dwell upon it. Nothing made the Jews so fond of the Levitical dispensation, as the high esteem they had of their priesthood; and it was doubtless a sacred and most excellent institution; but here the apostle assures them, that by receiving the Lord Jesus they would have a much better High Priest, a priesthood of a higher order, and consequently a better dispensation or covenant, a better law and testament.

Let then such as have fled to Christ, and have their hope sealed to them, 'by the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit,' rely confidently on the power, truth, mercy, and covenant of God, amidst all the opposition of earth and hell. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:15—17, 28—39. Let them pray for faith and hope equal to their security, staying their souls on the Word of God, and on the mediation of their great High Priest, in all dangers, afflictions, and temptations; let them follow the steps, as well as trust in the merits, of the great Forerunner of his people; for, while those who go before on earth, to prepare the way and make all ready for others, are commonly in many respects greatly their inferiors; our 'Forerunner,' is the 'Lord of hosts, the King of glory,' 'God manifested in the flesh.'—Let us, therefore, 'set our affections on things above,' and wait patiently for his appearance, when we also shall most certainly 'appear with Him in glory.' Col. 3:1—4. SCOTT.

firmity.' BLOOMF.—Stuart says, they are 'the oath of God that Abraham should have a son, the Messiah, Gen. 22:18. and the oath that He should be a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, Ps. 110:4.' Ep.

(18.) 'No real misery can be removed, or benefit conferred, by doctrines which want the seal of certainty. And were the Gospel a human invention, or checked by any rational suspicion, that it may turn out a fable; it might retain its brilliancy, its sublimity, and even some portion of its interest, but the charm of its consolation would be gone. Nay, it would add gall to bitterness, by fostering a hope that the next hour might laugh to scorn. But we may dismiss our anxiety. The promises, no man can deny, are exceeding great; yet they derive their value from assurances, which, by satisfying the hardest condition of evidence, render doubt not only inexcusable, but even criminal. Oh, it is this which makes Christianity glad tidings to the depressed and perishing!'

Rev. Dr. J. M. MASON.

(19, 20.) Anchor.] 'With respect to the metaphor, nothing is more frequent among classical writers. From this, however, it must not be inferred that Paul had read Greek classics, for the expression seems to be proverbial.'

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The apostle had repeatedly referred to the prophecy, that the Messiah should be 'a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec,' signifying, that his priesthood would resemble

God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him;

2 To whom also Abraham gave a tenth of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace;

3 Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually.

4 Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils.

5 And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham:

6 But he, whose descent is not counted from them, received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises.

7 And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better.

V. 1-3. The ch. foregoing ended with a repetition of what had been cited once and again before, out of Ps. 110: 4. This ch. is as a sermon on that text; here the apostle sets before them some of the strong meat he had spoken of before, hoping they would by greater diligence be better prepared to digest it.

The great question that first offers itself, is, Who was this Melchisedec? All the account we have of him in the Old Test., is in Gen. 14: 18, 19, &c. and in Ps. 110: 4. but the opinions concerning him, that are best worthy our consideration, are these three:

1. The rabbins, and most of the Jewish writers, think he was Shem the son of that of Melchisedec, and not that of Aaron. (6:20. Notes, 5:5-10. Ps. 110:4.) He therefore next proceeded to illustrate that prophecy, and argue more explicitly from it, as compared with the scriptural account of this extraordinary person. Gen. 14:18-20. 'Salem' probably means Jerusalem; 'Priest of the most high God,' i. e. by an appointment of which we have no information.—The union in Melchisedec, of royal authority with the priestly office, (which were divided between the family of Aaron and that of David, in the case of Israel,) plainly pointed to the Messiah, as 'a Priest on his throne.' Zech. 6:12, 13.—It is not so much as known from which of Noah's sons Melchisedec descended. Moreover, nothing was recorded of Melchisedec respecting the 'beginning of his life, or the end of his days,' and priesthood. In all these respects the silence of the Scripture, being intentional, and referring to the great Antitype, is mentioned in language taken from the instruction to be conveyed, rather than from historical fact, of which learned men have brought instances from other writers of antiquity.—Without genealogy.] Not elsewhere. No genealogy is given of Melchisedec; and those of Christ lead back, not to Aaron, but to David and Judah. (6:14.) Made like.] Here only. 2:17.—The composition is probably intended to add energy. Made very like.

(1.) Melchisedec.] Henry's view, 3. is the one, substantially, of which Stuart says, it 'lies on the face of the sacred record, Gen. 14. and Heb. 7. and is the only one which can be defended on any tolerable grounds of interpretation.' Of the other most popular opinion, that Melchisedec was Christ, he observes, that 'it forces the interpretation that "Christ is like unto Himself;" or, that a formal comparison is here instituted between Christ and Himself.' Ep.—'The design of the apostle in this ch. is, not to declare the nature or exercise of Christ's priesthood; the former he had spoken of, ch. 5. and of the latter he speaks, ch. 9. but here he speaks of its excellence and dignity, and that not absolutely, but in comparison with the Levitical priesthood.' OWEN.—Having reproved them for the little progress they had made in Christian knowledge, 5:11. 6:3. warned them against the dreadful consequences of abandoning the Christian religion, 6:4-8. and encouraged them to hold fast their faith, and hope, even to the end, by the example of Abraham, and the oath of God to assure them of an adequate reward, 6:9-19 the writer now returns to make the comparison of Christ, as High Priest, with Melchisedec, whose name, with that of Christ, had been already more than once introduced, 5:6, 10. The subject he pursues to the end of 7:25. where he resumes the topic broken off at 5:10. and completes what he had to say concerning it, 7:26-28.

Noah, who was king and priest to those they descended from, after the manner of the other patriarchs; but it is not probable he should thus change his name. Besides, we have no account of his settling in the land of Canaan.

2. Many Christian writers have thought him to be Jesus Christ Himself, appearing by a special dispensation and privilege to Abraham in the flesh, and who was known to Abraham by the name Melchisedec, which agrees very well to Christ, and to what is said, John 8: 56. Much may be said for this opinion, and what is said in v. 3. does not seem to agree with any mere man; but then it seems strange to make Christ a type of Himself.

3. The most received opinion is, that he was a Canaanite king, who reigned in Salem, and kept up religion and the worship of the true God; that he was raised to be a type of Christ, and was honored by Abraham as such.

But we shall leave these conjectures, and labor to understand, as far as we can, what is here said of him by the apostle, and how Christ is represented thereby, v. 1-3.

(1.) Melchisedec was a king, and so is the Lord Jesus; a King of God's anointing; the government is laid on his shoulders, and He rules over all for the good of his people.

(2.) He was king of righteousness; his name signifies the righteous king. Jesus Christ is a rightful and a righteous King; rightful in his title, righteous in his government.

(3.) He was king of Salem, that is king of peace; first king of righteousness, and after that, king of peace. So is our Lord Jesus; He by his righteousness is peace. Christ speaks peace, creates peace, He is our Peace-Maker.

(4.) He was priest of the most high God, qualified and anointed in an extraordinary manner to be his priest among the Gentiles. So is the Lord Jesus; He is the Priest of the most high God, and the Gentiles must come to God by Him; it is only through his priesthood that we can obtain reconciliation, and remission of sin.

(5.) He was without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, v. 3. This must not be understood according to the letter; but the Scripture has chosen to set him forth as an extraordinary person, without giving us his genealogy, that he might be a fitter type of Christ, who as Man was without father, as God without mother; whose priesthood is without descent, did not descend to Him from another, nor from Him to another, but is personal and perpetual.

(6.) He met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him. The incident is recorded Gen. 14: 18. &c. Thus our Lord Jesus meets his people in their spiritual conflicts, refreshes them, renews their strength, and blesses them.

(7.) Abraham gave him a tenth part of all, v. 2. that is, as the apostle explains it, of all the spoils; and this Abraham did, either as an expression of his gratitude, or as a testimony of his homage and subjection, or as an offering vowed and dedicated to God, to be presented by his priest. Thus are we obliged to make all possible returns of love and gratitude to the Lord Jesus, to pay our homage and subjection to Him as our King, and to put all our offerings into his hands, to be presented by Him to the Father, in the in-eense of his own sacrifice.

(8.) Lastly, This Melchisedec was made like unto the Son of God, and abideth a priest continually. He bore the image of God in his piety and authority, and stands on record as an immortal high priest; the ancient type of Him who is the eternal and only begotten of the Father, who abideth a Priest for ever.

V. 4-10. Let us now consider, as the apostle advises, how great Melchisedec was, and how far his priesthood was above that of the order of Aaron, v. 4, 5, &c. The greatness of this man and his priesthood appear,

1. From Abraham's paying the tenth of the spoils unto him; and it is well observed, that Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec in Abraham, v. 10. Now Levi received the office of the priesthood from God, and was to take tithes of the people, yet even Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec, as to a greater and higher priest than himself; therefore that High Priest who should afterward appear, of whom Melchisedec was a type, must be much superior to any of the Levitical priests, who paid tithes, in Abraham, to Melchisedec. By this argument of persons' doing things of courtesy, is plain from the apostle, and that the tenth was not accidental, is evident from the extreme antiquity of the custom, in all nations, of making these grateful offerings, and that in this very proportion.' BL.

(3.) Without father, &c.] The commentators generally agree that what is meant, is, that his name was not preserved, or the names of his parents, in the sacred genealogies. Stuart suggests, that it may mean, that his parents were not of 'kingly rank.' Ed.—Made like, &c.] 'The apostle is not laboring to show that Melchisedec, in respect to his priesthood, was made like to Christ; but vice versa. Ps. 110:4 compares the Son of God as Priest, to Melchisedec; and this is the order of nature and propriety.' STUART.—Doddr. suggests, it may refer to lack of 'priestly ancestors.' Ed.

V. 4-10. The argument, arising from the fact, that one of Abraham's contemporaries was in some things superior to him, as here stated, served to introduce with great advantage a most conclusive argument against the perpetual obligation of the Levitical law, and the continuance of the Aaronic priesthood, and that of the covenant made with the nation of Israel at Sinai. Ex. 19:5. The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Hebrews to 'consider how great' a person their inspired lawgiver had represented Melchisedec to be, not so much in respect of his regal authority, as of his priesthood; when even 'the patriarch Abraham,' the honored father of their whole nation, who was not one of Melchisedec's subjects, or in any other way connected with him, owned his superiority, and paid him tithes, as the representative 'of the most high God.' The Levites, indeed, were ordered in the law, as the Lord's tribe, 'to take tithes of their brethren,' the descendants of Abraham, of which the priests had a tenth part for their portion; Lev. 27:30-33. Num. 18:21-32. but Melchisedec, who was not of Abraham's family, received tithes of that patriarch himself. Nay, as 'the priest of the most high God,' he pronounced a solemn benediction upon him, to whom the promises, concerning the Messiah, and 'all nations being blessed in him' were made. Now it was well known, and certain beyond 'all contradiction,' that the inferior character was to be blessed, in this authoritative manner, by the superior and more honorable; as children by their parents, and the people by the priests. 11: 20, 21. Num. 6:24-27. So that, some One higher than Abraham, or Aaron, or any mere man of his race, was evidently to be expected, as 'a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec.' Under the law, indeed, mere sinful, dying men took tithes of their brethren, and so one generation after another rose up to receive them; but, in the case of Melchisedec, one, concerning whom it was only 'witnessed that he liveth,' (that is, nothing is said either of his birth or his death,) received tithes of 8 And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom <sup>e</sup> it is witnessed that he liveth.

9 And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

11 If <sup>b</sup> therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken, pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident <sup>i</sup> that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.

17 For he testifieth, <sup>j</sup> Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec.

18 For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the <sup>k</sup> weakness and unprofitableness thereof.

that are matters of right or injury in the loins of their predecessors, we have an illustration how we may be said to have sinned in Adam, and fallen with him in his first transgression, [and how we may be saved by Christ.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—18. Every part of Scripture was intended, in one way or other, to honor our 'King of righteousness and peace,' our glorious High Priest and Savior; and the more accurately we examine it, the fuller will be our conviction, that 'the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.' Luke 24:25—31, 44—49. John 5:33—44. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9, 10. May we then learn in simplicity to trust in Him, and submit to Him, to copy his righteousness, to seek the peace of his kingdom, to devote all that we are and have to his service, and to expect blessings from Him alone!—No further change shall now take place in the priesthood, or the worship of the church, by any future rev-

Abraham, as the representative of his posterity, by which it was intimated, that a Priest should arise, to whom the whole Israel of God would pay their devoted homage, and from whom they would receive the blessing. So that, 'to speak it in a word,' the apostle might say, that even Levi, and all the priests descended from him, paid tithes to Melchisedec, 'for they were in the loins of their father,' and representative, 'when Melchisedec met him.' This incontestably proved the inferiority of the Levitical priesthood to that of the Messiah, yea, its absolute dependence on Him, and subserviency to Him.—Indeed, it may be said, that CHRIST also 'was in the loins of Abraham;' but his divine nature, his miraculous and immaculate conception, and his being the intended and predicted Antitype, sufficiently show that He was excepted, as the Seed to whom especially the promises were made.—This argument of the apostle, illustrates the nature of our union with Adam, and representation by him, and our participation of the consequences of his apostasy; as also the method of our recovery by 'the second Adam, the Lord from heaven.' Gen. 2:16, 17. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:12—19. SCOTT.

Scott.] We were in Adam's loins when he sinned, and the guilt and depravity contracted by the human nature when it was in our first parents, are equitably imputed and derived to the same nature, as it is in all other persons naturally descended from them. They justly adhere to the nature, and it must be by an act of grace if ever they be taken away.

2. From Melchisedec's blessing of Abraham, who had the promises, v. 6, 7. Where, (1.) Observe Abraham's great dignity and felicity,—that he had the promises. (2.) Melchisedec's greater honor, in that it was his place and privilege to bless Abraham; and it is an incontestable maxim, that the less is blessed of the greater, v. 7. He who gives the blessing, is greater than he who receives it; therefore Christ, the Antitype of Melchisedec, the Meritor and Mediator of all blessings to the children of men, must be greater than all the priests of the order of Aaron.

V. 11.—28. Observe, the necessity there was of raising up another priest, after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron, by whom that perfection should come, which could not come by the Levitical priesthood; which therefore must be changed, and the whole economy with it, v. 11, 12, &c. Blessed be God, we may have perfect holiness and perfect happiness by Christ in the covenant of grace, according to the Gospel, for we are complete in Him. It is asserted, that, the priesthood being changed, there must of necessity be a change of the law; there being so near a relation between the priesthood and the law, the dispensation could not be the same under another priesthood; a new priesthood must be under a new regulation, managed in another way, and by rules proper to its nature and order. It is not only asserted, but proved, that the priesthood and law are changed, v. 13, 14. The priesthood and law by which perfection could not come, are abolished, and a Priest is risen, and a dispensation now set up, by which true believers may be made perfect. Now, that there is such a change, is obvious,

1. There is a change in the tribe of which the priesthood comes: before, it was the tribe of Levi; but our great High Priest sprang out of Judah, of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning the priesthood, v. 14. This change of the family shows a real change of the law of priesthood.

2. There is a change in the form and order of making the priests: before, in the Levitical priesthood, they were made after the law of a carnal commandment, or law of primogeniture; but our present High Priest was made after the power of an endless life; the life and immortality He had in Himself, were his right and title to the priesthood, not his descent from former priests. This makes a great difference in the priesthood, and in the economy too, and gives the preference infinitely to Christ and the Gospel. The very law which constituted the Levitical priesthood, supposed the priests to be weak, frail, dying creatures; but the High Priest of our profession holds his office by that innate power of endless life which He has in Himself, not only to preserve Himself alive, but to communicate spiritual and eternal life to all those who duly rely on his sacrifice and intercession. Some think the law of the carnal commandment refers to the external rites of consecration, and the carnal offerings that were made; but the power of endless life, to the spiritual living sacrifices proper to the Gospel, and the spiritual and eternal privileges purchased by Christ, who was consecrated by the eternal Spirit of life that He received without measure.

3. There is a change in the efficacy of the priesthood: the former was weak and unprofitable, made nothing perfect; the latter brought in a better hope, by which we draw near to God, v. 18, 19. The Levitical priesthood could not justify men's persons from guilt; could not sanctify them from inward pollution; could not cleanse the consciences of the worshippers from dead works; all it could do, was, to lead them to the Antitype. But the priesthood of Christ carries in it, and brings along with it, a better hope; it shows us the true foundation of all the hope we have toward God for pardon and salvation; it more clearly discovers the great objects of our hope; and so it tends to work in us a more strong and lively hope of acceptance with God. By this hope we are encouraged to draw nigh unto God; to enter into a covenant-union with Him; to live a life of converse and communion with Him.

4. There is a change in God's way of acting in this priesthood. He has taken an oath to Christ, which He never did to any of the order of Aaron. God never gave them any such assurance of their continuance, never engaged Himself by oath or promise that theirs should be an everlasting priesthood, and therefore gave them no reason to expect the perpetuity of it, but rather to relation from God; but He will 'overturn, overturn, overturn' the kingdoms of the earth, till that of our Melchisedec be everywhere established. Ez. 17:22—24. 21:25—27. Hag. 2:20—23. As 'the Surety of a far better covenant' than that connected with the Levitical priesthood, He has given his church, and every believer, the greatest advantages for following after perfection. May He stir up the hearts of his ministers and people, and pour out his Spirit, throughout all his church; that spiritual worship and holy obedience may everywhere abound, and that the congregations and services of his saints on earth, may more resemble those of heaven!

respect, he may be said to bear some resemblance to the ever living and ever blessed Jesus.'

V. 11. Perfection. 'Ch. 9:9. it is said, the Levitical sacrifices could not make him that did the service perfect, i. e. could neither purify, nor deliver from the burden of sin, and the apprehension of punishment. Christ did both; and this is the perfection here spoken of, which He accomplished, and the law could not accomplish.'

V. 12. Law. 'I. e. the law regulating the priesthood, the Jewish dispensation, the Mosaic law.'

IN.

V. 17. 'Here the reader is left to supply the conclusion. In v. 11. the Levitical priesthood, and the law, had been connected. In v. 12. the connexion is recognised as so intimate, that whatever affected one, would affect the other; and consequently, that if the priesthood be changed, the law must be so too. "But the priesthood is changed," is the next proposition, which he establishes, vs. 13—17. It follows, therefore, and this is the conclusion to be supplied, that the law is also changed.'

IN.

V. 18, 19. The concluding words may be rendered, 'The bringing in of a better hope is that, by which we draw near to God.'—The original word signifies more, than simply 'bringing in,' and implies, that this 'better hope' was brought in, even under the old dispensation, by the promises and prophecies of the Messiah, and by the types of the law; though more fully and clearly, when Christ had actually come, and finished his work on earth, and entered into his glory.—The weakness and unprofitableness of the ceremonial 'law,' either to justify or sanctify

19 For the law <sup>1</sup>made nothing perfect, but <sup>m</sup>the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which <sup>n</sup>we draw nigh unto God.

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest:

21 (For those priests were made without <sup>o</sup>an oath; but this with an oath by him that said unto him, <sup>p</sup>The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec:)

22 By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better <sup>q</sup>testament.

23 And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death:

24 But this man, because he continueth ever, hath <sup>r</sup>an unchangeable <sup>s</sup>priesthood.

25 Wherefore he is able <sup>t</sup>also to save them <sup>v</sup>to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession <sup>w</sup>for them.

26 For such an high priest became us, who is <sup>x</sup>holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens;

27 Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first <sup>y</sup>for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself.

look upon it as a temporary law. But Christ was made a Priest with the oath of God, v. 21. Here God has, on oath, declared the immutability, excellency, efficacy, and eternity, of the priesthood of Christ.

5. There is a change in that covenant of which the priesthood was a security, and the priest a surety; that is, a change in the dispensation of that covenant. The gospel-dispensation is more full, free, perspicuous, spiritual, and efficacious, than that of the law. Christ is, in this gospel-covenant, a Surety for us to God, and for God to us, to see that the articles be performed on both parts. He pleads with men to keep their covenant with God, and with God that He will fulfil his promises to men; which He is always ready to do in a way suitable to his majesty and glory, that is, through a Mediator.

6. There is a remarkable change in the number of the priests under these different orders. In that of Aaron there was a multitude of priests, of high priests, not at once, but successively; but in this of Christ there is but one and the same. The reason is plain,—The Levitical priests were many, because not suffered to continue by reason of death. But this our High Priest continues for ever, and his priesthood is unchangeable, always in the same hand; there can be no vacancy: and this is our safety and happiness, that this everlasting High Priest is able to save to the utmost, in all times, in all cases, in every juncture, all who come to God by Him, v. 25. So that here is a manifest alteration much for the better.

7. There is a remarkable difference in the moral qualifications of the priests; those who were of the order of Aaron were not only mortal, but sinful; they needed to offer up sacrifices first for their own sins, and then for the people. But our High Priest, who was consecrated by the word of the oath, needed only to offer up once for the people, never at all for Himself; for He has not only an immutable consecration to his office, but an immutable sanctity in his person. He is such a High Priest as became us, holy, harmless, and undefiled, &c. v. 26—28.

Here observe, Our case, as sinners, needed a high priest to make satisfaction and intercession for us. No priest could be suitable or sufficient for our reconciliation to God, but one perfectly righteous in his own person; for otherwise he could not be a propitiation for our sin, or our advocate with the Father. The Lord Jesus was exactly such a High Priest. Observe the description we have of the personal holiness of Christ, expressed in various terms; some learned divines think they all relate to his perfect purity.

[1.] He is holy, perfectly free from all the habits or principles of sin, not having the least disposition to it in his nature, not the least sinful inclination.

[2.] He is harmless, perfectly free from all actual transgression, never did the least wrong to God or man.

[3.] He is undefiled, was never necessary to other men's sins; though He took on Him the guilt of our sins, yet He never involved Himself in the fact and fault of them.

[4.] He is separate from sinners, not only in his present state, having entered as our High Priest into the holiest of all, into which nothing defiled can enter; but in his personal purity, He has no such union with sinners, either natural or federal, as can derive on Him original sin; though He took a true human nature, yet the miraculous way in which it was conceived, set Him on a separate foot from all the rest of mankind.

[5.] He is made higher than the heavens. Most expositors understand this of his state of exaltation in heaven, at the right hand of God, to perfect the design of his priesthood. But Dr. Goodwin thinks it may be very justly referred to the personal holiness of Christ, which is greater and more perfect than the holiness of the hosts of heaven, that is, the holy angels themselves, who, though free from sin, yet are not in themselves free from all possibility of sinning. Therefore we read, God putteth no trust in his holy ones, and He chargeth his angels with folly, Job 4:18. that is, with weakness and peccability. They may be angels one hour, and devils another, as many of them were; and that the holy angels shall not now fall, does not proceed from any indefectibility of nature, but from the election of God; they are elect angels.

It is very probable this explanation of the words, made higher than the heavens, may be thought too much strained, and that it ought to be understood of the dignity of Christ's state, and not the perfect holiness of his Person; and the rather because it is said, He was made higher; but it is well known that the [original] word is used in a neutral sense, as where it is said, Let God be true.

The other characters in the verse plainly belong to the personal perfection of Christ in holiness, as opposed to the sinful infirmities of the Levitical priests; and it seems congruous to think this must do so too, if it may be fairly taken in such a sense; and it appears yet more probable, since the validity and prevalency of Christ's priesthood, in v. 27, are placed in the impartiality and disinterestedness of it. He needed not to offer up for Himself; it was a disinterested mediation: had He needed mercy Himself, He

those who rested in the outward observance of it, and who did not by faith look to the things prefigured by it, was exactly parallel to the Christian sacraments, when the opus operatum, the mere attendance on the 'outward and visible sign,' is depended on, while 'the inward and spiritual grace,' the things signified in them, are disregarded. To such persons they are 'weak and unprofitable,' but to believers, they are means of grace, and solemn and acceptable acts of spiritual worship. Rom. 2:25—29. 3:1, 2.

(18.) 'Another reason for a change in the law as connected with the priesthood, the insufficiency of the whole legal institution, in respect to spiritual pardon and sanctification.'

V. 20—22. (22) Surety.] The word signifies a person who is bound with another for the payment of a debt, or the performance of an engagement. Jesus, 'the Surety' of his people, became answerable for their debt of sin, and engaged to satisfy divine justice, and magnify the holy law, as their Representative: Is. 53:7, and also to bring them to that repentance, faith, and holiness, which are requisite to their participation of the blessings of his covenant. By entering into this engagement, and fulfilling it in their behalf, He became the Surety of the Father to them, for the performance of all the promises of the covenant; being authorized, and exalted, in human nature, to confer on them all the blessings stipulated in it. The word rendered testament, is commonly translated covenant; its import has been repeatedly considered, and we shall have occasion shortly to speak of it again. (Notes, 9:15—23. Preface to the New Testament) The better covenant, of which Jesus is the Surety, is not here contrasted with the covenant of works, by which every transgressor is shut up under the curse, but distinguished from the Sinai-covenant with Israel, and the legal dispensation under which the church had so long continued; for the covenant of works had no connexion with the Aaronic priesthood, or the ceremonial law, which exhibited in shadows the blessings of the covenant of grace. 2:7—13. But the covenant, of which Jesus was Surety, was far better than that, of which the high priests of Israel were typical sureties, and brought the church, and every believer, into far clearer light, more perfect liberty, and more abundant privileges, than that could do. SCOTT.

V. 24. Continueth ever.] 'I. e. ever a priest.' STUART.—'He holds his priesthood in eternal continuity.'

V. 25. Save, &c.] 'Some include temporal salvation, but probably it was not in the mind of the apostle.' BLOOMF.—'Ever liveth.'] 'The mere continual existence of Christ, is not at all the question here, but the perpetuity of his priesthood.' STUART.—'To make intercession.'] 'Or rather to interpose. Here, it is plainly in the sense of aiding, defending, or delivering; as the preceding, to save, clearly indicates. He is able to save, because He is a perpetual Priest, i. e. can interpose in their behalf, to procure for them such aid as they may need.' SR.

V. 26—28. The considerate inquirer into this most interesting subject, would perceive, that 'such a High Priest' as had been described exactly suited the case of sinners, who were to be restored to the favor and image of a holy God, in a manner consistent with the glory of his name, and peculiarly suited to display that glory, and that He alone could suit it.

(26.) 'The writer having now commented on the priesthood of Christ, as compared with that of Melchisedec, and having also made some deductions from the nature of Christ's priestly office, as thus exhibited, resumes the subject he had dropped at 5:10, and had first proposed, 5:2, 3. In 5:7—9, he had shown the similarity between Christ and the Jewish priests, in regard to the power of sympathizing with the sufferer, inasmuch as both He and they were sufferers themselves. But, to limit the parallelism, as not holding in all respects, he here resumes the topic, and shows how far superior the Priest of the new covenant is, in a moral respect, to the priests of the old. They were "compassed with infirmities," but He was spotless; if they were ceremonially undefiled, He was morally so; if they were exalted in station, He was infinitely above them; being, like Melchisedec, King as well as Priest, inasmuch as He was raised to the throne of God above the heavens, 1:3. To finish the comparison, he goes on to say, that, in consequence of his perfect purity, He needed no expiatory offering for Himself, as the Jewish priests did.'

(27.) Daily.] 'That the high priest afflicted, not only on the great day of atonement, but daily, may be seen by consulting Lev. 6:19—22. Num. 28:3, 4. Also Philo, who was contemporary with the apostles, says, "the high priest, agreeably to the laws, makes daily supplications and sacrifices."

23 For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is <sup>3</sup> consecrated for evermore.

NOW of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who <sup>2</sup> is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens;

had been a party, and could not have been a Mediator; a criminal, and could not have been an Advocate for sinners. Now to render his mediation the more impartial and disinterested, it seems requisite, not only that He had no present need of that favor for Himself, which He mediated for in behalf of others, but that He never could need it. Though He needed it not to-day, yet, if He knew He might be in such circumstances as to need it to-morrow, or in any future time, He must have been thought to have had some eye on his own interest, and therefore could not act with impartial regard and pure zeal for the honor of God on one hand, and tender, pure compassion for poor sinners on the other. I pretend not here to follow the notes of our late excellent expositor; into his labors we have entered, but have taken the liberty to vindicate this notion of the learned Dr. Goodwin from the exceptions that I know have been made to it; and I have the rather done it, because, if it will hold good, it gives us further evidence how necessary it was that the Mediator should be God, since no mere creature is of himself possessed of that impeccability, which will set him above all possible need of favor and mercy for himself.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. Here is a summary of what had been said before of the excellency of Christ's priesthood, showing both what we have in Christ, where He now resides, and of what sanctuary He is the Minister. 1. We have in Christ a High Priest; such a High Priest as no other people or church ever had, of which all others were but types and shadows. 2. He now resides on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high, that is, of the glorious God of heaven. There He is possessed of all authority and power, both in heaven and on earth; this is the reward of his humiliation; this authority He exercises for the glory of his Father, for his own honor, and for the happiness of all who belong to Him; and He will, by his Almighty power, bring every one of them in their own order to the right hand of God in heaven, as members of his mystical body, that where He is they may be also. 3. That sanctuary of which He is a Minister, is the true tabernacle, which the Lord hath pitched, and not man, v. 2. the holy of holies, the true tabernacle in heaven; there He is Minister, taking care of his people's affairs, interceding with God for them, that their sins may be pardoned, and their persons and services accepted, through the merit of his sacrifice. He is not only in heaven, enjoying great dominion and dignity, but, as the High Priest of his church, executing this office for them all in general, and every member of the church in particular.

V. 3—5. Here the apostle sets before the Hebrews the necessary parts of Christ's priesthood, or what it was that belonged to that office, in conformity to what every high priest is ordained to. 1. Every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices, whatever was brought by the people to be presented to God, whether expiatory sacrifices, or peace-offerings, or thank-offerings; so, then, it necessarily belongs to the priesthood of Christ, that He should have somewhat to offer; and He, as the Antitype, had Himself to offer, his human nature on the altar of his divine nature, as the great atoning Sacrifice that finished transgression, and made an end of sin once for all; and He has the increase of his own righteousness and merits too, to offer with all that his people offer up to God by Him, to render them acceptable. We must not dare to approach to God, or to present anything to Him, but in and through Christ, depending on his merits and mediation; for if we are accepted, it is in the Beloved. 2. Christ must now execute his priesthood in heaven, in the holy of holies, the true tabernacle which the Lord hath fixed. Thus the type must be fully answered; having finished the work of sacrificing here, He must go into heaven, to present his righteousness, and to make intercession there. For, (1.) if Christ were on earth, He should not be a Priest, v. 4. that is, not according to the Levitical law, as that

PRACT. OBS. V. 19—23. It becomes us to aspire after a degree of spirituality and holiness, as much superior to those of Old Test. believers, as our advantages exceed theirs. No man who knows God, and his holy law of love, and who understands the evil of sin, and the difficulty of saving sinners to the glory of God, could desire the continuance of a priesthood, which appointed those to that office, who were themselves sinners; and now, that the Son of God is made High Priest, we may well rejoice that He is 'consecrated for evermore,' and has an unchangeable priesthood. As 'He is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God through Him,' let the vilest of sinners approach in this way to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God, seeing 'He ever liveth to make intercession for them.' None need be dismayed, but those who will not 'come unto God,' or who will not come in the name of his beloved Son; and the case of those will soon become hopeless, how great soever their present presumption may be. But, let believers meditate on the power and grace of their great High Priest, and on his universal and absolute sovereignty, and let them copy his 'holy, harmless, and undefiled' conduct, and 'his separation from sinners.' Then they may confidently expect, that He will 'save them to the uttermost,' and 'deliver them, in all time of their tribulation, in all time of their wealth, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.' SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. Some explain 'the true tabernacle' of heaven, exclusively, as signifying the same with 'the sanctuary;' others interpret it of the human nature of Christ, in which He 'tabernacled' among men, and in which He officiates as High Priest, in the holy of holies above; yet, as his human nature is needful to constitute his Person as High Priest, rather than to be the place of his ministrations, the figure is harsh. But, as the whole tabernacle comprised the inner and outer sanctuary; and, as the high priest alone went into the former, while the other priests officiated in the latter, in subordination to him, whose typical services rendered theirs accepted; and as the tabernacle was an emblem of the whole church of God, though it typified the human nature of Christ, also: it seems most obvious to explain 'the true tabernacle,' to signify the whole church of the redeemed on earth and in heaven, as one by its union with Christ Jesus; for believers, separately and collectively, 'are the habitation of God through the Spirit.' Ex. 26:7—29. P. O.—Note, Eph. 2:19—22. Christ ministers personally in the holy place above, as sole High Priest, He presides over the whole true tabernacle, and so the prayers and services of the spiritual priesthood, on earth, are rendered acceptable and efficacious, through his meritorious intercession in heaven. Luke 1:8—10. SCOTT.

(1.) The sum. 'The most important thing in regard to what we are now treating; not sum in the sense of summary.' So Stuart, Bloomf., and the commentators generally; also the Syr. and the VULG. Stuart adds: 'What follows is no recapitulation, but a new topic, exhibiting a different view of Christ's priesthood.' Ed.—'The apostle had spoken of its superiority as to duration and succession: of Christ's being made Priest with an oath, while the Levites were not; also of the perpetuity of his priesthood, while theirs, in consequence of their frailty, was subject to vicissitude and interruption; and finally, how they, because of their imperfection and sin, needed to sacrifice for themselves, while He was holy, and for ever secure from all sin, so that his sacrifice would avail solely to the benefit of sinful men. Thus much he had already said on his office, and his qualifications for it. He comes now, ch. 8—10. to consider the duties of the office themselves, viz. the nature of the sacrifice Jesus offers; the place where He offers it; the efficacy it has to atone for sin; and the difference, in regard to all these points, between the sacrifice offered by Christ, and that presented by the Jewish priests, —a different topic from that discussed ch. 7.' STUART.

(2.) 'In this explanation of the symbolical representations by which it pleased the Holy Spirit, under the former dispensation, to prefigure the blessings of Christianity, the interior sanctuary, or holy of holies, seems to be put as the sign of the heavenly state; and the outer tabernacle, as that of the flesh or human nature of the Messiah.'

V. 3—6. The various particulars respecting Christ and his salvation, which were typified by the tabernacle, its furniture, and worship, have already been explained. Ex. 25.—31. — Instead of interfering with the priests in the typical services of the temple, Christ 'had obtained a more excellent ministry,' of real value and efficacy, in the heavenly sanctuary; in which He was as much superior to the priests after the order of Aaron, as the covenant of which He was the Mediator, was 'a better covenant,' founded and established 'on better promises,' than the Sinai covenant with Israel. — It has repeatedly been observed, that all unbelievers continued personally under 'the covenant of works,' and that believers were personally interested in 'the covenant of grace,' by faith in the Messiah who was to come. Ex. 19:5. The Mosaic dispensation contained in it a typical Gospel, and its ordinances were to believers 'means of grace,' as well as acts of worship. But the covenant here referred to was that made with Israel as a nation, securing the possession of Canaan, and various temporal benefits to them, on prescribed conditions; and the promises of all spiritual blessings, and of eternal life, to believers of all nations, and through all succeeding ages, which were openly revealed by the Gospel, and ratified through Christ, are of infinitely greater value, than any temporal advantages to a single nation could be.—(5 See, &c.) The quotation is not exactly according to the Sept., but gives the sense of the Hebrew. Sc.

(3.) This man. 'I. e. High Priest: supply from the preceding clause.' MACKN.—Have somewhat also to offer.' 'What the oblation made by Christ is, he tells us more fully, ch. 9:—14. 25 26.' STUART.

(4.) 'No argument can hence be drawn against the reasonableness of considering Christ's death as a sacrifice, according to the express declaration of Scripture; since it is plain, that, under the Jewish economy, though none but priests ever ministered in the tabernacle, yet others, not of that order, might, by special appointment, offer sacrifices, and be accepted.' DODDR.

(5.) 'Comp. v. 2. and 9:24. The earthly tabernacle is but a shadow,'

6 But now hath he obtained a more excellent <sup>h</sup> ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better <sup>i</sup> covenant, which was established upon better promises.

[Practical Observations.]

7 For if <sup>j</sup> that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second.

8 For finding fault with them, <sup>k</sup> he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will <sup>l</sup> put my laws into their mind, and write them <sup>m</sup> in their hearts: and <sup>n</sup> I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people:

being of the line of that priesthood. (2.) All the services of the priest, under the law, and everything in that tabernacle which was framed according to the pattern in the mount, were only exemplars and shadows of heavenly things, v. 5. Christ is the Substance and End of the law of righteousness. Something, therefore, there must be in Christ's priesthood, that answers to the high priest's entering within the veil to make intercession, and what is that but the ascension of Christ into heaven, and his appearance there in the

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-6. While we bless God, that, of his plenteous mercy, He has provided for us, ruined sinners, 'such a High Priest' as suited our helpless condition; that He has accepted his 'one oblation of Himself,' that He has exalted Him to 'the right hand of his Majesty in the heavens,' to be 'a Minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle;' and that He has made a better covenant with Him, in behalf of his true people, and with them through Him, and established it on better promises, than those given to Israel; let us see to it, that we draw nigh to Him in this appointed way, as spiritual worshippers, in humble faith, and submission to his righteousness, relying on his mercy and truth, and praying for all his promised blessings.—If it were dangerous for those, who had 'the example and shadow of things,' to deviate in the least from the divine prescriptions, how can they escape condemnation, who have the clear discovery of the heavenly things themselves, yet worship other mediators, prefer human traditions, come to God in their own name, as if righteous persons, or refuse to come at all, as if independent of Him, under no obligations to Him, and sufficient for their own felicity?—In every part of our worship and obedience, we should keep close to the only and perfect standard of Scripture, and every deviation must be proportionably injurious: mistakes, in the way of a sinner's access and acceptance, cannot but prove fatal in the end, if not previously discovered and rectified. n mere imperfect effigy, of the heavenly one. Consequently, the office of priest, in the latter, is far more elevated than the like office in the former. STUART.

(6.) Better promises.] 'These follow, vs. 8-13. The imperfection of the first covenant, and the perfection of the second, is further disclosed, 9:9-14. 10:1-22. 13:9-14. From these passages, it appears, that the first covenant promised only external purification, and the civil or ecclesiastical pardon of an offender who complied with the rites it enjoined; but, under the new covenant, real pardon of sin, by God, is obtained, with purification, peace of conscience, the hope of eternal life, and union at last with the assembly of the redeemed, in a better world.' ID.

V. 7-13. The words tr. from the Heb., 'Although I was a Husband unto them,' are here rendered, as given from the Sept., 'And I regarded them not.' From this one clause, as it appears to me, the whole passage is generally spoken of by some learned men, as quoted from the Sept.; but it varies from that version in several immaterial particulars, and, except in the above clause, it accords to the Heb.—This prophecy was fulfilled in the conversion of multitudes of Judah and Israel, in the primitive times of the Gospel, and it foretells the future conversion and restoration of that people; but it is also fulfilled to all the spiritual Israel, who are really 'a holy nation,' as Israel, according to the flesh, was relatively. And as it can be said of no other company, that they 'all know the Lord,' it must be meant of them especially.—It is undeniable, that the national covenant with Israel at Sinai, and not the 'covenant of works' with men in general, or the Abrahamic covenant, is spoken of. SCOTT.

(7.) 'The fault of the first covenant was, that it made nothing perfect. See ch. 7:19.' WILLIAMS.—'The meaning is, not that the Mosaic economy had positive faults, viz. such things as were palpably wrong or er-sight of God for his people, to present their prayers, and plead their cause? So that if He had still continued on earth, He could not have been a perfect Priest; and an imperfect one He could not be.

V. 6-13. In this part of the ch. the apostle illustrates and confirms the superior excellency of the priesthood of Christ above that of Aaron, from the excellency of that covenant, or that dispensation of the covenant of grace, of which Christ was the Mediator, v. 6. His ministry is more excellent, by how much He is the Mediator of a better covenant. Now observe,

I. What is here said of the old covenant, or rather of the old dispensation of the covenant of grace: 1. It was made with the fathers of the Jewish nation at mount Sinai, v. 9. and Moses was the Mediator. God there took them by the hand, to lead them out of the land of Egypt, which speaks his great affection, condescension, and care of them. 2. It was not found faultless, v. 7, 8. it was a dispensation of darkness and dread, tending to bondage, and only a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; it was perfect in its kind, but very imperfect in comparison of the Gospel. 3. It was not sure or steadfast, for the Jews continued not in that covenant, and the Lord regarded them not, v. 9. God will regard those who remain in his covenant, but will reject those who cast away his yoke from them. 4. It is decayed, grown old, and vanisheth away, v. 13. Some think the covenant of peculiarity did not quite decay till the destruction of Jerusalem; though it was forfeited at the death of Christ, and was made old, and was now to vanish and perish, and the Levitical priesthood vanished with it.

II. What is here said of the New Test. dispensation, to prove the superior excellency of Christ's ministry. 1. It is a better covenant, v. 6. a more clear and comfortable dispensation and discovery of the grace of God to sinners, bringing in holy light and liberty to the soul; and is without fault, well ordered in all things. 2. It is established on better promises, more clear and express, more spiritual, more absolute; the promises of spiritual and eternal blessings are absolute, those of temporal blessings with a wise and kind proviso, as far as shall be for God's glory and his people's good.

3. It is a new covenant, even that new covenant that God long ago declared He would make with the house of Israel, that is, all the Israel of God, Jer. 31:31, 32. and accomplished in Christ. It will always be new, and all who truly take hold of it, shall be always found preserved by the power of God; it is God's covenant; his mercy, love, and grace moved for it; his wisdom devised it; his Son purchased it; his Spirit brings souls into it, and builds them up in it. 4. The articles of this covenant are very extraordinary, and are sealed between God and his people by baptism and the Lord's supper; whereby they bind themselves to their part, and God assures them He will do his part.

(1.) God articles with his people, that He will put his laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts, v. 10. that is, will give them understanding to know and to believe his law, memories to retain them, hearts to love them, consciences to recognise them, courage to profess them, and power to put them in practice; the whole habit and frame of their souls shall be a table and transcript of the law of God. This is the foundation of the covenant; and when this is laid, duty will be done wisely, sincerely, readily, easily, resolutely, constantly, and comfortably.

(2.) He articles with them to take them into a near and very honorable relation to Himself. He will be to them a God; will be all that to them, and do all that for them, that God can be and do. They shall be to Him a people, to love, honor, observe, and obey Him in all things; this those must and will do, who have God for their God; for God will enable them to do it, as an evidence that He is their God, and they his people; God Himself first founds the relation, and then fills it up with grace suitable and sufficient, and helps them in their measure to fill it up with love and duty; so that God engages both for Himself and themselves.

(3.) He articles with them, that they shall grow more and more acquainted with their God, v. 11. Here, observe, In the want of better instruction, one neighbor should teach another to know the Lord, as they have ability and opportunity for it. This private instruction shall not be so necessary; but, that it did not contain in itself all the provision necessary for pardon of sin, and the rendering of the conscience peaceful and pure; which the Gospel does effect. STUART.

(8.) Finding fault with them.] I. e. with the Jews. So Doddr. Yet, as others, 'Finding fault with them, i. e. it, the first covenant,—He saith to them, viz. the Jews.' Most recent commentators prefer the latter, which, Bloomf. says, is required by the words following. Respecting these, i. e. Jer. 31. Stuart remarks, that 'the passage is made up of consolation and promise, instead of reproof or finding fault; so that the imputed defect must be such, in this case, as may be understood accordingly; i. e. the old covenant had failed to accomplish the objects desired,—it was defective; [whereas, the new covenant, or gospel-dispensation, should accomplish its object, and secure pardon and sanctification.] The apostle evidently understands the passages quoted as originally having respect to the gospel-dispensation.' ED.

(10.) House of Israel.] 'The Jews in general,—the Israelitish nation; so the whole is often named in the Old and New Test.' I will put my laws, &c.] 'I will give them a lasting spirit of obedience to my laws, so that they shall no more violate them, as they have done.' SR.

(11.) 'He does not mean, that religious instruction will be altogether superseded; but none will be ignorant of God and his law, as in former times. The words are not to be urged to a literal explanation. The meaning of the whole plainly is, that the knowledge of true religion, or of God, should become universal, under the new covenant, so that no one might be found, who could properly be addressed as knowing nothing of the true God. The implication, moreover, contained in this, is, that, under the old covenant, many had been thus ignorant; a fact highly credible, considering the frequent lapses of the Jews into a state of idolatry.' ID.

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, A new <sup>p</sup> covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

cessary under the New Test. as under the Old; under the new dispensation there shall be such plenty of public qualified preachers of the Gospel, and dispensers of ordinances stately in the solemn assemblies, and so great a flocking to them, and such a plentiful effusion of the Spirit of God, to make the ministration of the Gospel effectual, that there shall be a mighty increase and spreading of Christian knowledge in persons of all sorts, of each sex, and of all ages. Oh that this promise might be fulfilled in our days, that the hand of God may be with his ministers, that a great number may believe, and be turned to the Lord!

(4.) God articles with them about the pardon of their sins, as what always accompanies the true knowledge of God, v. 12. Observe, The freeness of this pardon; it

PRACT. OBS. V. 7—13. We should often inquire, whether 'the new covenant' be really sealed and ratified to us; for, though the gospel-dispensation is 'faultless;' and though the Lord has, as it were, 'taken us by the hand,' to lead us forth from pagan and antichristian idolatry; yet He will have no special 'regard to us' at last, unless He now 'put his laws into our minds, and write them in our hearts,' as the principle of genuine repentance and willing obedience; unless we expect our happiness from Him as our God, and worship Him spiritually as his people; and unless we are taught by his Holy Spirit, to know Him in such a manner, as uprightly to fear, love, trust, and obey Him.

NOTES. CHAP. IX. 'The writer proceeds to consider the manner and design of the sacerdotal service, and the ends which could be accomplished by it.' STUART.—'It will now, according to the primary purpose of the epistle, be shown, that all that splendor and magnificence of the Jewish leitourgia, which so dazzled, nay, blinded the eyes of the Jews, and which therefore they were so unwilling to lay aside, is, in the new religion, far more august. From different parts of Ex. 25—27. Paul shows, that the whole Jewish worship was indeed splendid, but only respected what was external, and was to be repeated, again and again. By the divine counsel, then, it was only to last for a time, till the perfect one was to be introduced, which was done by Jesus Christ.'

Bloomf., after JASPIS.

V. 1—5. The apostle, knowing the excessive and dangerous attachment of the Hebrews to the legal ceremonies, proceeded more particularly to show their typical reference to Christ. (1) Ordinances. It is used in different senses; but ritual observances seems the meaning here. Luke 1:5—7. (4) Wherein, &c. 'The rod of Aaron, and the golden pot that had manna,' were within 'the holy of holies,' and by or near the ark, as the word may be rendered, but they seem not to have been put within it. 1 Kings 8:7—9. (1) The first. Many copies add tabernacle; but it appears to me, that some transcriber erroneously inserted that word, to supply the ellipsis; and that our version more properly substitutes covenant, as directly connected with the preceding v. 8:13. Sc.

(1—5.) 'The priests performed daily service in the outer temple, 9:6. the high priest entered the inner (where God dwelt) once a year, 9:7. permission to enter only so seldom, showed, that free access to

does not result from merit in man, but from mercy in God; He pardons for his own name's sake. The fulness of this pardon; it extends to their unrighteousness, sins, and iniquities; to all kinds of sin, to sins highly aggravated. The fixedness of this pardon; it is so final, and so fixed, that God will remember their sins no more; He will not only forgive their sins, but forget them, treat them as if He had forgotten them. This pardoning mercy is connected with all other spiritual mercies, and opens a wide door to all spiritual blessing. This is the excellency of the new dispensation, and these the articles of it; therefore, we have no reason to repine, but great reason to rejoice, that that former dispensation is antiquated and vanished away.

CHAP. IX. The apostle, having declared the Old Test. dispensation antiquated and vanishing away, proceeds to let the Hebrews see the correspondence there was between the Old Test. and the New; and that whatever was excellent in the Old, was typical and representative of the New; which, therefore, must as far excel the Old, as the substance does the shadow. The Old Test. was never intended to be rested in, but to prepare for the institutions of the Gospel.

V. 1—5. The apostle gives an account, here, of the tabernacle, that place of worship which God appointed to be pitched on earth, called worldly, because wholly of this world, as to its materials, and a building that must be taken down; a sanctuary, because the court and palace of the king of Israel. God was their King, and, as other kings, had his court or palace of residence, and attendants, furniture, and provision, suitable thereto. This tabernacle, of which we have the model, Ex. 25—27. it is said here was divided into two parts, called a first and a second tabernacle, an inner and an outer part; representing the two states of the church militant and triumphant, and the two natures of Christ, human and divine. We are told what was placed in each part.

In the outer part were several things of which you have here a sort of schedule.

1. The candlestick, where the lamps were always burning, there being no windows in the sanctuary; and this was to convince the Jews of the darkness and mysterious nature of that dispensation. Their light was only candle-light, in comparison of the fulness of light which Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, would bring along with Him, and communicate to his people.

2. The table and the shew-bread set upon it. This was directly opposite to the candlestick, which shows, that by light from Christ we must have communion with Him and with one another. On this table were placed twelve loaves, a loaf for a tribe, which stood from sabbath to sabbath, and on that day were renewed. This shew-bread may be considered either as the provision of the palace, in resemblance of the palaces of earthly kings, or the provision made in Christ for the souls of his people, suitable to the wants and to the relief of their souls. He is the Bread of life; in our Father's house is bread enough and to spare; we may have fresh supplies from Christ, especially every Lord's day. This outer part is called the sanctuary or holy, because erected to the worship of a holy God, to represent a holy Jesus, and to entertain a holy people, for their further improvement in holiness.

We have an account of what was in the inner part of the sanctuary, which was within the second veil, and is called the holiest of all. This second veil, which divided between the holy and the most holy place, was a type of the body of Christ; by the rending whereof, not only a view, but a way, was opened for us into the holiest of all, the type of heaven itself. Now in this part were,

1. The golden censer, to hold the incense, or the golden altar to burn the incense on, both typical of Christ, of his pleasing and prevailing intercession, grounded on the merits and satisfaction of his sacrifice, on which we are to depend for acceptance, and the blessing from God.

2. The ark of the covenant overlaid round about with pure gold, v. 4. typifying Christ, his perfect obedience to the law, and his fulfilling of all righteousness for us. Now here we are told both what was in this ark, and what was over it.

(1.) What was in it. [1.] The golden pot that had manna, which, being by God's appointment deposited here, was kept from putrefaction; and this, to teach us, that it is only in Christ that our persons, graces, performances, are kept pure; it was also a type of the bread of life we have in Christ, and a memorial of God's miraculously feeding his people in the wilderness. [2.] Aaron's rod that budded; and thereby showed

1 Chr. 22:6—10. Jn. 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 Jn. 2:3—6. Thus all true Israelites, 'from the least to the greatest,' are 'taught of God,' and sealed as his people; and thus they are become satisfied, that He 'hath been merciful to their sins, and will remember their iniquities no more.' This 'righteousness shall be for ever, this salvation shall not be abolished,' and the blessings of this irrevocable covenant will be the eternal portion of every true believer. But all other things, whether they be worldly vanities, external privileges, or forms and notions of religion, will soon 'decay, wax old, vanish away,' and leave those who have trusted in them most miserable for evermore. 1:10—12. 2 Pet. 3:5—13. SCOTT.

God was not yet disclosed under the first dispensation, v. 8. indeed all these rites were merely a symbol of what was to be effected under the Gospel, vs. 9, 10. Christ, on the other hand, the heavenly High Priest, entered the eternal sanctuary with his own blood, procuring everlasting redemption for sinners, vs. 11, 12. The blood of bulls and goats, presented by the Jewish high priest, effected nothing more than ceremonial, external purification, v. 13. while the blood of Christ purifies the conscience, and renders the worshipper truly acceptable to God, v. 14. the efficacy of the sacrifice extending back to the sins of former ages, so that all who are called of God to partake of the blessings of the Gospel, attain through his death to a heavenly inheritance, v. 15. Here occasion is taken to compare the new covenant, ratified by the death of Christ, with the covenants ratified by the death of testators. Such, says he, is the custom among men, that the death of the testators must supervene, in order to confirm and give full effect to their testaments, v. 16, 17. Even the first covenant, though not so appropriately called a testament, was sanctioned much as was the new covenant; for blood (the emblem of death) was applied to almost everything which pertained to the ancient covenant, in order either to ratify or to consecrate it, vs. 18—22. Now, since this was so extensively done in regard to these more resemblances or types of heavenly things, these heavenly things themselves, being of a nature so much more exalted, must be consecrated by a corresponding sacrifice, of a higher nature than any offered in the earthly temple, v. 23. For it is in the heavenly temple, Christ discharges the functions of his priestly office, v. 24. yet not, like the Jewish priests, repeating expiatory offerings, but once for all performing this sacred

Ps. 143.—That God resides in a particular part of the universe, where He makes his presence known by some visible glory, is a notion which has prevailed among all nations,—a proof that it is derived from tradition, or that it is a dictate of reason: either supposition shews its truth; and, being confirmed by revelation, why should it be called in question?' MACKN.

V. 6, 7. Some commentators mention carrying the blood of the sacrifices, in general, into the temple, to sprinkle it before the veil, as one of the services performed by the ordinary priests; but it was evident that no blood was carried into the tabernacle, except that of sin-offerings for the high priest or for the congregation, and this was done by this high priest himself. In other cases, when some of the blood had been sprinkled about the altar of burnt-offering, the residue was poured out at the bottom of it. 13:9-14. Lev. 1:5-9. 4:4-7, 22-35. 6:30. 16:11-19. V. 6, 7. From the description of the place of worship in the Old Test. dispensation, the apostle proceeds to speak of the duties and services performed in those places, v. 6.

1. The ordinary priests went always into the first tabernacle, to accomplish the service of God. Observe, Persons not qualified, not called of God, must not intrude into the office and work of the ministry; it would have been fatal presumption in the ordinary priests to have gone into the holiest of all; and this teaches us, that even ministers themselves must not presume to usurp the prerogative of Christ, by offering up incense of their own, or adding their own inventions to his ordinances, or larding it over men's consciences. These ordinary priests were to enter into the first tabernacle always; that is, they were to devote themselves and all their time to the work of their office, in the first tabernacle, that they might there accomplish the service of God, and fulfil their ministry.

2. Into the second, the interior part, went the high priest alone, v. 7. an emblem of heaven, and Christ's ascension thither. Observe, (1.) None but the high priest must go into the holiest; so none but Christ could enter into heaven in his own name, by his own right, and by his own merits. (2.) In entering into the holiest, the high priest must first go through the outer sanctuary, and through the veil; signifying that Christ went to heaven through a holy life and a violent death; the veil of his flesh was rent asunder. (3.) The high priest entered but once a year into the holiest, and in this the Antitype excels the type, (as in everything else,) for He is entered once for all, during the whole dispensation of the Gospel. (4.) The high priest must not enter without blood; signifying that Christ, having undertaken to be our High Priest, could not have been admitted into heaven without shedding his blood for us; and that none of us can enter either into God's gracious presence here, or his glorious presence hereafter, but by the blood of Jesus. (5.) The high priest, under the law, entering into the holiest, offered up that blood for himself and his own errors first, and then for the errors of the people, v. 7. This teaches us, that Christ is a more excellent Person and High Priest than any under the law, for He has no errors of his own to offer for; and that ministers, when in the name of Christ they intercede for others, must first apply the blood of Christ to themselves for their pardon. (6.) When the legal high priest had offered for himself, he must not stop there, but must also offer for the errors of the people. Our High Priest, though He needs not to offer for Himself, yet forgets not to offer for his people; He pleads the merit of his sufferings for the benefit of his people on earth. Observe, Sins are errors, great errors, both in judgment and practice; they leave guilt on the conscience, not to be washed away but by the blood of Christ; and the sinful errors of priests and people must be all done away by the same means; we must plead this blood on earth, while He is pleading it in heaven for us.

V. 8-14. In these vs. the apostle undertakes to deliver to us the mind and meaning of the Holy Ghost, in all the ordinances of the tabernacle and legal economy, comprehending both place and worship. Several things are mentioned, and certified hereby.

1. The way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while the first tabernacle was standing, v. 8. This was one lesson; the way to heaven was not so clear and plain, nor so much frequented, under the Old Test. as under the New. There was not that free access to God then that there is now.

2. The first tabernacle was only a figure for the time then present, v. 9. a dark dispensation, of short continuance, only designed for a while to typify the great things of Christ and the Gospel.

3. None of the gifts and sacrifices there offered could make the offerers perfect, as pertaining to conscience, v. 9. that is, they could not take away either the desert, or defilement, or dominion, of sin; they could not deliver conscience from a dread of the wrath of God; they could neither discharge the debts, nor resolve the doubts, of him who did the service.

V. 8-10. By all those restrictions and limitations, which kept even the worshippers of JENOVAH at so awful a distance, 'the Holy Spirit,' by whose inspiration they were revealed and recorded, conveyed this important instruction, viz. that 'the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest.'—A few believers, indeed, under the divine teaching, discerned something in these rites concerning the way of access to God, of communion with Him, and of admission into heaven, through the promised Redeemer; but the Israelites in general looked no further than the external forms, and scarcely any person conceived an idea, that sinners of every nation should have that freedom and boldness of access to God through Christ, and all the privileges and hopes, which believers enjoy under the Christian dispensation. The difficulty of guilty, polluted rebels, being thus admitted into the presence and favor of a holy God, was fully declared by those appointments; but the sacrifice and priesthood of the incarnate Son of God at once disannulled them all. When He hung on the cross, the veil of the temple was rent. (Notes, Mat. 27:51-53.) His ascension into heaven, and intercession there, opened the way to the mercy-seat; by his doctrine 'the way into the holiest was made manifest,' and thenceforth it was only necessary, that sinners should be made willing by regenerating grace, to avail themselves of such an invaluable privilege. (Note, 10:19-22.) The legal ordinances, therefore, especially those of the great day of atonement, were figures 'for the time then present;' (or, as some render it, of the present time, the happy period thus prefigured being at length arrived;) in which were offered various gifts and sacrifices, that could not give the worshippers genuine, solid peace of conscience, or make a perfect reconciliation between the sinner and the offended Judge. The offerers who rested in them, and did not by faith rely on the promised Savior, could not obtain forgiveness of sins, or spiritual blessings; but were only exempted from temporal punishment, and admitted to external privileges, as members of the kingdom and church of Israel, which was in a peculiar sense under the government of JENOVAH. (11:14.) The other ordinances of that covenant, which were connected with its sacrifices, consisted principally of regulations concerning meats and drinks, the latter especially in respect of the priests, and the Nazarites, 10 Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation.

11 But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building;

12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh;

14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself with-

4. The Holy Ghost hereby signifies, that the Old Test. institutions were but external, carnal ordinances imposed on them until the time of reformation, v. 10. Their imperfection lay in three things. (1.) Their nature; they were but external, carnal meats, drinks, and divers washings; bodily exercises, which profit little; they could only satisfy the flesh, or at best sanctify to the purifying of the flesh. (2.) They were imposed by grievous corporal punishments, and this on purpose to make them look more to the promised Seed, and long more for Him. (3.)

and divers baptisms, or washings with water, or in water, as typical of sanctification, and such like institutions which were carnal in themselves, though for wise purposes they were imposed till the coming of the Messiah, which was to be a time of reformation, by the introduction of a more simple and spiritual worship. (Note, John, 1:21-24.) They could therefore be of no use to those Jews, who rejected Christ out of zeal for them, and it was absurd for the Heb. Christians to adhere so pertinaciously to them. (8) The Holy Ghost, &c.] This is a most express attestation to the divine inspiration of Moses, which should not pass without special notice, in these days of skepticism on that subject. (3) Standing.] Retained its station. The temple which succeeded to the tabernacle, and must be included in all this argument along with it, was standing when the apostle wrote; but after the introduction of the Gospel, it virtually lost its station and use, in true religion.—Made perfect.] 7:19. 11:40. Something further was wanted, even the thing signified by all these types.—10) Divers washings.] Different baptisms; that is, differing from each other. 6:2. Mark 7:4, 8. Rom. 12:6. This fully proves, that other uses of water, besides immersion, were called baptisms in Scripture. SCOTT.

(9.) 'This, in few words, expresses what I take to be of the greatest importance for understanding the Mosaic sacrifices; which is, that they were never intended to expiate offences to such a degree, as to deliver the sinner from the final judgment of God in another world; but merely to make his peace with the government under which he then was, and to furnish him with a pardon, pleadable against any prosecution which might be commenced against him in their courts of justice, or any exclusion from the privilege of drawing near to God, as one externally at peace with Him, in the solemnities of his temple worship.' DOUGL.—'The verse shows plainly, that our epistle was written while the temple rites were still practised; consequently before A. D. 70.'—'Perfect, as pertaining to the conscience.' 'The meaning is, to render the mind of the worshipper secure of pardon for sin, and to produce that quiet which is connected with a well-grounded persuasion of this, and that moral purification which must accompany it.' STUART.

(10.) Carnal ordinances.] 'Ordinances of an external nature.'—'Imposed.' 'Enjoined.' STUART.—'Time of reformation.] 'This is explained by the best commentators, "the period which should introduce a reformation of religion, by the change of external and corporal into internal and mental worship."' BLOOMF.

V. 11-14. (11) Greater and more perfect tabernacle.] This may be explained, either of his holy human nature, in which He tabernacled on earth, and officiated as Priest in heaven, John 1:14. or rather of the heavens themselves, where 'He appears in the presence of God for us.' 24-26. His divine nature, the entire purity of his human nature, the exalted dignity of his person, as EMMANUEL; the honor put on the law of God by his most perfect obedience, and the voluntary offering of Himself, under the immediate influences of 'the eternal Spirit,' as a spotless sacrifice to divine justice in the stead of sinners, concurred to render it glorious in God, for his sake, fully to pardon, and freely to accept, all who were interested in Him by faith. If, then, there was the least efficacy in external expiations and purifications, through the appointment of God, and because they showed the guilt and pollution of sin, and typified the method of its removal, so that it became proper for God through them to confer temporal benefits on criminals, how much more

These were never designed for a perpetuity, but only to continue till the time of reformation, till gospel-times, times of reformation, of clearer light, of greater love, liberty and freedom both of spirit and speech, and of a more holy living according to the rule of the Gospel.

5. The Holy Ghost signifies to us hereby, that we never make the right use of types but when we apply them to the Antitype; and whenever we do so, it will be very evident that the Antitype (as in reason it should) greatly excels the type, which is the main drift and design of all that is said. And as he writes to those who believed that Christ was come, and that Jesus was the Christ; so he very justly infers, that He is infinitely above all the legal high priests, v. 11, 12. and he illustrates it very fully. For,

(1.) Christ is the High Priest of good things to come, by which may be understood, (1.) All the good things to come during the Old Test. and now come under the New; the New Testament is the accomplishment of the Old. (2.) All the good things yet to come and to be enjoyed in a gospel-state, all these depend on Christ and his priesthood, and shall be fulfilled. (3.) Of all the good things to come in the heavenly state, which will perfect both the Testaments; as the state of glory will perfect the state of grace, this state will be in a much higher sense the perfection of the New Test. than the New Test. was the perfection of the Old. Observe, All good things past, present, and to come, were, and are, founded on, and flowing from, the priestly office of Christ.

(2.) Christ is a High Priest by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, v. 11. a tabernacle not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building, but his own body, or rather human nature, conceived by the Holy Ghost overshadowing the blessed virgin. This was a new fabric, a new order of building, infinitely superior to all earthly structures, not excepting the tabernacle or the temple itself.

(3.) Christ, our High Priest, is entered into heaven, not as their high priest entered into the holiest, with the blood of bulls and of goats, but by his own blood typified by theirs, and infinitely more precious. And this,

(4.) Not for one year only, which showed the imperfection of that priesthood, that it did but typically obtain a year's reprieve or pardon. But our High Priest entered into heaven once for all, and has obtained not a yearly respite, but eternal redemption, and so needs not to make an annual entrance. In each of the types there was something that showed it was a type, and resembled the Antitype, and something that showed it was but a type, and fell short of the Antitype, and therefore ought by no means to be set up in competition with the Antitype.

(5.) The Holy Ghost further signified and showed what was the efficacy of the blood of the Old Test. sacrifices, and thence [he] infers the much greater efficacy of the blood of Christ. The legal sacrifices extended to the purifying of the flesh, v. 13. it freed the outward man from ceremonial uncleanness, and from temporal punishment, and entitled him to, and fitted him for, some external privileges. He infers very justly from hence the far greater efficacy of the blood of Christ, v. 14. Here observe,

[1.] What gave such efficacy to the blood of Christ. It was his offering Himself to God, the human nature on the altar of his divine nature, He being both Priest, Altar, and Sacrifice, his divine nature serving for the first two, and his human nature for the last; now such a Priest, Altar, and Sacrifice, could not but be propitiatory. It was his offering up Himself to God through the efficacious must the blood of Christ be, 'to purge the believer's conscience from dead works,' from the guilt of those evil works, which were committed by such as were dead in sin, and deserved death; or which really and deeply polluted the soul, even as the touch of a dead corpse ritually did the body! As, therefore, it was abundantly suited to render the exercise of mercy consistent with the most perfect justice and holiness, and honorable to God to accept the services of sinners who believed; so, when apprehended by faith, it effectually removes the burden of guilt from the conscience, and gives the trembling sinner peace, confidence, and comfort, in approaching, worshipping, and obeying the living God. Christians, therefore, could have no occasion to cleave to the abrogated typical expiations of the Mosaic law.—Some expositors, by 'the eternal Spirit,' suppose the Deity of the Son to be meant; but this seems rather to be implied in the word CHRIST. The holiness and obedience of our Savior, his miraculous powers, and the supports given to his human nature, are constantly ascribed to the Holy Spirit, 'with which He was anointed without measure,' sealing his appointment to his mediatorial offices, and as He was carried through his last scene of sufferings, by his most perfect zeal and love, which also gave value to his sacrifice. 1:3, 9. Ps. 45:6, 7. Is. 11:2-5. 42:4-4. 59:20, 21. 61:1-3. Mat. 3:16, 17. John 3:27-36. Acts 1:1-3. 10:36-43. The Holy Spirit, therefore, seems to be intended, whose eternal Deity, (as well as the everlasting value and efficacy of Christ's atonement,) is attested by the epithet here employed. The Levitical services were all 'shadows of heavenly things;' the expiations were, therefore, types of some real expiation. 'Now what expiation is there in the whole universe, if the Sacrifice of Christ is excluded?' Mackn.—(12) Eternal redemption.] Luke 1:68. 2:38. STUART.

(14.) Through the eternal Spirit.] 'Most of the ancients and earlier moderns, understand it of the divine nature of Christ. And this interpretation is ably supported by Grotius, Limborch, Wolf, Schoettig, Vitruv., Ernesti, Cramer, Storr, and Cranz. Others, as Abp. Tillots., and Drs. Owen, and Doddr., interpret it of the Holy Spirit. I confess, I see no interpretation so safe as the common one, first mentioned.' BLOOMF.—'An eternal spiritual nature, &c.' 'Although the offering of Christ might be rendered of the highest value, on account of the dignity of his Person, in consequence of the higher nature which dwelt in Him; yet the sacred writers represent Him as having made atonement in his human nature, not in his divine. This could not be because Christ had an immortal soul, and Adam had only a living animal soul; for Adam, too, was immortal. It would seem, here, that spirit and soul both designate a spiritual or immortal nature; but spirit, here, designates such a nature, of a higher order; and the antithesis is more fully made by quicken-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—14. 'The ordinances of divine service, and the worldly sanctuary' of the Mosaic covenant, point out to us Christ as the Light of the church and of the world, and 'the Bread of life' to our souls, Jn. 1:4—9. 6:30—35, 47—52. P. O. 30—35, 47—53, and remind us of his divine Person, his fruitful priesthood, which flourishes for ever, his perfect righteousness, and his all-prevailing intercession; 'which things the angels desire to look into' with adoring praise and adoration.—At what a distance has sin placed us from our holy Creator, when all the preparatory sacrifices of the law still left the worshippers secluded, and in a sense banished, even from the presence of God on his mercy-seat! All these sacrifices and services could no more purge the guilty conscience, than distinctions in meats, and divers 'baptisms,' could cleanse the polluted heart, or new create the fallen nature of man.

ing or life-giving, and living. If v. 14. contains substantially a recognition of the same or the like sentiment, (which it seems to do,) then through the eternal Spirit, may well refer to the eternal spiritual nature or condition of the Savior in glory, who presented Himself in the heavenly temple, with such a nature, as a spotless offering to God, and procured that pardon and purification which the sinner needs.' STUART. —'What strange servants some Christians are!—always at work for themselves, and never doing anything for Him whom they call their Master! And what subjects!—ever desiring to take the reins into their own hands!'

V. 15—17. Because of the unceasing and inexhaustible efficacy of his sacrifice, Christ was appointed to be 'the Mediator of the new covenant.' He had undertaken the cause of sinners, which must otherwise have been relinquished as desperate; as He alone was capable of offering a sacrifice of sufficient value to make a real atonement; and He had come into the world, in human nature, for that purpose, in order, by means of his death, to pay a ransom to God, for the transgressions which had been committed by believers, under the old covenant, or the legal dispensation; even those who lived before his coming, as well as all others who were called by the grace of God to faith in Him, 'might receive the promise of eternal inheritance.' Rom. 3:21—26. For the temporal inheritance alone was secured to the Israelites, by their observance of the legal expiations, and those of them who sought and obtained spiritual and eternal blessings, were made partakers of them through the anticipated efficacy of Christ's redemption. That grace was finally confirmed to them by his death; so that, in this respect, the covenant He mediated might also be considered as a testament, by which a man bequeaths certain legacies to persons specified in it, to be given to them in consequence of his death. Thus Christ might be considered, as having acquired, in his mediatorial office, a conditional right to dispose of spiritual and eternal blessings, as by his will and testament. These He bequeathed to all such as should apply for them by faith; and though, as a special favor, some were, before his coming, made partakers of them, in consequence of his unfulfilling engagements to assume human nature, and make redemption for their transgressions, yet even their right was incomplete till after his death, and all others must be admitted to claim them on that ground only. For when 'a testament is made,' 'the death of the testator must' of necessity take place, before the legacies can be claimed. It is of no validity till He be dead; for, as He may change it at pleasure while He lives, it has no force till afterwards. Thus Christ died, not only to obtain the blessings of salvation for us; but to give efficacy to his testamentary disposal of them; though He is different from all other testators, in that He rose again; and ever liveth to be the Executor of his own testament, for the benefit of all who are interested in it.—Thus the passage has generally been interpreted; but this is the only place, in which the original word is expressly used in Scripture for a testament, or the will of a dying person. The change of the meaning, also, from covenant to testament, seems unprecedented; 'the Mediator of a testament,' and 'the blood of a testament,' are expressions, to which it is difficult to annex any precise ideas, and the Sinai-covenant can hardly in any sense be called 'a testament.' Several modern expositors have therefore endeavored to establish another interpretation.—'For this reason, . . . of the new covenant He is the Mediator, or High Priest, by whom its blessings are dispensed, and also the Sacrifice, by which it is procured and ratified; that, his death, being accomplished, for obtaining the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant, b' lievers of all ages and nations, as the called seed of Abraham, . . . may receive the promised eternal inheritance. For . . . where a covenant is made by sacrifice, there is a necessity, that the death of the appointed sacrifice be produced. For, according to the practice of God and man, a covenant is made firm over dead which He had without measure, helping Him in all, and in this great act of obedience offering Himself. It was his offering Himself to God without spot, without any sinful stain, either in his nature or life; this was conformable to the law of sacrifices, which were to be without blemish. Now, further observe,

[2.] How great the efficacy of Christ's blood is; it is sufficient to purge the very soul and conscience; sufficient to enable us to serve the living God, not only by purging away guilt, but by sanctifying and renewing the soul through the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, purchased by Christ for this purpose, that we might be enabled to serve the living God in a lively manner.

V. 15—22. Here,

1. The Gospel is considered as a testament, the new and last will and testament of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. The solemn transactions that pass between God and man are sometimes called a covenant, here a testament. A covenant is an agreement between two or more parties about things in their own power, or that may be so; and this either with or without a mediator; this agreement takes effect at such time, and in such manner, as is therein declared. A testament is a voluntary act and deed of a single person, duly executed and witnessed, bestowing legacies on such legatees as are described and characterized by the testator, and which can only take effect on his death. Now observe,

Christ is the Mediator of a new testament, v. 15. and for several ends and purposes here mentioned. (1.) To redeem persons from their transgressions committed against the law or first testament, which makes every transgression a forfeiture of liberty, and makes men debtors, and slaves or prisoners, who need to be redeemed. (2.) To qualify all those that are effectually called, to receive the promise of an eternal inheritance. These are the great legacies that Christ, by his last will and testament, has bequeathed to the truly characterized legatees.

2. To make this new testament effectual, it was necessary Christ should die; the legacies accrue by means of death. This he

'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' that 'the Way into the holiest' is now manifested, by the coming, sacrifice, and ascension of our great High Priest! Now we 'sinners of the Gentiles' may come with far more 'boldness to the throne of grace,' than Israel's pontiff himself could; and now the gate of heaven is thrown open to all believers. Eternal redemption, and the promise of eternal inheritance, are purchased for us by 'the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God.' This effectually purges the most guilty 'conscience from dead works to serve the living God.' whilst the grace, which seals the pardon, new creates the polluted soul. May we then be made 'partakers of this heavenly calling,' and seek remission of our sins, only through the shedding and sprinkling of 'the blood of the New Test.,' which God has enjoined unto us! 13:20,21. sacrifices; seeing it never hath force, whilst the goat, calf, or hulloek, appointed as the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. Because, from the beginning, God ratified his covenants by sacrifice, to preserve among men the expectation of the Sacrifice of his Son; hence, not even the covenant at Sinai was made without sacrifice.' Mackn. 18—23. Gen. 15:7—21. Jer. 34:18, 19.—It appears to me, that the original will admit of this interpretation, but the nature of this work does not allow of my enlarging on the criticisms by which it is supported. On the one hand, the evils, which have been raised against the apostle's reasoning as inconclusive, if the first interpretation be adopted, and on the other hand, the venerable names, which have sanctioned it, with other circumstances of a similar nature, render me afraid of too confidently preferring either interpretation. I cannot, however, on the whole, but think, that the latter exposition is the most obvious, and consonant to the apostle's general way of reasoning.

SCOTT.
(15.) Scholfield says: 'The question is, whether the word here rendered "testament," should not be rendered covenant. In ch 7:22. also Mat. 26:28. it is rendered "testament." All through ch. 8. and here, v. 4. it is rendered "covenant;" but in these vs. 15, 16, 17. it is changed back to "testament,"—of course in the sense of a will. Comp. especially ch. 12:24. Waiving the question, whether the more general term, "dispensation," do or do not better express the meaning of the word, the inquiry is, whether the dispensation is to be regarded as a testament, or as a covenant, so as to comprehend rightly the apostle's argument. Scholfield came to the conclusion, that the word ought to be rendered "covenant," though there are difficulties in the way of this interpretation. He renders the passage, "And for this end He is the Mediator of the new covenant, that, his death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant, they that are called might receive the promise of the eternal inheritance. For where a covenant is, there must, of necessity, be brought in the death of the mediating sacrifice. For a covenant is valid over dead sacrifices, since it is never of any force while the mediating sacrifice continues alive." Scholfield adds: 'In one sense, Moses was the mediator of the old covenant, and so a type of Christ; but not in that sense which required the death of the Mediator, which is clearly the sense required, v. 15. In that sense the sacrifices were the types of Christ.'—Faber, on this passage, shows, that the rules of composition require, that the word, here in question, is used by the apostle, in the same sense as the same word is used in the context, both before and after it, i. e. to denote a covenant. The sum of this reasoning is,—All covenants are ratified over a sacrifice, and are valid only over dead victims; for they are no way binding while the ratifier is living. But the Levitical and Christian dispensations are each a covenant between God and man. Therefore, each of those covenants must have been ratified over a sacrifice.—Slade would consider, that the apostle takes advantage of the twofold sense of the word, intimating it as applicable to the Christian dispensation, not only as denoting a covenant, but also in its general acceptation of a testament. In Henry, abr., Bloomf. thinks Slade's view the least exceptionable. But see on vs. 1—5. from Stuart. Ep.—[For this cause.] 'I understand it as referring to the sentiment, v. 14. The sentiment stands thus: "As Jewish sacrifices rendered the offerer externally clean; so the blood of Christ purifies the moral or internal man, and removes the consequences of sin. On this account (for this cause), i. e. because the sacrifice of Christ produces an effect such as the Jewish sacrifices did not. He may be justly called the mediator of a new covenant, differing greatly from the old." Comp. Heb. 8:6—8, 13, 7:15—19.'—'The sentiment which this verse contains, respecting the efficacy of atoning blood in regard to the sins of preceding ages, has an exact parallel in Rom. 3:25. Both passages compared, form a striking coincidence of a peculiar sentiment, nowhere else so clearly and directly asserted.' STUART.

18 Whereupon neither the first testament was <sup>1</sup> dedicated without blood.

19 For <sup>2</sup> when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and <sup>1</sup> scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people,

20 Saying, 'This is the blood <sup>m</sup> of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you.

21 Moreover <sup>n</sup> he sprinkled likewise with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry.

22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood <sup>o</sup> is no remission.

23 It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

24 For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear <sup>p</sup> in the presence of God for us:

25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

26 For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

27 And as it is appointed <sup>q</sup> unto men once to die, but after this <sup>r</sup> the judgment;

proves by two arguments, from the general nature of every will or testamentary disposition, v. 16. none ever taking effect till the death of the testator; and from the particular method taken by Moses in the ratification of the first testament, which was not done without blood, v. 18, 19, &c. The method is here particularly related, v. 19. This blood and water signified the blood and water that came out of our Savior's pierced side, for justification and sanctification; and also shadowed forth the two sacraments of the New Test.,—Baptism, and the Lord's Supper; with scarlet wool, signifying the righteousness of Christ, with which we must be clothed; the hyssop signifying that faith by which we must apply all. And the sprinkling of both the book and the people signified the mutual consent of both parties; God and man, and their mutual engagements to each other in this covenant through Christ; Moses at the same time using these words, 'This is the blood of the Testament which God hath enjoined unto you.' This blood, typifying the blood of Christ, is the ratification of the covenant of grace to all true believers. He sprinkled the tabernacle, and all the utensils of it, intimating, that all the sacrifices offered up, and services performed there, were accepted only through the blood of Christ, which procures the remission of that iniquity that cleaves to our holy things, which could not have been remitted but by that atoning blood.

V. 23—28. In this last part of the ch. the apostle goes on to tell us what the Holy Ghost has signified to us by the legal purifications of the patterns of the things in heaven; inferring from thence the necessity of better sacrifices to consecrate the heavenly things themselves.

1. The necessity of purifying the patterns of the things in heaven, v. 23. This arises both from the divine appointment, and from the reason of that appointment. It is observable here, that the sanctuary of God on earth is a pattern of heaven, and communion with God in his sanctuary is to his people a heaven on earth.

2. The necessity that the heavenly things themselves should be purified with better sacrifices than of bulls and goats; the things themselves are better than the patterns, and must therefore be consecrated with better sacrifices. These heavenly things are the privileges of the gospel-state, begun in grace, perfected in glory; these must be ratified by a suitable sanction or consecration; and that was the blood of Christ. Now it is very evident that the sacrifices of Christ are infinitely better than those of the law. (1.) From the places in which the sacrifices under the law, and those under the gospel, were offered. Those under the law were the holy places made with hands, which are but figures of the true sanctuary, v. 24. Christ's sacrifice, though offered on earth, was by Himself carried up into heaven, and is there presented in a way of daily intercession; for He appears in the presence of God for us. (2.) From the sacrifices themselves, v. 26. Those under the law were the lives and blood of other creatures, of a different nature from the offerers,—blood of small value, and indeed of none at all in this matter, had it not had a typical respect to the blood of Christ; but the sacrifice of Christ was the oblation of Himself; He offered his own blood, truly called, by virtue of the hypostatical union, the blood of God; and therefore of infinite value. (3.) From the frequent repetition of the legal sacrifices. This showed the imperfection of that law; but it is the honor and perfection of Christ's sacrifice, that, being once offered, it was sufficient to all the ends of it; and, indeed, the contrary would have been absurd; for then He must have been still dying and rising again, and ascending and then again descending and dying; and the great work had been always a doing, and always to do, but never finished; which would be as contrary to reason as it is to revelation, and to the dignity of his Person; but now once in the end of the world hath He appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself. The Gospel is the last dispensation of the grace of God to men. (4.) From the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice: the legal sacrifices could not of themselves put away sin; neither procure pardon for it, nor power against it. Sin would still have laid on us, and had dominion over us; but Jesus Christ, by one sacrifice, has made an end of sin; He has destroyed the works of the devil.

3. The apostle illustrates the argument from the appointment of God concerning men, v. 27, 28. and observes something like it in the appointment of God concerning Christ.

(1.) Men must once die, or, however, undergo a change equivalent to death; and then, after death, they shall come to judgment, to a particular judgment, immediately after death; to the general judgment, at the end of the world. This is the unalterable decree of God concerning men: they must die, and they must be judged. It is appointed for them, and it is to be believed and seriously considered by them.

(2.) Christ must be once offered, to bear the sins of many, of all the Father had given to Him, of all who should believe in his name. He shall appear the second time without sin, to the salvation of those who look for Him. At his first appearance, though He had no sin of his own, yet He stood charged with the sins of many; He was the Lamb of God that bore on Him the

V. 18—23. To prefigure the necessity of the blood-shedding of Christ, even the Sinai-covenant had not been dedicated, or ratified, without blood.—The apostle specified some particulars, not found in the history; probably taking them from the usages of his people, on some occasions. To prevent the blood from coagulating, it was customary to mix it with water, that it might sprinkle the better, which was an apt emblem of the twofold benefit of Christ's atonement.—The Hebrews also knew, that Moses had afterwards sprinkled the tabernacle and all its furniture with blood, to consecrate them for the worship of God. (M. R. n.—Notes, 8—10. Lev. 16:18—22.) In short, it was a general rule, that 'almost every thing was by the law purified with blood;' which showed, that nothing could be clean to a sinner, not even his religious duties, except as his guilt was expiated by the death of a sacrifice of sufficient value for that end, and unless he continually depended on it. And, indeed, it was absolutely a universal rule, that, 'without the shedding of blood,' no kind or degree of sin was ever pardoned, or the punishment due to it remitted. (10 3, 4.—20) This, &c.] The quotation is not from the Septuagint, but agrees in meaning both with that and the Hebrew. Ex. 24:3.—22. Shedding of blood.] Here only. The reference is to Ex. 20—23.—The blood, &c.] 'Though Moses, in the history Ex. 24. has said nothing of these things, yet that they were not matters of new revelation to the writer, seems pretty evident; for he plainly makes an appeal to circumstances, which, he takes it for granted, are well known to the Hebrews, whom he addresses, and about which, if he were to commit an error of statement, all his readers would be revolted.' STUART. Bloomf. takes the same view, and adds: 'These particulars are supposed to have been derived from tradition.'

(21.) 'The high priest is said to appear before God, when he stands at the ark. Then it is announced, that the solemn expiation is made. So Christ has entered heaven, and is at the right hand of the Father. Now, therefore, it is declared, that the whole expiation is made, and that pardon is obtained for men through the death of Christ. See ch. 7:25.'

V. 26. 'Christ is here said to have been revealed at the confines of the ages; where the end of this age or world, and the beginning of that to come, as it were, touch one another. A phrase which most exactly describes the time of the coming of the Messiah.' J. P. SMITH.

V. 27, 28. It is generally supposed, that some of the expressions, in the latter part of this ch., allude to the ceremonies, used on the great day of atonement; particularly, 'the scape-goat bare,' or carried away, the sins of the people into the wilderness, and the high priest, when he had entered into the holy of holies, in linen garments, came forth to the people in his splendid sacerdotal robes, to pronounce the blessing on them. Lev. 16:20—25.—'Did He not appear the first time without sin? Yes, certainly, as to any inherent guilt, for the Scripture says, "He had no sin." What then is the meaning of this opposition, that at his first coming "He bare our sins," but at his second coming "He shall appear without sin unto salvation?" These words can have no other imaginable sense but this, that at his first coming He sustained the person of a sinner, and suffered instead of us; but his second coming shall be our sin-

28 So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation.

PRACT. OBS. V. 15—23. We must never presume to approach God, except on a mercy-seat, and in the name of our great High Priest, who is 'entered into heaven to appear in his presence for us.' All our hopes and blessings must be sought as the fruit of his agonizing, yet voluntary death, the legacy of his dying love, and the gift of his royal munificence to rebellious creatures. We must ascribe even our sanctification, and all our real good works, to the same all-procuring Cause; and attend on divine ordinances, and offer our spiritual sacrifices, as 'sprinkled with his blood,' and so purified from their defilement. Nay, we must expect admission into heaven, as the place which He has prepared for other account, and He shall appear, not as a Sacrifice, but as a Judge.' Abp. Tillotson.

(27, 28.) 'The apostle shows, by a new argument, derived a simili, that Christ ought once only to offer Himself, namely, because his sacrifice and death were one and the same. Nor does he properly intend to affirm, that all men must die, but that it is appointed for them once to die, and after death nothing shall remain but judgment.' Bloomer. See on vs. 1—5. from Stuart, who adds here, on v. 27. 'The implication contained in this v. viz. that a state of trial in a future world, like to that which is allowed men in the present world, is not to be expected, seems to be plain.' Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. X. 'Having compared various particulars in the Aaronic priesthood to those which relate to the priesthood of Christ, the writer comes at last to treat more fully of the inefficacy of the Jewish sacrifices, and of the perfect and everlasting efficacy of the propitiatory offering made by Christ.—at which indeed he had hinted several times before, 7:11, 19. 8:7, 13. 9:2—10, 13, 14. He begins by declaring, that the rites of the law were designed to be typical, and that the yearly sacrifices offered under it, never could quiet and purify the consciences of men, 10:1. otherwise, the offerings had not been continually repeated, v. 2. The remembrance of sin is constantly renewed by them, v. 3. Indeed, it is plainly impossible the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin, i. e. remove the penalty of it, or lessen its power, v. 4. Hence the Scripture (Ps. 40.) represents the Savior, when entering on his work, as saying, sacrifices and offerings are of no value in the sight of God, v. 5, 6. The Messiah represents Himself as doing what God requires, in order that He may exercise his clemency, v. 7. Of course, (so our author,) sacrifices and offerings are rejected, in respect to making real propitiation, while the obedience of Christ unto death is accepted instead of them, vs. 8, 9. This sacrifice is truly efficacious for moral purposes, v. 10. The Jewish priests continually repeated their sacrifices; but the offering of Christ, once made, is of everlasting efficacy, vs. 11, 12. Having once made this, He may expect the cause on account of which it was made to be victorious, v. 13. for one offering, once made by Jesus, is all sufficient, its effects are never to cease, v. 14. To such an efficacy of Christ's offering, the Holy Spirit has testified in the Scriptures, by declaring, that under the new covenant sin should be forgiven, and iniquity no more remembered, vs. 15, 16. Consequently, offering for sin needs not be repeated, after pardon is actually obtained, v. 17, 18. With this consideration, the comparison of Jesus, as a Priest, with the Jewish priests under the Levitical priesthood, closes, occupying, however, most of the epistle, viz. from 4:14. to 10:13. The writer then proceeds to exhortations, warnings, and various arguments from different sources, in order to urge on his Hebrew brethren the importance of persevering in the Christian faith.' SEWALL.—'This ch. is not connected with the words immediately preceding, nor contains the reason of them; but relates to what was said on the entering of the priest to the sanctum sanctorum every year, with the blood of another; whereas Christ offered Himself. The cause he deduces from the variety of sacrifices, and the nature of the law.'

BLOOMER, after Diot.
 V. 1, 2. (2) 'Would they not, &c.?' Some render this, 'They would not have ceased to be offered.' That is, they would have continued to be offered, being efficacious and adequate. But it is plain, from the apostle's previous reasoning on several things contained in the Old Test. that this was never intended. The reading with an interrogation seems to be founded on the best authority, and is most satisfactory.—If any sacrifice had been offered, of sufficient efficacy to atone for sin, there would have been no need for a continual repetition of it; and [540] sins of the world; and then He appeared in the form of sinful flesh; but his second appearance will be without any such charge on Him, He having fully discharged it before; and then his visage shall not be marred, but shall be exceedingly glorious. This will be to the salvation of all who look for Him; He will then perfect their holiness, their happiness; their number shall then be accomplished, and their salvation completed. Observe, It is the distinguishing character of true believers, that they are looking for Christ; they look to Him by faith, for Him by hope and holy desires, for Him in every duty, in every ordinance, in every providence now; and they expect his second coming, and are preparing for it; and though it will be sudden destruction to the rest of the world, who scoff at the report of it, it will be eternal salvation to those who look for it.

CHAP. X. V. 1—6. Here the apostle, by the direction of the Spirit of God, sets himself to show the weakness and imperfection of the Levitical dispensation; which he does effectually, from several arguments. As,

1. The law had but a shadow of good things to come; and who would dote on a shadow, though of good things, especially when the substance is come? Observe, The things of Christ and the Gospel are good things; the best things, best in themselves, and best for us; they are realities of an excellent nature. These good things were, under the Old Test., good things to come, not clearly discovered, nor fully enjoyed. The Jews then had but the shadow of the good things of Christ, some adumbrations of them; we under the Gospel have the substance.

2. The law was not the very image of the good things to come. An image is an exact draft of the thing represented thereby. The law did not go so far, but was only a shadow, as the image of a person in a looking-glass is a much more perfect representation than his shadow on the wall. The law was a very rough draft of the great design of divine grace, and therefore not to be so much doted on.

3. The legal sacrifices, being offered year by year, could never make the comers thereunto perfect; for then there would have been an end of offering them, v. 1, 2. But no, after one day of atonement was over, the sinner would fall again into one fault or other, and so there would be need of another day of atonement, and of one every year, beside the daily ministrations. Whereas now, under the Gospel, the atonement is perfect, and not to be repeated; and the sinus, through the presenting of his blood, for the ransom of our souls, and which would otherwise have been contaminated by our entrance into it. Thus we should in all things learn the inestimable value of the 'one sacrifice,' which Christ once appeared on earth to offer for us, that we may know our interest in his covenant, and be 'constrained by his love,' to the most devoted and unreserved obedience. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. In this manner we shall be reconciled to the appointed stroke of death, and look forward to judgment with cheerful hope; and so wait prepared for his coming the second 'time without sin' to perfect our salvation.

that repetition showed the inefficacy of the most solemn legal sacrifices. On the contrary, when the one sacrifice of Christ had been offered, the legal sacrifices were virtually abolished; no other sacrifice was required; no repetition was necessary; the end was fully answered; nothing, except faith in Him, was needful; and the appointed ordinances were no longer prefigurations, but memorials, of his one all-sufficient atonement.

SCOTT.

V. 3, 4. The apostle's argument implied, that no sacrifice could really atone for sin, or bring sinners into a state of acceptance with God unto eternal life, which did not make full satisfaction to his offended justice, and render it honorable to Him to remit the punishment of it.—The same argument equally proves, that the blood of a mere man, or of a mere creature, 'cannot take away sin.' A guilty creature deserves wrath for his own crimes. If a perfectly holy man had the full disposal of his own life and soul, and could be willing to devote them to destruction, in the stead of a single guilty person; his life might be an adequate ransom for the other's life, his soul for the other's soul; but this must be all: and, even in this case, we cannot conceive that God would appoint, allow, or accept such a substitution. If the most exalted of mere creatures should willingly assume our nature, and suffer temporal death, in its most horrible forms, for our salvation; we may easily perceive that the atonement, or compensation to justice, would be very small, when compared with the guilt to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted, for the sake of it: nor could this render it consistent with the perfect justice of God, to pardon the atrocious and innumerable rebellions of unnumbered millions, and to give them eternal life, in consideration of it. . . . But, when 'God manifested in the flesh' became the Sacrifice, and his death upon the cross the Ransom; when 'God purchased the church with his own blood;' the Sufferer being of infinite dignity, his voluntary sufferings were of infinite value. The perfect justice and holiness of God, and the honor of his law, are as legitimate in the cross of Christ, as his love to sinners: his infinite purity, and infinite mercy, unite in perfect and eternal harmony; while unnumbered millions of rebels, who deserve the final wrath of God, are pardoned, and made heirs of eternal felicity, through this satisfaction of inestimable value. We may perceive, that this was an expedient adequate to its object; and that such a sacrifice would suffice for the sins of the whole world, if all men actually came to God through it. It is necessary for us to insist on this, not only as comprising an unanswerable argument for the real Deity and the proper atonement of Christ, but because many, who profess to believe both these truths, under color of blaming metaphysical exactness in stating doctrines, and affecting to treat the orthodox reformers, doctrinal Puritans, and modern preachers of the Gospel, as men of narrow minds, advance many things contrary to the apostle's reasoning in this passage: as if Christ's sacrifice derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from his personal Deity and excellency; (which was 'the altar that sanctified the gift;') and as if, had the Lord so pleased, an inferior sacrifice might have equally answered the purpose. But surely they forget, that God appointed the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as well as that of his Son: yet 'it was not possible' for the former to take away sin, but the latter at once effected it, because of its intrinsic value.—'Divine acceptance must not be assigned as the only cause, that the oblation of our Savior's body was thus available for the expiation of the guilt of sin; for then no reason can be given why He might not have accepted of the blood of bulls and goats, and much more of the sufferings of any ordinary man. . . . But the great reason, why "the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sins" is this, that they could never answer the great ends of 4 For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away <sup>d</sup> sins.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-4. The righteousness brought in by Christ, and the sacrifice once offered by Him, are of infinite and eternal efficacy, and 'his salvation shall never be abolished.'—Most certain it is, from these chs., that God will not pardon any transgression, without such a sacrifice, as can really expiate the guilt of it. And if those sacrifices, which were of his own appointment, 'could not take away sin,' be-punishment, and thereby render it consistent with the honor of the Governor, and with the ends of government, to admit the substitution of them in our stead. . . . By the obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ unto the death, in our stead, these ends of punishment are very signally obtained, and that with more advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our offences had been inflicted on us; and so God, by it, may be truly said to have been satisfied, seeing that justice . . . is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which the punishment of the offender could be desired, are obtained. . . . 1. God, by this dispensation, hath given us the best and most effectual example, to deter us from sin. . . . If He, who was the well beloved Son of God, found it so dreadful to lie under the burden for some hours; to lie exposed for ever to it must be far more intolerable. . . . If, on this account, "God spared not his own Son," we may be sure He will not spare his stubborn enemies. . . . 2. God, by this method, hath taken a most excellent way for reformation of the sinner. . . . 3. God, by this dispensation, hath sufficiently consulted the preservation of his honor, and secured the reverence and observation of his laws. . . . seeing He hath, by this example, let all men know, that, though He be a God of great long-suffering and mercy, He will by no means clear the sinner, or suffer sin to go unpunished. . . . But that none of these ends could be at all obtained, by the substitution of a bull, or goat, or ram, to suffer in our stead, must be extremely evident; . . . for this would rather tempt men to conceive that God's displeasure against sin could not be great, . . . and that He was not much concerned for any satisfaction for the violations of his law, when such slight matters were by Him thought sufficient expiations for them.' Whitby. Scott.

(3.) Remembrance.] This 'remembrance of sin,' pervades all the appointed ordinances of worship, since the fall of Adam; including baptism, the Lord's supper, prayer, and thanksgiving. 1 Kings 17:18. Jo.

V. 5-10. To prove his doctrine in the most manly manner, the apostle referred the Hebrews to a remarkable prophecy of the Messiah; which showed that his coming was the necessary consequence of the inefficiency of the legal sacrifices, and of the Lord's purpose of saving sinners. (Note, Ps. 40:6-8.) The Messiah, speaking concerning his 'coming into the world,' remarked, that Jehovah had no delight in the sacrifices of the law; (Notes, Ps. 50:7-15. Is. 1:10-15.) but 'that He had prepared a body for Him.'—When Jehovah received no satisfaction from the legal sacrifices, not merely because the people rested in them after a formal and self-righteous manner, but especially because they did not sufficiently display the honor of his justice in pardoning sinners; the eternal Son declared his readiness to come into the world in human nature for that purpose, according as it had been written of Him in 'the volume of the book,' or in opening the roll of prophecy, in which He had been promised as 'the Seed of the woman.' (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) Now the apostle argued from this, that the evident contrast in the prophecy quoted, between 'the sacrifices, in which Jehovah had no pleasure,' and the obedience of the Messiah to his whole will, in which He would be fully satisfied, was an evident intimation, that He intended to remove the former, in order to establish the latter in its full glory, and as the only ground of sinners' being pardoned and saved. By this will of God, perfectly performed by Christ in his obedience unto the death on the cross, Christians were 'sanctified' and consecrated to God, as accepted and spiritual worshippers; 'through the offering of his body once for all,' with which his mediatorial obedience had been completed. (Note, 13:9-14.)—From this memorable passage of the fortieth Psalm, we learn, that the only expiation for sin, which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices, which He appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside; that, under the gosselfs take away sin, so it was impossible they should, v. 4. There was an essential defect in them. They were not of the same nature that offended, and so could not be suitable. They were much less of the same nature that was offended; and nothing less than that could make the sacrifice a full satisfaction for the offence. The beasts offered up under the law could not consent to put themselves in the sinner's room and place. The atoning sacrifice must be one capable of consenting, and must voluntarily substitute himself in the sinner's stead; Christ did so.

5. There was a time fixed and foretold by the great God, and that time was now come, when these legal sacrifices would be no longer accepted by Him, or useful to men. God never did desire them for themselves, and now He abrogated them; and therefore to adhere to them now, would be resisting God and rejecting Him. This time of the repeal of the Levitical laws was foretold by David, Ps. 40:7. and is recited here as now come. Thus industriously does the apostle lay low the Mosaic dispensation.

V. 7-18. Here the apostle exalts the Lord Jesus Christ as high, as he had laid the Levitical priesthood low. He recommends Christ to them as the true High Priest, the true atoning Sacrifice, the Antitype of all the rest; and this he illustrates, because they could not satisfy the demands of his justice; let none suppose, that human inventions, self-imposed penances, prayers, tears, amendments, moral virtues, almsdeeds, or any other device or performance, can avail in the behalf of those, who substitute them in the stead of the sacrifice of the Son of God; 'for if righteousness,' in any way or degree, 'come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.' Scott.

1. From the purpose and promise of God

pel-dispensation, there might remain to mankind no sacrifice, having pretension to take away sin, but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God Himself, as the meritorious Cause of our pardon.' Maacknight. A body, &c.] The words in the Psalm are, 'Mine ears hast Thou opened,' or 'bored.' Ex. 21:3-6. and it has perplexed many expositors to determine why the apostle, writing to the Hebrews, should quote from the Sept., where that translation evidently differs from the Heb. But he probably supposed that the words conveyed the general meaning of the passage: and that the production of the holy human nature of Christ was that preparation for his mediatorial obedience, which was intended by that expression, 'Mine ears hast Thou opened.' The quotation, however, is not exactly from the Sept., which seems to have been made from some other reading, than that found in our present copies. The meaning, however, and the apostle's argument, are not at all affected by the variation. Scott.

(5.) 'The apostle opening the great plan of redemption, introduces the Savior as thus addressing his Father. See Ps. 40:6. et seq. which is a prophecy of Christ, upon the assumption of his human nature.' Valpy, in Bloomf.—Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not.] I.e. 'Not absolutely, but they were, in a comparative sense, of little value.' Stuart. A body hast Thou prepared Me.] 'The discrepancy here between the Heb. and the Sept. [Kennicott thinks the Heb. once read as the Greek now does] the most judicious are of opinion may best be removed [accounted for] by supposing the Sept. have translated freely, giving the real, though not the literal sense; explaining it, as Mr. Slade says, in the way of paraphrase, to those for whom they translated. See Rom. 3:12. Bloomf.—Saurin ingeniously conjectures, that the Heb. originally read: 'My ears hast Thou opened,' or bored, in allusion to Ex. 21:6. He conceives that the LXX., considering that idea unintelligible in Greek, changed the allusion to a custom familiar to themselves, namely, the marking the bodies of their soldiers and slaves, that they might claim them as their own, and therefore rendered the original, 'My body hast Thou prepared,' meaning marked, according to their custom: and Wilkins adds, (in reference to Gal. 6:17.) Rev. 13:16, 17. But Stuart has well shown, that the apostle's use of the phrase from the Sept. may be regarded as rather incidental; the apostle found it in the Sept., and, as being to his purpose, he used it accordingly.—'There can be no doubt,' Bloomf. says, 'but the phrase must be understood of Christ's being clothed and fitted with a human body for the purpose of making the sacrifice in question.' Ros. gives the sense thus: "'Thou hast created Me a body, that I might use it to the purpose of obeying [ad obedientiam], that I might make it what Thou wouldest have it to be made, and that I might yield it up to death.' What the apostle wished (he says) to show, was, that, since the sacrifices by the law of Moses could not take away sin, Christ was pleased to offer up Himself; and by this sacrifice to make expiation and bring us to be saved.' Ed. 'Christ's coming into the world, in scripture-phrase, means, his descending from heaven to be with us, John 16:23. and his going hence to heaven, is styled his leaving the world, John 13:1. 16:28. 17:11. The connexion of it here with the time when a body was prepared for Him, will not suffer us to doubt, that it imports his assumption of the human nature, and his being born into the world.' Whitby, in Henry, abr.

(3, 9.) Ros. here gives the sense from v. 5-9 thus: 'Obedience is better than external sacred rites; but this Christ rendered while He willing- and promptly underwent death, to this end, that we might be purified from sin and obtain pardon.'—'That is,' says Stuart, 'doing the will

10 By the which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

11 And every priest standeth daily ministering, and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins :

12 But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God ;

13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.

14 For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

15 Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us : for after that he had said before,

16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord ; I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them ;

17 And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

in two instances. In taking away the first priesthood, which God had no pleasure in; and in establishing the second, that is, his own priesthood, and the everlasting Gospel, the most pure and perfect dispensation of the covenant of grace; this is the great design on which the heart of God was set from all eternity; and it is not more agreeable to the will of God, than it is advantageous to the souls of men; for it is by this will that we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ, once for all, v. 10. Observe, What is the fountain of all that Christ has done for his people—the sovereign will and grace of God. How we come to partake of what Christ has done for us—by being sanctified, converted, effectually called, wherein we are united to Christ, and so partake of the benefits of his redemption; and this sanctification is owing to the oblation He made of Himself to God.

5. From the perfect efficacy of the priesthood of Christ, v. 14. He has and will perfectly deliver those that are brought over to Him, from all the guilt, power, and punishment of sin, and will put them into the sure possession of perfect holiness and felicity. This is what the Levitical priesthood could never do; and if we indeed are aiming at a perfect state, we must receive the Lord Jesus as the only High Priest that can bring us to that state.

6. From the place to which our Lord Jesus is now exalted, the honor He has there, and the further honor He shall have, v. 12, 13. Here observe, (1.) To what honor Christ, as Man and Mediator, is exalted,—to the right hand of God, the seat of power, interest, and activity; the giving hand; all the favors God bestows on his people, are handed them by Christ; the receiving hand; all the duties God accepts from men, are presented by Christ; the working hand; all in the kingdoms of providence and grace, is administered by Christ; and therefore this is the highest post of honor. (2.) How Christ came to this honor,—not merely by the purpose or donation of the Father, but by his own merit and purchase, as a reward due to his sufferings; and as He can never be deprived of an honor so much his due, so He will never quit it, nor cease to employ it for his people's good. (3.) How He enjoys this honor,—with the greatest satisfaction and rest; He is for ever sat down there; here He will dwell; for He hath both desired and deserved it. (4.) He has further expectations, which shall not be disappointed; for they are grounded on the promise of the Father, who hath said unto Him, Sit Thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool, Ps. 110:1. One would think such a Person as Christ could have no enemies, except in hell; but He has enemies on earth, very many, and very inveterate ones. But Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool; some by conversion, others by confusion; and which way soever it be, Christ will be honored; of this Christ is assured, this He is expecting; and his people should rejoice in the expectation of it; for when his enemies are subdued, their enemies, that are so for his sake, shall be subdued also.

7. And lastly, The apostle recommends Christ, from the witness the Holy Ghost has given in the Scriptures concerning Him; this relates chiefly to what should be the happy fruit and consequence of his humiliation and sufferings, which in general is that new and gracious covenant that is founded on his satisfaction, and sealed by his blood, v. 15. The passage is cited from Jer. 31:31. in which covenant God promises, (1.) That God would pour out his Spirit on his people, so as to give them wisdom, will, and power, to obey his Word; He will put his laws in their hearts, and write them in their minds, v. 16. This will make their duty plain, easy, and pleasant. (2.) Their sins and iniquities He will remember no more, v. 17. which will alone show the riches of divine grace, and the sufficiency of Christ's satisfaction, that it needs not be repeated, v. 18. For there shall be no more remembrance of sin against true believers, either to shame them now, or to condemn them hereafter. This was much more than the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices could effect.

And now we have gone through the doctrinal part of the epistle, in which we have met with many things dark and difficult to be understood, which we must impute to the weakness and dullness of our own minds. The apostle now proceeds to apply this great doctrine, so as to influence their affections, and direct their practice, setting before them the dignities and duties of the gospel-state.

V. 19—39. Here the apostle sets forth, I. The dignities of the gospel-state. It is fit believers should know the honors and privileges Christ has procured them, that, while they take the comfort, they may give Him the glory of all. They have access to God, light and liberty, a right to the privilege, and a readiness for it; assistance to use and improve it, and assurance of acceptance and advantage. They have a High Priest over the house of God, even this blessed Jesus, who presides over the church militant, and every member thereof on earth, and over the church triumphant in heaven. God is willing to dwell with men on earth, and to have them dwell with Him in heaven; but fallen man cannot dwell with God, without a High Priest, who is the Mediator of reconciliation here, and of fruition hereafter.

II. The apostle tells us the way and means by which Christians enjoy such privileges, and, in general, declares it to be by the blood of Jesus, by the merit of that blood which he offered up to God as an atoning sacrifice. This, being sprinkled on the conscience, chases away slavish fear, and gives the believer assurance both of his safety, and his welcome into the divine presence. Now the apostle having given this general account of the way by which we have access to God, enters further into the particulars of it, v. 20. It is the only way; there is no other but this. It is a new way, PRACT. OBS. V. 5—13. When the eternal Son of God saw the hopeless condition of fallen man, for whom no sacrifices even of divine appointment, and no contrivances of man's devising, could in the least avail, He, according as it had been written of Him in 'the volume of the Book,' from the beginning, with infinite compassion towards our of God, or obedience to Him, even unto death, or the offering up of his [Christ's] body, is represented by the Psalmist as a substitute for legal sacrifices, and an arrangement which would supersede them.' Ed.

V. 11—13. By his one oblation, He had provided effectually for the perfect justification, unto eternal life, of all those who should ever receive his atonement, by faith springing from regeneration, and evidenced 'by the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience,' and who were thus set apart and consecrated to the service of God. To this the Holy Spirit had borne testimony in the Scripture, which had been before quoted. 8:7—13. According to the covenant, there spoken of, when the laws of God are written in the heart, every kind and degree of sin is for ever pardoned: for Christ 'by his one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;' and where such perfect remission is vouchsafed, there needs no more sacrifice for sins. For though justified persons continually contract new guilt, and their best services need forgiveness; yet the sacrifice of Christ continually applied to, in the exercise of penitent faith, preserves their peace; and if the exercise of repentance and faith he at any time intermitted, through temptation and sin; corrections, rebukes, and terrors bring them back again to the same remedy and thus their justification is, as it were, a permanent act of God, continued in their daily pardon and acceptance for Christ's sake, through life even unto death, and so in judgment and to eternity. (15.) Holy Ghost.] How marked an attestation of the inspiration of the Psalmist!

deserved misery, came in human nature, to accomplish the will of the Father, and to 'bear our sins in his own body on the tree.' Gen. 3:14, 15. What then remains, but that we seek an interest in this sacrifice by faith, and the seal of it to our souls by 'the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience?' SCOTT.

V. 19—22. (20) New way.] The original way of acceptance and communion with God, through 'the righteousness of works,' had been finally shut up by the entrance of sin. Gen. 3:22—24. The typical sacrifices could not open another way, as the restrictions and exclusions, before stated, evidently showed: while even the admission of the high priest, on the day of atonement, only, being preceded with recent sacrifices and blood newly shed, signified that the way into the holiest was not yet manifested.' But the blood of Jesus is always, as it were, 'newly shed;' it never loses its efficacy, and may at any time, and by any sinner, be presented in faith before the mercy-seat; and it never fails to procure, to all who thus plead it, a free and acceptable access to God. JENOVAN displayed his glory above the mercy-seat, in the holy of holies, before the coming of Christ; but this glory was covered and concealed by the veil; that is, the harmony of infinite holiness with pardoning mercy, in the divine conduct and character, was not clearly discovered or understood. 9:1—10. Ex. 26:31—33. But when the human nature of Christ, the Son of God, was wounded and bruised for our sins; and when He expired on the cross, 'the veil was rent from top to PRACT. OBS. V. 19—25. Having 'access with boldness into the holiest by the blood of Jesus,' by 'the new and living way which He hath consecrated for us,' let us not stand at a distance, or turn away from Him who 'beseeches us to be reconciled.' Is. 55:6, 7. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Jam. 4:7—10. Let us, in the first place, beware of hypocrisy, that we may 'draw near with a true heart ;' let us watch and pray against unbelief, that we may come 'in the full assurance of faith,' knowing this to be the appointed and only way of acceptance and salvation ; let us apply his blood to purge us from guilt, and seek for his promised grace, to cleanse us from all our filthiness ; that so, our 'hearts being sprinkled from an evil conscience,' we may 'lay aside the body of the sins of the flesh,' and 'henceforth walk in newness of life.' Thus we bottom.' (Note, Mat. 27:51—53.) The obscurity was then removed, and 'a just God and a Savior' was openly revealed to mankind ; displaying his glory from the mercy-seat, and exercising most abundant grace even to the chief of sinners, in a manner most honorable to his infinite purity.—They might indeed very properly examine themselves, whether they were true believers or not ; and so admit a doubt of their own sincerity, or personal acceptance ; and therefore 'the full assurance of hope' could not always be a duty, any more than always attainable : yet they must never allow themselves to doubt of the truth of the testimony of God, or his faithfulness to his promises ; so that 'the full assurance of faith' was always their duty ; though in that, as in other things, they would come short of it. Note, 6:11, 12.—As the priests were washed with water, before they were admitted to enter on their office, and continually washed themselves, in some measure, before they officiated ; and as divers baptisms were appointed to the worshippers by the law, 9:8—10. Ez. 29:1—7. 30:12—21. so the use of water in baptism was to be a constant memorial to Christians, that their outward conduct should be pure and holy before men, as well as their hearts and consciences cleansed in the sight of God. (Notes, Zech. 13:1. Mat. 3:5, 6. 28:18—20. John 3:4, 5. 1 Cor. 6:9—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:19—22. Rev. 7:13—17.) Thus they would approve themselves to be spiritual worshippers ; and whilst they derived comfort and grace from their reconciled Father, they would 'adorn the doctrine of God their Savior in all things.'

(19.) The writer having gone through with a comparison of the new dispensation with the old, and having shown, that whether Christ be compared with angels, or Moses, or the high priest of the Hebrews, He holds a rank far above them ; having shown, also, that whether the temple in which He ministers be compared with that at Jerusalem, or the sacrifice He offers be compared with those sacrifices presented by the Jewish priests, either as to its exalted nature, its spiritual efficacy in respect to procuring pardon for sin, or the duration and extent of its effects, the Mosaic institutions are nothing more than the shadow, of which Christian ones are the substance ; he now proceeds to the hortatory and admonitory part of his epistle.

(20.) 'New and living way,'—i. e. new, not only as lately opened, but also because those who draw nigh to God in it, have liberty of access in their own persons, and obtain pardon by means of a sacrifice altogether different from that which was offered for worshippers by the Jewish priests :—living, i. e. leading to life or happiness, or conferring it.—Through the veil.—In John 1:14. Rom. 1:4. 9:5. Phil. 2:6. the human nature or body of Christ seems to be regarded as a kind of temporary tabernacle, or veil of the divine nature which dwelt in Him. May not this be the sense here ? The idea would be : "As the veil of the temple concealed the glory of Jehovah, in the holy of holies, from the view of men ; so Christ's flesh or body screened or concealed the higher nature from our view (which dwelt within this veil, as God did of old within the veil of the temple)." If on this account the apostle calls Christ's flesh a veil, then we may easily make out the sense of the verse before us. It would stand thus : "As God dwells behind the veil, in the earthly temple, so God dwells behind the veil of Jesus' body, in his spiritual temple, i. e. He can be approached only through the medium

God, and live. It is a way Christ has consecrated for us through the veil, that is, his flesh. The veil in the tabernacle and temple, signified the body of Christ ; when He died, the veil of the temple was rent in sunder, and this was at the time of the evening sacrifice, and gave the people a surprising view into the holy of holies, which they never had before. Our way to heaven is by a crucified Savior ; his death is to us the way of life ; to those who believe this, He will be precious.

III. The apostle proceeds to show the Hebrews the duties they were obliged to, on account of these privileges conferred on them in such an extraordinary way, v. 22, 23, &c.

1. They must draw near to God, and that in a right manner. They must draw near to God by conversion, and by taking hold of his covenant ; in all holy conversation, like Enoch walking with God ; in humble adorations, worshipping at his footstool ; in holy dependence, and a strict observation of the divine conduct toward them ; in conformity to God, and communion with Him, living under his blessed influence, still endeavoring to get nearer and nearer, till they come to dwell in his presence ; but they must see to it, that they make their approach to God after a right manner. (1.) With a true heart, without any allowed guile or hypocrisy. (2.) In full assurance of faith ; with a faith grown up to a full shall be enabled to 'hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering,' whatever temptations or seducing examples we may meet with, knowing that 'He is faithful who hath promised ;' and, with composed and cheerful minds, we shall be enabled to consider the cases of our brethren, that we may animate and 'stimulate them to love and good works.'—But, if they were not to be excused who, in the time of severe persecution, forsook the assembling of themselves together ; how shall we answer it to God, if, in these favored days, we indolently absent ourselves from the assemblies of his saints, and neglect to honor Him by attendance on his ordinances ? Against such evils we should warn others most earnestly, and ought ourselves gladly 'to suffer the word of exhortation,' as knowing the day of death and judgment speedily approaches. Sc.

of this, or by means of this." The comparison is, in most respects, without grounds of analogy, and the two things widely dissimilar ; yet there is as much congruity in it, as there is in the comparison between the physical death of Christ in Rom. 6. and the moral death of believers to sin, to which the former is there compared.

(22.) 'There is an allusion to the sacrificial rite, by which the mind as well as the body of the worshipper was required to be pure.' Bl.—The washing with pure water, he, with Doddr. and others, understands of the daily washings of the priests. Ex. 29:4. Lev. 16:4. Stuart thinks there 'is a plain allusion to the use of water in the initiatory rite of Christian baptism ;' and its connexion with sprinkling may also be noticed in this respect.

V. 23—25. This epistle was written only a few years before that event, (Jerusalem's desolation,) and as this would be a critical deliverance of Christians from the persecutions of the Jews, so it would be peculiarly terrible to apostates.—(23) Faith.] Hope is the general and approved reading. 3:1—6, 14—19. 6:11, 12. 1 Pet. 1:13—16. Scott.

(25.) Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together.] How important this precept to the maintenance of piety ; and yet how little regarded by multitudes of professors of religion in our country, who voluntarily place themselves and their families in situations in which they cannot enjoy the privilege of assembling with their brethren on the Sabbath, and at other times, for social and public worship, and attendance on the preaching of the Gospel. The following forcible remarks upon this subject, are from Dr. Alexander's Sermon, on the duty of Growing in Grace. 'There is a prevalent evil in our country, so common that it seems to be but little noticed. It is the practice of many professors, of leaving places where Christian society and the ordinances of the Gospel are enjoyed, to dwell in the new settlements, without making any provision for the supply of their spiritual wants ; influenced altogether by a regard to worldly profit. Often months and years pass without their hearing a single gospel-sermon, (or once assembling with their brethren.) Their children grow up, nearly as wild and irreligious as their heathen neighbors. How will such persons answer for the irreparable injury done to their families, by removing far from the house of God, and all the public means of grace ? The question may be asked, whether a man who happens to reside where evangelical preaching is not heard, ought to change his residence so as to live under its sound ? I answer, assuredly ; unless he has reasonable ground of hope that he can be personally useful to the people where he dwells, or instrumental in (soon) procuring the establishment of the means of grace among them. For what is the body to the soul ? Growth in riches to growth in grace ? And who can be excused for exposing, to eternal death, the souls of his family, for the sake of procuring for them a larger share of earthly property ? If we would grow in grace, we must live within the reach of the means of grace.' *Rev. apostasy. They who begin to waver in matters of Christian faith and practice, are in danger of falling away. (3) The motive or reason enforcing this duty,—He is faithful, that hath promised. God has made great and precious promises to believers, and his faithfulness should excite and encourage us to be faithful; and we must depend more on his promises to us, than on ours with Him, and we must plead with Him the promise of grace sufficient.

world, where no Sabbath convenes the population to receive instruction, the character and government of God, and the retributions of eternity, fade from the mind, and cease to operate as principles of action. Blot out the Sabbath, and in half a century [men would forsake the assembling of themselves together for religious worship, and] the intelligent worship of God would be nearly obliterated, and the land covered with every form of superstition and crime. Where the Sabbath does not give presence and energy to the divine government, the moral law is without effect; parents are without natural affection; children are dissolute and disobedient; and the family a scene of turmoil and wretchedness.' Rev. Dr BEECHER. 'That they spend so much time in reading, praying, singing, hearing sermons, &c. has been urged against some professors. But it is clear from Scripture, that true grace very much tends to produce delight in such exercises. This was the case with Anna the prophetess, Lu. 2:37. with the primitive Christians, Ac. 2:46, 47. Daniel, David, and others. But, on the other hand, such a disposition is no certain proof of grace, because it is found in many persons who are evidently not gracious, Is. 1:12-15. 53:2, 4. Ez. 33:31, 32. Mark 6:20. John 5:20. Experience shows that persons, from the influence of false systems, may be induced to devote much time to the external services of religion.' EDWARDS. Ep.

V. 26, 27. The whole argument shows, that the apostle principally intended a wilful, deliberate, and pertinacious apostasy; not the effect of ignorance or sudden surprise; but against the convictions of their own consciences, and in a presumptuous and obstinate manner; though he expressed himself in such language, as might also warn the readers against every kind of wilful, deliberate, and presumptuous sin. The persons spoken of were such as had 'received the knowledge of the truth,' and were so enlightened, in respect of the evidences and doctrines of Christianity, as to make a credible and intelligent profession of it, even in the time of the apostles. When this had preceded, a wilful renunciation of Christianity to return to Judaism, either from a determined purpose of escaping persecution, or from proud and carnal enmity to the humiliating and spiritual truths of the Gospel, would generally be fatal. In respect of such apostates, 'there remained no more sacrifice for sin.' Nor could it be expected, that they would ever be 'renewed to repentance' of this atrocious and presumptuous wickedness; for they must have witnessed so many miracles, and some of them even have exercised such gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, that it might be supposed, they had committed the blasphemy against that divine Agent, by ascribing his operation to satanical influence, and that they would be given up to final impenitence and unbelief, and be wholly excluded from the benefit of Christ's efficacious sacrifice. Mat. 12:31, 32.—There seems in this awful passage to be a peculiar reference to the unexampled miseries, which came soon after on the Jewish nation, and to their desperate rage and fury in the midst of them. This horror of conscience, connected with desperation, and all its tremendous effects, (as in the case of Judas,) might be expected to be the most common among apostates from Christianity, who had done violence to their own convictions, and sinned against their better knowledge, with presumptuous enmity, when they saw matters evidently coming to those extremities which Christ had predicted. But this horror and despair were only a shadow of the unspeakable anguish, to which they would at length be reduced, when the insulted Savior should proceed to execute vengeance upon them, from which they would see, that it was impossible to escape.—Sometimes apostates have perceived their desperate condition before death; and, in all the horrors and blasphemous rage of damned spirits, have served as beacons to warn others not to imitate their conduct. Probably, there were few or no instances of such enlightened and deliberate apostates being restored; perhaps several of them had been known to be given up to the most tremendous horrors of conscience; and it was peculiarly proper to state this matter in such strong language, for the benefit of others. (Notes, Mat. 12:43-45. 2 Tim. 2:23-26. 4:14, 15. 2 Pet. 2:20-22. 1 Jn. 5:16-18.) Yet this did not imply, that any penitent would fail of obtaining mercy, or that any one would be excluded from the benefit of the Savior's sacrifice, who humbly, earnestly, and perseveringly sought it, into whatever sins he had been betrayed. The persons spoken of are considered as 'adversaries,' which cannot properly be applied to the case of any trembling, weeping, praying penitent. It was not probable, that such apostates, as were described, would, in the peculiar circumstances of those times, return to seek forgiveness by faith in the blood of Christ; and their danger consisted in being given up to final obduracy, or desperation. The passage, therefore, can have fideliy and perseverance, v. 24, 25, &c. He mentions several; as,

1. That we should consider one another, to provoke to love and to good works. Christians ought to have a tender consideration and concern for one another; they should affectionately consider what their several wants, weaknesses, and temptations are; and this, not to reproach one another, not provoke one another to anger, but to promote love and good works, calling on themselves and one another to love God and Christ more, to love duty and holiness more, to love their brethren in Christ more, and to do all the good offices of Christian affection, both to the bodies and the souls of each other. A good example given to others, is the best and most effectual provocation to love and good works.

2. Not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, v. 25. It is the will of Christ, that his disciples should assemble themselves together, sometimes more privately for conference and prayer, and in public for hearing and joining in all the ordinances of gospel-worship. The communion of saints is a great help and privilege, and a good mean of steadiness and perseverance;

3. To exhort one another; to exhort ourselves and each other; to warn ourselves and one another of the sin and danger of backsliding; to put ourselves and our fellow-Christians in mind of our duty, of our failings and corruptions; to watch over one another, and be jealous of ourselves and one another with a godly jealousy. This, managed with a true gospel-spirit, would be the best and most cordial friendship.

4. That we should observe the approaching of times of trial, and be thereby quickened to greater diligence; so much the more, as ye see the day approaching. Christians ought to observe the signs of the times, such as God has foretold. There was a day approaching, a terrible day to the Jewish nation, when their city should be destroyed, and the body of the people rejected of God for rejecting Christ. There is a trying day coming on us all, the day of our death, and we should observe all the signs of its approaching, and improve them to greater watchfulness and diligence in duty.

V. After having mentioned these means of establishment, the apostle proceeds, in nothing to do with the case of persons, called Christians, in these days, who had not previously received the knowledge either of the evidences or doctrines of Christianity; but who, through ignorance, or the artifices of wicked men, have been led to doubt or deny the truth of the Scriptures, without any of the peculiar aggravations of these primitive apostates. Some of these persons, being afterwards 'renewed to repentance,' have assuredly believed the Gospel, experienced the power of its truth in their hearts, and produced the fruits of it in their lives; yet Satan has taken advantage of the sound of this and similar passages, and of some unguarded things which expositors or preachers have said on the subject, to harass them with perpetual apprehensions, that there remained no benefit for them in the sacrifice of Christ, because they once doubted the truth of Christianity, though they now value that salvation more than all the world.—Cases of this kind have fallen under the writer's cognizance, and, in this day of skepticism and infidelity, in which multitudes aspire to the reputation of free thinkers, by never thinking seriously at all, there may be many of the same kind. For when Satan can no longer buoy up men in unbelieving presumption, he endeavors to drive them into unbelieving desperation, and he never fails to harass those to the utmost, whose destruction he cannot compass. Even when the Gospel has been renounced, after far clearer knowledge, and with much greater malignity, than in the case before stated, the apostasy cannot be fatal unless it be final. It is the peculiar honor of the mercy of God, and of the redemption of Christ, that none are excluded, who are willing to accept of them in the prescribed manner; 'Him that cometh unto Christ, He will in no wise cast out,' whatever he has before been guilty of (Note, Jn. 6:36-40.); but when professed Christians are tempted to apostasy, they may well fear, lest God should be provoked to give them up to final obduracy, and a reprobate mind; and then, while living on earth, their doom is as irreversibly fixed as that of devils or damned spirits.—The apostle lays it down as certain, that God will not pardon sinners, without some sacrifice or satisfaction. For, otherwise, it would not follow, from there remaining to apostates no other sacrifice for sin, that there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.' Mackn.—(26) The knowledge of the truth. He does not say, 'The love of the truth.'

SCOTT.

(26.) Sin wilfully. Calm. understands the apostle to speak of those as sinning, 'not who are delinquent through any particular sin, but who, the church being deserted altogether, are quite alienated from Christ.'—'To sin wilfully is to sin deliberately and knowingly, and neither through ignorance nor fear. Wilfully, I apprehend, is not to be construed here with metaphysical exactness, but has reference to the common and acknowledged distinction in the Jewish law, between the sins of oversight or inadvertence, and those of presumption. For the first class, see Lev. 4:2, 13, 22, 27. Num. 15:27-29. for the second, Num. 15:30:31. where the presumptuous offender is described by the expression, 'There remaineth, &c.' I. e. the Jewish sacrifice being abolished, and that of Christ rejected, of course there remains no other. "I was lately," observed Mr. Gim, "called to attend the death-bed of a young man at Horton. I found him in the greatest horror of mind: I pointed him to Jesus, the sinner's only Friend, and to the glorious promises of the Gospel; when, with an agonizing look of despair, he replied, 'Ah! Sir, but I have rejected the Gospel. Some years since, I read Paine's Age of Reason,—it suited my corrupt taste; I inhibited its principles: after this, wherever I went, I did all in my power to hold up the Scriptures to contempt; by this mean I led others into the fatal snare, and made proselytes to infidelity. Thus I rejected God, and now He rejects me.' I offered to pray with him, but he replied, 'Oh, no,—it is all in vain to pray for me.' Then, with a dismal groan, he cried out: 'Paine's Age of Reason has deceived my soul!' and expired.'" WILL.

V. 28-31. The sacrifices of the law were principally appointed for 'sins of ignorance, infirmity, or inadvertency; but presumptuous transgressors were excluded from that benefit. (Notes, Lev. 4:5:6:1-7. Num. 15:22-31. 1 Sam. 2:23-25, 29. 3:14. Ps. 19:12-14. 51:16.) 'He,' therefore, 'who despised the law of Moses,' and deliberately violated its plain commands, in contempt and defiance of the authority and vengeance of God, was punishable with death, and excluded from mercy, when the fact had been legally proved, even though the crime were such, as might otherwise have been pardoned through a trespass-offering. (Notes, 2:1-4. 12:15-17, 22-25. Num. 15:32-36. Mat. 3:7-10.) But 'of how much severer' vengeance would they be adjudged deserving, who renounced the Gospel, in that wilful, contemptuous, and presumptuous manner, which had been described! They had, indeed, as

1. From the description he gives of the sin of apostasy : sinning wilfully against that truth we have had convincing evidence of. This text has been the occasion of great distress to some gracious souls ; they have been ready to conclude that every wilful sin, after conviction, and against knowledge, is the unpardonable sin ; but this has been their infirmity and error. The sin here mentioned is a total and final apostasy, when men, with a full and fixed will and resolution, despise and reject Christ, the only Savior ; despise and resist the Spirit, the only Sanctifier ; and despise and renounce the Gospel, the only way of salvation, and the words of eternal life ; and all this, after they have known, owned, and professed, the Christian religion, and continue to do so obstinately and maliciously. This is the great transgression : the apostle seems to refer to the law concerning presumptuous sinners, Num. 15:30, 31. They were to be cut off.

it were, 'trampled upon the Son of God,' with insolent defiance and disdain, by doing all in their power to dishonor Him, and to provoke Him, with the most desperate ingratitude and impiety ; they had esteemed the precious 'blood of the new covenant,' by the shedding of which Christ 'had been sanctified,' or consecrated, to be the High Priest and Advocate of sinners in the heavenly sanctuary, as if it had been an unclean thing, less holy than the blood of goats, or as vile as that of a malefactor ! (Notes, 5:7—10. 13:20, 21.) Some indeed apply the word sanctified to the apostate, who had been admitted into the church, as set apart for God, and consecrated to his service, by professing faith in the blood of Christ, which he afterwards vilified. — In either case, [that of applying it to the apostate, or to Christ,] it may refer to those blasphemies, against 'Jesus of Nazareth,' which were often required of such as renounced the Gospel, in order to avoid death, or other sufferings ; and which apostates would commonly use, in order to gain confidence with the party which they had joined.—They had, moreover, 'done despite to the Holy Spirit,' the divine and gracious Author of spiritual life, and all holy consolations in the souls of sinners. They had acted in direct opposition to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and to his strivings with them. In renouncing Christianity, they traduced, with most virulent reproaches, that religion, which was adorned by the holy fruits of the Spirit, in the lives of its professors ; and, above all, by ascribing his miraculous power to divination and satanical agency, even contrary to their own knowledge ; thus they acted, as if they were determined to provoke Him in the most despiteful manner possible. Mat. 12:31, 32. Lu. 12:8—10. So that, the authority and mercy of the Father, the Person, love, and atoning blood of the Son, and the Person, and operations of the Holy Spirit, were alike insulted and blasphemed by them, after having professed the Gospel, and having been baptized 'into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost !' yea, many of

2. From the dreadful doom of such apostates ; there remains no more sacrifice for such sins, no other Christ to come to save such : they sin against the last resort and remedy. There remains only for them a certain fearful looking for of judgment, v. 27. Some think this refers to the dreadful destruction of the Jewish church and state ; but certainly it refers also to the utter destruction that waits for all obstinate apostates at death and judgment. Of this destruction God gives some notorious sinners, while on earth, a fearful foreboding in their own consciences, a dreadful looking for it, with a despair of ever being able either to endure or escape it.

3. From the methods of divine justice with those who despised Moses' law, that is, sinned presumptuously, despising his authority, his threatenings, and his power. These, when convicted by two or three witnesses, were put to death ; they died without mercy, a temporal death. Hence the apostle infers the heavy doom that will fall on those that apostatize from Christ.

(1.) They have trampled under foot the Son of God. To trample on an ordinary person shows intolerable insolence ; to treat a person of honor in that vile manner, is insufferable ; but to deal thus with the Son of God, who Himself is God, must be the highest provocation ; to trample on his Person, denying Him to be the Messiah ; to trample on his authority, and undermine his kingdom ; to trample on his members as the off-scouring of all things, and not fit to live in the world,—what punishment can be too great for such men ?

(2.) They have counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing : the blood of Christ, with which the covenant was purchased and sealed, and wherewith Christ Himself was consecrated, or wherewith the apostate was sanctified, that is, baptized, visibly initiated into the new covenant by baptism, and admitted to the Lord's supper. Observe, Persons may be distinguished by common gifts and graces, and yet fall away finally. Men who have seemed to esteem, may come to account the blood of Christ no better than that of a malefactor, though it was the world's ransom, and of infinite value.

(3.) They have done despite unto the Spirit of grace ; the Spirit graciously given to men, that should be regarded and attended to with the greatest care ; this Spirit they have grieved, resisted, quenched, yea, done despite to Him ; which is the highest act of wickedness, and makes the case of the sinner desperate ; refusing to have the gospel-salvation applied to him. Now he appeals to universal reason and equity, whether such aggravated crimes ought not to receive a suitable punishment, a sorer punishment than they had who died without mercy. But what punishment can be sorer than to die without mercy ? I answer, To die by mercy, by the mercy and grace which they have despised. How dreadful is the case, when not only the justice of God, but his abused grace and mercy, call for vengeance !

4. From the description we have in the Scripture of the nature of God's vindictive justice, v. 30. see Ps. 94:1. The terrors of the Lord are known both by revelation and reason. Vindictive justice is a glorious, though terrible attribute of God ; it belongs to Him, and He will use and execute it on the heads of such sinners as despise his grace ; He will avenge Himself, and his Son, and Spirit, and covenant, on apostates. And how dreadful, then, will their case be ! The other quotation is from Deut. 32:36. The Lord will judge his people ; He will search and try his visible church, and will discover and detect those who say they are Jews, but are of the synagogue of Satan ; and He will separate the precious from the vile, and will punish the sinners in Zion with the greatest severity. Now those who know Him who hath said, Vengeance belongeth to Me, I will recompense, must needs conclude, as the apostle does, v. 31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. They who know the joy that results from the favor of God, can thereby judge of the power and dread of his vindictive wrath.

Observe, The eternal misery of impenitent sinners and apostates shall come from God's own hand ; He will deal with them Himself ; their greatest misery will be the immediate impressions of divine wrath on the soul ; their destruction shall come from his glorious powerful presence ; He is a living God ; He lives for ever, and will punish for ever.

5. He presses them to perseverance, by putting them in mind of their former sufferings for Christ, v. 32. In the early days of the Gospel, a very hot persecution was raised against the professors of the Christian religion, and the believing Hebrews had their share of it : he would have them to remember,

(1.) When they had suffered ; in former days, after they were illuminated ; that is, converted, or brought into a state of grace ; then earth and hell combined all their force against them. Here observe, A natural state is a dark state, and those who continue in that state, meet with no disturbance from Satan and the world ; but a state of grace is a state of light, and therefore the powers of darkness will violently oppose it. They who will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution.

them at least, after having received the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles ! and what punishment could be too severe for such accumulated guilt ?

(29.) Wherewith he was sanctified, &c. [This may either be referred to Christ, or to the apostate here described. But applying the term sanctified to the apostate, it may mean, only a professed devotedness of himself to Christ ; and, as Bp. Hoally suggests, receiving the sacramental cup. See 1 Cor. 11:29. 2 Pet. 2:1.] WILLIAMS.—Spirit of grace.] 'I see no reason to abandon the interpretation of the ancients, and earlier moderns, namely, the Holy Spirit, the third Person in the sacred Trinity. It may be observed, that, as in the former clause we have Jesus Christ n Person, so here we have the Holy Spirit also a Person. I cannot think apostasy alone here meant, or the sin against the Holy Ghost ; but all wilful sin, and a presumptuously corrupt life, since such must tend to that dreadful conclusion.' BLOOMF.

V. 32—34. Among those, whom the apostle especially addressed, were several that had 'shown compassion to him,' some years before, when he was bound at Jerusalem, and in his subsequent imprisonment ; and when, on that or other accounts, their property was seized and confiscated, they bore it, not only patiently, but 'joyfully ;' having abundant consolation from the assurance, that they had 'in heaven a better and more enduring inheritance,' which could not be taken from them, but would be their substantial felicity for ever. For they possessed in themselves, independently of all external things, the pledges and earnest of that expected blessing.

(32.) 'Afflictions scour us of our rust ; and, however the wicked, like trees in the wilderness, grow without culture ; yet the saints, like trees in the garden, must be pruned, and made fruitful ; and affliction does this. God will prune his people, but not cut them down.'

afflictions, many and various afflictions united together against them, and they had a great conflict with them. They were afflicted in themselves; in their own persons, 1 Cor. 4:9. in their names and reputation, v. 33. and they were afflicted in their estates, by the spoiling of their goods, by fines and forfeitures. They were afflicted in the afflictions of their brethren; partly, while ye became companions of those that were so used. The Christian spirit is a sympathizing spirit, not selfish, but compassionate. Christians are one body, animated by one spirit, embarked in one common cause and interest, the children of that God who is afflicted in all the afflictions of his people. The apostle takes particular notice how they had sympathized with him, v. 34. We must thankfully acknowledge the compassions our Christian friends have showed for us under our afflictions.

(3.) How they had suffered. They had been mightily supported, and not only took their sufferings patiently, but joyfully, as a favor and honor, in that they should be thought worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Christ, Col. 1:11.

(4.) What it was that enabled them thus to bear up under their sufferings. They knew in themselves that they had in heaven a better and more enduring substance. Observe, The happiness of the saints in heaven is something of real weight and worth, better than anything they can have or lose here, an enduring substance, that will make a rich amends for all they can lose and suffer here. In heaven they all have a better life, estate, liberty, society, hearts, work, everything better. Christians should know this, should get assurance of it; (the Spirit of God witnessing with their spirits;) for the assured knowledge of this will help them to endure any fight of afflictions.

6. He presses them to persevere, from that recompense of reward that waited for all faithful Christians, v. 35. not to cast away their confidence, their holy courage and boldness, but to hold fast that profession for which they had suffered so much before, and borne those sufferings so well. He encourages them to this, by assuring them that the reward of their holy confidence would be very great, a present reward in holy peace and joy, and much of God's presence, and a great recompense of reward hereafter. He shows them how necessary a grace the grace of patience is in our present state, v. 36. Ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise; that is, this promised reward. Observe, The greatest part of the saints' happiness is in promise; they must first do the will of God before they receive the promise; and after they have done the will of God, they have need of patience to wait for the time when the promise shall be fulfilled; they have need of patience to live till God calls them away. To help their patience, he assures them of the near approach of Christ's coming to deliver and to reward them, v. 37. He will soon come to them at death, end all their sufferings, and give them a crown of life. He will soon come to judgment, end the sufferings of the whole church, and give them an ample and glorious reward in the most public manner. There is an appointed time for both, and beyond that time He will not tarry, Hab. 2:3. The Christian's present conflict may be sharp, but it will be soon over.

7. And, lastly, He presses them to perseverance, by telling them that this is their distinguishing character, and will be their happiness; whereas apostasy is the reproach, and will be the ruin, of all who are guilty of it, v. 38, 39. It is the honorable character of just men, that, in times of the greatest afflictions, they can live by faith; they can live on the assured persuasion they have of the truth of God's promises. Apostasy is the mark and the brand of those in whom God takes no pleasure; and it is a cause of God's severe displeasure and anger. God never was pleased with the formal profession and external duties and services of such as do not persevere: He saw the hypocrisy of their hearts then; and He is greatly provoked when their formality in religion ends in an open apostasy from religion; He beholds them with great displeasure; they are an offence to Him. The apostle concludes, with declaring his good hope, concerning himself and these Hebrews, that they should not forfeit the character and happiness of the just, and fall under the brand and misery of the wicked, v. 39. Observe, Professors may go a great way, and after all draw back; and drawing back from God is drawing on to perdition; the further we depart from God, the nearer we approach to ruin. Those who have been kept faithful in great trials for the time past, have reason to hope, that the same grace shall be sufficient to help them still to live by faith, till they receive the end of their faith and patience, even the salvation of their souls. If we live by faith, and die in faith, our souls are safe for ever.

CHAP. XI. The apostle having, in the close of the foregoing chapter, recommended the grace of faith and a life of faith as the best preservative against apostasy, now enlarges on the nature and fruits of this excellent grace.

V. 1—3. Here we have, 1. A definition or description of the grace of faith in two parts. (1.) It is the substance of things hoped for, a firm persuasion and expectation, that God will perform all that He has promised to us in Christ; and this persuasion so strong, that it gives the soul a kind of possession and present fruition of PRACT. OBS. V. 26—30. By negligence, pride, or carnal self-love, or by gradually yielding to the fear of man, many professors of the Gospel are left to sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth; and, though the fallen, the weak, and the trembling should be encouraged, yet we cannot too awfully alarm the secure, self-confident, and presumptuous; as every deliberate sin, against light and conscience, is a step towards the tremendous precipice described by the apostle.—However men may now despise these warnings, they will at length know, that it is 'a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God,' and to hear Him say, 'It is a people that hath no understanding; therefore He who made them will have no mercy on them.' Is. 27:7—11. Let then every professed Christian 'give diligence to make his calling and election sure;' let us all remember our convictions, affections, and purposes, when we were first 'enlightened,' and how we thought, that we should be willing to endure or part with anything, if we could but obtain peace with God and a good hope of salvation; and let us also remember our consolations and supports under former trials. If we have been called to 'endure a great fight of afflictions,' and have suffered reproaches and losses with fortitude and cheerfulness, from a persuasion that we had 'in heaven a better and a more enduring substance,' let us not disgrace our former conduct, or 'cast away our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward.' For we still 'have need of patience' and perseverance, whilst we wait the accomplishment of God's promises, in obedience to his will. But 'the time is short;' He that cometh will soon come, and will not tarry beyond his appointed season, and He will shortly end our sorrows and conflicts, by removing our souls to heaven; yea, He will speedily come to raise the dead, and perfect our salvation. Let us then show that we are justified through faith, by living and 'walking with God,' in dependence on his promises, and in obedience to his commands, because we are satisfied with the security of his Word. Thus we shall possess the assurance, that 'we are not of them who draw back to perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.' SCOTT.

V. 35—39. In regard to their final deliverance from trouble, as well as to the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, and thus to deliver the Christian church from the persecutions, which they endured from that quarter, the words of God by the prophet might properly be applied; 'The just by faith would live,' Hab. 2:1—4. (38) The just, &c. 'The just man' (the word is singular here, in the Sept. and in the Heb.) 'by faith shall live; but if he draw back, &c.'—The insertion of the words, 'any man,' has been justly objected to, for if the just man himself draw back, and continue in apostasy, he shall finally perish, and we must not alter the Scriptures, to support our own view of evangelical truth. (Note, Ez. 3:20, 21.)—In the Sept. however, whence the quotation is made, the clauses are reversed; 'If he draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him; but the just, by the faith of Me, shall live.' And here, 'the just by faith, who shall live,' is clearly distinguished, as another character, from him, who 'drew back to perdition,' in the concluding v. The Sept. seems to have read the Hebrew very differently from our copies; but the meaning of each is important.

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. This view does not confine us to one single exercise of the fundamental grace of faith, but takes in all the variety of its actings, in the whole of a believer's experience and conduct. Where the principle, from which faith springs, is implanted by the regenerating Spirit of God, it leads a man to receive the truth, concerning [543] justification by the merits of Jesus Christ, according to the measure of light afforded him; (Note, John 1:10—13.) but it will also embrace the whole Word of God, and expect its accomplishment, to all the extent, in which He has spoken and promised, 2 Thes. 2:13.—Thus the believer gives up present advantages, and endures present hardships, in obedience to God, and in waiting for his promise; even as men give ready money for an estate in reversion, or endure present labor, in hope of future ease and indulgence. 6:16—20. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:24—27. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. 1 Pet. 1:3—5. 1 John 5:1—3. The things revealed to faith, but invisible to sense, and undiscoverable by reason, may relate to the past, the present, or the future; to God, and to his works of creation, providence, and redemption; to his omniscient presence and his future judgment; to the world of spirits, and eternal state of happiness or misery; to the law and its sanctions, or the gospel and its privileges; and, in short, to a great variety of particulars which cannot be enumerated. But faith is the evidence, the internal conviction, or demonstration, of them all. To unbelievers those appear false, dubious, or visionary, for they have no medium, by which to obtain satisfaction about them; but believers take the clear 'testimony of God,' as a truth already demonstrated, which requires no further proof; their argument is this; 'God hath said it, and it must be true.' In proportion to the strength of this faith, their judgment and conduct are influenced by this realizing conviction, with reference to things revealed; even as if they were the ob-

3 Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.

4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it, he being dead, yet speaketh.

those things; gives them a subsistence in the soul, by the first-fruits and foretastes of them, so that believers, in the exercise of faith, experience a substantial reality in the objects of faith. (2.) It is the evidence of things not seen. Faith demonstrates to the eye of the mind the reality of those things that cannot be discerned by the eye of the body; it helps the soul to make application of all to itself, with suitable affections and endeavors; and so it is designed to serve the believer instead of sight, and to be to the soul all that the senses are to the body. That faith is but opinion or fancy, which does not realize invisible things to the soul, and excite the soul to act agreeably to the nature and importance of them.

jects of sight, or capable of strict demonstration. The believer uses his powers of reasoning, to obtain satisfaction concerning the evidence, that such or such matters are divinely revealed, and to determine the meaning of the words, in which the revelation is conveyed. 1 Pet. 3:13-16. But, when these previous questions are answered, he most rationally says, 'God has determined this point; and though I once thought otherwise, as multitudes still do; yet infinite knowledge and truth have decided against our prejudices and erroneous opinions, and I submit to the divine teaching.' He is not so absurd, as to attempt to invalidate the testimony of God by his objections, or even to give force to it by his arguments. 1 John 5:9, 10. He does not suppose that divine revelation must be level to man's comprehension; or coincide with his speculations; he expects, believes, and adores mysteries, but knows that contradiction is not mystery; so that mysteries above reason he humbly receives, but absurdities contrary to it, he ascribes to misconception or imposture. Gen. 1:26, 27. Mat. 13:10, 11. 1 Tim. 3:16.—This description of faith will be illustrated by all the examples in this ch.—There is no operation of the human soul, which can possibly receive and profit by testimony, except faith, or believing. Revelation without faith is and must be as useless, as light without vision. Acts 26:16-18. Evidence.] 2 Tim. 3:16. Demonstration, conviction. John 16:18. (1) Faith.] Guise, and Owen, with others, take this description of faith to include that which is justifying, but not, under the strictest notion of it, merely as justifying. For this is only as it has a regard to, and depends on, Christ and his righteousness; but here is no mention of Him as the object of faith; and in several of the instances there is only notice taken of temporal blessings, which were obtained by faith. Yet they may all be considered as so many proofs and evidences of the truth and efficacy of justifying faith in real believers on Christ, and of its more extensive exercise to the glory of God, and their own encouragement to go on in a course of dependence on Him, and obedience to Him, amidst all difficulties and dangers of every kind that surround them in this sinful world. HENRY, abr.—So Stuart, and he asks, 'what is the object of the whole [epistle]? Plainly to prevent apostasy, i. e. a renunciation of belief in Christ.' 'To this point,' he adds, 'converge all the warnings, reproofs, and tremendous judgments in the epistle; they all have a bearing on the same specific object.' Yet in this particular ch. he agrees, with others, that faith is to be taken for belief, or confidence generally in divine declarations. Ed.—Substance, &c.] 'Confident expectation.' Dodd.—'Confidence in respect to things hoped for.' Sr.—Evidence, &c.] 'Powerful conviction, &c.' Dodd.—'Strict proof or demonstration; i. e. such a kind of reason and argument, as both convinces the understanding, and engages a man to act according to that conviction.' Raphaelius, and Hallct. in Dodd.—Stuart renders it 'convincing evidence.' Ed.—There are certain doctrines, which ought to be preached with more caution than they usually are; such as the "living by faith and not by sight," "trusting God in the dark," &c. By walking by faith and not by sight is meant, a being governed by a respect to eternal things, which are the objects of faith, and not by temporal, which are the objects of sight. But this is understood by many, as if professors ought firmly to trust in Christ, without spiritual light, and though in a lifeless frame. What they mean by faith, is, believing they are in a good state. But the SS. are ignorant of any faith not founded on a spiritual sight of Christ. John 6:40. 2 Cor. 3:18. Men can only exercise faith, just in proportion as they have spiritual light. They cannot exercise trust in God, any further than they possess a believing view of his faithfulness and all-sufficiency. The people of God ought indeed to trust Him when in darkness, and when we do not see which way it is possible for Him to fulfill his word, as Abraham did, but this is a different thing from trusting without spiritual light. EDWARDS.

V. 3. The heavens and the earth, and all things in them, as well as

2. An account of the honor it reflects on all who have lived in the exercise of it, v. 2. Observe, (1.) True faith is an old grace, not a new invention, a modern fancy; it is a grace that has been planted in the soul of man ever since the covenant of grace was published in the world; it has been practised from the beginning of the revelation; the eldest and best men that ever were in the world, were believers. (2.) Their faith was their honor; and it put them on doing the things that were of good report, and God has taken care that a record should be kept, and report made, of the excellent things they did in the strength of this grace. The genuine actings of faith will bear to be reported, deserve to be reported, and, when reported, redound to the honor of true believers.

3. We have here one of the first acts and articles of faith, which has a great influence on all the rest, and which is common to all believers in every age, and that is, the creation of the worlds by the word of God, v. 3. Faith looks not only forward to the end of the world, but back to the beginning of the world. By faith we understand much more of the formation of the world, than ever could be understood by the naked eye of natural reason. Faith gives us to understand concerning the worlds, how they were made, that is, the upper, middle, and lower regions of the universe, by the word of God. These worlds were not eternal, nor did they produce themselves, but they were made by another, even God; He is the Maker of all things; and whoever is so, must be God. He made the world with great exactness; it was a framed work; He made the world by his Word, that is, by his essential wisdom and eternal Son, and by his active will, saying, Let it be done, and it was done, Ps. 33:9. The world was thus framed out of nothing, out of no pre-existent matter, contrary to the received maxim, that 'out of nothing nothing can be made;' which, though true of created power, can have no place with God, who can call things that are not, as if they were, and command them into being. These things we understand by faith. The Bible gives us the truest and most exact account of the origin of all things, and we are to believe it, and not to wrest or run down the scripture-account of the creation, because it does not suit with some fantastic hypotheses of our own; which has been in some learned but conceited men the first remarkable step towards infidelity, and has led them into many more.

V. 4-19. The apostle, having given us a more general account of the grace of faith, now proceeds to set before us some illustrious examples of it in the Old Test. times. A few occur, whose names are not only mentioned, but the particular trials and actings of their faith subjoined; and in these verses are included the several instances from Abel to Isaac.

It is observable, that the Spirit of God has the regular order with which they are governed and directed, might, indeed, be proved by argument to be the contrivance and work of God, Rom. 1:18-20. yet men's reason had never come to any satisfactory and practical conclusions in this matter. (Note, Gen. 1:1.) So that, 'by faith,' crediting the Word of God, we believe, and understand to good purpose, that 'the worlds' were contrived, framed, created, and arranged in their present order, by the omnipotent command of God; and that the things, which we now behold in such resplendent beauty, were made of those things, 'which do not now appear.' They were produced from the chaotic mass, which 'was without form and void,' by that powerful Word, which first called the chaos out of non-existence. Note, Gen. 1:2. and the satisfactory assurance, which believers derive from the scriptural account of the original of the world, being contrasted with the discordant hypotheses and endless disputations of ancient philosophers and modern theorists, exhibits a very striking illustration of the proposition, that 'faith is the evidence,' or demonstration, 'of things not seen.' 1, 2. Gen. 1:2.—'This world, which we see, was not made of any appearing or existing matter, but from nothing; contrary to the axiom of all the philosophers, "From nothing, nothing is made." This indeed never could enter into the mind of any philosophers, not even of those who wrote that God created the world. Therefore the whole of this is of faith.' Beza.—Nothing can possibly be more unphilosophical, or indeed absurd, than the notion of the eternal pre-existence of that chaos, from which God created the world; yet, I apprehend, Beza had firm grounds for asserting, that none of the philosophers had perceived this, or without revelation would have perceived it. Most commentators consider this v. as a decided proof, that God created the world from nothing; which no doubt is the doctrine both of reason and revelation.

(3.) Worlds.] 'The universe.' So Stuart and Bloomf., referring to the sublime passage, Gen. 1:3. Ed.—Were made, &c.] 'I. e. made out of nothing, without any pre-existent matter.' Bp. Pearson, in Dodd.—Ed.

V. 4. The original word rendered 'more excellent,' signifies also a 'greater,' fuller, or more complete sacrifice. Cain brought the meat-offering alone; Abel, as it is generally supposed, brought that, and also 'the firstlings of his flock.' . . . Cain . . . seemed to say, with modern infidels and skeptics; 'In what is my sacrifice inferior to Abel's? Why should he be so bigoted, as to think God will accept none, who do not come in his peculiar way? I, being sincere, shall be as favorably received with my sacrifice, as he with his; and indeed it seems more rational to present the first-fruits of the earth, than to slay an innocent lamb, to be burned upon the altar.' (Note, Gen. 4:3-5.) Yet God rejected his offering; and his rage and enmity against Abel, the accepted worshipper of God, produced the same horrid effects, which similar principles have in every age been producing, in cruel persecutions and multiplied murders of believers, especially by formalists and hypocrites. (Notes, Gen. 4:6-15, 1 John 3:11-15.) But God Himself attested, that Abel 'was righteous' before Him, and that his oblations were accepted; so that, being murdered by Cain, 'he still speaketh' to us; declaring, that sin cannot be pardoned without an atonement; that sinners can come to God, only by penitent faith in the great Propitiation; that faith is uniformly connected with righteousness and upright obedience; that believers have their portion in a better world, and not on earth; that they must expect no favor from proud, self-righteous unbelievers, and that their blood, shed by persecutors, calls from the ground to heaven for vengeance. (Notes, 12:22-25. Mat. 23:34-36. . . . 'In this character of Abel, Paul had our Lord's expression in his eye, "the blood of righteous Abel." Mat. 23:35.—Flesh not being permitted to kill any animal, after the flood, Abel must have thought it unlawful to kill any animal, unless God had ordered it to be killed as a sacrifice.' Mackn. Scott.

(4.) More excellent.] 'More acceptable, as proceeding from faith.' Bloomf.—So Stuart; who says, 'Abel made his offering in faith; the implication is, that Cain did not, and therefore [his offering] was not accepted.'

5 By faith Enoch<sup>f</sup> was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God.

6 But without faith it is impossible to please<sup>g</sup> Him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

7 By faith<sup>h</sup> Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

not thought fit to say anything here of the faith of our first parents; and yet the church of God has generally, by a pious charity, taken it for granted that God gave them repentance and faith in the promised Seed; but God has left the matter under some doubt, as a warning to all who have a great trust reposed in them, that they do not prove unfaithful, since God would not enrol our first parents among the number of believers in this blessed calendar.

1. The leading example is that of Abel.

Observe, (1.) What Abel did by faith, he offered up a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, a more full and perfect sacrifice. Hence learn, that, after the Fall, God opened a new way for men to return to Him in religious worship. God must be worshipped by sacrifices, a way of worship which carries in it a confession of sin, and of the desert of sin, and a profession of faith in a Redeemer, who was to be a Ransom for the souls of men. Note, also, From the beginning, there has been a remarkable difference between the worshippers; here were two persons, brethren, both go in to worship God, and yet a vast difference is observable in their persons, and principles, and offerings; Abel a true believer, Cain a formalist; Abel actuated by faith, Cain not; Abel brought a sacrifice of atonement, the firstlings of the flock, acknowledging himself a sinner who deserved to die, and only hoped for mercy through the Great Sacrifice; Cain only a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a mere thank-offering, the fruit of the ground, which might, and perhaps must, have been offered in innocency; here was no confession of sin, no regard to the Ransom; this was an essential defect in Cain's offering.

(2.) What Abel gained by his faith; the original record in Gen. 4:4. God had respect to Abel, and to his offering; first to his person as gracious, then to his offering as proceeding from grace, especially from the grace of faith. In this place we are told, that he obtained by his faith some special advantages; as, that he was righteous, a justified, sanctified, and accepted person; very probably, attested by fire from heaven, kindling and consuming his sacrifice, God thus testifying his acceptance of his gifts. In this, He, being dead, yet speaketh. He had the honor to leave behind him an instructive speaking case; teaching us, That fallen man has leave to go in to worship God, with hope of acceptance, through faith in the Messiah; and that though those who obtain this favor from God, must expect the envy and malice of the world, yet God will not suffer the injuries done to his people to remain unpunished, nor their sufferings unrewarded. These are very good and useful instructions, and yet the blood of sprinkling speaketh better things than that of Abel.

2. Enoch, v. 5. In this place, and in Gen. 5:22, &c. we read, That he walked with God, was really, eminently, actively, progressively, and perseveringly, religious in his conformity to God, communion with God, and complacency in God. That he was translated, that he should not see death, nor any part of him be found on earth; for God took him, soul and body, into heaven, as He will do those of the saints who shall be found alive at his second coming. That before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. He had the evidence of it in his own conscience, and the Spirit of God witnessed with his spirit.

It is said, v. 6. that without this faith it is impossible to please God, without such a faith as helps us to walk with God, an active faith; and that we cannot come to God, unless we believe that He is, and that He is a Rewarder of those that diligently seek Him. He must believe that God is, and that He is what He is, what He has revealed Himself to be in the Scripture, a Being of infinite perfections, subsisting in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Observe, The practical belief of the existence of God, as revealed in the Word, would be a powerful restraint to keep us from sin, and a spur of constraint to put us on all manner of gospel-obedience. He is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. Here observe, By the Fall we have lost God; lost the divine light, life, love, likeness, and communion. God is again to be found of us through Christ, the second Adam. God has prescribed means and ways wherein He may be found; and they who would find God in these ways must seek Him diligently; seek Him early, earnestly, and perseveringly; then shall they seek Him, and find Him, if they seek Him with all their heart; and when once they have found Him, as their reconciled God, they will never repent the pains they have spent in seeking Him.

3. Noah, v. 7. Observe, (1.) The ground of Noah's faith,—a warning he had received from God; a divine revelation, whether by voice or vision does not appear, but such as carried in it its own evidence; he was forewarned of things not seen as yet, that is, of a great and severe judgment, such as the world had never yet seen, and of which, in the course of second causes, there was not

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-7. The wisdom and goodness of God are peculiarly manifested, in the appointment of 'faith,' to be both the recipient of Christ for justification, and the efficacious principle of our obedience: and, in neither case, will anything avail, but that faith which gives the soul, as it were, an appropriating hold of 'things hoped for,' and an internal demonstration of 'things not seen.'—We know nothing to good purpose, concerning the perfections or works of God, or the eternal state, except by this 'evidence of things not seen;' men's reasonings produce amusing speculations; but 'the sure testimony of God,' received by faith, brings satisfaction to the soul. While we credit his account of the creation, we learn to adore and obey the Creator, with humble, thankful, and admiring hearts; which philosophers, in general, with a few honorable exceptions, ancient and modern, have scarcely appeared to do; and those few were led to do it, not by philosophy, but by believing the Word of God.—Believing his testimony concerning the future judgment and the eternal world; and even more than believing, that we are sinners exposed to condemnation, and deserving of it, according to the tenor of his righteous law; we gladly receive the truth, concerning salvation by grace, through the atoning blood of the divine Savior; and wait on Him for pardon and every blessing, as 'his gift through Jesus Christ.' Rom. 6:21-23. 1 John 5:11, 12.—If we possess this 'evidence of things not seen,' we shall hear, with great interest, the warnings of the oracles of God, concerning the future and eternal misery of the ungodly; we shall reverence the denunciation which unbelievers deride, object to, or blaspheme; we shall be 'moved with fear to flee from the wrath to come;' we shall be encouraged in hope to make Christ our refuge, and to leave all other things, as comparatively worthless, to seek admission into this ark. Thus we shall be safe, during the troubles of life, the terrors of death, and the solemnities of judgment, when 'the wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the people that forget God.' Scott.

V. 5, 6. Gen. 5:21-24. Jude 14-16. As all men deserve condemnation for their sins, and even their best services need forgiveness, no one can know, or on good grounds conclude, that God will reward his services, or accept him in them: unless by receiving the testimony of revelation, either immediate, traditional, or written. This Enoch doubtless did, and so he believed in God, and came to Him, by faith in his Word and promise, according to his appointment, and thus was accepted and graciously rewarded. But this differs widely from a mere assent to a conjecture, or a conclusion of reason, concerning the existence of a God, without any just notions of his perfections, will, or worship, and an attempt to please Him, in ways of man's devising. This may suppose to be all 'the faith,' which the apostle here means; though it does not at all resemble the religion of any one person mentioned in this chap. except that of Cain. Faith must have respect to some word spoken, which it believes; but the conjectures, or deductions from reasoning, in a man's own mind, cannot be faith, according to the common use of words, much less can such a meaning of faith be found in Scripture. It is 'the belief of the truth,' of 'the word,' and 'testimony of God.' (5) He pleased God. Paul here quotes the Sept. where the words, translated in our version, 'he walked with God,' are twice rendered 'he pleased God;' as the same Heb. term is rendered, in other places. Gen. 6:9. 17:1. 43:15. Sept. The general meaning is, no doubt, the same, though the language is less emphatical. He pleased. 6. 13:16.—Gen. 5:22, 24. Sept. Rom. 12:1. Phil. 4:18.—It is not said, that 'he always did those things which pleased God.' (Note, John 15:27-29.) This was never said of any man, except the Man Christ Jesus. Scott.

(6.) 'The two fundamental truths of all that can properly be called religion, are here adverted to, viz. a belief that God exists, and that He is the moral Governor of the universe; i. e. that He rewards those who are pious, and, consequently, punishes those who are not so.' STRAY.

V. 7. Gen. 6:—9. Noah had faith, he verily believed the word God had spoken, he confidently expected that Omnipotence would execute [548]

the sentence denounced by infinite justice, and fulfil the word of unflinching veracity: he therefore was prepared to employ any means of deliverance, which the Lord should see good to appoint. But 'he obeyed in faith;' he ventured all consequences, and exercised the needful self-denial; he waited the Lord's time, and preached, though unsuccessfully, to the men of his generation. 1 Pet. 3:19, 20. 2 Pet. 2:4-9. He expected safety in the ark, though Omnipotence alone could secure him, in a vessel constructed as it was, through so tremendous a deluge. Thus he was preserved, and he preserved his family also, from the common destruction of mankind, to re-people the earth; his example and admonitions concurred in 'condemning the world,' and in showing the justice of God in thus punishing their universal and incorrigible wickedness. (Notes, Is. 54:6-10, 15-17. Ez. 14:13-21. Mat. 12:41, 42. Rom. 2:25-29.) By the same faith, he relied on the promise of God concerning the Messiah, and became 'heir of the righteousness of faith,' and of eternal salvation through Him. This may be shown to be an exact representation of the manner, in which believers, being warned by God to 'flee from the wrath to come,' are 'moved with fear,' take refuge in Christ, part with all for his sake, are often made the instruments of salvation to their families also, 'condemn the world,' and become heirs of the righteousness of faith.' Phil. 3:8-11.—A Jewish writer introduces Noah, from the ark, expostulating with those who were perishing, because excluded. They plead, that they had used various means of securing themselves, in case the deluge should come, though they had declined his invitation to come into the ark; but he silences all their pleas at once, by saying, that they had refused to avail themselves of God's appointed way of preservation, and every other method must be unavailing. 'How shall ye escape, if ye neglect so great salvation?' 2:1-4. Mat. 24:36-41. Scott.

(7.) 'The things unseen were the deluge, and the events accompanying it.' Bloomf. 'True belief is effectual in the obedient use of God's appointed means of salvation.' BAXTER.

8 By faith <sup>1</sup> Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, <sup>k</sup> dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise :

10 For he looked for a city <sup>1</sup> which hath foundations, whose <sup>m</sup> builder and maker is God.

11 Through faith also Sara <sup>n</sup> herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful <sup>o</sup> who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, <sup>p</sup> so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable.

yet the least sign; this secret warning he was to communicate to the world, who would be sure to despise both him and his message. God usually warns sinners before He strikes; and where his warnings are slighted, the blow will fall the heavier. (2.) The actings of Noah's faith, and the influence it had both on his mind and practice. It impressed his soul with a fear of God's judgments. Faith first influences our affections, then our actions suitably to the matter revealed. His faith influenced his practice; his fear, excited by believing God's threatening, moved him to prepare an ark, notwithstanding the scorns and reproaches of a wicked generation. And the blessed fruits and rewards of his faith were, that hereby himself and his house were saved, when a whole world of sinners were perishing about them. Hereby he also judged and condemned the world; his holy fear condemned their security and vain confidence; his faith their unbelief; his obedience their contempt and rebellion. This is the best way the people of God can take to condemn the wicked; not by harsh and censorious language, but by a holy exemplary conversation. Moreover, hereby he became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, was possessed of a true justifying righteousness, was heir to it; his right of inheritance was through faith in Christ, as a member of Christ, a child of God, and if a child, then an heir. His righteousness was relative, resulting from his adoption, through faith in the promised Seed. As ever we expect to be justified and saved in the great and terrible day of the Lord, let us now prepare an ark, secure an interest in Christ, and in the ark of the covenant; and do it speedily before the door be shut, for there is no salvation in any other.

4. Abraham, the friend of God, and father of the faithful. The apostle enlarges more on the heroic achievements of Abraham's faith, than any other of the patriarchs; and in the midst of his account of the faith of Abraham, he inserts the story of Sarah's faith, whose daughters those women are, that continue to do well. Observe,

[1.] This, though a very trying call, was the call of God, and therefore a sufficient ground for faith, and rule of obedience. The manner in which he was called, Stephen relates in Acts 7:2. It was an effectual call, by which he was converted from the idolatry of his father's house, Gen. 12:1. The call was renewed after his father's death in Charran. Observe, The freeness of the grace of God in converting sinners, and how He appears a God of glory in it, working a glorious work in the soul. He calls us not only to leave sin, but sinful company, and whatever is inconsistent with our devotedness to Him. We need to be called, not only to set out well, but to go on well. He will not have his people take up that rest anywhere short of the heavenly Canaan.

[2.] The promise of God; God promised Abraham that the place, he was called to, he should afterward inherit; after a while he should inherit the heavenly Canaan, and his posterity the earthly. Observe here, God calls his people to an inheritance, by his effectual call making them children, and so heirs; not immediately, but the promise is sure, and shall have its seasonable accomplishment. The faith of parents often procures blessings for their posterity.

(2.) The exercise of Abraham's faith; he yielded an implicit regard to the call of God. [1.] He went out, not knowing whither he went. He put himself into the hand of God, subscribed to God's wisdom, and submitted to his will. Implicit faith and obedience are due to God, and to Him only.

[2.] He sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country. This was an exercise of his faith. Observe, Canaan is called the land of promise, because yet only promised, not possessed. Abraham lived in Canaan, not as an heir and proprietor, but as a sojourner only. He dwelt in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, heirs with him of the same promise. He lived there in an ambulatory, moving condition, living in a daily readiness for his removal; and thus should we all live in this world. Abraham lived till Isaac was seventy-five years old, and Jacob fifteen, and the promise was renewed to Isaac, Gen. 26:3. and to Jacob, Gen. 28:13. It is pleasant to see parents and children sojourning together in this world, as heirs of the heavenly inheritance.

(3.) The supports of Abraham's faith, v. 10. Observe here, The description given of heaven; it is a city, a regular society, well established, well defended, and well supplied; a city that hath foundations, even the immutable purposes and almighty power of God; the infinite merits and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ; the promises of an everlasting covenant; its own purity, and the perfection of its inhabitants; God contrived it, and made it, and is Himself the Substance and Felicity of it. Observe the due regard Abraham had to this heavenly city; he looked for it, believed there was such a state, waited for it, and in the mean time conversed in it by faith; he had raised and rejoicing hopes, that, in God's time and way, he should be brought safely to it. This influenced his present conversation; it was a support to him, and helped him patiently to bear all the inconveniences of his sojourning state, and actively to discharge all the duties of it, persevering therein unto the end.

5. In the midst of the story of Abraham, we have inserted an account of the faith of Sarah. Here observe,

(1.) The difficulties of Sarah's faith, which were very great; she laughed at the promise, as impossible, and was so unbelieving as to put Abraham on taking Hagar, that he might have a posterity, the thing promised was so improbable; when she was of sterile constitution naturally, and now past the prolific age. Now this sin of her's would make it more difficult for her to act by faith afterward.

(2.) The actings of her faith, v. 11. She received the promise as the promise of God; and being convinced of that, she truly judged He both could and would perform it, how impossible soever it might seem to reason; for the faithfulness of God will not suffer Him to deceive his people.

(3.) The fruits and rewards of her faith. She received strength to conceive seed. The strength of nature, as well as grace, is from God; He can make the barren fruitful. She was delivered of a child, a child of the promise, the comfort of his parents, and the hope of future ages. From them, by this son, sprang a numerous progeny of illustrious persons, as the stars of the sky, v. 12. a great, powerful, and renowned nation, above all the rest in the world; and a nation of saints, the peculiar church and people of God; and, which was the highest honor and reward of all, of these, according to the flesh, the Messiah came, who is over all, God blessed for evermore.

6. The apostle proceeds to make mention of the faith of the other patriarchs, Isaac and Jacob, and the rest of this happy family, v. 13. Where observe,

(1.) The trial of their faith in the imperfection of their present state. They had not received the promises, that is, the things promised; they had not yet been put into possession of Canaan, had not yet seen their numerous issue; had not seen Christ in the flesh. Observe, All who are interested in the promises, do not presently receive the things promised. One imperfection of the present state of the saints on earth, is, that their happiness lies more in promise and reversion, than in actual enjoyment and possession.

(2.) The actings of their faith during this imperfect state of things. Though they had not received the promises, yet, they saw

V. 8—10. Gen. 12:—17. If this was the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and this their expectation, can we suppose that such of their posterity, as 'obtained a good report by faith,' did not believe the same truths, and expect the same inheritance? Nay, can we reasonably doubt, whether this was the popular creed, and hope of Israel, through successive generations, to the time of Christ? We cannot, unless we can suppose, that the Sinai-covenant, in which national advantages were secured to Israel, on condition of national obedience, could operate, as the fabled waters of Lethe, to make them entirely forget all preceding revelations made to their forefathers, and transmitted to them; and all the obedient confidence their forefathers had placed in those revelations. In fact, there is not one age, in the history of Israel, from the origin of the nation, to the termination of the New Test. of which we have any remaining records, but, in these records, the belief of a future state of just retributions, a future judgment, and a state of supreme blessedness to the righteous, may not be clearly discerned, and pointed out. Mat. 22:23—33. Rom. 4. Gal. 3. Maker.] 'One who performs things which relate to the public.' Here only. Scott.

(3.) Not knowing.] 'This seems a popular mode of expression; and Abraham probably was by no means ignorant of the country, or its productions; but went without knowing whither he was going, as not knowing where it would please God he should settle in the land.' BL.

(9.) With Isaac and Jacob.] 'Rather as, &c.' Id.

V. 11, 12. This principally refers to the descendants of Abraham by Isaac and Jacob; but those, descended from him by Ishmael, and the sons of Keturah, and from Isaac by Esau, render the fulfilment of the promises to him, in this respect, still more surprising. Gen. 12:1—3. 15:5, 6. 17:15—21. 18:9—15. 21:1—7. 22:16—18. 25:1—4. 36: Is 51:1—3. Ez. 33:21—29. Rom. 4:18—22.

(11.) Through faith, &c.] 'The first announcement that a child would spring from them, [Abraham and Sarah,] occasioned, both in his and her mind, a feeling of incongruity, of impossibility, that the course of nature should be so reversed. [See Gen. 18:10—15. comparing 17:17.] Subsequent consideration brought both to a full belief in the reality of the promised, future blessing. The history of this is not expressly given in Genesis, with respect to Sarah; but it is implied.' Sr.

13 These all died <sup>q</sup> in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and <sup>r</sup> confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

14 For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a country.

15 And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned :

16 But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly : wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their <sup>s</sup> God ; for he hath prepared for them a <sup>t</sup> city.

them afar off, John 8. 56. they were persuaded they were true, and should be fulfilled; they embraced them; their faith was a faith of consent. They confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on earth. Observe, Saints are as strangers, whose home is heaven; as pilgrims, travelling toward their home, though often meanly and slowly. This their condition they were not ashamed to own; their lives confessed they expected little from the world, cared not to engage much in it, endeavored to lay aside every weight, to gird up the loins of their minds, to mind their way, to keep company and pace with their fellow-travellers, looking for difficulties, and bearing them, and longing to get home. Hereby they declared plainly that they sought another country, v. 14. heaven, their own country. For their spiritual birth is from thence, there are their best relations, and there is their inheritance. They gave full proof of their sincerity in making such a confession. For, they were not mindful of that country from whence they came, v. 15. did not regret they had left it, and had no desire to return to it. Note, Those that are once effectually and savingly called out of a sinful state, have no mind to return into it again; they now know better things. They did not take the opportunity that offered for their return; they might have had opportunity; they had time enough, had natural strength, and knew the way; those with whom they sojourned would have been willing to part with them; they had sufficient to bear the charges of their journey; but they steadfastly adhered to God and duty under all discouragements, and against all temptations to revolt from Him. So should we all do. We shall not want opportunities to revolt from God; but we must show the truth of our faith and profession by a steady adherence to Him to the end of our days. Their sincerity appeared, not only in not returning to their former country, but in desiring a better country, that is, a heavenly. Observe, here: The heavenly country is better than any on earth, and all true believers desire it. They died in the faith of those promises; not only lived by the faith of them, but died in the full persuasion that all the promises should be fulfilled to them and theirs, v. 13. That faith held out to the last. These were the actings of their faith. Now observe,

(3.) The gracious and great reward of their faith, v. 16. Note, God is the God of all true believers; faith gives them an interest in God, and in all his fulness. He is called their God: He calls Himself so; gives them leave to call Him so; and the spirit of adoption, to enable them to cry Abba Father. Notwithstanding their meanness by nature, vileness by sin, and the poverty of their outward condition, God is not ashamed to be called their God; such is his condescension, such is his love to them; therefore let them never be ashamed of being called his people, nor of any that are truly so: above all, let them not be a shame and reproach to their God, and so provoke Him to be ashamed of them. For, as a proof of his love, He has prepared for them a city, a happiness suitable to the relation into which He has taken them; and it shall never be said, to the reproach and dishonor of God, that He has adopted a people to be his own children, and then taken no care to make a suitable provision for them. The consideration of this should inflame the affections, enlarge the desires, and excite the diligent endeavors, of the people of God, after this city that He has prepared for them.

7. The apostle having given this account of the faith of others, with Abraham, returns to him again, and gives us an instance of the greatest trial and act of faith recorded, either in the story of the father of the faithful, or of any of his spiritual seed, v. 17. In this, observe,

(1.) The trial and exercise of Abraham's faith; He was tried indeed. It is said, Gen. 22:1. God in this tempted Abraham; not to sin, for so God tempteth no man, but only tried his faith and obedience to purpose. God had before tried him in many other instances, but this trial was greater than all; he was commanded to offer up his son Isaac. Read the account of it, Gen.

22:2. There you will find every word was a trial; 'Take now thy son, &c.' A greater trial was never put on any creature. The apostle here mentions some things that very much added to the greatness of this trial.

[1.] He was put on it after he had received the promises, that this Isaac should build up his family, that in him his seed should be called, v. 18. and in him, as one of the progenitors of the Messiah, all nations be blessed; so that in being called to offer up his Isaac, he seemed to be called to destroy and cut off his own family, to cancel the promises of God, to prevent the coming of Christ, to destroy the whole world, to sacrifice his own soul and his hopes of salvation, and to cut off the church of God at one blow; a most terrible trial!

[2.] That this Isaac was his only begotten son by his wife Sarah, the only one he was to have by her, and the only one that was to be the child and heir of the promise. Either the promises of a posterity, and of the Messiah, must be fulfilled by means of this son, or not at all; so that, beside his most tender affection to this his son, all his expectations were bound up in him, and, if he perished, must perish with him. If Abraham had ever so many sons, this was the only son who could convey to all nations the promised blessing; a son for whom he waited so long, received in so extraordinary a manner, on whom his heart was set, to have this son offered up as a sacrifice, and that by his own hand; it was a trial that would have upset the firmest and the strongest mind that ever informed a human body.

(2.) The actings of Abraham's faith in so great a trial; he obeyed; he offered up Isaac; he intentionally gave him up by his submissive soul to God, and was ready to have done it actually, according to the command of God; he went as far in it as to the very critical moment, and would have gone through with it if God had not prevented him. Nothing could be more tender and moving than those words of Isaac, My father, here is the wood, here is the fire; but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering? little thinking that he was to be the lamb; but Abraham knew it, and yet he went on with the great design.

(3.) The supports of his faith; they must be very great, suitable to the greatness of the trial; He accounted that God was able to raise him from the dead, v. 19. His faith was supported by the sense he had of the mighty power of God, who was able to raise the dead; he reasoned thus with himself, and so he resolved all his doubts. It does not appear that he had any expectation of being countermanded; the expectation of that would have spoiled the trial, and consequently the triumph, of his faith; but he knew God was able to raise him from the dead; and he believed God would do so, since such great things depended on his son, which must have failed if Isaac had not a PRACT. OBS. V. 8—19. That is not justifying faith, which does not obey the command, as well as rely on the promise, of God. If indeed we professed to seek a portion in the world, the advantages of religion might appear dubious: but we avow ourselves to be 'strangers' in a foreign land, and on our pilgrimage to our desired home, where 'our treasure and our hearts already are.' If, like apostates, we were minded to 'return to the country whence we came out,' we might 'find an opportunity' of doing it, perhaps with some secular advantage; but faith shows us that it is devoted to destruction, with all those who choose their inheritance in it. Whilst we live, our faith must be repeatedly and sharply tried, that we may be distinguished from mere professors of Christianity; but we may expect, that we shall be strengthened in proportion to the trial; nor can we reasonably doubt of the power of faith, to produce the most unreserved obedience, when we remember, that by this principle, 'Abraham, when tried, offered his beloved Isaac' as a burnt-offering at God's command; and trusted in Him to perform all those promises, which his obedience seemed about for ever to render vain, and their fulfilment impossible. Let us then inquire how far our faith has produced similar obedience, when we have been called to acts of inferior self-denial, or to make inferior sacrifices to our duty; and whether we have given up what was called for, in an unreserved confidence that the Lord would make up all our losses, and even bless us by means of the most afflictive dispensations. SCOTT.

V. 13—16. (15) If they had been mindful, &c. If, weary of this wandering life, they had purposed to return into Mesopotamia, they might have found an opportunity of doing it, and might there have settled among their relations; but this would have been an act of unbelief and disobedience, and a renunciation of the promises. SCOTT.

further life. Observe, God is able to raise the dead, dead bodies, and dead souls. The belief of this will carry us through the greatest difficulties and trials that we can meet with. It is our duty to reason down our doubts and fears, by the consideration of the almighty power of God.

(4.) The reward of his faith in this great trial, v. 19. he received his son from the dead in a figure, in a parable. He received his son. He had parted with him to God, and God gave him back again. He received him from the dead, for he gave him up for dead; he was as a dead child to him, and the return was to him no less than a resurrection. This was a figure or parable of something further, the sacrifice and resurrection of Christ, of whom Isaac was a type. It was a figure and earnest of the glorious resurrection of all true believers, whose life is not lost, but hid with Christ in God. We come now to the faith of other Old Test. saints, mentioned by name, and by the particular trials and actings of their faith.

V. 20—31. In this roll of believers we have an account,

I. Of the faith of Isaac; something of him we had before in the story of Abraham. Here we have something distinct,—that by faith he blessed his two sons, Jacob and Esau, concerning things to come. Where, observe,

1. The actings of his faith; He blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come. He blessed them; that is, resigned them up to God in covenant, recommended God and religion to them, prayed for them, and prophesied concerning them, what would be their condition in times to come; the account we have in Gen. 27. Observe, Both Jacob and Esau were blessed as Isaac's children; wicked children often fare the better in this world for their good parents' sake; for things present are in the covenant. Jacob had the precedency and the principal blessing, which shows that grace and the new birth exalt persons above their fellows, and qualify for the best blessings; and that it is owing to the sovereign free grace of God, that in the same family one is taken and another left, since all the race are by nature hateful to God; that if one has his portion in this world, and the other in the better world, it is God who makes the difference; for even the comforts of this life are more and better than any deserve.

2. The difficulties Isaac's faith struggled with. (1.) He seemed to have forgotten how God had determined the matter at the birth of these his sons, Gen. 25: 23. he was rather swayed by natural affection and general custom, which gave the double portion of honor, affection, and advantage, to the first-born. (2.) He acted in this matter with some reluctance, when he came to pronounce the blessings, Gen. 27: 33. and charged Jacob that he had subtly taken Esau's blessing, v. 33, 35. But for all this, Isaac's faith recovered itself, and he ratified the blessing; I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed. Rebeeca and Jacob are not to be justified in the indirect means they used to obtain this blessing, but God will be justified in overruling even the sins of men to serve the purposes of his glory. Now the faith of Isaac thus prevailing over his unbelief, it has pleased the God of Isaac to pass by the weakness of his faith, to commend the sincerity of it, and record him among the elders, who, through faith, have obtained a good report. We now go on to,

II. Jacob, v. 21. There were a great many instances of the faith of Jacob; two it has pleased God to single out, beside what has been already mentioned in the account of Abraham. Where, observe,

1. The actings of his faith here mentioned, and they are two. (1.) He blessed both the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh; he made them both heads of different tribes, as if they had been his own immediate sons; prayed for them, that they might both be blessed of God; and prophesied that they should be blessed; but as Isaac before, so now Jacob prefers the younger, and this by divine direction, to show that the Gentile church, the younger, should have a more abundant blessing than the Jewish, the elder. (2.) He worshipped, leaning on his staff; that is, he praised God for what He had done for him, and for the prospect he had of approaching blessedness; and he prayed for those he was leaving behind him, that religion might live in his family when he was gone. He did this, leaning on the top of his staff; intimating to us, his great natural weakness, and yet, that he would not make this an excuse for neglecting the worshipping of God; he showed thereby his dependence on God, and testified his condition here as a pilgrim with his staff, and his weariness of the world, and willingness to be at rest.

2. The time and season when Jacob thus acted his faith: when he was dying. Observe, Though the grace of faith is of universal use throughout our whole lives, yet it is especially so when we come to die. The best way in which parents can finish their course, is, blessing their families and worshipping their God. We are now come to,

III. Joseph, v. 22. And here, also, we consider, What he did by his faith; he made mention of the departing of the children of Israel, and gave commandment concerning his bones. The passage is from Gen. 50: 24, 25. Joseph was eminent for his faith, though he had not enjoyed the helps for it his brethren had; and this was evinced by his foretelling of the departure at length of the children of Israel, and giving charge concerning his bones. Some of the Rabbies fancied, that all the Jews who were buried out of Canaan, must be conveyed under ground to Canaan before they could rise again. But he gave this order to testify, 1. That though he had lived and died in Egypt, yet he did not live and die an Egyptian, but an Israelite. 2. That he believed the resurrection of the body, and the communion that his soul should presently have with departed saints, as his body had with their dead bodies. 3. To assure them that God would be with them in Egypt, and deliver them out of it in his own time and way. Observe, When it was that Joseph's faith acted after this manner; i. e. as in the case of Jacob, when dying. God often gives his people living comforts in dying moments. We go on now to,

IV. The parents of Moses, cited from Ex. 2: 3, &c. Where, observe,

1. The acting of their faith; they hid this their son three months. Though the mother, only, is mentioned in the history, yet by what is here said, it seems his father not only consented to it, but consulted about it. Observe, Moses was persecuted betimes, and forced to be concealed; in this he was a type of Christ, who was persecuted almost as soon as He was born, and his parents forced to flee with Him into Egypt for his preservation. In this faith of Moses' parents there was a mixture of unbelief, but God was pleased to overlook it.

2. The reasons of their thus acting. No doubt, natural affection could not but move them; but there was something further. They saw he was a proper child, a goodly child, Ex. 2: 2. exceeding fair, as in Acts 7: 20.—fair to God; there appeared in him something uncommon; the beauty of the Lord sat on him, as a presage that he was born to great things, and that by conversing with God his face should shine, Ex. 34: 29. Sometimes, not always, the countenance is the index of the mind.

3. The prevalency of their faith over their fear. They were not afraid of the king's commandment, Ex. 1: 22. they did not so fear as presently to give up their child; they considered that if none of the males were preserved, there would be an end and utter ruin of the church of God and the true religion, and that though, in their present state of servitude and oppression, one would praise the dead rather than the living, yet they believed God would preserve his people, and the time was coming when it would be worth while for an Israelite to live. Some must hazard their own be no doubt of the design to be answered by this otherwise mysterious event. On the very spot where Christ was crucified, Abraham is commanded to slay his son. It is needless to recapitulate the coincidences between the sacrifice of Isaac and of Christ. . . . That the meaning of the whole of the circumstances of this mystical sacrifice of his son was revealed to Abraham; that he learned from them, that the promised Messiah, should in like manner bear the wood of the cross, and die for mankind; and that Abraham, in obeying the divine command, rejoiced to see the day of Christ, and that he then saw it and was glad, [John 8: 56.] is well argued by Bp. Warburton.

TOWNSEND'S Old Test. arr., in WILLIAMS.

V. 21. So the Sept. render the words which, in our version, are translated 'the bed's head'; and the variation is immaterial. The same word, by changing merely the vowel points, will bear either signification.—'We have here a lively example of that substance, (1.) which was before commemorated. Jacob, dying a stranger in Egypt, distributes the kingdoms of the Canaanites to his twelve sons, in no other manner than he would have done, had he reigned in peace at Jerusalem. But how true and solid this "faith, the substance of things hoped for," was, appeared by this, that, after many years, the whole concern being committed to the lot, than which nothing seems more fortuitous, the event confirmed Jacob's testament.' Beza.—This learned divine here includes the blessing, which Jacob pronounced on all his sons, as well as that on Joseph, with Manasseh and Ephraim. Gen. 49.

(21.) When he was a dying.] 'Not in the act of dying, as Gen. 48: 8—22. shows, but when on his death-bed he blessed both them [i. e. Joseph's sons] and his 12 sons; see Gen. 47: 31. 48: 2. 49: 33.' STUART.—Bowed himself, &c.] 'This last action did not accompany the blessing of Joseph's sons, (see Gen. 47: 31. comp. 48: 1, 15, 16.) but was a separate transaction: and it designates, as it would seem, the act of worship, or reverence, paid to God, and occasioned by the grateful emotions of the dying patriarch, on account of the promise his son Joseph had just made to bury him with his fathers.' ST.—The question respecting top of his staff, the Heb. of which in Gen. might, according to some, be rendered head of his bed, Stuart is decided upon, in favor of understanding the phrase in the most obvious and literal sense, of an old man standing and leaning over his staff for support; than which, he says, nothing can be more natural.

V. 23. Not afraid.] 'I. e. not so intimidated as to drown the child, as commanded, Ex. 1: 22.'

lives to preserve their children, and they were resolved to do it; they knew the king's commandment was evil in itself, contrary to the laws of God and nature, and therefore of no authority or obligation. Faith is a great preservative against the sinful, slavish fear of men, as it sets God before the soul, and shows the vanity of the creature, and its subordination to the will and power of God. The apostle next proceeds to,

V. Moses himself, v. 24, 25, &c. Where, observe,

1. An instance of his faith in conquering the world.

(1.) He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Observe, How great his temptation; Pharaoh's daughter is said to have been his only child, and herself childless; and, having found Moses, and saved him as she did, they resolved to take him as her son; so he stood fair to be king of Egypt, and might, thereby, hope to be serviceable to Israel. He owed his life to this princess; and to refuse such kindness from her, would look not only like ingratitude to her, but a neglect of Providence, that seemed to intend his advancement and his brethren's advantage. How glorious the triumph of his faith in so great a trial! He refused, &c. lest he should undervalue the truer honor of being a son of Abraham, the father of the faithful; he refused, lest it should look like renouncing his religion, as well as his relation to Israel; and no doubt both he must have done, had he accepted this honor; he therefore nobly refuses it.

(2.) He chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, v. 25. He was willing to take his lot with the people of God here, though a suffering lot, that he might have his portion with them hereafter, rather than to enjoy all the sensual, sinful pleasures of Pharaoh's court, which would be but for a season, and then punished with everlasting misery. Herein he acted rationally as well as religiously, and conquered the temptation to worldly pleasure, as he had done before to worldly preferment. Here, observe, The pleasures of sin are, and will be, but short; and a true believer will despise them. Suffering is to be chosen rather than sin; there being more evil in the least sin than there can be in the greatest suffering.

(3.) He esteemed the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, v. 26. See how Moses weighed matters; in one scale he put the worst of religion,—the reproaches of Christ; in the other, the best of the world,—the treasures of Egypt; and in his judgment, directed by faith, the worst of religion weighed down the best of the world. Now here, Moses conquered the riches of the world, as before he had conquered its honors and pleasures.

2. The circumstance of time is noticed, when Moses by his faith gained this victory over the world, in all its honors, pleasures, and treasures; when he was come to years, v. 24. not only to years of discretion, but of experience, to the age of forty years; when he was great, or come to maturity. Some would take this as an extenuation of his victory, that he did not make this choice sooner; but it is rather an enhancement of the honor of it, that he made the choice when he was grown ripe for judgment and enjoyment. It was not the act of a child, but proceeded from mature deliberation. It is an excellent thing to be seriously religious, when in the midst of worldly business and enjoyments; to despise the world, when most capable of relishing and enjoying it.

3. What supported and strengthened Moses' faith to that degree; respect to the recompense of reward, that is, say some, the deliverance out of Egypt; but doubtless it means much more,—the glorious reward of faith and fidelity in the other world. Observe, here, Heaven is a great reward, a reward suitable to the price paid for it,—the blood of Christ; suitable to the perfections of God, and fully answering to all his promises. It is a recompense of reward, because given by a righteous Judge, for the righteousness of Christ, to righteous persons, according to the righteous rule of the covenant of grace. Believers may, and ought to have, respect to this recompense of reward; they should acquaint themselves with it, approve of it, and live in the daily and delightful expectation of it. Thus it will prove a landmark to direct their course; a loadstone to draw their hearts; a sword to conquer their enemies; a spur to quicken them to duty; and a cordial to refresh them under all the difficulties of doing and suffering work.

4. We have another instance of Moses' faith, and that in forsaking Egypt, v. 27. Twice Moses forsook Egypt; (1.) As a supposed criminal, when the king's wrath was incensed against him for killing the Egyptian; where it is said, he feared, Ex. 2: 14, 15. not with a fear of despondency, but of discretion to save his life. (2.) As a commander and ruler in Jeshurun, after God had employed him to humble Pharaoh, and make him willing to let Israel go. Observe, here,

[1.] The product of his faith; He forsook Egypt, and all its power and pleasures, and undertook the conduct of Israel out of it.

[2.] The prevalency of his faith. It raised him above the fear of the king's wrath, though he knew that it was great, and levelled at him in particular; he was not dismayed, and said to Israel, Fear not, Ex. 14: 13.

[3.] The principle on which his faith acted in these his motions; seeing the invisible God. Observe, The God with whom we have to do is an invisible God; yet by faith we may see Him, be fully assured of his existence, of his providence, and of his gracious and powerful presence with us; and such a sight of God will enable believers to endure to the end, whatever they may meet with in the way.

V. 24—26. Refused, &c. any longer to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter? though tradition reports, and Josephus states, that he was considered as heir of that prosperous kingdom.—Esteeming the scoffs, cast on the Israelites, for expecting the Christ to arise from among them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed, "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt." Mackn. (Notes, 13:9—14. 1 Cor. 10:6—10.) "The recompense of the reward," here mentioned, could not be temporal, for Moses came not into the land of Canaan; nor could he expect any greater blessing in that kind, than he might have had in Egypt. He therefore must have had respect to some spiritual and heavenly recompense. Whitby.—(21) Come to years } Become great. His authority and consequence in Egypt, as well as his time of life, seem intended.

(25.) Pleasures of sin, &c.] 'The luxurious and sinful pleasures of a court, at that time the most corrupt in the world. There is contained also an indirect contrast between the ever-enduring promises of God, and the fleeting pleasures of sin.'

(26.) Reproach of Christ.] 'Such contumely as Christ suffered.' So, Bloomf. says, most commentators. But some, as Doddr., think it refers to the relation in which Christ stood to Israel, as his peculiar people; and that Moses looked forward to the reward, in the promise of God respecting a future Savior.—Stuart renders it reproach, like that which Christ suffered, and thinks the simple sentiment is, 'Moses renounced pleasure and wealth, and endured suffering and reproach, because he believed in the promises God had made of future good, and that He would deliver his people from the bondage of Egypt. So Christ, "though rich, for our sakes became poor," in order to redeem us from a bondage worse than that of Egypt.'—Bloomf. remarks, on choosing rather, &c., v. 25. that 'it places in strong point of view the merit of the sacrifice [i. e. made by Moses]: for by renouncing the adoption, he ceased to be an Egyptian, and to have the privileges thereof; and became an Israelite, and was exposed to a participation in the oppressions of his countrymen.' Doddr. also remarks, respecting the recompense of reward here, v. 26. 'that it could not have been temporal grandeur, which he might have had, with much greater security and advantage, in Egypt; nor the possession of Canaan, which he never saw; but that it must, therefore, have been the eternal inheritance, discovered to him by the principle here [in this ch.] so largely described and recommended.'

Ed.

V. 27. Moses evidently 'feared,' when he forsook Egypt the first time; (Note, Ex. 2:13—15.) but this relates to his leaving that kingdom the second time, when he led forth the tribes of Israel. He was then strengthened in faith, to disregard the wrath and power of king Pharaoh; he denounced the death of the first-born, left the tyrant's presence, as one who had defiance to his menaces, and marched out of Egypt with great intrepidity; though he was fully aware, that Pharaoh, with his army, would pursue him. And when that actually took place, he boldly said to the affrighted Israelites, 'Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord.—The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace.' Ex. 9:13—18, 33. 10:16, 17, 29. 11:4—8. 12:29—39. 14:1—14.

V. 28. By the same efficacious faith, Moses foresaw the destruction of the first-born in Egypt, and expected the exemption of Israel from that calamity, in the way which the Lord prescribed unto him. He therefore influenced the people to keep the Passover, with 'the sprinkling of the blood' on the door-posts, and the other significant ceremonies; lest the destroying angel should enter their houses also. In this manner they were preserved, and this made way for their deliverance out of bondage.

V. 29. Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Caleb, and others, truly believed; and the rest of the nation, by the exhortations of Moses, were excited to a confidence in JEHOVAH's power and favor, for present deliverance from Pharaoh. But it was chiefly by the faith of Moses, their leader, that the Israelites passed safely through the Red Sea; even as Noah's family were preserved in the ark by means of his faith; though it does not appear that they were all true believers.

(29.) By faith, &c.] 'Not that every individual of the Israelites possessed such a confidence as is here described; but their leaders had it, and (as in other cases, of a similar nature) it is predicted of the nation.' Sr.—Red Sea.] 'The appellation, Red Sea, is founded in a vulgar error, and rather arose from its proper name, Mare Erythraeum, which, the commentators say, was derived from king Erythras, undoubtedly the same with Esau or Edom, who was a red man. So Grot. and others. It is called by Moses, Ex. 15:22. the weedy sea. And such, the accounts of modern tourists, as Niebuhr and others (see Harmer), testify it to be. But whether these weeds give a color to it so as to originate the name, Red Sea, is, I think, very doubtful.'

Bloomf.

30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.

31 By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace.

[Practical Observations.]

32 And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gedeon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; and of David also, and of Samuel, and of the prophets:

33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions,

34 Quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens.

5. We have yet another instance of the faith of Moses, in keeping the passover and sprinkling of blood, v. 28. The account we have, Ex. 12:13-23. All Israel kept this passover, yet God delivered the institution by Moses; and though it was a great mystery, Moses by faith both delivered it to the people, and kept it that night in the house where he lodged. The passover was one of the most solemn institutions of the Old Test.; and a very significant type of Christ, to whom the accommodation of it is not difficult.

VI. The Israelites passing through the Red Sea under the conduct of Moses their leader, v. 29. The story we have Exodus, ch. 14. Where observe,

1. Their preservation and safe passage, when there was no other way to escape from Pharaoh and his host, who were closely pursuing them; in which their danger was very great, and their deliverance very glorious: the grace of faith will help us through all the dangers we meet with in our way to heaven.

2. The destruction of the Egyptians.

PRACT. OBS. V. 20-31. While we desire, in faith, to 'bless our children' and worship God during life, and at the approach of death, and afterwards to have our lot with his people in the heavenly Canaan; and while we attend to every relative duty, trusting in the Lord, and 'not fearing the wrath' of man; let us particularly note the effects of the faith of Moses; and ask ourselves, whether we have been influenced to a similar judgment, choice, and experience. All believers are not called to make the same sacrifices, or to endure the same trials 'for righteousness' sake; nor have all the same measure of faith; yet without some experience and consciousness of this kind, we are not warranted to con-

V. 30. 'As the land of Canaan belonged to the Israelites, by a grant from "God, the Possessor of heaven and earth," it was proper that the first city, which resisted them, should be taken in such a manner, as to demonstrate the truth of their title.—Thus were . . . all the Canaanites made to know the supremacy and power of the God of Israel, and how vain it was to make any resistance.' Macknight. Scott.

V. 31. Doubtless she embraced the promises concerning the Messiah and spiritual salvation, in the same obedient manner, when she was made acquainted with them, and thus she was incorporated among the Israelites, and became an ancestor of Christ.—But the fruits and the infirmities of her faith have already been fully considered. Notes, Josh. 2:1-21. P. O. Notes, 6:17-19, 22-25. Jan. 2:25, 26. In.

(31.) Rahab.] 'Rahab is called a harlot on account of her former way of life, not because she remained such, Mat. 21:31. Therefore she received and preserved safe the spies sent by Joshua, because she believed that that was the one true God, who, in Egypt, and in the Arabian desert, had performed such wonders for the Israelites, who were his worshippers.' ROSENM.—'Rahab's falsehood in relation to the spies, was the effect, not of her faith, but of her sinful dread of the king's wrath; but it was not to the purpose of this discourse, to notice it, any more than the sinful infirmities mixed with the faith of others, enumerated. Guyse. But he considers her faith related only to the temporal preservation of her family, though she afterwards was incorporated with the church of Israel, and even then really believed that Jehovah was the only true God.' Henry, abr.—The notion of Rahab's having been an inn-

They, presumptuously attempting to follow Israel through the Red Sea, being thus blinded and hardened to their ruin, were all drowned. Their rashness was great, and their ruin grievous. When God judges, He will overcome; and it is plain that the destruction of sinners is of themselves.

VII. The Israelites, under Joshua their leader, before the walls of Jericho. The story we have, Josh. 6:5. where observe, 1. The means prescribed of God to bring down the walls of Jericho, wherein was a great trial of their faith: the method prescribed seemed very improbable to answer such an end, and would doubtless expose them to the daily contempt of their enemies; the ark of God would seem to be in danger. But this was the way God commanded them to take, and He loves to do great things by small and contemptible means, that his own arm may be made bare. 2. The powerful success of the prescribed means; the walls of Jericho fell before them. God was pleased in this extraordinary manner to slight and dismantle it, in order to magnify Himself, to terrify the Canaanites, to strengthen the faith of the Israelites, and to exclude all boasting.

VIII. Rahab, v. 31. Here consider, 1. Who this Rahab was, a Canaanite, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, yet a believer. The power of divine grace greatly appears, when it works without the usual means of grace. She was a harlot, and lived in a way of sin; yet she believed that the greatness of sin, if truly repented of, shall be no bar to the pardoning mercy of God. Christ has saved the chief of sinners; where sin has abounded, grace has superabounded. 2. What she did by her faith; she received the spies in peace, the men that Joshua had sent to spy out Jericho, Josh. 2:6, 7. She not only bade them welcome, but concealed them from their enemies, and made a noble confession of her faith, v. 9-11. Learn, here, true faith will show itself in good works, especially toward the people of God. It will venture all hazards in the cause of God and his people: a true believer will sooner expose his own person than God's interest and people. A true believer is desirous, not only to be in covenant with God, but in communion with the people of God, and is willing to cast in his lot with them, and to fare as they fare. 3. Observe what Rahab gained by her faith; she escaped perishing with those that believed not. Observe, (1.) The generality of her neighbors, friends, and fellow-citizens, perished; man and beast were cut off. (2.) The cause of the people of Jericho's destruction,—unbelief; they believed not that Israel's God was the true God, and that Israel was the peculiar people of God, though they had evidence sufficient of it. (3.) The signal preservation of Rahab. Joshua gave a strict charge that she should be spared, and none but she and hers; and she taking care that the sign, the scarlet thread, should be hung out, her family were marked out for mercy, and perished not. Singular faith, when the generality are not only unbelievers, but against believers, will be rewarded with singular favors, in times of common calamity.

V. 32-40. I. The apostle having given a classis of many eminent believers, whose names are mentioned, and the particular trials and actings of their faith recorded, now concludes his narrative with a more summary account of another set of believers, where the particular acts are not ascribed to particular persons by name, but left to be applied by those who are well acquainted with the sacred story.

In this summary account the apostle, I. Mentions Gideon, see Judges 6:11. &c. an eminent instrument, raised up of God to deliver his people from the oppression of the Midianites, when his army was reduced from 32,000 to 300; yet by these, with their lamps and pitchers, God put the whole army of the Midianites to confusion and ruin; and the same faith that gave Gideon so much courage and honor, enabled him to act with great meekness and modesty toward his brethren afterward. It is the excellency of the grace of faith, that, while it helps men to do great things, it keeps them from having high and great thoughts of themselves.

2. Barak, another instrument raised up to deliver Israel out of the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, Judges 4: a soldier, yet he received his commission and instructions from Deborah, a prophetess of the Lord; and insisted on having this divine oracle with him in his expedition. He obtained a great victory, by his faith, over all the host of Sisera, and returned all the praise and glory to God: this is the nature of faith; it has recourse unto God in all dangers and difficulties, and then makes grateful returns to God for all mercies and deliverances.

3. Samson, another instrument God raised up to deliver Israel from the Philistines, Judges ch. 13, 14, 15, and 16. From his story we learn, that the grace of faith is the strength of the soul for great service. If clude that we are of Moses' religion; for a common walking-stick more resembles Aaron's fruitful rod, than the faith of many modern professors of evangelical truth does the self-denying faith of Moses or of Abraham. But the subject is absolutely inexhaustible. . . . By faith we must implicitly use every mean, however unlikely, which God prescribes in order to our obtaining the promises; trusting in Him alone to render them effectual; nor will any perish with the enemies of God, who believe his Word, and show it by love to his people; whatever former crimes they have committed, or in whatever situation they may be found. Scott.

keeper or hostess, which Bloomf. approves, Stuart rejects, as 'contrary to the laws of [Hebrew] etymology.' Ed.

V. 32-34. The eminent persons, here mentioned in general terms, are not placed in the order of time in which they lived, but as they occurred to the apostle's mind; and the whole succession of the prophets are mentioned at once. Yet it has generally been supposed, that there is a peculiar reference to the successes of Judas Maccabeus and his brethren, against the forces of Antiochus Epiphanes; when from feeble beginnings they arrived at great power, and defeated all that persecutor's devices, by faith in the promises and protection of the Lord.—While we make a decided difference, between the Word of God and all other writings, there seems no impropriety in supposing that the apostle had these events in his view, on this occasion; as the historical facts respecting the persecutions of Antiochus, and the victories of the Maccabees, were well known among the Hebrews, and really formed an illustrious example of the efficacy and nature of faith. Scott.

(33.) 'Oh, if you could expect enough, believe enough, and ask enough, I know not what you might not obtain; I know not what deliverances you might accomplish in the earth. The age is fast opening when the triumphs of prayer are to be everywhere displayed as they never were before, to draw the creation up to God, and to perpetuate the union by the bond of eternal confidence. When a nation shall be born in a day, in answer to prayer, that strong language of a condescending God shall be written on our banners, 'concerning the work of my hands command ye Me.' Dr. GRIFFIN.

37 They were<sup>f</sup> stoned, they were slain asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword: they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented;

Samson had not had a strong faith, as well as a strong arm, he had never performed such exploits.

4. Jephthah, Judges 11: before Samson; raised up to deliver Israel from the Ammonites. In his story, observe, The grace of God often finds out, and fastens on, the most undeserving and ill-deserving persons, to do great things for them and by them. Jephthah was the son of a harlot. The grace of faith, wherever it is, will put men on acknowledging God in all their ways, ch. 11: 11. It will make them bold and venturesome in a good cause; will not only put them on making their vows to God, but paying their vows after the mercy received; yea, though they have vowed to their own great grief, hurt, and loss, as in the case of Jephthah and his daughter.

5. David, that great man after God's own heart. Few ever met with greater trials, or discovered a more lively faith; having, when young, slain the lion and the bear; his faith in God encouraged him to encounter the great Goliath, and helped him to triumph over him. The same faith enabled him to bear patiently the ingrateful malice of Saul and his favorites, and to wait till God should put him into possession of the promised power and dignity: also it made him a very successful and victorious prince, and, after a long life of virtue and honor, (though not without some foul stains of sin,) he died in faith, relying on the everlasting covenant God had made with him and his, ordered in all things, and sure; and he has left behind him such excellent memoirs of the trials and acts of faith in the book of Psalms, as will ever be of great esteem and use, among the people of God.

6. Samuel, raised up to be a most eminent prophet of the Lord to Israel, as well as a ruler over them. God revealed Himself to Samuel, when he was but a child, and continued to do so till his death. To Samuel he adds, and of the prophets, who were extraordinary ministers of the Old Test. church, employed of God sometimes to denounce judgment, sometimes to promise mercy, always to reprove sin; sometimes to foretell remarkable events, known only to God; and chiefly to give notice of the Messiah, his coming, Person and offices;—for all of whom a true and strong faith was very requisite.

II. And now, having done naming particular persons, he proceeds to tell us what things were done by their faith; some that easily apply to one or other of the persons named; but others not so easy to any here named.

1. By faith they subdued kingdoms, v. 33. Thus did David, Joshua, and many of the judges. 2. They wrought righteousness, both in their public and personal capacities: they turned many from idolatry to the ways of righteousness; they believed God, and it was imputed to them for righteousness; they walked and acted righteously toward God and man. 3. They obtained promises, both general and special: faith gives us an interest in the promises; by faith we have the comfort of the promises; and by faith we are prepared to wait for the promises, and in due time to receive them. 4. They stopped the mouth of lions; so Samson, Judg. 14: 5, 6. and David, 1 Sam. 17: 31, 35. and Daniel 6: 22. 5. They quenched the violence of the fire, v. 34. So Moses, by the prayer of faith, quenched the fire of God's wrath kindled against Israel, Num. 11: 1, 2. So did the three children, Dan. 3: 17, 27. Refusing to worship the golden image, exposed them to the fiery furnace which Nebuchadnezzar had prepared for them, and their faith engaged for them that power and presence of God in the furnace, which quenched the violence of the fire, so that not so much as the smell thereof passed on them. 6. They escaped the edge of the sword, as David, of Goliath and of Saul; and Mordecai and the Jews, the sword of Haman. 7. Out of weakness they were made strong; from national weakness, into which the Jews often fell by their unbelief; on the revival of faith, all their interest and affairs revived and flourished: from bodily weakness; as Hezekiah, who ascribed his recovery to the promise and power of God, Isa. 38: 15. And it is the same grace of faith, that from spiritual weakness helps men to recover and renew their strength. 8. They grew valiant in fight; as Joshua, the judges, and David. God, as a reward and encouragement of their faith, put to flight the armies of the aliens, aliens to their commonwealth, and enemies to their religion. 9. Women received their dead raised to life again, v. 35. as the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings 17: 23. and the Shunammite, 2 Kings 4: 36. Thus Christ had compassion on the widow of Nain, Luke 7: 12. &c. This should confirm our faith in the general resurrection.

III. The apostle tells us what these believers endured by faith:

1. They were tortured, not accepting deliverance, v. 35. They were put on the rack, to make them renounce their God, their Savior, and their religion; they bore the torture, and would not accept of deliverance on such vile terms; that which animated them thus to suffer, was, the hope they had of obtaining a better resurrection, and deliverance on more honorable terms, 2 Macc. ch. 7. &c.

2. They endured trials of cruel mockings and scourgings, and bonds and imprisonment, v. 36. They were persecuted in their reputation by mockings, which are cruel to an ingenious mind; in their persons by scourging, the punishment of slaves; in their liberty by bonds and imprisonment. Observe, how ingenerate is the malice wicked men have toward the righteous.

3. They were put to death in the most cruel manner; some were stoned, as Zechariah, 2 Chron. 24: 21. sawn asunder, as Isaiah, by Manasseh. They were tempted; some read it, burnt, 2 Macc. 7: 5. They were slain with the sword. All sorts of death were prepared for them; their enemies clothed death in all the array of cruelty and terror, and yet they boldly met it, and endured it.

4. Those who escaped death, were used so ill, that death might seem more eligible than such a life, v. 37, 38. Such sufferings as these they endured, then, for their faith; and such they endured through the power of the grace of faith; and which shall we most admire, the wickedness of human nature, that is capable of acting such cruelties on fellow-creatures, or the excellency of divine

V. 35—38. This is supposed to refer to the tortures and death of a woman and her seven sons, as recorded in the history of the Maccabees. (2 Macc. 7.)—This is a most decisive testimony of the sacred writer, that his countrymen expected a resurrection to eternal life, and that the Word of God warmed that expectation.—Others, in different ages, had been tried by 'cruel mockings,' and every kind of indignity and derision; with ignominious and painful scourgings, and with lingering sufferings in bonds and imprisonment; yet by faith they cleaved to God and their duty, amidst all that could be inflicted on them. Thus Micaiah, Jeremiah, and many others had been abused. (Notes, 1 K. 22: 3, 26, 27. Jer. 20: 23: 10—24. 37: 33.) Moreover, several had been stoned to death, and some had even been cruelly sawn asunder, as tradition reported that Isaiah had been. (Notes, 2 K. 21: 16. Is. 1: 1.) Others had been tempted with the most complicated sufferings, and with conditional offers of deliverance, to sin against God. Some were slain at once with the sword, whilst others were driven from their habitations, to wander as vagabonds, covered with matted skins instead of suitable raiment; and to inhabit mountains, deserts, dens, and caves, instead of commodious houses; being destitute of friends, afflicted by complicated distresses, and most cruelly tortured, when they fell into the hands of their persecutors. Yet they still trusted in God, and obeyed Him, with unremitting patience and constancy, in a realizing belief of his promises of support, comfort, and eternal salvation, and an unwavering confidence in them. Of these excellent persons 'the world,' which used them with such contempt and cruelty, 'was not worthy;' and therefore they were soon removed, in mercy to them, and in judgment to their enemies. The cases of David, Elijah, and many others, recorded in Scripture, may be alluded to; but doubtless many others occurred, during the persecuting reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, of which particular accounts have not reached us; though some records or traditions concerning them might be extant among the Hebrews, when the apostle wrote. (M. R. p—s.)—(35) Tortured.] Probably they were killed by being stretched out, and beaten with staves as a drum by drumsticks.

(35.) Tortured.] I. e. by stretching upon the tumpanon, and beating at the same time. Sr.,—who says the shape of this instrument of torture is not certainly known. Williams suggests the bastinadoing still practised in the East, as what is meant.—Bl., in a learned and ingenious note, remarks, that 'the form of the tumpanon may have been this, T;

the criminal having his arms fastened to the two horns of the post, with his head above the top of it, and his feet bound to the lower part, but not reaching the ground,—a posture which would promote the object of punishment in the extreme, by rendering it impossible, for the poor wretch to shrink from the blows.' Ed.—Not accepting, &c.] 'Not accepting liberation, in order that, &c. I. e. they declined accepting liberation from their torments, on condition of renouncing their religion.' STUART.—Better resurrection.] 'I. e. the resurrection which is better than the resurrection of the wicked?' So Owen. But Crellius and Hammond (in Doddr.) understand better as opposed to a present remission of their torments, which Doddr. adopts; though he quotes Hallett, as being very clear, that the opposition lies between the resurrection to eternal life, which these martyrs expected, and the resurrection of the dead children to life in this world, mentioned in the first clause of the verse: to this sense Stuart accords; but Bloomf., after Rosenm., explains it 'of another and better life;' quoting Theoph. as confirming, he understands it of 'a heavenly one, better than that of the wicked, who will only rise from their graves to suffer punishment here below, while the righteous will be caught up, to meet the Lord in the air,' &c. The other interpretations he thinks 'precarious.'

(37.) Saw asunder.] 'Prideaux and many others suppose the apostle might here refer to the tradition among the Jews, that the prophet Isaiah was sawn asunder at the command of Manasseh. Calmet understands, by this expression, being torn in pieces, as it were under a threshing instrument, consisting of wooden rollers, full of sharp, iron teeth, like a harrow.' DODDR.—Were tempted.] The word in the original here has occasioned great difficulty in interpreting this passage, principally because of its genuine signification, and milder aspect, while placed amidst others which designate specific sufferings, and those of a high degree. But Stuart thinks a very obvious and intensive meaning of it, viz. that of temptation to do evil, (which, as presented here, v. 37. must mean temptations presented by persecutors, to the victims of their torture, in order to induce them to forsake their religion and worship the gods of idolaters,) makes it plain, and is, probably, the correct interpretation. He comp. v. 35. Ed.—Wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins.] 'Residing first in one cave, and then in another.—Not in skins, literally, but in rude garments made thereof. See 1 K. 19: 13, 19. 2 K. 2: 8. 13: 14.'

grace, that is able to bear up the faithful under such cruelties, and to carry them safely through all !

IV. What they obtained by their faith.

1. A most honorable character and commendation from God, the true Judge and Fountain of honor, v. 38. It is not fit good men should have their rest in this world ; therefore God receives them out of it, to that world that is suitable to them, and yet far beyond the merit of all their services and sufferings.

PRACT. OBS. V. 32—40. 'Faith' will enable a man to serve God, and his generation, in whatever way he may be employed ; whether in governing or reforming nations, or defending them, by crushing the power of iniquitous assailants ; or in preaching the Gospel and boldly testifying against the crimes of the most mighty and implacable of its opposers ; or by 'working righteousness,' and obtaining promises in a more obscure station. It will influence a man to such prompt obedience, disinterested diligence, and warranted expectation, as will ensure all needful success in his undertakings. It will also prepare him for facing any dangers ; and though we do not now expect to 'stop the mouths of lions,' or to 'quench the violence of the fire ;' yet we are

V. 39, 40. Various interpretations have been given of this passage. Some suppose that the promise was that of 'the better country,' which the patriarchs desired, 13—16. but unto which they were not admitted, nor will he admitted, till the whole multitude of heirs shall be collected together at the end of the world. Others, perceiving that this interpretation is contrary to the general current of Scripture, which uniformly declares, that the 'righteous entereth into rest ;' that 'it is better to depart, to be with Christ ;' and that 'when absent from the body, believers are present with the Lord ;' 'blessed are the dead, who die in the Lord, &c.' confine the meaning almost wholly to deliverance from persecution !—But was not the promise of a Redeemer, from the first fall of Adam, the grand promise to fallen man ? (Notes, Gen. 3:14, 15. 12:1—3. 49:10.) This 'promise' the patriarchs received, and cordially embraced in faith (17) : but they did not live to obtain the thing promised.

eadar of the Old Test. worthies, God's witnesses ; yea, they had a witness for them in the consciences of their enemies, who, while they thus abused them, were condemned by their own consciences, as persecuting those who were more righteous than themselves.

3. They obtained an interest in the promises, though not the full possession of them. This is not meant of the felicity of the heavenly state, for that they did receive ; but of the felicity of the gospel-state ; they had types, but not the Antitype ; they had shadows, but had not seen the Substance ; yet, under this imperfect dispensation, they discovered this precious faith : this the apostle insists on, to render their faith more illustrious, and to provoke Christians to a holy jealousy and emulation. He tells the Hebrews, God had provided some better thing for them, v. 40. therefore they might be assured He expected at least as good things from them ; and that, since the Gospel is the end and perfection of the Old Test., which had no excellency but in its reference to Christ and the Gospel, it was expected that their faith should be as much more perfect than the faith of the Old Test. saints ; for their faith and dispensation were more perfect than the former, and were indeed the perfection and completion of the former ; for, without the gospel-church, the Jewish church must have remained in an incomplete and imperfect state. This reasoning is strong, and should be effectually prevalent with us all.

CHAP. XII. The apostle, in this ch., applies what he has collected in the ch. foregoing, and makes use of it as a great motive to patience and perseverance in the Christian faith and state.

V. 1—3. Here, observe, the great duty the apostle urges on the Hebrews, and which he so much desires they would comply with, and that is, to lay aside every weight, and the sin that did so easily beset them, and run with patience the race set before them. The duty consists of two parts, the one preparatory, the other perfective.

1. Preparatory ; Lay aside every weight, and the sin, &c. Every weight, that is, all inordinate affection and concern for the body, and the present life and world ; inordinate care for the present life, and fondness for it ; and The sin that doth so easily beset us ; the sin that has the greatest advantage against us, by the circumstances we are in, our constitution, our company,—either the damning sin of unbelief, or rather the darling sin of the Jews, an over-fondness for their own dispensation. Let us lay aside all external and internal hindrances.

2. Perfective ; Run with patience the race, &c. The apostle speaks in the gymnastic style, taken from the Olympic and other exercises. Christians have a race to run ; a race of service, and a race of sufferings ; a course of active and passive obedience. This race is set before them, marked out, both by the Word of God and the examples of the faithful, that cloud of witnesses with which they are compassed about. It must be run with patience and perseverance. There will be need of patience to encounter difficulties, of perseverance to resist all temptations to desist, or turn aside. Christians have a greater Example to animate and encourage them in their Christian course than any, or all, who have been mentioned, before, and that is the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 2. Here, observe, authorized to look for proportionable supports and consolations if called to end our pilgrimage by the hand of violence. We seem not to have immediate cause to apprehend being 'stoned, or sawn asunder, or slain by the sword ;' yet we shall surely be 'tempted ;' and we cannot overcome temptation, except by that faith which supported the martyrs, and made them more than conquerors over the fear of torment and death. Let us then pray continually for the increase of our faith, that we may follow these illustrious examples, and be with them at length made perfect in holiness and felicity, and 'shine like the sun in the kingdom of our Father' for evermore. SCOTT.

1. What our Lord Jesus is to his people ;

They were indeed saved by faith in a Redeemer, who was to come ; but without those events, which the apostles testified as already past, their pardon and acceptance could not be ratified, or their salvation perfected. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) Thus the Old Test. believers could not be perfected, except by communion with the N. T. church, in the promised Savior, and his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. SCOTT.

(40.) It is debated, whether this refers to the most perfect state of the church on earth, and so expresses a decorum in the conduct of providence in gradually improving the church, or to the glory of the future state. Doddr. ; who in his paraphrase inclines to the former. Ep. Better thing.] 'The only conjectures here that deserve particular regard are, that the better thing refers to the Messiah, or to the happiness of the heavenly world. But, how is heavenly blessedness vouchsafed to later more than to ancient saints ? And in what sense can it be affirmed, that the ancients could not, or did not, attain it without us. The object of the writer, through the ch., has been to show, that the hopes of heaven, cherished by the ancient worthies, were firm and bright, through faith in the Word of God. "The better thing reserved for Christians," then, is not a reward in heaven ; for such a reward was proffered also to the ancient saints.' So Stuart,—who accordingly adopts a different view of the whole passage ; in which he refers the promise to 'the promised blessing of the Messiah,' and construes thus : 'The ancient worthies persevered in their faith, although the Messiah was known to them only by promise. We are under greater obligations than they to persevere ; for God has fulfilled his promise respecting the Messiah, and thus placed us in a condition better adapted to perseverance than theirs. So much is our condition preferable to theirs, that we may even say, without the blessing which we enjoy, their happiness could not be completed. In other words, the coming of the Messiah was essential to the consummation of their happiness in glory, i. e. was necessary to their perfection. So the better thing seems to be, the actual fulfilment of the promise respecting the Messiah ; in respect to which, later times certainly have a pre-eminence over the early ones ; and on which the expected happiness of early times was really dependent.' Ep.

NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1. Witnesses.] Acts 6:13. 7:55. 22:20. 1 Thes. 2:10. Rev. 2:13. It does not appear, that this word is ever used, either in Scripture or in Greek writers to denote a spectator, simpl. ; except as he was one prepared to testify what he had seen. So that the testimony of the multitude of ancient believers to the truths insisted on, and not that they or others are spectators of our conduct, is perhaps exclusively meant. SCOTT.

the Author and Finisher of their faith; the Beginning, Perfecter, and Rewarder of it. He is so in all respects.

2. What trials Christ met with in his race and course: He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself, v. 3. He bore the opposition they made to Him, both in their words and behavior; and though He could easily have both confuted and confounded them, and sometimes gave them a specimen of his power, yet He endured their evil manners with great patience; their contradictions against Christ Himself, against his Person as God-man; against his authority; against his preaching; He endured all. He endured the cross,—all those sufferings He met with in the world, and at length the painful, ignominious, and accursed death of the cross; in which He was numbered with the transgressors, the vilest malefactors; all this He endured with invincible patience and resolution. He despised the shame, all the reproaches that were cast on Him, both in his life, and at his death, He despised them

3. What it was that supported the human soul of Christ under these unparalleled sufferings; and that was the joy that was set before Him, the thought, that by his sufferings He should make satisfaction to the injured justice of God, and give security to his honor and government; make peace between God and man; seal and be the Mediator of the covenant of grace; should open a way of salvation to the chief of sinners, and effectually save all whom the Father had given Him, and Himself be the First-born among many brethren. This was the joy that was set before Him.

4. The reward of his suffering; He is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. Christ, as Mediator, is exalted to a station of the highest honor, of the greatest power and influence; He is at the right hand of the Father; nothing passes between heaven and earth but by Him; He does all that is done; He ever lives to make intercession for his people.

5. Our duty with respect to this Jesus; we must Look unto Him; that is, set Him continually before us as our Example, and our great encouragement; look to Him for direction, for assistance, and for acceptance, in all our sufferings. We must consider Him, meditate much on Him, and reason with ourselves from his case to our own. We must analyze, as the word is; compare Christ's sufferings and ours; and we shall find, that, as his sufferings far exceeded ours, in the nature and measure of them, so his patience far excels ours, and is a perfect pattern for us to imitate.

6. The advantage we shall reap by thus doing; it will be a mean to prevent our weariness and fainting, v. 3. Observe, There is a proneness in the best to grow weary, and to faint under their trials and afflictions, especially when they prove heavy and of long continuance; this proceeds from the imperfection of grace, and the remains of corruption. The best way to prevent this, is, to look unto Jesus, and to consider Him. Faith and meditation will fetch in fresh supplies of strength, comfort, and courage; for He has assured them, if they suffer with Him, they shall also reign with Him: and this hope will be their helmet.

V. 4—17. Here the apostle presses the exhortation to patience and perseverance, by an argument taken from the gentle measure and gracious nature of those sufferings which the believing Hebrews endured in their Christian course.

1. From the gentle and moderate degree and measure of their sufferings, v. 4. Observe, He owns they had suffered much, had been striving to an agony against sin. Every Christian is enlisted under Christ's banner, to strive against sin, against sinful doctrines, sinful practices, sinful habits, and customs, both in himself and in others. Observe, He puts them in mind, that they might have suffered more; they had not been called to martyrdom as yet, though they knew not how soon they might be. It becomes Christians to notice the gentleness of Christ in accommodating their trial to their strength; they should not magnify their afflictions, but notice the mercy mixed with them, and pity those who are called to the fiery trial, to resist to blood; not to shed the blood of their enemies, but to seal their testimony with their own blood. Christians should be ashamed to faint under less trials, when they see others bear up under greater, and do not know

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—4. We should seriously inquire, what are the weights which retard our [Christian] course; what the sin, or sins, by which we are 'most easily beset,' and peculiarly endangered; that we may seek for grace to enable us to 'lay aside the one,' and to be on our guard against all occasions of the other. Many, who seemed to run well, lose the race, through the weight of increasing business, prosperity, and affluence, with the peculiar snares, temptations, concupiscences, and encumbrances, which spring from that source. This seems the easily besetting sin of these days of liberty and peace; but all men, in whatever state, have their peculiar dangers and hindrances, against which they are required to watch and pray without ceasing; nor can we 'run with patience the race set before us,' unless we be crucified to gests, that cloud well answers to the immense crowd of spectators, in the amphitheatre, seated one above another to an immense height.—Stuart remarks, that the sin which most easily beset the Hebrews was undoubtedly that of apostasy.—With patience.] 'With perseverance.' So Mackn., and others. Ed.

V. 2, 3. In order to their more full instruction and encouragement, they must look steadily to Jesus; not merely as One, who had run his glorious race, and completed his work, by faith in the promises and covenant-engagements of the Father; but as 'the Author and Finisher of faith' itself. He alone had opened the way for men to return to God and to enter heaven, 'by faith;' when sin had closed for ever that of personal righteousness: from Him, as the great Prophet of the church, the doctrine of faith had been delivered from the beginning, and perfected in the revelation made by the Gospel: and this none would ever be authorized to change, add to, or deduct from. He alone, by his Spirit, produces 'faith' in the hearts of his people, which He maintains, increases, and perfects, in its nature and fruits, till its work be finished. So that they must look to Him for faith, as well as by faith. He indeed did not want that faith, by which a sinner is justified; yet 'in finishing his work' on earth, He led his people the way to complete victory over every enemy, by a patient, obedient reliance on the word of his heavenly Father. (Note, Ps. 16:2—11.) As He had in 'all things the pre-eminence;' so He did not enter into his mediatorial glory without having the pre-eminence in the measure of his sufferings, above all others who ever went to heaven. 'For the joy set before Him,' of his own personal exaltation to the mediatorial throne; of the salvation of countless millions of lost sinners from destruction; of bringing them to endless happiness; and of eternally glorifying the whole Name, and all the perfections of God; (Notes, Mat. 25:19—23. John 17:22, 23.) He, with the utmost fortitude and constancy, endured all his other humiliating sufferings, from his birth in the stable to his agony in the garden; and at length most willingly submitted to be suspended on the cross, and there to expire in lingering tortures. Though this method of execution was peculiarly ignominious, and by the law pronounced accursed; and though his crucifixion was attended with unheard of circumstances of indignity, outrage, revilings, and derision; yet He disregarded and even 'despised the shame,' as also the anguish of it, as not worthy to be compared with the glorious event, which He had in full view. Thus, having 'endured' until his undertaking was finished, He was speedily raised from the dead, and exalted to 'the right hand of the throne of God.' (1:3, 4. 8:1, 2.) The disciples ought therefore to look unto Him, both as an example of constancy and patience; as the Author of their strength, encouragement, victory, and salvation; and as a glorious in-the world, and daily employed in mortifying the whole body of sin, with all its affections and lusts, those especially, to which education, habit, and situation, give most advantage.—Let us then frequently 'consider Him, who endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest we be wearied and faint in our minds.' What are our little trials, to his agonies, or even to our deserts? What, indeed, are they to the sufferings of many of our brethren, in different ages and places? We have 'not yet resisted unto blood,' in our warfare against sin, as many others have done; and we should be ashamed of our murmurings and impatience, when we have so very little even apparent reason of complaint. Jer. 12:5, 6. Scott.

stance of the blessed effect of perseverance, amidst reproaches and sufferings, in cleaving unto God and being 'faithful unto death.' This case was so extraordinary, that they would do well to 'consider it,' even with arithmetical exactness, and to estimate the dignity and excellency of the Sufferer; 'the contradiction of sinners' against Him, who ensnared, reviled, opposed, and accursed Him, with most perverse enmity against his holy doctrine and example, and with malignant ingratitude for all his love; the intemperance and variety of his sufferings; the meek and composed fortitude with which He endured them; the love, which moved Him thus to suffer, and the most blessed consequences of his humiliation. When they began to grow 'weary and faint in their minds,' with trials and injuries from their malicious persecutors, such considerations would serve to quiet and encourage them: whilst they recollected, that the holy Jesus suffered to save them from deserved and eternal misery; and that sinners of the same nature with themselves inflicted these tortures; that He had much bitterness in his cup, which was not in theirs; (Notes, Mat. 26:36—39. John 1:29. Gal. 6:11—14.) that He was hated for his own sake, and they only because of their relation to Him; and that his cross secured a happy event to all their conflicts and trials in his cause. In short, by 'looking to Him,' every kind of humiliating and animating topic would occur to their minds, to invigorate the exercise of their holy affections, and to repress every corrupt propensity. (2) Looking.] Turning our eyes from other objects, to fix them on this alone.—Author. Acts 3:15. 5:31.—Finisher.] I apprehend, that the apostle specially meant, that 'in Jesus all the plans, which had previously been unfinished, had acquired their completion.—He finished and perfected all things, respecting salvation by faith.' Sc.

(2.) Looking.] 'It properly signifies our taking off our regards from other things, that we may fix them on Christ.' Doddr.—Author and finisher.] Bloomf. understands here a mixture of military and agonistical metaphors, and renders leader, as of soldiers; and Stuart gives the sense of the whole verse thus: 'Do as Christ the Author of our holy religion did. For the heavenly reward proposed, He, with patience and perseverance, endured every kind of indignity and suffering, and has, in consequence of it, received a glorious reward. Follow in his steps, and participate in his glory.'—It may be added from Slade, in Bloomf., 'As Jesus endured, for the joy of finishing his scheme of salvation, [so] should his disciples endure, for the joy of being partakers of it.' Ed.

V. 4—8. If the professed people of God were not at all corrected, it might be inferred, that He did not own them as his children, but considered them as spurious; members of the visible church, but not 'born of the Spirit,' or educated for the 'inheritance of his saints.' Gal. 4:21

5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation <sup>d</sup> which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him :

6 For <sup>e</sup> whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

7 If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons ; for <sup>f</sup> what son is he whom the father chasteneth not ?

8 But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.

9 Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh, which corrected <sup>g</sup> us ; and we gave <sup>h</sup> them reverence : shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the <sup>i</sup> Father of Spirits, and live ?

10 For they verily for a few days chastened <sup>j</sup> us <sup>k</sup> after their own pleasure ; but he for <sup>l</sup> our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.

11 Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous : nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit <sup>m</sup> of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.

12 Wherefore lift <sup>n</sup> up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees :

PRACT OBS. V. 5-13. While we 'look to Jesus,' to reconcile us to suffering, to set us against sin, and to eclipse the vain splendor of this worthless world, we should also learn to receive every affliction, which the malice or envy of men brings upon us, as a correction sent by our wise and gracious Father, who speaketh to us by his Word, interpreting his providential dispensations, 'as to children,' and calls on us neither to 'despise his chastisements, nor to faint under' them. We should consider them as precious favors, needful blessings, pledges of love, and the only spiritual good, which He has promised to give us, without our praying for it. He never fails to chasten his children, though He often permits hypocrites to remain unmolested, because He means to destroy them. He will neglect the education of none, whom He receives into —31.—The allusion may either be made to such children, as a man deems to be spurious, though born of his wife ; because he suspects her of having been unfaithful, and therefore he will bestow no pains about them ; or such, as the real father neglects, because they are illegitimate, and he is ashamed to own them ; (Notes, Judg. 9: 11:1, 2.) but the former case seems more exactly to accord to the apostle's intent.—(5) My son, &c.] The quotation is almost exactly from the Sept. ; which does not materially vary from the Heb. (4) Resisted.] To stand against the assaults of sin ; as a man, in fighting against his antagonist. SCOTT.

(4.) Resisted unto blood.] Some understand this as agonizing, but others take it otherwise. Bl. says, 'the words show what kind of apostasy must principally be intended. "By resistance to apostasy even unto blood," is meant, so to overcome the temptations of the flesh, as to be ready to shed one's blood in the cause of the Gospel. Now this the prophets and others, especially Jesus Christ, had already done. Those whom he is addressing, the apostle means to say, were called to comparatively light endurance ; and therefore had no excuse for fainting under them.' Ed.

(5) 'A slight affliction may overcome and disquiet the mind with suspicious and rebellious murmurs, and occasion a degree of distress quite disproportioned to the cause ; while a much heavier stroke is perhaps born with meek submission and heavenly fortitude. The slight affliction touches but one rivulet of earthly pleasure, and you have recourse to those which are left ; but the heavier stroke dries up the very source of all earthly comfort, and leaves you to sink or depend on God alone. The slight affliction you attempt to bear in your own strength ; the heavier stroke is no sooner felt than you are convinced, that if the same God who inflicts the wound does not heal, you must be overthe reverence of obedience to the just commands of their parents, and the reverence of submission to their correction when they have been disobedient : to be stubborn and discontented under due correction is a double fault ; for the correction supposes there has been a fault already committed against the parent's commanding power, and superadds a further fault against his chastising power. From hence, he recommends a humble and submissive behavior towards our heavenly Father, when under his correction ; and this he does by an argument from the less to the greater. We owe reverence and affection to the natural fathers of our bodies ; but much more to Him who is the Father of our spirits, — they are the immediate offspring of God. Our earthly parents chastened us, sometimes to gratify their passion rather than to reform our manners. But the Father of our spirits never grieves willingly, nor afflicts the children of men, much less his own children." It is always for our profit ; and the advantage He intends thereby, is no less than our being partakers of his holiness ; it is to correct and cure those sinful disorders which make us unlike to God, and to improve and increase those graces which are the image of God in us, that we may be and act more like our heavenly Father. The fathers of our flesh corrected us for a few days, in our state of childhood, when minors ; and though we were in that weak and peevish state, we owed them reverence ; and when we came to maturity, we loved and honored them the more for it. Our whole life here is a state of childhood, minority, and imperfection, and therefore we must submit to the discipline of such a state ; when we come to a state of perfection, we shall be fully reconciled to all the measures of God's discipline over us now. God's correction is no condemnation ; his children may at first fear lest affliction should come on that dreadful errand ; but that is so far from being the design of God to his own people, that He therefore chastens them now, that they may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. 11: 32.

(1.) Those afflictions which may be truly persecution, so far as men are concerned in them, are fatherly rebukes and chastisements, so far as God is concerned in them. Men persecute us because we are religious ; God chastises us because we are not more so : men persecute us because we will not give up our profession ; God chastises us because we have not lived up to it.

(2.) God has directed his people how they ought to behave under all their afflictions ; they must avoid the extremes that many run into ; must not despise the chastening of the Lord, not make light of afflictions, and be stupid and insensible under them ; not faint under them, not despond and sink under them, nor fret and repine, but bear up with faith and patience. If they run into either of these extremes, it is a sign they have forgotten their heavenly Father's advice and exhortation, which He has given them in true and tender affection.

(3.) Afflictions, rightly endured, though they may be the fruits of God's displeasure, are yet proofs of his paternal love to his people, and care for them, v. 6, 7. Observe, The best of God's children need chastisement ; have their faults and follies, which need to be corrected. Though God may let others alone in their sins, He will correct sin in his own children ; and in this He acts as becomes a father, and treats them like children. To be suffered to go on in sin without a rebuke, is a sad sign of alienation from God ; such are bastards, not sons. They may call Him Father, because born in the pale of the church ; but they are the spurious offspring of another father, not God, v. 7, 8.

(4.) Those that are impatient under the discipline of their heavenly Father, behave worse toward Him, than they would do toward earthly parents, v. 9, 10. Here, the apostle commends a dutiful and submissive behavior in children toward their earthly parents ; it is the duty of children to give his family ; and He sets us an example, how we should correct our children, 'not for our pleasure, but for their profit,' not from passion, but in wise affection. Thus 'He makes us partakers of his holiness,' that we may be meet to share his felicity. Let us then endeavor to receive chastening from 'the Father of our spirits,' as we expect our children to submit to our corrections. Let us also comfort ourselves and each other with these topics, that we may 'lift up the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees ;' and let us carefully remove obstacles out of the way of pilgrims, and look well to the weak and tempted, lest they should be turned out of the way, instead of being encouraged to persevere in the course, amidst all its roughness and difficulty. (7.) What son is he whom the father chasteneth not.] 'That a peculiar insensibility to the obligations of the parental and filial relation, exists, is, I fear, too evident to need any extended illustration. The notion, that a family is a society, and that a society must be governed, and that the right and the duty of governing this society, rests with the parent, seems to be rapidly vanishing from the minds of men. [Note, Job 12:13-22.] In the place of it, it seems to be the prevalent opinion, that children may grow up as they please ; and that the exertion of parental restraint, is an infringement of the personal liberty of the child. But all this will not abrogate the law of God ; nor will it avert the punishments which He has connected, indissolubly, with disobedience ; [indeed, these are now plainly seen, in our duels, personal rencontres, and mobs, all in defiance even of law.] The Law of Children ; Elts. (12.) Doddr., with others, takes the expressions here as agonistical ; but Bloomf. thinks the metaphor is derived from extreme sickness or violent fatigue. Stuart gives the sense thus : 'since all your afflictions are dispensed by fatherly kindness, be of good courage, do not indulge despondency, but persevere in the course which you have begun.' Ed.

that of sense in this case,—sense groans under afflictions, but faith corrects sense, and declares, that a sanctified affliction produces the fruits of righteousness, peaceable, and tending to quiet and comfort the soul. The great concern of the righteous when chastened, is, that the chastening they are under may be endured by them with patience, and improved to a greater degree of holiness. So the apostle again returns to exhort them, that, for the reason before mentioned, they should lift up the hands that hang down, and the feeble knees, v. 12. that they may the better run their spiritual race, and may encourage and not dispirit others in the same way.

V. 15—17. It behooved Christians 'to look diligently,' both to themselves, and likewise to each other, in respect of their principles and conduct, 'lest any one should fail' of an interest in the special mercy and favor of God, or remain destitute of his sanctifying grace, and so be left to apostatize; 3:7—13. 4:1, 2. 10:19—22, and lest 'any root of bitterness,' any unmortified lust in the heart, which seemed to be dead, should spring up and shoot forth its bitter and poisonous produce. Deut. 29:18—20. 1 Cor. 5:6—13. 15:31—34. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:6—9. For instance, lest any one among them should commit fornication, under a mistaken notion of Christian liberty; or lest there should be some 'profane' person, who so despised the peculiar blessings of the new covenant, as to barter them away for temporal advantages; like Esau, who for one meal of meat sold his birthright. Gen. 25:30—34, and who, when 'afterwards he willed to inherit the blessing, was rejected,' both by the Lord, and by his father Isaac. Gen. 27:33—42. The whole history of Esau shows, that he, at that time at least, neither truly repented of all his sins, nor sought to do it. But he was grieved and vexed at being circumvented by Jacob; he was sorry that he had made so foolish a bargain; he coveted the temporal advantages which belonged to the birthright, especially the dominion over his brother; he had altered his neither walk so quietly and peaceably toward men, nor so piously toward God, as they should do; but faith and patience will enable them to follow peace and holiness too, as a man follows his calling, constantly, diligently, and with pleasure. Observe, [1.] It is the duty of Christians, even when in a suffering state, to follow peace with all men, yea, even with those who may be instrumental in their sufferings. It is a hard lesson, a high attainment, but it is what Christ has called his people to. [2.] Peace and holiness are connected; there may be prudence and discreet forbearance, and a show of friendship and good-will to all; but this true Christian peaceableness is never found separate from holiness. [3.] Without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The vision of God our Savior in heaven is reserved as the reward of holiness, and the stress of our salvation is laid on our holiness; though a placid, peaceable disposition, contributes much to our meetness for heaven.

6. Where afflictions and sufferings for the sake of Christ are not considered by men as the chastisement of their heavenly Father, and improved as such, they will be a dangerous snare and temptation to apostasy, which every Christian should most carefully watch against, v. 15, 16. Here the apostle enters a serious caveat against apostasy, and backs it with an awful example.

(1.) The caveat, v. 15. Where, observe, [1.] The nature of apostasy; it is failing of the grace of God, and so coming short of the love and favor of God here and hereafter. [2.] The consequences of apostasy: a root of bitterness springing up, and producing bitter fruits, damnable errors, and corrupt practices, by which many are troubled, the peace of the churches broken, the peace of men's minds disturbed, and many defiled, tainted with those bad principles, and drawn into defiling practices; so that the churches suffer both in their purity and peace. But the apostates themselves will be the greatest sufferers at last.

(2.) An awful example, that of Esau. Where, observe, Esau's sin; he profanely despised and sold the birthright, and all the advantages attending it, the privilege of being prophet, priest, and king, in his family; so do apostates, who, to avoid persecution, and enjoy sensual ease and pleasure, though they bore the character of the children of God, and had a visible right to the blessing and inheritance, give up all the pretensions thereto. Esau's punishment was suitable to his sin. He was condemned by his own conscience; he now saw that the blessing he had made so light of, was worth the having, worth the seeking, though with much carefulness and many tears. He was rejected of God, he found no place of repentance in God, in his father, or of true repentance in his own soul; the blessing was given to another, even to him to whom he sold it for a mess of pottage. Esau, in his great wickedness, had made the bargain, and God, in his righteous judgment, ratifies and confirms it, and would not suffer Isaac to reverse it. Learn, Apostasy from Christ is the fruit of preferring the gratification of the flesh to the blessing of God, and the heavenly inheritance. Sinners will not always have such mean thoughts of the divine blessing and inheritance as now they have. When the day of grace is over, (as sometimes it may be in this life,) they will find no place for repentance: they cannot repent aright of their sins: and God will not repent of the sentence He has passed on them for their sin. Therefore, as the design of all, Christians should never give up their title and hope of their Father's blessing and inheritance, and expose themselves to his irrevocable wrath and curse, by deserting their holy religion, to avoid suffering; which, though this may be persecution, as far as wicked men are concerned in it, is only a rod of correction and chastisement in the hand of their heavenly Father, to bring them near to Himself in conformity and communion. This is the force of the apostle's arguing from the nature of the sufferings of the people of God, even when they suffer for righteousness' sake; and the reasoning is very strong.

V. 18—29. Here the apostle goes on to engage the professing Hebrews to persevere ical principles; for 'a little of this leaven' will suffice to 'leaven a whole lump.'—But the time is at hand, when those, who thus renounce or refuse the salvation of God, for carnal indulgence or interest, would be glad to 'inherit the blessing,' and will be rejected; no place will be found for reversing the fatal bargain, though they should 'seek it carefully with tears;' nor can any one, who wilfully rejects the Gospel, or deliberately refuses to comply with its exhortations, for the love of this present world, know to what obduracy and desperation he may be given up, in the righteous judgment of God. SCOTT.

mind in that particular, and he sought carefully, and with tears, to induce Isaac to alter his purpose, to retract Jacob's blessing, and to bestow it on him; but he sought this in vain, for it was then too late. The latter, however, even the change of mind in Isaac, which might induce him to retract the blessing pronounced on Jacob, and to confer it on him, seems to be the repentance which Esau sought with tears.—Thus the time would shortly come, when they, who refused spiritual blessings for the sake of temporal interests, would become fully sensible of their madness and folly, and would be glad to reverse the fatal bargain; but 'that must be let alone for ever.' This was another awful warning against apostasy, but it has no relation to the case of those who earnestly desire and pray for repentance. 6:4—8. 10:26—31. SCOTT.

(15.) Grace.] Some understand this of Christianity, or the doctrines of the Gospel; but Stuart understands it of 'that divine favor which is the result of holiness,' and suggests the connexion and the previous repeated warning of the writer against apostasy, as a reason for his preference. ED.—Looking diligently, &c.] 'It was a good remark of Fuller, "He need not complain of too little work, who hath a little world in himself to mend."' MATHER.

(16.) As Esau.] 'We do not read that Esau was a fornicator; nor does the apostle say he was. By putting a comma after fornicator, and by connecting the words, or profane person, with what follows, Esau will be called only a profane person. This he showed himself to be, by selling his birthrights to Jacob, who proposed it only because he had heard him speak contemptuously of them. In Abraham's family, the birthright entitled to spiritual as well as temporal privileges, all which Esau despised, as we learn from Moses. Gen. 25:32.' MAERN.—Stuart says, the argument is from analogy. 'Let no one give up himself to the gratification of his lusts, as Esau did, to the great grief of his father, Gen. 26:35. let no one despise the distinguished privileges of Christianity, as Esau did those of his birthright, and parted with them for a mere morsel of food.' ED.

V. 18—21. The apostle again returned to his former position, that the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation would render it proportionably more criminal and perilous to reject it, for his discourse in their Christian course and conflict, and not to relapse again into Judaism. This he does by showing them, how much the state of the gospel-church differed from that of the Jewish, and how much it resembles the state of the church in heaven, and on both accounts demands and deserves our diligence, patience, and perseverance in Christianity.

I. How much the gospel-church differs from the Jewish church, and how much it excels. And here we have a very particular description of the state of the church under was equally suited to warn avowed unbelievers, and those who were tempted to apostasy. (Notes, 2:1—4. 6:4—8. 10:23—31.) He did not speak of the state of individuals, as converted or unconverted, but of the different method, in which God now spake to the nation, from that in which he delivered the law to their fathers. This he showed by an allusion to the two mountains, Sinai and Zion. Gal. 4:21—31.—The whole of the scene showed the impossibility of a sinner's coming before God with acceptance, according to the works of the law, the highly criminal presumption of attempting it, and the need of a Mediator and a better covenant; and it was to the apostle's purpose, to call off the attention of the Hebrews from that dispensation to the Gospel, by every argument and illustration which could be fairly made to bear on the subject.

(18.) 'The comparison between the two dispensations opens here, and is continued to the end of v. 24. the whole passage has respect to Ex. 20:21, &c. and Deut. 4:5.' Sr.—The mount that might be touched.] Some are stumbled here, as though it should read, might not be touched, referring to the prohibition, Ex. 19:13. mentioned here also, v. 20. but Doddr. remarks, that 'it is not intimated by the expression, that the mountain might lawfully be touched; but only that it was the object of touch,' or, as Stuart says, 'palpable to the senses.'

(21.) Moses said, &c.] 'Not expressly mentioned in the O. Test., implied, however, Ex. 19:16. where it is said, "all the people trembled," and Moses was with them, comp. v. 14. The fear mentioned, Deut. 9: 19. was on a different occasion.'

V. 22—25. The Hebrew converts to Christianity ought to consider themselves, as summoned by the preachers of the Gospel, to come to 'mount Zion,' or as actually convened there, to hear the voice of God from the merey-seat. They were, professedly, become inhabitants of 'the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem,' the place of the Lord's special residence with his covenant people and accepted worshippers, of which Jerusalem had been a type; at least they were invited to enter, and become citizens of that favored city. This meant the church of Christ on earth, with all its special privileges, ordinances, and the Mosaic dispensation, v. 18—21. 1. It was a gross, sensible state. Mount Sinai, on which that church state was constituted, was a mount that might be touched, v. 18. a gross, palpable place; so was the dispensation. The state of the gospel-church on mount Zion is more spiritual, rational, and easy. 2. It was a dark dispensation. On that mount there were blackness and darkness, and that church state was covered with dark shadows and types: the gospel-state is much more clear and bright. 3. It was a dreadful and terrible dispensation; the Jews could not bear the terror of it, v. 19. The gospel-state is mild, kind, and condescending, suited to our weak frame. 4. It was a limited dispensation; all might not approach to that mount, but only Moses and Aaron. Under the Gospel we have all access with boldness to God. 5. It was a very dangerous dispensation, v. 20. It is true, it will be always dangerous for presumptuous, brutish sinners to draw nigh to God; but it is not immediate and certain death, as here it was. This was the state of the Jewish church, fitted to awe a stubborn and hard-hearted people, to set forth the strict and tremendous justice of God, to wean the people of God from that dispensation, and to make them more readily to embrace the sweet and gentle economy of the gospel-church, and adhere to it.

II. He shows how much the gospel-church represents the church triumphant in heaven; what communication there is between the one and the other. Mount Zion was the hill on which God set his King the Messiah. Now, in coming to mount Zion, believers come into heavenly places, and into a heavenly society.

1. Into heavenly places; the city of the living God. God has taken up his gracious residence in the gospel-church, which, on that account, is an emblem of heaven.

2. To a heavenly society, an innumerable company of angels, who are of the same family with the saints, under the same head, and, in a great measure, employed in the same work. These are innumerable; yet, for order and union, a company, a glorious one. And those who by faith are joined to the gospel-church, are joined to the angels, and shall at length be like them, and equal with them. To the general assembly and church of the first born that are written in heaven; that is, to the universal church, however dispersed. The names of these are written in heaven, in the records of the church there, written among the living in Jerusalem.

promises, as connected with the holy residence of God in heaven, and as continually transmitting to it new inhabitants. Is. 12:4—6. Gal. 4:21—31. Rev. 11:1, 2. 14:1—5. 21:9—27.—This is a most decisive proof, that the souls of believers enter into a state of perfect happiness when they die, as far as it can consist with their state of separation from the body.—Better things, &c.] While the blood of Abel called from the ground for vengeance on the murderer, the blood of Christ, applied in faith, not only took away the guilt of all other sins, however atrocious, but even that of being his murderers; as multitudes of the Hebrews, especially, who had been immediately concerned in that most tremendous crime, could thankfully witness. The national guilt of Israel, therefore, could not preclude them from pardon, through this great atonement; and the Lord invited and commanded them, to believe in the name of his Son, and so to share all the before mentioned inestimable privileges. Let them therefore see to it, as they valued his favor, and feared his vengeance, that they did not 'refuse' the gracious call and proffered salvation of Him, who thus spake to them from his 'throne of grace,' and by 'his beloved Son.' This plainly shows, that, by 'coming to mount Zion, &c.' the apostle did not mean being true believers, but having the Gospel proposed to them, or having made a profession of it. They might therefore be said to 'refuse,' and to 'turn away' from God, whether they rejected his invitation, or after a time became apostates from Christianity; but men cannot be said to refuse what was never proposed to them.

(24.) The blood of sprinkling.] Stuart, Ros., and Bloomf. seem evidently to understand the allusion to the blood of Christ.—Than, &c.] Here Doddr. too, understands literally the blood of Abel. And Ros. explains: 'The blood of Abel calls for vengeance, but that of Christ for pardon. Christ intercedes for us, and saves us everlastingly.'

(25.) Him that speaketh.] I. e. Christ. So Bloomf. and Stuart. Him that spake on earth and was refused, they both also understand of Moses. And Stuart remarks, that 'the legislator, or head of each dis-

To God the Judge of all; that great God who will judge both Jew and Gentile, according to the law they are under. To the spirits of just men made perfect; to the best sort of men, the righteous, and to these in their best state made perfect. To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel. The gospel-covenant is a new covenant, distinct from the covenant of works, and it is now under a new dispensation, distinct from that of the old Test. Christ is the Mediator of this new covenant; the middle Person between both parties,—God and man; at length to bring God and his people together in heaven, and to be a Mediator of fruition between them for ever; they beholding and enjoying God in Christ, and God beholding and blessing them in Christ. This covenant is ratified by the blood of Christ sprinkled on our consciences, as the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled on the altar and the sacrifice. This blood of Christ pacifies God, and purifies the consciences of men. This is speaking blood, and it speaks better things than that of Abel. It speaks to God in behalf of sinners; it pleads not for vengeance, as the blood of Abel did on him who shed it, but for mercy. To sinners, in the name of God, it speaks pardon to their sins, peace to their souls; and bespeaks their strictest obedience, and highest love and thankfulness.

Now the apostle, having thus enlarged on the argument to perseverance, taken from the heavenly nature of the gospel-church state, closes the ch. by improving the argument in a manner suitable to the weight of it, v. 25. &c. Here observe,

1. When God speaks to men in the most excellent manner, He justly expects from them the most strict attention and regard. Now it is in the Gospel God speaks in this manner. For He now speaks from a higher and more glorious seat and throne, not from mount Sinai, which was on this earth, but from heaven. He speaks now more immediately by his inspired Word, and by his Spirit, which are his witnesses. He speaks not now any new thing to men, but by his Spirit speaks the same Word home to the conscience. He speaks now more powerfully and effectually. Then, indeed, his voice shook the earth, but now, by introducing the gospel-state, He hath shaken not only the earth, but the heavens; not only the hills and mountains, or the spirits of men, or the civil state of the land of Canaan, but the church, that is, the Jewish nation,

26 Whose voice then shook the earth : but now he hath promised, saying, <sup>k</sup> Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

27 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that <sup>l</sup> are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us <sup>m</sup> have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear :

29 For <sup>n</sup> our God is a consuming fire.

and them in their church-state, which was, in Old Test. times, a heaven on earth; this, their heavenly, spiritual state, He hath now shaken. V. 26—29. The voice of JEHOVAH, from mount Sinai, had been attended with tremendous earthquakes and convulsions ; but many ages after that transaction, in an express prediction of the Messiah, God had foretold, that He would 'once more shake the earth and the heavens also ;' Hag. 2:6—9. meaning, that He would change the whole civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews, and abolish the Mosaic dispensation, in order to make way for the kingdom of Christ. . . . The apostle evidently meant some of his expressions for one description of readers, and others, for those of a different character ; though he left each to make the application to himself ; but he peculiarly aimed to convince his countrymen, that unbelievers among them were doomed to the most tremendous vengeance of God, both national and personal, from which there could be no escape, except by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and cleaving to Him. — (26) Yet once, &c.] The quotation varies both from the Sept. and the Heb. In the latter it is, ' Yet once, I will shake the heaven and the earth, &c.'

(26, 27.) ' Yet once more, &c. is from Hag. and respects the changes which would be introduced by the coming of the Messiah. appears in these three things : (1.) That the former dispensation and state of the church of God were shaken and removed ; (2.) That a new kingdom is erected for God in the world, which can never be so shaken as to be removed. (3.) This change is made once for all ; we have now received a kingdom that shall never be removed, never give way to any new dispensation. The gospel-church may be enlarged, and purified, but it shall never be altered for another : they who perish under the Gospel, perish without remedy. Hence the apostle justly concludes, [1.] How necessary it is for us to obtain grace from God, to serve Him acceptably : if we be not accepted of God under this dispensation, we shall never be accepted at all ; and we cannot worship God acceptably, unless we worship Him with godly reverence and fear. As faith, so holy fear, is necessary to acceptable worship. It is only the grace of God that enables us to worship God in a right manner : nature cannot come up to it ; it can produce neither that precious faith nor that holy fear, that are necessary to acceptable worship. God is the same just and righteous God under the gospel, that He appeared to be under the law ; and He will avenge Himself on all the despisers of his grace, and on all apostates ; nay, under the gospel, the justice of God is displayed in a more awful manner, though not in so sensible a manner as under the law ; for here we behold divine justice seizing on the Lord Jesus Christ, and making Him a propitiatory sacrifice, his soul and body an offering for sin ; which is a display of justice far beyond what was seen and heard on mount Sinai, when the law was given.

CHAP. XIII. The apostle, having treated largely of Christ, and faith, and free grace, and gospel-privileges, and warned the Hebrews against apostasy, now, in the close of all, recommends several excellent duties to them, as the proper fruits of faith ; then bespeaks their prayers for him, and offers up his prayers to God for them, gives them some hope of seeing himself and Timothy, and ends with the general salutation and benediction.

V. 1—17. The design of Christ in giving Himself for us, is, that He may purchase to Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Now the apostle calls the believing Hebrews to the performance of many excellent duties, in which it becomes Christians to excel.

1. To brotherly love, v. 1. by which he means, not only a general affection to all men, as our brethren by nature, but that special and spiritual affection which ought to be among the children of God. (1.) It is here supposed, that the Hebrews had this love one for another ; though, at this time, that nation was miserably divided and distracted among themselves, both about matters of religion and the civil state. The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of love ; faith works by love ; the true religion is the strongest bond of friendship ; if it be not so, it has its name for nothing. (2.) This brotherly love was in danger of being lost, and that, in a time of persecution, when it would be most necessary ; it was in danger of being lost by disputes about the respect they ought still to have to the ceremonies of the Mosaic law. Disputes about religion too often produce a decay of Christian affection ; but this must be guarded against, and all proper means used to preserve brotherly love.

2. To hospitality, v. 2. We must add to brotherly kindness, charity. Where observe, (1.) The duty required, — to entertain strangers, both strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to our persons ; especially those who know themselves to be strangers here, and are seeking another country ; which is the case of the people of God, and was so at this time. (2.) The motive, — thereby some have entertained angels unawares ; so Abraham did, Gen. 18. and Lot, Gen. 19. and one of those Abraham entertained was the Son of God ; and though we cannot suppose this will ever be our case, yet what we do to strangers, in obedience to Him, He will reckon and reward as done to Himself, Mat. 25: 35.

3. To Christian sympathy, v. 3. Where observe, (1.) The duty, — to remember those that are in bonds and in adversity. God often orders it so, that, while some Christians and churches are in adversity, others enjoy peace and liberty ; and those that are themselves at liberty, must sympathize with those that are in bonds and adversity, as if bound with them in the same chain ; they must feel the sufferings of their brethren. (2.) The reason of the duty, — as being yourselves in the body ; not only in the body natural, and so liable to the like sufferings ; but in the same mystical body, under the same Head ; and if one fall from a greater height of privilege to a more tremendous depth of condemnation, than ancient rebels did ; for how can they escape, who turn away from God in unbelief or apostasy, whilst He so graciously beseeches them to be reconciled to Him, and to accept of his everlasting favor ?

NOTES. CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The Hebrew converts, after the day of Pentecost, abounded in love to each other, and in all the fruits of this holy affection ; (Notes, Acts 2:42—47. 4:32—35.) but many things would naturally occur to interrupt that entire harmony, and to stop the current of that liberality, which they at first showed. It was therefore peculiarly proper for the apostle to exhort them to 'let brotherly love continue,' and to avoid everything which interfered with their persevering attention to peace, kindness, and reciprocal affection, as became children of one family, and heirs of the same inheritance. He likewise meant to excite them to 'brotherly love' towards the Gentile converts, against whom they were generally in some degree prejudiced. Eph. 2: 11—22. 3:1—7. 4:1—6.—It has been shown, that one of the three who came to Abraham was called JEHOVAH, and was doubtless the eternal Word and Son of God ; but it was not necessary for the apostle to advert to that circumstance, when he merely suggested a hint on the subject.—It could not indeed be expected, that the Hebrews would literally be visited by angels, in the form of strangers.—All captives and afflicted persons might be included in the exhortation ; but 'the household of faith' was specially intended.

SCOTT.

(1.) Let brotherly love continue.] 'To cultivate affection, is not to strive to excite it by any direct effort of abstract thinking, but to show by the whole tenor of a life of disinterested goodness, that our happiness is really promoted by seeking the happiness of another. [Note, 1 John 5:7—13.] It consists in restraining our passions, in subduing our selfishness, in quieting our irritability, in eradicating from our minds everything which could give pain to an ingenuous spirit ; and in cherishing a spirit of meekness, forbearance, forgiveness, and of active, cheerful, and incessant desire for the happiness of those whom we love. AT NO LESS PRICE THAN THIS CAN AFFECTION BE PURCHASED, AND THOSE WHO ARE WILLING TO PURCHASE IT AT THIS PRICE, WILL RARELY HAVE REASON TO COMPLAIN OF THE WANT OF IT.' Law of Marriage, Elts. Mor. Sci. member suffer, all the rest suffer with it, 1 Cor. 12:26. It would be unnatural in Christians not to bear each other's burdens.

4. To purity and chastity, v. 4. Here you have, (1.) A recommendation of God's ordinance of marriage, that it is honorable in all, and ought to be so esteemed by all, and not denied to those to whom God has not denied it; it is honorable, for God instituted it for man in paradise, knowing it was not good for him to be alone; he married and blessed the first couple, the first parents of mankind, to direct all to look unto God in that great concern, and to marry in the Lord. Christ honored marriage with his presence and first miracle; it is honorable, as a mean to prevent impurity and a defiled bed; it is honorable and happy, when persons come together pure and chaste, and preserve the marriage bed undefiled, not only from unlawful, but inordinate affections. (2.) A dreadful but just censure of impurity and lewdness; whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. God, who knows them; and will call such sins by their proper names, not by the names of love and gallantry, but of whoredom and adultery; whoredom in the single state, and adultery in the married. He will bring them into judgment, He will judge them, either by their own consciences here, or at his tribunal at death, and in the last day; He will convict them, condemn them, and cast them out for ever, if they die under the guilt of this sin.

5. To Christian contentment, v. 5, 6. Here observe, (1.) The sin that is contrary to this grace and duty,—covetousness, an over eager desire of the wealth of this world, envying those who have more than we; this sin we must not allow, but root it out of our souls. (2.) The duty and grace is contrary to covetousness; being satisfied and pleased with such things as we have; present things, for past things cannot be recalled, and future things are only in the hand of God; what God gives us from day to day, we must be content with it, though it fall short of what we have enjoyed heretofore, and come not up to our expectations for the future; we must be content with our present lot, bring our minds to our present condition, and this is the sure way to contentment; and they who cannot do it, would not be contented though God should raise their condition to their minds, for the mind would rise with the condition. Hannu was the great court-favorite, and yet not contented; Ahab, on the throne, and yet not contented; Adam, in paradise, and yet not contented; yea, the angels, in heaven, and yet not contented; but Paul, though abased and empty, had learned in every state, in any state, therewith to be content. (3.) What reason Christians have to be contented with their present lot: God hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee, v. 5, 6. This was said to Joshua, ch. 1:5. but belongs to all the faithful servants of God. This promise contains the sum and substance of all the promises; I will never, no, never leave thee, nor ever forsake thee. Here are no less than five negatives heaped together, to confirm the promise; the true believer shall have the gracious presence of God with him in life, at death, and for ever. From this comprehensive promise they may assure themselves of help from God, v. 6. Men can do nothing against God, and God can make all that men do against his people, to turn to their good.

6. To the duty Christians owe to their ministers, both those that are dead, and those yet alive.

(1.) To those that are dead, v. 7. Here observe, The description given of them; they were their guides and governors, not according to their own will, but the Word of God; not at a distance, and by proxy, but by personal presence and instruction. The duty owing to them, even when dead; 'Remember them; their preaching, praying, private counsel, example.' 'Follow their faith steadfastly, profess it, and labor after the grace of it. Consider the end of their conversation, how quickly, how comfortably, how joyfully, they finished their course!'

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-8. 'Brotherly love' tends, in such various ways, to the benefit of the church, the comfort of believers, and the honor of the Gospel; that the enemy of our souls endeavors, by every mean, to interrupt its exercise, and to work on the remains of our corrupt affections, for that purpose, with a vast variety of most subtle artifices, against which we should be perpetually on our guard. Hence it is, that so little of this love is found in the church, though so much is read concerning it in the Scriptures; and that so many divisions and controversies prevail among those, who seem, in a measure, to have been taught of God to love their brethren! John 13:31-35, 17:20-23. 1 Thes. 4:9-12. 1 John 2:7-11, 3:11-24, 4:9-12.—Defilement and dishonor spring from contrariety to the law of God, which is perfectly sued to promote our present and future welfare. But God does, in this world, severely mark his abhorrence of those forbidden lusts, to which the depravity of the human heart leads such vast multitudes; Gen. 2:24. 1 Cor. 6:18-20. and He will surely condemn every impenitent fornicator and adulterer at the day of judgment; whatever disguise or excuse he may here use to cloke his wickedness.—Christians, whether poor or rich, should, in all their words and actions, show, that they 'abhor covetousness.'—The instructions and example of ministers, who have honorably and comfortably closed their testimony, should be peculiarly remembered by their survivors. But Jesus alone is an ever-living Friend, 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' SCOTT.

V. 4. Many expositors, particularly those of the church of Rome, explain this as an exhortation; 'Let marriage be honorable in all things, &c.' and doubtless the apostle meant, that it ought to be entered into, and behaved in, according to the holy commandments of God; that it might be honorable to the persons themselves, and to their profession of the Gospel; as well as that the state should be had in honor, and considered as undefiled. The particle but, however, introducing the second clause, shows that his primary meaning was to assert, that 'marriage' in itself 'was honorable in all' things, and in all persons; for he contrasts marriage with the conduct of fornicators and adulterers, whom God will certainly judge, and condemn for their violations of his law. 1 Cor. 5:9-13. 6:9-11. Gal. 5:19-21. Eph. 5:3-7. Rev. 21:5-8. 22:14, 15. Some persons, in the primitive times, contended for the lawfulness of fornication; and most abominable sentiments and practices, in respect of polygamy and divorcees, prevailed, not only among the Gentiles, but even to an astonishing degree among the Jews; while, on the other hand, some of both, and of the Christians, condemned marriage, or at least deemed it a less holy state than celibacy. This 'mystery of iniquity,' very early began to work; and the apostle, in a few most expressive words, guarded against both the extremes, which experience has always proved to be, in different forms, but almost equally, destructive to morality, the welfare of society, and the purity of religion. Gen. 2:21-24. 1 Tim. 4:1-5. SCOTT.

(4.) Marriage, &c.] Stuart and Mackn. render it; Let marriage, &c.; but Doddr. says, the connexion of the latter clause introduced by the particle, but, is sufficient to vindicate our version. EN.

V. 5, 6. The Hebrews were generally poor; many had sold their estates to relieve their brethren, after the day of Pentecost; and the goods of others had been plundered by their persecutors. (10:34.)—The apostle had strenuously exerted himself to procure them a liberal relief from the Gentile churches; Rom. 15:22-29. 2 Cor. 8: 9. but he here exhorts them, to let their whole conduct, discourse, and manner of life, be evidently at a distance from 'covetousness;' neither being anxious about getting money, to lay up, or to expend in superfluities; nor yet to be tenacious of what they had, or averse to lay it out for valuable purposes. I will never leave, &c.] The emphasis of the original words can scarcely be retained in a translation, though nearly the same words are used in several parts of the Scripture. Marc. Ref. 1.—They, however, evidently show that every believer, in similar circumstances, may rely on the promises made specially to any person, as recorded in the Scripture. The quotation gives the general meaning conveyed in the Sept. but in very different words. Deut. 31:3-3. SCOTT.

(5.) I will never leave, &c.] Doddr. renders or paraphrases: 'I will not, I will not leave thee, I will never, never, never forsake thee.'

ED.—In English, two negatives are equivalent to an affirmative, and destroy each other. But not so in Greek. They strengthen each other; and a third makes it stronger still, and so a fourth and fifth. Here is a case, connected with a promise, one of the "exceeding great and precious promises." We translate but two of them. Now, they need not all have been there. They are not all necessary to express the simple idea, that God will never forsake his people. There must have been design in multiplying them. God meant to be believed in that thing, and would secure the confidence of his people. He knew how prone they were to doubt his constancy,—how strongly inclined to that form of unbelief, and how liable to be harassed by the dread of being forsaken by Him. How in earnest God appears to be in this matter! How unworthy his children to suspect that He will forsake them!

Rev. Dr. W. NEVINS.
V. 7, 8. The same yesterday, &c.] The expression seems to be a periphrasis of immutability, a divine attribute incommunicable to a mere creature; his Person is as immutable as his doctrine, his justice and holiness, as his mercy and truth; and all kinds of persons will meet a Judge exactly of the same character, as He manifested when He appeared on earth as a Savior. The Hebrews might, therefore, confide in Him, to support and comfort them under their sufferings for his sake; even as He had supported those, who had so happily finished their course. SCOTT.

(7.) Whose faith follow.] Or, as Mackn. and M'Lean, 'of whose conversation attentively considering the ending, or close, imitate their faith.' And M'Lean continues; 'This is the strong argument to imitate their faith; that though they were dead and gone, Jesus Christ in whom these holy men believed, continues still the same to-day as He was then; and shall for ever continue the same all-sufficient Savior, to the end of time.' So, Williams remarks, that the immutability of Christ is thus used, as an argument against vacillation or wavering in opinion. EN.

(3.) 'There is nothing in the argument to bar our understanding the passage, as referring primarily to the Person of Christ; and, in the phraseology, there is a reason, which I think of weight sufficient to be decisive. This is the adoption of the same phrase which, at the commencement of the epistle, had been employed to express the absolute unchangeableness of God; "Thou art the same, &c. Heb. 1:12." J. P. SMITH.—Some understand this of the doctrines of Christ, but others, more justly, so Mackn., Stuart, and Schulz, of the nature of Christ; and Bloomf. agrees with Stude, that the words are to be referred both to the preceding and following vs. and to be understood of the nature and object of the Hebrews' faith, as well as of the doctrines of their religion. EN.

9 Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines: for it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein.

10 We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.

11 For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp.

12 Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.

13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach:

14 For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come.

15 By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name.

16 But to do good, and to communicate, forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.

17 Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account; that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you.

Now this duty of following the same true faith the apostle enlarges much upon, and presses earnestly, from several motives:

[1.] From the immutability and eternity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Though their ministers were some dead, others dying, yet the great Head and High Priest of the church, the Bishop of their souls, ever lives, and is ever the same, in the Old Testament day, in the Gospel day, and for ever.

[2.] From the nature and tendency of those erroneous doctrines, they were in danger of falling in with, divers and various, v. 9. different from what they had received from their former faithful teachers, and in-

V. 12, 13. 'Hereby, Paul offers a most convincing proof to the Jews, that they must abandon their old ritual, and adopt a system that has changed the law of the priesthood, before they can have any claim to eat of our altar or sacrifice. It is as if he had said, "If you would have any claim to participate with us of the peculiar privileges of the Gospel, all resulting from the sufferings of Jesus, you must leave the old Jerusalem; you must go forth unto Him without the camp, bearing his reproach. Without the camp He suffered, and without the camp He must be enjoyed." Pirie, in Williams.—Without the gate.] 'Calvary was then without the walls of the city, although it is now within them.' Sr.

V. 15, 16. (15) Fruit of our lips.] Hos. 14:2. Sept. Our version, from the Heb. reads calves of the lips; but the omission of one letter would render it 'fruit of the lips.'

(15.) Praise . . . continually.] 'A man who lives a prayerful life, must be a man of transcendent loveliness and worth. And who knows not that in every age, the best and brightest of men have been those, who approached nearest to these (Enoch, Elijah and other scriptural) illustrious patterns of prayer. At this present time there are persons, of but inferior parts and accomplishments, who, by reason of great prayerfulness, transcend in moral worth professors of high distinction, and splendid gifts. Religionists, however exalted, who are not often with God in prayer, are but little profited by all their privileges, and but little profitable to others by all their intercourse with them; but, contrariwise, being persons of prayer by character, and not in fact, are stumbling-blocks to many; and are the principal causes of this world's incredulity, in regard to the efficacy, and usefulness of prayer.'

Rev. Dr. SKINNER.

V. 16. 'This duty (of benevolent giving) is not enjoined by human authority, but by that of conscience, and of God. Suppose the Lord Jesus should in some special manner come to you, and give you a particular amount of property, and expressly say, "This I commit to you in sacred consistent with themselves; strange doctrines, such as the gospel-church was unacquainted with, of an unsettling, distracting nature; quite contrary to that grace of God that fixes and establishes the heart, which is an excellent thing. These strange doctrines keep the heart always fluctuating and unsettled. They are mean and low as to their subject, about external, little, perishing things, such as meats and drinks, &c. unprofitable; they make none more holy, humble, thankful, or heavenly. They would exclude those who embraced them from the privileges of the Christian altar, v. 10. This is an argument of great weight, and therefore the apostle insists the longer on it. Observe,

The Christian church has its altar. It was objected against the primitive Christians, that their assemblies were destitute of an altar; but that was not true. Christ is both our Altar, and our Sacrifice; He sanctifies the gift. This altar furnishes out a feast for true believers, a feast on the sacrifice, a feast of fat things, 1 Cor. 5:7. and this follows, therefore let us keep the feast. The Lord's supper is the feast of the gospel-passover. Those who adhere to the tabernacle, or the Levitical dispensation, or return to it again, exclude themselves from the privileges of this altar, from the benefits purchased by Christ. He argues thus under the Jewish law; No part of the sin-offering was to be eaten, but all must be burnt without the camp while they dwell in tabernacles, and without the gates when they dwell in cities: now, if they will still be subject to that law, they cannot eat at the gospel-altar; for what is eaten there, is furnished from Christ, who is the great Sin-offering, not the very sin-offering itself, as the papists affirm; for then it was not to be eaten, but burnt; but the gospel-feast is the fruit and procurement of the sacrifice, which they have no right to, who do not acknowledge the sacrifice itself. And that it might appear that Christ was really the Antitype of the sin-offering, and, as such, might sanctify or cleanse his people with his own blood, He conformed Himself to the type, in suffering without the gate. Having thus showed, that adherence to the Levitical law would, even according to its own rules, debar men from the Christian altar; he proceeds to improve this argument, v. 13—15. in suitable advices. Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp; go forth from the ceremonial law, from sin, from the world, from ourselves, our very bodies, when He calls us. Let us be willing to bear His reproach, be willing to be accounted the offscouring of all things, not worthy to live, not worthy to die a common death; and we have the more reason, because, whether we go forth from this world to Christ or no, we must necessarily go forth in a little time by death; for here we have no continuing city; death will not suffer us to continue long here; therefore we should go forth now by faith, and seek in Christ the rest and settlement which this world cannot afford us, v. 14. Let us make a right use of this altar; not only partake of the privileges of it, but discharge the duties of it, as those whom Christ has made priests to attend on it. Let us bring our sacrifices to this altar, and to this our High Priest, and offer them up by Him, v. 15, 16. Now, what are the sacrifices we must bring and offer on this Altar, even Christ? Not any expiatory sacrifices; there is no need of them; Christ has offered the great Sacrifice of atonement; ours are only the sacrifices of acknowledgment; and they are, the sacrifice of praise to God, which we should offer up to God continually; all adoration and prayer, as well as thanksgiving, the fruit of our lips. The sacrifice of almsdeeds, and Christian charity, v. 16. according to our power, not contenting ourselves to offer the sacrifice of our lips, mere words, but the sacrifice of good deeds; and these on this altar, not depending on the merit of them, but of our great High Priest; and with such sacrifices as these, adoration and alms thus offered up, God is well pleased; He will accept the offering with pleasure, and will accept and bless the offerers through Christ.

(2.) Having thus told us the duty Christians owe to their deceased ministers; the apostle tells us what is the duty that people owe to their living ministers, v. 17. and the reasons of that duty: Their duty is to obey them, and submit themselves to them, not implicitly, or absolutely, but only so far as is agreeable to the mind and will of God revealed in his Word. Christians must submit to be instructed by their ministers, and not think themselves too wise, too good, or too great, to learn from them; and when they find that ministerial instructions are agreeable to the written Word, they must obey them. The motives to this duty are,—They have the rule over the people; their office, though not magisterial, is yet truly authoritative; not to lord it over the people, but to lead them in the ways of God, by informing and instructing them, explaining the Word of God to them, and applying it to their several cases. They watch for the souls of the people, not to ensnare them, but to save them; to gain them, not to themselves, but to Christ; to build them up in knowledge, faith, and holiness, and help them forward in the way to heaven. They must give an account how they have discharged their duty, and what is become of the trust,—use it to promote the cause dearest to my heart." Would you not be happy to be the steward of his bounty? Could you have a thought of devoting it to any use but to promote his cause? Now "the silver and the gold are the Lord's," and He has virtually spoken in the manner supposed; He has intrusted you with a portion of his property, and made known his will respecting its use." Rev. Dr. Woods. 'The world contains, it is supposed, 800,000,000 of inhabitants. What an ample field for doing good!' To do good forget not.] 'While it is yet in the power of thy hand.' 'My friend, place thyself in dying circumstances; apprehend and realize thy approaching dissolution; suppose thy last solemn hour arrived; thy breath failing, thy throat rattling, thy hands with a cold sweat upon them: in this condition, "What wouldst thou wish to have done more than thou hast already done for thy own soul, for thy family, or for the people of God?" Think upon this question, and do not forget the result of thy thoughts; do not delay to perform what thou hast resolved upon. How much more profitable would such an exercise be on the Lord's day evening, than those vanities to which that evening is not unfrequently prostituted, and by which all the good of the past day is defeated. — And if such an exercise were often performed, Oh how would it regulate our lives; how watchfully, how faithfully would it cause us to live; what an incredible number of good works would it produce in the world!'

CORON MATHER.

V. 17. This must principally relate to the account given before the Lord, as it were, from day to day, with joy or grief, by ministers, of the reception given to their message: for no misconduct of the people will occasion sorrow to the faithful servants of Christ, at the final day of retribution; though their salvation will be unto them 'a crown of rejoicing.' 2 Cor. 2:14—17. 1 Thes. 2:17—20. The exhortation supposes the faithfulness of ministers and ecclesiastical rulers, and that they exercise a scriptural authority in a proper manner: for no obedience and submission can be due to the usurped dominion of 'idol shepherds,'

18 Pray for us : for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly.

19 But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, 21 Make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ : to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

22 And I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation : for I have written a letter unto you in few words.

23 Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty ; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.

24 Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints. They of Italy salute you.

25 Grace be with you all. Amen.

souls committed to their trust, whether any have been lost through their neglect, and whether any have been brought in and built up under their ministry. They would be glad to give a good account of themselves and their hearers, to give up their account with joy and not with grief. If they give up their account with grief, it will be the people's loss as well as theirs. If faithful ministers be not successful, the grief will be theirs, but the loss the people's. Faithful ministers have delivered their own souls, but a fruitless and faithless people's blood and ruin will be upon their own heads.

PRACT. OBS. V. 9—25. We should be careful not to be 'carried about with divers and strange doctrines,' and diligently seek to have our hearts 'established by grace;' for notions and forms never profit those who are occupied in them. Living by faith in Christ, and being consecrated to God through his blood, let us willingly separate from this evil world, and 'bear the reproach' of proud formalists, and all the enemies of true religion, however distinguished. Our pilgrimage here will soon end; let us then seek an abiding mansion in the city of our God, and consider all temporal prosperity or adversity, as of scarcely any consequence; being of a transient and evanescent nature. 1 Cor. 7:29—31. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 1 Pet. 4:7. All ministers of the Gospel should peculiarly remember, that they are called 'to watch for men's souls, as those who must give account;' which involves the most weighty and unfaithful stewards, or blind guides. To other rulers and superiors, honor is required for their office's sake; but to ministers for their work's sake alone.

V. 18, 19. It is plain, from these verses, that the persons immediately addressed, or to whom in the first instance the epistle was sent, would know from whom it came.—'That I may be quickly restored to you from this confinement, and have an opportunity of rendering you those services, which were prevented by this unjust imprisonment, occasioned by the fury of the populace, when I was last at Jerusalem.' Dodtr. The priests, rulers, and council were more deeply criminal than even 'the populace.'

V. 20, 21. The blood of Christ purchased the blessings of the new covenant, and ratified it as unalterable; so that it was rendered perpetual on earth to the end of time, and everlasting in respect of the salvation conferred according to it.—He prayed for them, under the full persuasion, that sanctifying grace, and holy obedience, would surely be attended with divine consolations, which he did not particularly mention. Id. Stuart renders these vs. thus: 'Now may the God of peace, that raised from the dead our Lord Jesus, (who by the blood of the everlasting covenant has become the great Shepherd of the sheep.) prepare you for every good work, that ye may do his will; working in you, &c.,' and this opens to the sense of the passage as understood by Beza,

V. 18—25. Here,

1. The apostle recommends himself, and his fellow-sufferers, to the prayers of the Heb. believers, v. 18. 'Pray for us; for me and Timothy,' mentioned v. 23. 'and for all those of us who labor in the ministry of the Gospel.' This is one part of the duty which people owe to their ministers,—to pray for them. There are good reasons why people should pray for their ministers; he mentions two: We trust we have a good conscience, &c. v. 18. Many of the Jews had an ill opinion of Paul, because he, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews, had cast off the Levitical law, and preached Christ: now he here modestly asserts his own integrity. Observe, A good conscience has a respect to all God's commands, and all our duty. Those who have this good conscience, yet need the prayers of others. Conscientious ministers are public blessings, and deserve the prayers of the people. Another reason why he desires their prayers is, that he hoped thereby to be the sooner restored to them, v. 19. intimating that he had been formerly among them; and that the best way to facilitate his return to them, and to make it a mercy to him and them, was, to make it a matter of their prayer. We should fetch in all our mercies by prayer.

2. He offers his prayers to God for them, being willing to do for them as he desired they should do for him, v. 20. In this prayer, observe, (1.) The title given to God,—the God of peace, who has found out a way for peace and reconciliation between Himself and sinners, and who loves peace on earth, and especially in his churches. (2.) The great work ascribed to Him; He hath brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, &c. Jesus raised Himself by his own power; and yet the Father was concerned in it, attesting thereby that justice was satisfied, and the law fulfilled. (3.) The titles given to Christ,—our Lord Jesus, our Sovereign, our Savior, and the great Shepherd of the sheep, promised in Isa. 40:11. declared by Himself to be so, John 10:14, 15. Ministers are under-shepherds, Christ is the great Shepherd. (4.) The way and method in which God is reconciled, and Christ raised from the dead, through the blood of the everlasting covenant. The blood of Christ satisfied divine justice, and so procured Christ's release from the prison of the grave, as having paid our debt, according to an eternal covenant or agreement between the Father and the Son; and this blood is the sanction and seal of an everlasting covenant between God and his people. (5.) The mercy prayed for, v. 21. Observe, The perfection of the saints, in every good work, is the great thing desired by them and for them, to fit them for the employment and felicity of heaven. The way in which God makes his people perfect is, by working in them always what is pleasing in his sight, and that through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever. Observe. There is no good thing wrought in us, but it is the work of God; and that through Jesus Christ, for his sake, and by his Spirit. And therefore eternal glory is due to Him, who is the Cause of all the good principles wrought in us, and all the good works done by us. To this every one should say, Amen.

3. He gives the Hebrews an account of Timothy's liberty, and his hopes of seeing them with him in a little time, v. 23. It seems Timothy had been a prisoner, doubtless for the Gospel, but now was set at liberty. The imprisonment of faithful ministers is an honor to them, and their enlargement matter of joy to the people. Opportunities of writing to the churches of Christ are desired by the faithful ministers of Christ, and pleasant to them.

4. Having given a brief account of this his letter, and begged their attention to it, v. 22. he closes with salutations, and a solemn, though short benediction.

The salutation is from himself, directed to all their ministers who had rule over them, and to all the saints; to them all, ministers and people. Also from the Christians in Italy. Religion teaches men the truest civility and good-breeding. It is not a sour or morose thing.

His benediction, though short, is solemn, v. 25. Grace be with you all. Amen. When the people of God have been conversing together by word or writing, it is good to part with prayer, desiring for each other the continuance of the gracious presence of God, that they may meet together again in the world of praise.

awful responsibility; for dreadful will be their condemnation, if they be slothful, selfish, or unfaithful. Christians should also pray fervently and constantly for their ministers; for these would generally walk more honorably, and labor more successfully, if the people were more earnest in praying for them. Even when they see, or think they see, something amiss in those who upon the whole have a good conscience, willing in all things to live honestly; they should pray the more frequently and earnestly for them. Let us approach 'the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep;' and 'through the blood of the everlasting covenant,' let us beseech Him for ourselves and each other, 'to make us perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ;' that we may glorify Him for ever. Amen. SCOTT.

Dodtr., and others, who consider the clause, blood of the everlasting covenant, as more properly connecting with the words immediately preceding, namely, great Shepherd of the sheep.

(21.) Working in you. 'There are some animals of which we say, "they know not their own strength." Why should the Christian be like them?' COTTON MATHER.

V. 22—25. The apostle . . . had written a letter to them, in few words, compared with the vast importance, and the great variety, of the subjects discussed in it.—It appears hence, that he was either at liberty, or had a clear prospect of being speedily liberated; and that the spurious postscript falsely says, that Timothy was the bearer of the epistle. When the argumentative part of the epistle had been read, without the prejudices which the writer's name, in the beginning, would have unavoidably excited; these intimations at the close would have no had effect. After this, he concluded with salutations, especially to the pastors and rulers of their churches; and from all the Christians in Italy, as well as those at Rome. (24) Them that have the rule, &c.] 7, 17. Luke 22:26. 7, 8, 17. The pastors of the church are evidently thus distinguished from the people; but it must be allowed, that no disparity among the pastors is intimated. The apostle James was probably living at this time; and was the principal, though not the only person intended. Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22. [Note, 1 Pet. 5:2.] SCOTT.

Extracts from the very interesting 'Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches,' by Rev. Dr. SCHMUCKER, have already been inserted in this Comm. The object is truly great, evangelical, and vitally important to human welfare. Feeling this, in no slight degree, the Editor inserts an outline of the worthy Professor's 'Plan for Catholic Union on Apostolic Principles,' appended to his Appeal, and reviewed in the Am. Bibl. Repos.; intermingling such remarks or references as seem necessary.

'Whoever,' says that eminent servant of Christ, and highly endowed writer, the late ROBERT HALL, 'forms his ideas of the church of Christ from perusing the New Test. will perceive, that unity is one of its essential characteristics; and that, though it be branched out into many distinct societies, it is still but one. Nothing more abhorrent from the principles and maxims of the sacred oracles can be conceived, than the idea of a plurality of true churches, neither in actual communion with each other, nor in a capacity for such communion. Though this rending of the seamless garment of our Savior, this schism in the members of his mystical body, is by far the greatest calamity which has befallen the Christian interest, and one of the most fatal effects of the great apostasy foretold by the sacred penmen, we have been so long familiarized to it as to be scarcely sensible of its enormity; nor does it excite surprise or concern in any degree proportioned to what would be felt by one who had contemplated the church in the first ages. Christian societies regarding each other with the jealousies of rival empires, each aiming to raise itself on the ruin of all others, making extravagant boasts of superior purity, generally in exact proportion to their departures from it, and scarcely deigning to acknowledge the possibility of obtaining salvation out of their pale, is the odious and disgusting spectacle which modern Christianity presents. The bond of charity, which unites the genuine followers of Christ in distinction from the world, is dissolved, and the very terms by which it was wont to be denoted, exclusively employed to express a predilection for a sect. The evils which result from this state of division are incalculable: it supplies infidels with their most plausible topics of invective; it hardens the consciences of the irreligious, weakens the hands of the good, impedes the efficacy of prayer, and is probably the principal obstruction to that ample effusion of the Spirit which is essential to the renovation of the world. It is easier, however,' he confesses, 'to deplore the malady than to prescribe the cure: for, however important the preservation of harmony and peace, the interests of truth and holiness are still more so; nor must we forget the order in which the graces of the Spirit are arranged. "The wisdom which is from above is first pure, then peaceable." Peace should be anxiously sought, but always in subordination to purity; and therefore every attempt to reconcile the differences among Christians which involves the sacrifice of truth, or the least deliberate deviation from the revealed will of Christ, is spurious in its origin, and dangerous in its tendency. If communion with a Christian society cannot be had without a compliance with rites and usages which we deem idolatrous or superstitious, or without a surrender of that liberty in which we are commanded to stand fast, we must, as we value our allegiance, forego, however reluctantly, the advantages of such a union.'

Fully in the spirit of these observations, Dr. S. remarks, that 'the separation of the Protestants from the Papal hierarchy, was an insuperable duty; for Rome had poisoned the fountains of truth by her corruptions, and death, or a refusal to drink from her cup, was the only alternative: but that the Protestants them-selves should afterwards break communion with their professed brethren was inconsistent, although the result of many conspiring causes, with the practice of the apostolic church, as well as detrimental to the Christian cause.' Reviewing, then, the growth of the leading Protestant organizations, the Lutheran, German Reformed, Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational or Independent, Moravian, and Methodist denominations, and alluding to 'others, of minor extent, whose principles coincide more or less with these,' he observes, 'All these together constitute the Protestant church, and are the great mass of the viable church of the Redeemer, engaged in promoting his mediatorial reign on earth, and owned by his Spirit's blessing.'

The subject is divided into, I. The causes of sectarian strife between these branches: and II. A remedy for the evils which result.

I. 'In continental Europe, the sectarian principle is not fully developed, the Lutheran or Reformed church being established by law, though in England, where greater liberty is enjoyed, dissenters are numerous. But in these United States, where Christianity has been divorced from the civil government, and restored to its primitive dependence on its own moral power, all sects are on perfect equality, and the natural tendency of sectarianism is witnessed in its full latitude. The separation between church and state is worthy of all praise, and demands our warmest gratitude to Heaven. It has restored,' he adds, 'the American Protestant church to the original advantages of the golden age of Christianity in the apostolic days. In this land of refuge for oppressed Europe, God has placed his people in circumstances most auspicious for the gradual "perfecting" of his visible kingdom. Here we are enabled, unencumbered with entangling alliances with civil government, to review the past history of the Redeemer's kingdom, trace error in its various forms, witness effects of different measures, and, by a species of experimental eclecticism, rejecting everything injurious, to combine all that has proved advantageous, and incorporate it in the structure and relations of the Protestant church. Has not God, then, by our peculiar situation, called us to such a work? Among the causes of this strife, are, 1. The absence of any visible bond, or indication of union, between the different churches in any city, town, or neighborhood, whilst each of them is connected to other churches elsewhere of their own denomination. 2. The separate organization of the churches on the ground of doctrinal diversity. 3. The use of transfundamental creeds; or those which embody not only the undisputed doctrines of Christianity, but also the sectarian peculiarities of some particular denomination. 4. The sectarian training of the rising generation. 5. Sectarian idolatry; man-worship, or inordinate veneration for distinguished theologians; each sect cultivating, almost exclusively, the literature of its own denomination. 6. Ecclesiastical pride; or undue preference of all that pertains to one's own sect. 7. Conflict of pecuniary interest between neighboring ministers and churches; the success of either being, more or less, at the other's expense.' For the Prof.'s judicious exemplification of each of these causes, however, room cannot be expected in this work.

II. 'Any plan of union, in order to possess a claim to the attention of the different Christian denominations generally, must be based on apostolic principles, [i. e.] be accordant with the spirit and principles of the New Test. or deducible from them; leaving untouched the unalienable rights and obligations of Christians: therefore, 1. It must require of no one the renunciation of any doctrine or opinion believed by him to be scriptural or true. 2. It must concede to each denomination, or branch of the church of Christ, the right to retain its own organization, or to alter or amend it at option, leaving everything relative to government, discipline, and worship, to be managed by each denomination according to its own views. 3. It must dissuade no one from discussing fundamentals and non-fundamentals in the spirit of Christian love. 4. The plan must be applicable to all the orthodox Christian denominations,—all that are regarded as portions of Christ's visible church on earth, whom God has owned by the influences of his Spirit and grace. Now,

'Some few advocates of union have proposed, that all others should abandon their own peculiarities, and conform to them in practice and views. But this violates Christian right and obligation, by requiring the abandonment of what is believed to be truth; and no sect, at this late day, can expect all others so to adopt its peculiarities. It has also been proposed, that each denomination renounce its standards of doctrine, government, and worship, and then unite in one new, short confession, embracing only the doctrines held in common by all, and establishing such a system of government, as all could conscientiously adopt; whilst entire liberty and privilege of diversity should be enjoyed by all on every point not determined by the new standards.' But there seem difficulties, which are stated: and the Professor exhibits his own Plan, having the following features:

1. Let the several Christian denominations retain each its own present ecclesiastical organization, government, discipline, and mode of worship. 2. Let each of the confederated denominations formally resolve, for itself, not to discipline any member or minister, for holding a doctrine believed by any other denomination whose Christian character it acknowledges; provided his department be unexceptionable, and he conform to the rules of government, discipline, and worship adopted by said denomination: for, all doctrines, which the great body of all Christians whom God has owned by his grace and Spirit, and who have free access to the Scriptures, agree in finding in them, are certainly taught there; and all those points on which they differ, are less certain, are doubtful. 3. Let a creed be adopted including only the doctrines held in common by all the orthodox Christian denominations, to be termed the Apostolic, Protestant Confession, and let this same creed be used by all denominations as the term of sacramental, ecclesiastical, and ministerial communion. This creed should embrace, (1.) The so-called Apostles' Creed, embraced now by four fifths of the Protestant church: (2.) A selection of those articles from the creeds of the prominent Protestant churches, in which all can agree, taking but one article on each subject, and styling it the United Protestant Confession. Such a creed would [1.] Keep heretics out of the church: [2.] Give prominence to the great, acknowledged truths of Christianity. 4. There should be free sacramental, ecclesiastical, and ministerial communion among the confederated churches.' [Dr. S. explains the last of these as implying, 'that a certificate of good standing in the ministry of one church, ought,' other things being unexceptionable, 'to be a passport for admission to the ministerial ranks of any other church: by the second, 'that a certificate of good standing in any one church should be a certain passport for admission to regular membership in any other; but, concerning the first he observes, that 'free sacramental communion may be said already to exist among the churches.' How such an assertion could be made, by one whose views and information are so extensive, it is difficult to conceive. Has not the celebrated Treatise of that vigorous iconoclast, Robert Hall, attracted his notice? And can it be said, that free sacramental communion is enjoyed, when a denomination of more than half a million of souls, within the pale of the Protestant church, systematically withholds it? On this point, the Ed., deep as are his feelings, could hardly wish to employ stronger language than Mr. Hall has used,—although he is compelled to dissent from him, as would Dr. Schmuncker, (see above,) in his views on the method of producing the communion he aims at, by holding baptism as not pre-requisite. Rather would the Editor place it on the base of conscientious conviction of Christian obligation, which ought to be inviolate, as stated in the first article of the Plan of Dr. S. And it well deserves serious and prayerful inquiry, whether it be not using the Table of the Lord with irreverence, to constitute it the mere badge of a denomination or party; to make the admission to it of any such as are his acknowledged children depend on their compliance with sectarian peculiarity in the mode of administering an ordinance, to which, nevertheless, such attention has been paid as satisfies conscience. The refusal, in such case, the Ed. cannot but regard, as a rejection of Christ, in rejecting his acknowledged friends, and as the boldest assumption at this day chargeable on persons and churches of admitted orthodoxy and piety. He grieves to utter, but cannot, in Christian fidelity, withhold the remark. 'To the advocates of strict communion,' says Dr. POND, 'I will venture to suggest a way in which the difficulties between us may be consistently got over. Let them cease to judge another man's servant, and leave him to stand or fall to his own Master. We who differ from them on the subject of baptism, are not conscious of neglecting or trifling with the ordinance more than they; but observe it conscientiously, according, as we think, to the institution and will of Christ.' See Treat. on 'Christian Baptism,' 1833, p. 165.]

'5. In all matters not relating to the government, discipline, and forms of worship of individual churches, but pertaining to the common cause of Christianity, let the principle of co-operation, regardless of sect, be adopted as far as the nature of the case will admit, and as far as the views of the parties will allow. 6. The Bible should, as much as possible, be made the text-book in all religious and theological instruction. 7. Missionaries ought to use and profess no other than this Apostolic Protestant Confession, and connect it with whatever form of church-government and mode of worship they prefer.' He adds:

'For the sake of our bleeding Savior, our divisions ought not to be carried to heathen lands. The Protestant churches amount to but 60 millions out of 700, the probable population of the globe, and ought not to spread the Corinthian contagion of sectarianism over the Gentile world. Into the same district of country no two sects should send, to produce collision. In view of the divisions sectarianism has entailed on the heritage of God, let the disciples of Christ, instructed by the experience of 300 years of discord in the household of faith, settle some plan for preserving the unity of the church, as her triumphs extend to heathen countries. The signs of the times call us to this duty in the providence of God, [and the intellect of the Christian church should no longer be expended in internal contentions, but all her energies be directed to THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD.] See the article, Creed, &c., Am. Bibl. Repos. No. for April, 1833.

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES,

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Dr. S. Wright.)

THE writer of this epistle was not James the son of Zebedee: for he was put to death by Herod, (Acts 12.) before Christianity had gained so much ground among the Jews of the dispersion as is here implied. But it was the other James, the son of Alphaeus; who was cousin-german to Christ, and one of the twelve apostles, Mat. 10:3. He is called a pillar, Gal. 2:9. and this epistle of his cannot be disputed, without loosening a foundation-stone.

It is called a general epistle, because (so some) [see Guide, in Suppl.] not directed to any particular person or church, but, as we say, a circular letter: or, as others, to distinguish it from the epistles of Ignatius, Barnabas, Polycarp, and others, noted in the primitive times, but not generally received in the church, and on that account not canonical, as this is. Eusebius tells us, that this epistle was generally read in the churches with the other catholic epistles. Hist. Eccles. page 53. Ed. Val. 1678. James was called the just, for his great piety. He was an eminent example of those graces which he presses on others. He was so exceedingly revered for his justice, temperance, and devotion, that Josephus records it as one of the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem, 'That James was martyred in it.' This is mentioned in hopes of procuring the greater regard to what is penned by so holy and excellent a man.

The time of this epistle is uncertain. Its design is, to reprove Christians for their great degeneracy, both in faith and manners; and to prevent the spreading of those libertine doctrines, which threatened the destruction of all practical godliness: also, a special intention was, to awaken the Jewish nation to a sense of the greatness and nearness of the judgments coming on them; and to support all true Christians in their duty, under calamities and persecutions. Its truths are very momentous, and necessary to be maintained; and its rules for practice are for our times, as well as preceding ages. HENRY.

It is recorded in ecclesiastical history, and 'the Acts of the Apostles' confirm the fact, that James generally resided at Jerusalem, superintending the concerns of the churches in that city, and in the neighboring places, to the end of his life; which was terminated by martyrdom, the circumstances of which are differently related.—He seems to have written this epistle, only a short time before his death; and it is supposed by some, that the sharp rebukes and awful warnings, given in it to his countrymen, stirred up that persecuting rage, which terminated his life: but, indeed, it is peculiarly wonderful, that he should have been preserved so many years, in so perilous a situation; and it can be accounted for, only by ascribing it to the Lord's immediate protection. The epistle is styled general, or catholic, because addressed to the Jewish converts generally, throughout their dispersions; indeed, with most evident reference also to the unconverted part of the nation. This title, however, is not coeval with the epistle; but was prefixed to it some ages after it was written; and to the subsequent epistles, in several instances, with manifest impropriety. The apostle, by means of the elders and Christians at Jerusalem, probably circulated copies of this epistle, by those strangers who came to the sacred festivals, from the several cities and countries where the Jews resided, and especially where Jewish converts to Christianity were found: and, as it was exclusively addressed to his countrymen, it seems for a long season to have been little known among the Gentile converts; so that its authenticity was doubted for a considerable time.*—It is generally known, that Luther, in the earlier part of the Reformation, spoke rather in a slighting manner of this epistle, groundlessly supposing that it contradicted Paul's doctrine, in the grand subject of justification: but deeper experience, more exact investigation, more extensive observation, and a maturer judgment, induced him to retract his opinion: and at present no further doubt seems to be entertained, among orthodox Christians, as to its divine inspiration and authority. It is not, however, so replete with the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, as Paul's epistles are in general; or, indeed, as the other apostolical epistles: for it is supposed to have been written with a special design of counteracting the false teachers, who, in different ways, perverted those doctrines, and wrested them to their own destruction, and that of other men. But the grand principles of Christianity are throughout taken for granted, and it will be found, on attentive consideration, entirely coincident with even Paul's doctrine, concerning grace and justification; though, at the first glance, it may appear discordant: and it abounds with most important exhortations to the patience of hope, and the obedience of faith and love; with which various very needful warnings, reproofs, and encouragements, are interspersed, according to the different characters of the persons addressed in it. SCOTT.

This epistle (like 2 Pet. and 2 and 3 John) was not at first received as canonical. But, after a severe scrutiny (attesting the great caution of the primitive church in receiving any books into the canon), all doubts respecting its genuineness being soon removed, it was admitted into the sacred volume, and at so early a period, that it is found in the Peshito-Syriac Version, formed at the beginning of the 2d century, and which does not contain 2 Pet., 2 and 3 John, nor Rev. Indeed, to its reception as an inspired book, there is strong attestation, in two allusions to it in Clement of Rome, and seven in Hermas' Pastor. . . The epistle ranks among the most instructive and edifying of the N. T.

'As to its manner and style, there is deep earnestness, true pathos, grandeur of thought, and beauty, nay, splendor of imagery; there is a singular vivacity of thought, and terseness of expression, (see Col. 4:6.) yet united with unaffected simplicity; there is an oratorical, not rhetorical deinotēs in the reproofs, yet united with true Christian meekness; there is, besides, much sound wisdom, evinced in the counsels here given; but that is (to use the apostle's own expression) the "meekness of wisdom," (the mitis sapientia of Horace,) the "wisdom that is from above, which is first pure, and then peaceable and gentle." BLOOMFIELD.

* 'While 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Rev., are omitted in the first Syriac tr. of the N. T., made in the beginning of the 2d cent., for the use of converted Jews, this epistle of James hath found a place therein.—This is an argument of great weight; for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles to whom it was not sent; and who perhaps had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written.' Mackn. — 'It is cited by Clemens Romanus four several times, and by Ignatius, in his genuine epistle to the Ephesians; by Origen, in his 13th homily on Genesis. Eusebius saith, It was known to most, and publicly read in most Christian churches; Jerome, That in process of time it obtained authority. Eusebius notes, That they who before doubted of it, in the fourth century embraced the opinion of them who received it; and from thence no church, no ecclesiastical writer, is found who ever doubted of it. But, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of the Holy Scripture, published by general and provincial councils, Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, number it among the canonical scriptures.' Whitby. — 'It appears to me, that the authority of this, and some other parts of the N. T., having been early questioned by some primitive churches, affords an argument of their peculiar caution, that no other writings should be admitted into the sacred canon, however excellent, besides those which had an undoubted claim to that distinction; and justly challenges our deference to their judgment, who doubtless were most capable of deciding, and gave sufficient evidence of their care, as well as their ca-capacity. The epistle before us, having passed through a severe and accurate scrutiny, appears to have been universally received; and accordingly has been transmitted down to the present age, as an authentic part of the oracles of God.' Doddr. SCOTT.

The apostle, (ch. 1.) after the inscription and salutation, encourages believers to bear their trials cheerfully and patiently; to maintain good thoughts of God, and charge themselves with all sinful effects of their temptations; to keep watch over their turbulent passions, receive God's Word with meekness, and put it in practice. In ch. 2. he cautions against partial and undue respect to the rich, and treating the poor with contempt and neglect, feigning pity for them; illustrates the insignificance of profession of faith in Christ for justification, without proof of sincerity by good works, and confirms it by the obedience of Abraham and Rahab. Ch. 3. guards against reviling, censorious, imperious language; shows the mischief of the tongue, and the inconsistency of indulging it with the Christian temper and profession, and with heavenly wisdom. Ch. 4. reproves them for a litigious, proud, worldly, envious spirit, marring and defeating their prayers, and contrary to God and his law, and for their disregard to Providence, in secular affairs. Ch. 5. denounces God's approaching judgments against those unbelieving Jews, who heaped up unrighteous gains; exhorts Christian converts to wait patiently for deliverance from their enemies, who should soon fall, and for better blessings in heaven; to envy none; to avoid swearing; to live as Christians in prosperity and adversity, acknowledge their faults to, and pray for, each other, and seek to convert sinners to the truth and holiness of the Gospel. ## CHAP. I.

CHAP. I. V. 1-12. This inscription has three principal parts:

1. The character by which our author desires to be known,—James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was a prime minister in Christ's kingdom, yet he styles himself only a servant. Further, though called by the evangelist the brother of our Lord, yet it was his glory to serve Christ, rather than to boast of being akin, according to the flesh. Hence let us learn to prize this title above all others in the world,—the servants of God and of Christ. Again, James professes himself a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to teach us, that in all services we should have an eye to the Son as well as the Father, John 5:23. looking for acceptance in Christ, and assistance from Him, and yielding all obedience to Him; thus confessing that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

2. The conditions of those to whom he writes,—the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad. Some understand this of the dispersion on the persecution of Stephen, Acts 8. But that only reached to Judea and Samaria. Others understand it of the Jews dispersed in Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, and other kingdoms into which their wars had driven them. The greatest part indeed of ten of the twelve tribes were lost in captivity; yet some of every tribe were preserved, and are still honored with the ancient style of twelve tribes. These however were scattered and dispersed, even good people among them sharing in the common calamity. These Jews of the dispersion were those who had embraced the Christian faith. Note here, It is often the lot even of God's own tribes to be scattered abroad. The gathering day is reserved for the end of time. God has a particular care of his outcasts, Is. 16:3, 4. Eze. 11:16. We should not then value ourselves too much on outward privileges, nor despond, and think ourselves rejected, under outward calamities.

3. James here shows the respect he had even for the dispersed, greeting, saluting them, wishing peace and salvation to them.

We next come to consider the matter of this epistle. Observe,

I. The suffering state of Christians in this world, represented in a very instructive manner. 1. It is implied, that troubles and afflictions may be the lot of the best Christians, even of those who have the most reason to think and hope well of themselves. 2. These outward afflictions and troubles are temptations to them. The devil endeavors by sufferings and crosses to draw men to sin, and to deter them from duty, or unfit them for it; but as our afflictions are in God's hand, they are intended for the trial and improvement of our graces. 3. We must be armed on every side, because numerous and various temptations lie on all sides. 4. The trials of a good man are such as he does not create to himself, or sinfully pull on himself; but such as he is said to fall into; for this reason they are the better borne by him.

II. The graces and duties of a state of trial and affliction are here pointed out to us. Could we attend to these things, and grow in them as we should do, how good would it be for us to be afflicted!

1. One Christian grace to be exercised, is joy; Count it all joy, v. 2. We must not sink into a sad and disconsolate frame of mind, that would make us faint under our trials; but must endeavor to keep our spirits dilated, enlarged, and full of hope, the better to take in a true sense of our case, and with greater advantage to set ourselves to make the best of it. Philosophy may instruct men to be calm under their troubles; but Christianity teaches them to be joyful; because such exercises proceed from love, and not fury in God. In them we are conformable to Christ our Head, and they become marks of our adoption; by suffering in the ways of righteousness, we are serving the interests of our Lord's kingdom among men, and edifying the body of Christ; and our trials will brighten our graces now, and our crown at last. And this is not purely a New Testament paradox, but even in Job's time it was said, Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth. There is the more reason for joy in afflictions, if we consider the other graces that are promoted by them.

2. Faith is a grace that one expression supposes, and another expressly requires, v. 3. There must be a sound believing of the great truths of Christianity, and a resolute cleaving to them, in times of trial. That faith which is spoken of here as tried by afflictions, consists in a belief of the power and promise of God, and in fidelity and constancy to the Lord Jesus.

3. There must be patience; The trial of faith worketh patience. Trying of one grace produces another; and the more the suffering graces of a Christian are exercised, the stronger they grow, Rom. 5:3. Christian patience is not a stupid, but an active thing. A stoical apathy and a Christian patience are very different; by the one men become, in some measure, insensible of their afflictions; but by the other, triumphant in and over them. Let us take care, in times of trial, that, whatever is said or done, patience have the saying and doing of it; give it leave to work, and it will work wonders, in a time of trouble. We must let it have its NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1. Probably, the apostolical authority of James was not disputed, among those whom he more immediately addressed, so that he waived the mention of it, and only styled himself 'the servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' (M. R. b.)—He is said to have been the first bishop of that church [Jerusalem]. This indeed is spoken inaccurately, for he certainly possessed far more than episcopal authority, however that may be defined; and surely it could be no preferment to an apostle, to be appointed a diocesan bishop!—[Greeting.] James, who probably drew up the epistle of the council at Jerusalem, to the Gentile converts, there uses the same word. Acts 15:22-29. SCOTT.

(1.) Dispersion.] 'There were properly two: the Eastern (beyond the Euphrates), and the Western, commencing in the time of Alexander. This increased so much, that, in the apostle's age, all the commercial and manufacturing cities of Syria, Egypt, and other parts of the sea-coast of Africa, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and Spain, were full of them. And they cultivated the use of the Greek tongue, as if it were a vernacular one, because it was indispensably necessary to the commercial transactions by which they almost invariably lived.' V. 2-4. Knowing the afflicted and persecuted condition, in which his brethren were, the apostle exhorted them to 'count it' altogether a cause of rejoicing, if the Lord saw good, that, notwithstanding their watchfulness, they should fall into such 'trials,' as might expose them to temptation, and give them an opportunity of resisting and overcoming it; they ought to consider it as a matter of unmingled joy, an occasion of evidencing the sincerity and strength of their love to God, and as a rich advantage to their souls, though painful for the time. Mat. 5:10-12. Lu. 6:21-23. 1 Pet. 1:6, 7. 4:12-16.—2) Temptations.] Mat. 6:13. 26:41. Lu. 22:28. 1 Cor. 10:13. Gal. 4:14. Heb. 3:8. 1 Pet. 1:6. Some persons lay considerable stress on the distinction between temptations and trials; but the original word is the same as that in the Lord's prayer, which is rendered 'temptation.' Indeed, every trial is, or gives occasion to, temptation; and every temptation is a trial of our hearts, and tends to show whether divine grace or corrupt nature has, at that time, the ascendancy. 12-15. Gen. 22:1. The apostle, however, no doubt, especially referred to the persecutions, for the sake of their Lord, to which Christians were then peculiarly exposed.—(3) The trying.] 1 Pet. 1:7. (2.) All joy.] 'Nought but joy, i. e., a matter of entire rejoicing. So we say, it is "all for the best." BL.—'The Lord does not prevent you from doing evil things, and from being wicked, if you choose to, because He wishes you to choose freely to be good.' It is with temptations as with poisons in the natural world, which in sickness operate as medi- cines. You are, for instance, on some provocation, 'disposed to be angry, or revengeful; this is soul-sickness; and if you do this wickedness much and often, and persist in it, and love it, and do not repent of it, it will make your soul die; now this very provocation which has happened may supply a remedy. For if you recollect, that it is sinful to be angry, and if you stop, and put a restraint on yourself, and speak mildly and feel kindly [to the aggressor], you have cured your sickness; and what is more, you will never be so apt to have that soul-sickness again. Every time you check and prevent your own anger, it will be easier for you to check it the next time; and it will be more difficult for anything that happens to make you angry; and thus you will be far happier.—Just the same is true of every sinfulness, and of every trouble which comes upon us; and this, whether it is brought upon us by another's wicked act or not.—It is to get rid of sinfulness, and of the disposition to sin, that we live in this world. And it is to help us to get rid of them that troubles come to us. You may be always perfectly sure that the Lord will never permit, and that He never does permit, any trouble whatever, great or small, or of any kind, to come upon us, in any way whatever, unless He knows that the trouble which He permits may be used by us as a medicine for the soul. I. e. unless He sees in us some inclination to sin, and unless He sees, that the trouble He permits may be so used by us as to check that inclination, and get rid of that sin, or confirm us in some good. . . Generally, when you take medicine, you do not know how it is to help you; but you think they know who gave it to you, and you take it, trusting that it will relieve your pain and make you better. Just so it will often happen, that you are not able to see why any affliction has come to you, or what good it can do to you. But you can know, in the first place, that it may do some good, or it would not be permitted. And you may know, in the next place, that if you try and endeavor to be patient, and to be calm, and to have a belief in the Lord's goodness, and to wish that his will may be done, then it is certain that this endeavor will do you good, and will be useful to you for ever.' Sunday Lessons for Children. So did the Greeks. See Potter. Ed.—'If some Christians are more eminent than others, it is simply because they make more efforts to be so. So that all worldly minded and indifferent Christians continue in this state because they do not choose to make efforts to get out. ANY PERSON MAY BE AN EMINENT SAINT WHO CHOOSES TO BE SO. Christians are too apt to feel, as if eminence in piety was a distinction made by the sovereignty of God, and to suppose that high attainments are not within the reach of all, and that languid and inefficient piety is the result of divine sovereignty, rather than of negligence and sloth.' BEECHER.

6 But <sup>i</sup> let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth, is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed.

7 For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

8 A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways.

9 Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted :

10 But the rich, in that he is made low : because as the flower of the grass <sup>k</sup> he shall pass away.

perfect work. 'Do nothing to limit it, or to weaken it; if one affliction come on the heels of another, and a train of them, yet let patience go on till its work is perfected.' When the work of patience is complete, it will furnish us with all that is necessary for our Christian race and warfare, and enable us to persevere to the end, and then its work will be ended, and crowned with glory. After we have abounded in other graces, we have need of patience, Heb. 10:36.

4. Prayer is a duty recommended also to suffering Christians; and here the apostle shows, (1.) What we ought more especially to pray for,—wisdom; If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God. We should not pray so much for the removal of an affliction, as for wisdom to make a right use of it. To be wise in trying times is a special gift of God, and to Him we must seek for it. (2.) In what way this is to be obtained,—on our petitioning or asking for it. Let the foolish become beggars at the throne of grace, and they are in a fair way to be wise. Let us confess our want of wisdom to God, and daily ask it of Him. (3.) We have the greatest encouragement to do this, He giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not. Yea, it is expressly promised that it shall be given, v. 5. Here is something in answer to every discouraging turn of the mind, when we go to God, under a sense of our own weakness and folly, to ask for wisdom. He gives to all men. And if you should say you want a great deal of wisdom, a small portion will not serve your turn; recollect, He gives liberally. And, lest you should be afraid of going to Him unseasonably, or being put to shame for your folly; it is added, He upbraideth not. Ask when you will, and as often as you will, you will meet with no upbraidings; it shall be given him. Justly then must fools perish in their foolishness, if wisdom may be had for asking, and they will not pray to God for it. But, (4.) There is one thing necessary to be observed in our asking, namely, that we do it with a believing, steady mind, v. 6. The promise above is very sure, wisdom shall be given to those who ask it of God, provided they believe that God is able to make the simple wise, and is faithful to make good his word to those who apply to Him. Here therefore we see,

5. That oneness, and sincerity of intention, and a steadiness of mind, constitute another duty required under affliction; He that wavereth, is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind, and tossed. To be sometimes lifted up by faith, and then thrown down again by distrust, is very fitly and elegantly compared to a wave of the sea, that rises and falls, swells and sinks, just as the wind tosses it higher or lower, that way or this. A mind that has but one single and prevailing regard to its spiritual and eternal interests, [note, 1 John 5:7, 13. latter part,] and that keeps steady in its purposes for God, will grow wise by afflictions, will continue fervent in its devotions, and will be superior to all trials and oppositions. Now, for the cure of a wavering spirit and a weak faith, the apostle shows the ill effects of these; (1.) In that the success of prayer is spoiled hereby, v. 7. Such a distrustful, shifting, unsettled person is not likely to value a favor from God as he should do, and therefore cannot expect to receive it. (2.) A wavering faith and spirit has an ill influence on our conversation, v. 8. When our faith and spirits rise and fall with second causes, there will be great unsteadiness in all our conversation, [ends, interests,] and actions; and he that is unstable as water, shall not excel. Hereupon,

III. The holy, humble temper of a Christian, both in advancement and debasement, is described; and both poor and rich are directed on what grounds to build their joy and comfort, v. 9—11.

Here observe, 1. Those of low degree are to be looked upon as brethren; Let the brother of low degree, &c.

2. Good Christians may be rich in the world, v. 10. Grace and wealth are not wholly inconsistent. Abraham, the father of the faithful, was rich in silver and gold.

3. Both are allowed to rejoice. No condition of life puts us out of a capacity of rejoicing in God. If we do not rejoice in Him always, it is our own fault. Those of low degree may rejoice, if they are exalted to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of God, (so Whitby,) and the rich may rejoice in humbling providences, as they produce a lowly and humble disposition of mind, which is highly valuable in the sight of God. Where any are made poor for righteousness' sake, their very poverty is their exaltation. It is an honor to be dishonored for the sake of Christ.

4. What reason rich people have, notwithstanding their riches, to be humble and low in their own eyes; because both they and their riches are passing away, v. 11. Note, hence, Worldly wealth is a withering thing. Riches are too uncertain (says Baxter, on this place), too inconsiderable things, to make any great or just alteration in our minds. For this reason, let him that is rich rejoice, not so much in the providence of God, that makes him rich, as in the grace of God, that makes and keeps him humble; and in those trials and exercises that teach him to seek his felicity in and from God, and not from these perishing enjoyments.

IV. A blessing is pronounced on those who endure their exercises and trials, as here directed, v. 12.

Observe, 1. It is not the man who suffers only, who is blessed, but he who endures; who, with patience and constancy, goes through all difficulties in the way of his duty. 2. Afflictions cannot make us miserable, if it be not our own fault. A blessing may arise from them, and we may be blessed in them. 3. Sufferings and temptations are the way to eternal blessedness; so metals are tried as to their excellency by the fire; Note, hence, To be approved of God is the great aim of a Christian in all his trials; and it will be his blessedness at last, when he shall receive the crown of life. It will be life and bliss, and will last for ever. We only bear the cross for a while, but we shall

V. 5—9. In attempting properly to endure and improve their trials, as well as in a great variety of other matters, many, to whom the apostle wrote, would experience and discover, that they were very deficient in wisdom. When, therefore, any were conscious, that they were not capable of distinguishing truth from error, or of ascertaining the line of conduct which they ought to pursue, they should immediately bring the case before God, and earnestly beseech Him to be their Teacher and Counsellor; by the influences of his Spirit enabling them to understand, remember, and apply the instructions of his holy Word, and to remove all prejudices and carnal passions, which tended to mislead them.—'Let him come to God with firm adherence on Him; a mind resolved, whatsoever comes, to stick fast to God; to use no means of delivering himself, but such as are acceptable to Him; never entertaining a doubt, whether God's ways or his own are to be adhered to, for the obtaining of his ends; making no question of God's power and will to answer his requests, and therefore praying, and depending on Him quietly, for an issue out of all.' Hammond.—'A double-minded man,' whose schemes are divided between God and the world, and who cannot cheerfully and resolutely commit himself, in confidence of divine support, to be led whithersoever Providence shall please, "is unsettled in all his ways." He will perpetually be running into inconsistencies of conduct; and those imperfect and undetermined impressions of religion, which he feels, will serve rather to perplex and torment, than guide and secure him.' Doddr.—Such characters differ widely from weak believers, who constantly expect and seek help from God, and do not allow any doubts of his veracity and faithfulness, though they are harassed with fears, lest there be something in their case, or manner of asking, which should exclude them from the benefit. Their language is, 'Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life?'—(8) Double-minded.] 4:3. Having two souls. The English word generally signifies, deceitful, or insidious; 'a man who secretly aims at one thing, but openly professes another.' This, however, is not the signification of the original, in this place at least. It denotes 'a man of unsettled, and fluctuating sentiments, too solicitous about the present to attain the future, too anxious about the future to secure the present; who, driven hither and thither in his judgment of things, is perpetually shifting the object; who this moment would sacrifice all for eternity, and the next renounce anything for this present life.' Ecumenius, in Campbell.

(5.) 'The most liberal men are apt [and it is common with the niggardly] to make mention of former benefits, to excuse themselves for not bestowing future ones.'

(6.) 'It is implied, that such an one [as Ecum. describes above] will not obtain his request, because he cannot ask with that undoubting faith, indispensable in him who addresses God in prayer.'

V. 9—11. All outward splendor and distinction must soon pass away, as the gaudy flowers, which grow among the grass, are withered by the scorching sun. . . . Thus rich men flourish only to be cut down; they grow but to wither, and their transient distinctions terminate in deeper misery and disgrace, if they proceed 'in their ways' of avarice, luxury, pride, selfishness, or ungodliness: and are not made low, by repentance, faith, self-denial, crucifixion to the world, and submission to the righteousness and authority of God. Mat. 19:23—26. Lu. 1:46—55. 6:24—26. 12:15—21. 16:19—26. 1 Pet. 1:23—25. This is an obvious and apposite interpretation. But to render the passage, (by inserting a word needlessly,) 'Let the rich be ashamed, in that he is brought low,' as some learned men do, wholly destroys the energy and beauty of the contrast; and to explain it exclusively of the rich man, when reduced to poverty for the sake of the Gospel, would imply, that no rich man, however humble, poor in spirit, liberal, and condescending to his poor brethren, could have any ground of rejoicing, or glorying in Christ, and in the hope of glory, unless he voluntarily relinquished, or were forcibly deprived of, his estate and possessions, and so reduced to entire poverty! A doctrine well suited to some orders of papists, but not at all to genuine Christianity. It is proper that some persons should be the Lord's stewards and almoners, in outward things; and if they be made low, as humble, teachable, penitent believers in Christ, and thankful to be thus employed by Him, let them rejoice in this humiliation of heart, under these circumstances, which almost always increase pride and self-exaltation. Mat. 5:3.

(10.) The sun in those countries, as soon as it gets high, say about 10 o'clock, produces the burning heat mentioned; which some needlessly understand of the burning wind, called in Heb. qadm. By grass, dasha, the Hebrews seem to have meant, all kinds of annual plants, (whose succulence exposes them to wilting,) as distinguished from shrubs, and trees, the other two divisions of their botany. 12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man:

14 But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.

15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

wear the crown to eternity. 4. This blessedness, involved in a crown of life, is a promised thing to the righteous sufferer. It is therefore what we may most surely depend on. But let us notice, our future reward comes, not as a debt, but by a gracious promise. 5. Our enduring temptations must be from a principle of love to God and to our Lord Jesus Christ, otherwise we are not interested in this promise; The Lord hath promised to them that love Him. Paul supposes a man may even give his body to be burnt, and yet not be pleasing to God, nor regarded by Him, because of his want of charity, or a prevailing sincere love to God and man, 1 Cor. 13:3. [Notes, 1 Jn. 5:7, 13. Jude v. 10.] 6. The crown of life is promised, not only to great and eminent saints, but to all who love God. Every soul that truly loves God, shall have its trials in this world fully recompensed in that world above, where love is made perfect.

V. 13-18. We are here taught several things.

I. That God is not the author of any man's sin. Whoever may raise persecutions against men, and whatever injustice and sin they may be guilty of in proceeding against them, God is not to be charged with it! And whatever sins good men may themselves be provoked to by their exercises and afflictions, [whether from the spontaneous action of propensities within, or accidents or malice without,] God is not the cause of them. It seems to be here supposed that some professors might fall in the hour of temptation; but, though this should be the case, and though such delinquents should attempt to lay their fault on God; yet the blame of their misconduct must lie entirely on themselves. For,

1. There is nothing in the nature of God, they can lay the blame on; all moral evil is owing to some disorder in the being that is chargeable with it; to a want either of wisdom, or of power, or of decorum and purity in the will. But who can impeach the holy God with the want of these, which are his very essence?

2. There is nothing in the providential dispensations of God, that the blame of any man's sin can be laid on, v. 13. As God cannot be tempted with evil Himself, so neither can He be a tempter of others. He cannot be a promoter of what is repugnant to his nature. The carnal mind is willing to charge its own sins on God; there is something hereditary in this; our first father Adam tells God, The woman Thou gavest me tempted me; thereby, in effect, throwing the blame on God, for giving him the tempter. Let no man speak thus. They who lay the blame of their sins either on their constitution, or on their condition in the world, or pretend they are under a fatal necessity of sinning, wrong God, as if He was the author of sin. Afflictions, as sent by God, are designed to draw out our graces, but not our corruptions.

II. We are taught where the true cause of evil lies, and where the blame ought to be laid, v. 14. neither the devil nor any other person or thing is to be so blamed, as to excuse ourselves; for the true original of evil and temptation is in our own hearts. The combustible matter is in us, though the flame may be blown up by some outward causes. And therefore, if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it, Prov. 9:12.

Observe here, 1. The method of sin in its proceeding. First it draws away, then entices. As holiness consists of two parts,—forsaking what is evil, and cleaving to what is good; so these two things, reversed, are the two parts of sin. The heart is first by corrupt inclinations, or by lusting after, and coveting some sensual or worldly thing, estranged from the life of God, and then by degrees fixed in a course of sin.

2. We may observe hence the power and policy of sin. The word here rendered drawn away, signifies a being forcibly haled or compelled. The word translated enticed, signifies being wheedled and beguiled by allurements, and deceitful representations of things. Great force is done to conscience and to the mind by the power of corruption; and there is great cunning, and deceit, and flattery, in sin, to gain us to its interests.

3. Observe the success of corruption in their hearts, v. 15. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; i. e. Sin being allowed to excite desires in us, it will soon ripen those desires into consent; and then it is said to have conceived. The sin truly exists, though but in embryo. And when it is grown to its full size in the mind, it is then brought forth in actual execution. Stop the beginnings of sin, therefore, or else all the evils it produces must be wholly charged on us.

V. 12. When he is tried.] Having become approved, i. e. having stood the trial.—Silver which by the goldsmith's trial is found good, is called dokimon. Leigh. Rom. 5:4. Scott.

(12.) Crown of life.] Here is an allusion to the crowning of victors in war, or in the games; note, 1 Cor 9: end. After a victory, the general assembled his troops, and, in presence of the whole army, bestowed rewards on those who deserved them. The highest reward was the civic crown, corona civica. (1) Given to him who had saved the life of a citizen, with the inscription ob civem servatum; it was of oak leaves, and, by the appointment of the general, presented by the person who had been saved, to his preserver, whom he ever after respected as a parent. [Comp. 1 Thess. 2:19, 20] Under the emperors it was always bestowed by the prince. The person who received it, wore it at the spectacles, and sat next to the senate. When he entered, the audience rose up, as a mark of respect. The corona vallaris, or castrens (2), was given to him who first mounted the rampart, or entered the camp, of the enemy. It was golden, and given by the general: as also the corona navalis (5), to him who first boarded an enemy's ship; and the corona muralis (4), to him who first scaled the walls in an assault. When an army was freed from a blockade, the soldiers gave to their deliverer, a crown, made of the grass which grew in the place where they had been blocked up; hence called graminea corona obsidionalis (3). This, of all military honors, was esteemed the greatest. Golden crowns were also given to officers and soldiers, who had displayed singular bravery. There were also smaller rewards, as bracelets, necklaces, &c. These presents were conferred by the general, in presence of the army; and such as received them, after being publicly praised, were placed next him. They ever after kept them with great care, and wore them at the spectacles, and on all public occasions. Roman Antiquities. ADAM. Ed.

V. 13-15. The commandments and providential dispensations of [568]

God make trial of men's hearts, and tend to discover what dispositions prevail in them. Where gracious affections are prevalent, through the power of the Holy Spirit, remarkable obedience and fidelity are the consequence of the trial; but when sin and Satan rule within, disobedience must be the effect. Deut. 8:2, 3, 16. 13:1-5. 2 S. 24:1, 2. 1 Chr. 21:1, 2 Chr. 32:30-33. Pr. 17:3. Nothing, therefore, which is sinful, in the heart or conduct, can be ascribed to God, without the same absurdity as it would be, to charge darkness and coldness on the sun. Ec. 4:21. 'For God cannot be tempted with evil;' his absolute perfection and all-sufficiency render it impossible that there should ever be any inducement for Him, in the most minute degree, to deviate from complete and entire justice, truth, wisdom, purity, and goodness; neither 'doth He,' in this sense, 'tempt any man,' by putting evil into his heart, suggesting it to his thoughts, or necessitating the commission of it. He is not the Author of the dross, though his fiery trial detects and exposes it.—But every man is tempted, &c. when inordinate desires draw him out of the line of duty; as the fish is dragged out of the water, when it has been enticed by the delusive morsel, which covered the hook. (Ec. 9:11, 12. 2 Tim. 2:23-26.) So that when 'lust,' or vehement desire after any object which cannot be obtained without sin, 'is conceived' in the heart, through the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of external objects; the purpose of indulgence is admitted and cherished. Thus actual transgression is brought forth, and, when this is completed, 'it bringeth forth death,' as its genuine offspring; and nothing but the mercy and grace of God, through Christ Jesus, can prevent the sinner's final destruction. This may be considered as the scriptural account of the original of moral evil, the natural history of the conception, production, progeny, and consequence of the first sin, and of every sin, except as repentance, through God's mercy in Christ Jesus, prevents the effects of them. Gen. 3:1-6. Josh. 7:20-26. 2 Sam. 11:1-5.—But perhaps the apostle referred to the case of apostates, who, under persecutions, through love of the world, conceived the purpose of renouncing Christianity; which, being deliberately done and persisted in, ended in their final obduracy and destruction.—It is egregious and pernicious trifling, and manifestly absurd, to take occasion from the English word 'lust,' which is often used to mean one particular sensual inclination, when impetuous and ungoverned, to limit the passage merely to sensuality; as if the impetuous and ungoverned desire of power, praise, wealth, or revenge, were not 'lusting,' as much as the sensual inclinations. The original word, indeed, is often used in a good sense; (Luke 22:15. Phil. 1:23.) and simply means a vehement inclination, whatever be the object. (Notes, Rom. 7:7, 8. [and 8: end.] Scott.

(14.) Lust.] Epithumia: his animal part, so Abp. Newcome, to which his rational part can always (with the aid of divine grace, adds Bl.) be superior. Bl.—Note, Rom. 7: end. It means, any inordinacy of desire. Enticed.] 'So, in the Tabula Cebetis, &c. a harlot is represented as laying hold, and dragging off, men to her company. A piscatory metaphor is added; and thus, Plato says, men are caught with pleasure, as fishes with a hook and bait. The embrace with the harlot, lust, conceives sin, this in its turn begets death, which destroys the sinner. Thus lust is mother to sin, sin to death, and the sinner the parent of both. "Evil concupiscence, (says a Jewish writer, in Dr. A. Clarke,) is, at the beginning, like the thread of a spider's web; afterwards it is like a cart-rope." Bl. Ed.

16 Do not err, my beloved brethren.

17 Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

18 Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath :

20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.

4. Observe the final issue of sin ; when finished it bringeth forth death. After sin is brought forth in actual commissions, the finishing of it, as Dr. Manton observes, is its BEING STRENGTHENED BY FREQUENT ACTS, AND SETTLED INTO A HABIT. And when the iniquities of men are thus filled up, death is brought forth. Let sin therefore be repented of, and forsaken, before it be finished. Why will ye die, O house of Israel! Ez. 33:11. God has no pleasure in your death, as He has no hand in your sin ; but both sin and misery are owing to yourselves.

III. We are taught yet further, that while we are the authors and procurers of all sin and misery to ourselves, God is the Father and Fountain of all good, v. 16, 17. We should take particular care not to err in our conceptions of God ; not to wander, i. e. from the Word of God, and the accounts of Him there. The loose opinions of Simon, and the Nicolaitans, (from whom the Gnostics arose afterward,) may, perhaps, be more especially cautioned against ; consult the first book of Irenæus against heresies.

Here observe, 1. God is the Father of lights. The visible light of the sun and the heavenly bodies is from Him. He said, Let there be light, and there was light. Thus God is at once represented as the Creator of the sun, and in some respects compared to it. What the sun is in nature, God is in grace, providence, and glory ; aye, and infinitely more. For,

2. Observe, Every good gift is from Him. As the Father of lights, He gives the light of reason, Job 32:8. He gives also the light of learning ; Solomon's wisdom in the knowledge of nature, in the arts of government, and in all his improvements, is ascribed to God. The light of divine revelation is more immediately from above. The light of faith, purity, and all manner of consolation, is from Him. We must own God as the Author of all the powers and perfections of the creature, and the Giver of all the benefits we have in and by those powers and perfections ; but none of their darkneses, their imperfections, or their ill actions are to be charged on the Father of lights ; from Him proceeds every good and perfect gift, both pertaining to this life, and that which is to come.

3. Observe, As every good gift is from God, so particularly the renovation of our natures, our regeneration, and all the holy, happy consequences of it, must be ascribed to Him, v. 18. Here let us notice, (1.) A true Christian is a creature begotten anew, as different a person from what he was, before the renewing influences of divine grace, as if he were formed over again, and born afresh. (2.) The original of this good work is here declared ; it is of God's own will ; not by our skill or power ; not from any good foreseen in us, or done by us, but purely from the good-will and grace of God. (3.) The means are pointed out ; the Word of truth, i. e. the Gospel ; as Paul expresses it more plainly, 1 Cor. 4:15. This Gospel is indeed a Word of truth ; else it could never produce such real, such lasting, such great and noble effects. And we shall find it a mean of our sanctification, as it is a Word of truth, John 17:17. (4.) The end and design of God's giving renewing grace is here laid down ; that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures ; that we should be God's portion and treasure, and a more peculiar property to Him, as the first-fruits were ; and that we should become holy to the Lord, as the first-fruits were consecrated to Him. Christ is the First-fruits of Christians, Christians are the first-fruits of creatures.

V. 19—27. In this part of the ch. we are required,

1. To restrain the workings of passion. This lesson we should learn under afflictions ; and this we shall learn, if we are indeed begotten again by the Word of truth. For thus the connexion stands,—An angry and hasty spirit is soon provoked to ill things by afflictions ; and errors and ill opinions become prevalent through the workings of our own vile and vain affections ; but the renewing grace of God and the Word of the Gospel teach us to subdue these ; Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath. This may refer,

1. To the Word of truth spoken of in the verse foregoing. And so we may observe, It is our duty rather to hear God's Word, and apply our minds to understand it, than to speak according to our own fancies or the opinions of men, and to run into heat and passion thereupon. 2. To the afflictions and temptations spoken of in the beginning of the ch. And then we may observe, It is our duty rather to hear how God explains his providences, and what He designs by them ; than to say, as David did in his haste, I am cut off ; or as Jonah did in his passion, I do well to be angry. Instead of censuring God under our trials, let us open our ears and hearts to hear what He will say to us. 3. To the disputes and differences that Christians, in those times of trial, were running into among themselves ; and so this part of the ch. may be considered without any connexion with what goes before. Here we may observe that, whenever matters of difference arise among Christians, each side should be willing to hear the other. People are often stiff in their own opinions, because they are not willing to hear what others have to offer against them ; whereas, we should be swift to hear reason and truth on all sides, and be slow to speak anything that should prevent this ; and when we do speak, there should be nothing of wrath ; for a soft answer turneth away wrath. As this epistle is designed to correct a variety of disorders that were among Christians, these words, swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath, may be very well interpreted according to this last explication. And we may further observe from them, that, if men would govern their tongues, they must govern their passions. When Moses' spirit was provoked, he spake unadvisedly with his lips. If we would be slow to speak, we must be slow to wrath.

II. A very good reason is given for the suppression of anger, v. 20. as if the apostle had said, 'Whereas men often pretend zeal for God and his glory, in their heat and passion, let them know that God needs not the passions of any man ; his cause is better served by mildness and meekness than by wrath and fury.' Solomon says, The words of the wise are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools, Eccl. 9:17. Dr. Manton here says, of some assemblies, 'That if we were as swift to hear as we are ready to speak, there would be less of wrath, and more of profit in our meetings. I remember, when a Manichee contested with Augustine, and with importunate clamor cried, Hear me ! hear me ! the father modestly replied, Neither let me hear thee, nor do thou hear me, but let us both hear the apostle.' The worst thing we can bring to a religious controversy, is, anger. This, however it pretends to be raised by a concern for what is just and right, is not to be trusted. Wrath is a human thing, and the wrath of man stands opposed to the righteousness of God. Those who pretend to serve the cause of God hereby, show that they are acquainted neither with God nor his cause. This passion must especially be watched against, when we hear the Word of God. See 1 Pet. 2:1, 2.

V. 16—18. The sun, the great natural light, which He has made, appears to us to have several changes and turnings, whence summer and winter, day and night, succeed each other ; but in fact these appearances arise entirely from our varied situation respecting it.—It should be remembered, that all to whom the apostle wrote, as well as others, had been in themselves 'dead in sin' and 'children of wrath,' and that God, 'of his own will,' had regenerated them by his Spirit, 'through the Word of truth.' John 3:1—8. Eph. 2:1—10. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 1:23—25. 1 John 3:7—10. This He had most graciously done, in order that they might be concerned to his service, as 'a kind of first-fruits of his creatures,' more excellent and valuable than the rest of them, and as an earnest of a vastly larger increase from the Gentile world, in that and future ages, even as the first-fruits, presented to the Lord, were the earnest of the future harvest, and brought a blessing upon it. Lev. 23:5—14. Jer. 2:2, 3. (17) Gift. Phil. 4:15. Rom. 5:16. It is remarkable, that the first clause is a regular hexameter verse in the original, and perhaps is a quotation from some unknown author.

SCOTT. (17.) Father of lights, with whom is no variableness. 'If the passage alludes, as it probably does, to the changes of the heavenly luminaries, the language is full of energy and beauty, as well as truth. We witness the varying aspects and revolutions of the orbs that roll above us, shining from evening to evening in the same triment, but never twice exactly in the same place ; but with the Father of lights, the Creator of these changing planets, there is not so much as the least shadow or resemblance of change. Neither shadow of turning.' For when God is said to repent, it implies no change in his character or purposes. As the parent accommodates his language to the capacity of the child, so God, in condescension to human weakness, speaks of Himself in terms adapted to our conceptions. Hence we read of his hand, arm, and eye. So when He changes his dealings, it is said, He repents ; because, in men, a change of conduct usually proceeds from a change of purpose. The Bible is a plain book ; not a system of metaphysics. When we are told God repents, it implies no mutability ; but merely that He varies his dispensations, according to the character of moral agents ; or, in other words, that He changes his conduct towards changing creatures. (Otherwise He would not be immutable.)

REV. DR. E. PORTER. (18.) 'Bp. Bull thinks, there is a reference to the Pharisees' doctrine of fatal necessity, q. d. because we are faithful and pious, does not happen from any fatal necessity, but the true good pleasure of God through Christ ; nor is it owing to that eukrasia of temperament, which occurs to us from the eutaxia [proper position] of the heavens [or stars] at our nativity ; but to the renewing and regeneration, that new and celestial birth, which the Holy Spirit effects in us through the Gospel.' BL.—'If we could reason better than Locke, Butler, or Edwards,—yea, if we could reason with the powers of an angel, instead of those of a man,—we should never be able to reason a single sinner out of his sins, and persuade him into faith in Christ and love to God. The truths of Holy Scripture, plainly stated and powerfully urged, are those only from which we can look for this effect ; because everything, in this great concern, depends on God's blessing ; and it is his purpose ordinarily to bless only the truths of his own Word.'

III. We are called on to suppress other corrupt affections, as well as rash anger, v. 21. The word here translated filthiness, signifies those lusts which have the greatest turpitude and sensuality in them; and the words rendered superfluity of naughtiness may be understood of the overflowings of malice, or any other spiritual wickednesses. Hereby we are taught, as Christians, to watch against, and lay aside, not only those more gross and fleshly dispositions and affections which denominate a person filthy, but all the disorders of a corrupt heart, which would prejudice it against the Word and ways of God. Observe,

Sin is a defiling thing; abundance of it is in us, and this must be watched against; not only outward sins, and greater abominations, but all sin of thought and affection as well as speech and practice;—all filthiness, everything corrupt and sinful. Observe,

'swift' and prompt 'to hear' further admonitions, instructions, and counsels, from the same source, in a teachable and attentive manner. S.

(22) How many of the disputes which have agitated the world, divided the church, in heart as well as opinion, and even drenched kingdoms in blood, are upon subjects and thoughts beyond the limits of human ken. Would that Christians could learn, that unity of affections is that which makes the church one, and not unity of thoughts, for no two persons' intellectual opinions can be alike, while the endowments, education, &c. of each individual are and must be so diverse. Why then do we reject the light of all human experience, and deny all human progress, by still waging so many wars of words as disgrace our religious periodicals? Bacon, though the 'meanest,' is acknowledged to have been also one of the 'wisest' and 'brightest of mankind,' and to follow his example in philosophising, is thought to be the glory of modern times. Yet he did not, says a discriminating writer, 'meddle with those enigmas, which have puzzled hundreds of generations, and will hundreds more. He said nothing about the grounds of moral obligation, or the freedom of the human will. He had no inclination to employ himself in labors, resembling those of the damned in the Grecian Tartarus,—to spin for ever on the same wheel, round the same pivot,—to gaze for ever after the same deluding clusters,—to pour water for ever into the same bottomless buckets,—to pace for ever to and fro on the same wearisome path, after the same recoiling stone. . . . He troubled himself not at all about Homosonians and Homosonians, Monothelity and Nestorians; though he lived in an age, in which disputes on the most subtle points of divinity excited an intense interest throughout Europe, and nowhere more than in England. He was in power at the time of the Synod of Dort, and must for months have been daily deafened with talk about election, reprobation, and final perseverance. . . . He exhorted his disciples to prosecute researches of a very different description; to consider moral science as a practical science,—a science of which the object was to cure the diseases and perturbations of the mind,—and which could be improved only in a method analogous to that which has improved medicine and surgery. . . . He loved to dwell on the power of the Christian religion to effect much, that the ancient philosophers could only promise. He loved to consider that religion as the bond of charity; the curb of evil passions; the consolation of the wretched; the support of the timid; the hope of the dying. . . . Moral philosophers ought, he said, to set themselves vigorously to work, for the purpose of discovering what are the actual effects produced on the human character, by particular modes of education, by the indulgence of particular habits, by the study of particular books, by society, by emulation, by imitation. Then we might hope to find out what mode of training was most likely to preserve and restore moral health.' Edinb. Rev. July, 1837. Ep.

V. 22—25. In order that 'the Word of truth' might produce these blessed effects, on the souls of those who heard it, they must 'be doers of it, and not hearers only.' For if they were 'only hearers,' however attentive, constant, or teachable they might seem to be, their neglect

From the foregoing parts of this ch., the laying aside of all filthiness, is what a time of temptation and affliction calls for, and is necessary to the avoiding of error, and the right receiving and improving of the Word of truth; for,

IV. We are here fully, though briefly, instructed concerning hearing the Word of God.

1. We are required to prepare ourselves for it, v. 21. to get rid of every corrupt affection, and of every prejudice and prepossession, and to lay aside those sins which pervert the judgment and blind the mind. All the filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, in an especial manner.

2. We are directed how to hear it; we are to receive it; yield ourselves to it, with most submissive, humble, and tractable tempers; this is to receive it with meekness. Being willing to hear of our faults, and taking it not only patiently, but thankfully; desiring also to be moulded and formed by the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel. In all our hearing we should aim at the salvation of our souls. It is the design of the Word of God to make us wise to salvation; and we should come to it, as those who know it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, Rom. 1:16.

3. We are taught what is to be done after hearing, v. 22. Observe here, (1.) Hearing is in order to doing; the most attentive and the most frequent hearing of the Word of God will not avail us, unless we be also doers of it. Therefore the apostle insists much upon it, that we practise what we hear.

'There must be inward practice by meditation, and outward practice in true obedience,' says Mr. Baxter. It is not enough to remember what we hear, be able to repeat it, give testimony to it, commend it, write it, and preserve it; what all this is in order to, and crown the rest, is, that we be doers of the Word. Observe, (2.) Bare hearers are self-deceivers; the original word signifies men's arguing sophistically to themselves; making one part of their work discharge them from the obligation they lie under to another; or persuading themselves, that filling their heads with notions is sufficient, though their hearts be empty of good affections and resolutions, and their lives fruitless of good works. Self-deceit will be found the worst deceit at last.

4. The apostle shows what is the proper use of the Word of God, who do not, and who do make a right use of it, v. 23—25. (1.) The use we are to make of God's Word may be learnt from its being compared to a glass, in which a man may behold his natural face. There are glasses that will flatter people; but that which is truly the Word of God, is no flattering glass. Let the Word of truth be carefully attended to, and it will set before you the corruption of your nature, the disorders of your hearts and lives; it will tell you plainly what you are. Paul describes himself as insensible of the corruption of his nature, till he saw himself in the glass of the law, Rom. 7:9. Thus, when we attend to the Word of God, so as to see ourselves, our true state and condition, to rectify what is amiss, and to form and dress ourselves anew by the glass of God's Word, this is to make a proper use of it. (2.) We have here an account of those who do not use this glass as they ought, v. 2. This is the true description of one who hears the Word of God, and does it not. How many are there, who, when they sit under the Word, are affected with their own sinfulness, misery, and danger, acknowledge the evil of sin, and their need of Christ; but, when their hearing is over, all is forgotten, convictions are lost, good affections are vanished, and pass away like the waters of a land-flood; he straightway forgets; in vain do we hear God's Word, and look into the gospel-glass, if we go away, and forget our spots, instead of washing them off, and forget our remedy, instead of applying to it. This is the case of those who do not hear the Word as they ought. (3.) Those also are described, and pronounced blessed, who hear aright, and who use the glass of God's Word as they should do, v. 25. Observe here, The Gospel is a law of liberty, or, as of practising what they had heard would prove, that the Word was not engrafted in their hearts, and that they were putting a most fatal imposition on themselves, by some specious but delusive and sophistical reasoning; whether custom, curiosity, a love of speculation, or a vain confidence in knowledge without obedience, for salvation, induced them to attend. A man of this description, who heard the Gospel, and did not obey its call to repentance, faith in Christ, and a sober, righteous, and godly life, was like a person, who gave a transient look at 'his natural face,' as reflected from a mirror, without attempting to alter what was unbecoming in his attire or appearance; who would therefore immediately depart, and soon 'forget what manner of man he was;' and the glimpse which he had of himself would have no abiding effect on him. (Notes, Mat. 7:24—27. 13:13, 19. Lu. 6:45—49. 11:27—28.) Thus, the mere hearer might have short-lived convictions of his sinfulness; but, displeased with the view given of his state, heart, and character, in the mirror of the sacred Word, and having no effectual desires of an entire change, he would soon lose sight of his transient discoveries in the company, business, and pleasures of the world, and so remain ignorant of himself, and destitute of transforming grace. But 'whosoever looked,' steadfastly and attentively, into the Word of God, with a real desire of learning from it his true state and character, and the way of acceptance and salvation, and 'continued' with perseverance in this important inquiry; he, 'not being a forgetful hearer,' but one who reduced to practice what he learned from time to time, [Note, Heb. 5:14. and note, 1 Tim. 4:7.] though it cost him much humiliation and self-denial, would be 'blessed in his deed,' or in his doing; the Lord would in this way lead him into the knowledge of his truth and salvation; his obedience would evidence the sincerity of his faith; his sanctification would proportionably advance, as he became acquainted with God and with himself, and his gracious recompense hereafter would succeed his present peace and comfort.—Some, by 'the perfect law of liberty,' suppose the moral law to be intended, in opposition to the ceremonial; and it certainly deserves that title in itself, as perfect obedience to it is perfect liberty, and every deviation from it is slavery, but then it cannot give liberty to us sinners. Others, therefore, suppose the Gospel to be intended, because by it we are set at liberty from condemnation, and the bondage of sin. But divine revelation in general seems to be meant; as every part of it has its use, in bringing the sinner to Christ for salvation, and in directing and encouraging him to walk at liberty, by the Spirit of adoption, according to the holy commandments of God. In the Word of truth, as the law, or rule, of obtaining and enjoying liberty, the true Christian looks, as into a mirror, that he may discover the remaining unholiness of his temper, affections, words, and actions; in order that his soul may be purified from defilement, beautified with salvation, and transformed into the holy image of God, continually more and more. (Marg. Ref.)

(25.) Liberty.] Certainly that person enjoys the highest moral liberty, of which creatures are capable, whose will is identified with

26 If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridled not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

27 Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

d Ps. 34:13. e Is. 1:16, 17. 58:6, 7. f Ro. 12:2.

Mr. Baxter expresses it, of liberation, giving us deliverance from the Jewish law, and from sin and guilt, and wrath and death. Observe again, It is a perfect law; nothing can be added to it. Observe, further, In hearing the Word, we look into this perfect law; we consult it for counsel and direction; we look into it, that from thence we may take our measures; but observe, withal, then only do we look into the law of liberty as we should, when we continue therein, are not forgetful of it, but practise it, as our work and business; set it always before our eyes, and make it the constant rule of our conversation and behavior, and model the temper of our minds by it. Observe once more from this place, They who thus do, and continue in the law and word of God; are, and shall be blessed in their deed; blessed in all their ways, according to the first Psalm, which, some think, James here alludes to. The papists pretend, that here we have a clear text to prove we are blessed for our good deeds; but Dr. Manton, in answer to that pretence, puts the reader on marking the distinctness of scripture-phrase. The apostle does not say, for his deeds, that any man is blessed, but in his deed. This is a way in which we shall certainly find blessedness, but not the cause of it. This blessedness does not lie in knowing, but in doing the will of God, John 13:17. It is not talking, but walking, that will bring us to heaven.

V. The apostle next informs us, how we may distinguish betwixt a vain religion, and that which is pure and approved of God. Here it is plainly and peremptorily declared,

1. What is a vain religion, v. 26. (1.) In a vain religion there is much of show, and affecting to seem religious in the eyes of others. When men are more concerned to seem religious than really to be so, it is a sign that their religion is but vain. Not that religion itself is a vain thing; but it is possible for people to make it a vain thing, if they have only a form of godliness, and not the power. (2.) In a vain religion there is much censuring, reviling, and detracting of others. The not bridling the tongue here, is chiefly meant of not abstaining from these evils of the tongue. The man who has a detracting tongue, cannot have a truly humble, gracious heart. Censuring is a pleasing sin, extremely compliant with nature; and therefore evidences a man's being in a natural state. These sins of the tongue were the great sins of that age in which James wrote; and it is a strong sign of a vain religion, says Dr. Manton, to be carried away with the evil of the times. This has ever been a leading sin with hypocrites, that the more ambitious they have been to seem well themselves, the more free they are in censuring and running down others; and there is such quick intercourse betwixt the tongue and the heart, that the one may be known by the other. On these accounts it is, that the apostle has made an unguarded tongue, an undoubted, certain proof of a vain religion. (3.) In a vain religion a man deceives his own heart, he goes on in such a course of detracting from others, and making himself seem somebody, that at last the vanity of his religion is consummated by the deceiving of his own soul. When once religion comes to be a vain thing, how great is the vanity!

2. It is here plainly and peremptorily declared wherein true religion consists, v. 27. Observe, (1.) It is the glory of religion to be pure and undefiled; not mixed with the inventions of men, nor the corruptions of the world; a holy life and a charitable heart show a true religion. (2.) That religion is pure and undefiled, which is so before God and the Father. That is right, which is so in God's eye, and which chiefly aims at his approbation. (3.) Compassion and charity to the poor and distressed, is a very great and necessary part of true religion; visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction. Visiting is here put for all manner of relief which we are capable of giving to others; and fatherless and widows are here particularly mentioned, because they are generally most apt to be neglected or oppressed; but by them we are to understand all others who are objects of charity; all who are in affliction. It is very remarkable, that if the sum of religion be drawn up in two articles, this is one,—to be charitable, and relieve the afflicted. (4.) An

PRACT. OBS. 'The servants of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ,' must consider themselves, as employed to do good to the chosen tribes of the true Israel, through all their dispersions in this evil world, in every way they are able.—'Divers temptations' we must meet with; and if we fall into them without our own fault, and have only the distress of hearing them, without the guilt of yielding to them; we may deem it a great cause of joy to be thus proved and purified in the furnace, and made meet for future honor and felicity. Heb. 2:16—18. But in every part of our conduct, we shall feel that we 'are deficient in wisdom,' in proportion as we become acquainted with ourselves; nor shall we, if we reverence the Scriptures, seek it in the schools of philosophy, or from the counsels of the wise men of this world; but we shall ask the precious boon of God, and obtain the substance, while others are deceived with an empty shadow. As 'God giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not,' (Mat. 11:20—21.) and has engaged that wisdom shall be given to them, who ask it of Him; did we fully avail ourselves of this privilege, how greatly should we be enriched with divine knowledge; and how prudently should we conduct all our concerns, and avoid every snare and device of our enemies!—The poor believer may well rejoice in being exalted to an interest in Christ, and in the prospect of glory in heaven, though he have all kind of hardships by the way; and the rich have at least equal cause for rejoicing, if God has humbled them before his mercy-seat, though the world despise and hate them on that account; nay, though they should be stripped of their possessions and reduced to poverty for the cause of Christ. But if we be 'Christians indeed,' the Lord has, 'according to his determinate purpose,' and 'the counsel of his own will,' begotten us again with the Word of truth; we should therefore give Him all the glory of this happy change, and consecrate all our faculties to his service, that we may be 'a kind of first-fruits of his creatures,' and blessings to all around us. While we are 'swift to hear' the Word of God, let us take care to be 'doers of it, and not hearers only, lest we deceive our own souls;' for many such are found in the best instructed congregations; who deceive scarcely any but themselves.—Happy would it be for mankind, were they in general as assiduous in seeking this inward, durable, and spiritual adorning, as they are in decorating their poor mortal bodies, that they may appear comely in the eyes of their fellow-worms! SCOTT.

God's, and acts spontaneously as his law requires, being thus a 'law to itself.' Thus the Psalmist says, 'I will walk at liberty, for I keep thy precepts,'—and this one apostle calls 'perfect freedom,' and another, here, a 'law of liberty,' for liberty without law is not predicable of a created being. 'They will be done,' is the Christian's law of liberty. Ep.

V. 26. So necessary was practice, in every particular, to the very existence of real Christianity; that if 'any man,' among professed believers, appeared to be a devout worshipper of God, according to the doctrine and ordinances of the Gospel; and if his conduct in other respects were not reprehensible, yet, in case he habitually neglected to bridle his tongue, and so gave loose to vain, polluting, ostentatious, or improper discourse; especially if he uttered bitter, malicious, slanderous, or reviling words, in an unrestrained manner, under pretence of zeal against such as differed from him; and 'deceived his own heart' by one vain excuse or another, to think this was allowable or consistent with the Christian temper; his religion was thus proved to be vain and worthless, his heart was not right in the sight of God, whilst 'out of the abundance' of it such evil things habitually proceeded; but he was 'in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity.' (Notes, 3:3—12. Ps. 39:1—4. Mat. 12:33—37. Rom. 3:9—18. Eph. 4:29. 5:3, 4. Col. 3:7—11.) This is the general interpretation; and nothing more is supposed to have been intended. Yet men do not bridle horses, merely to restrain them from mischief, or from going in a wrong way; but likewise in order to rule and direct them in the right way; that they may be useful, and not merely inoffensive. Surely, then, the refraining from evil discourse, and not perverting the gift of speech, by which man is distinguished from all other creatures here below, is far from the whole, which is intended by 'bridling the tongue!' Beyond doubt, the proper improvement of that important talent is also meant; the tongue must be held in, and kept from improper discourse, and directed to that conversation, which tends 'to the use of edifying,' and is suited to 'minister grace unto the hearers.' It will perhaps be found, that those who have any regard to God and their duty, offend as frequently by silence when they ought to speak, as by speaking when they should be silent; but sins of omission are generally less regarded than sins of commission. How often do cowardice, indolence, and lukewarmness, make us silent; when holy courage, active zeal, and fervent love, would excite us to attempt 'a word in season,' which God often most eminently blesses. (Notes, Deut. 6:6—9. Ps. 37:29—31. Prov. 10:20, 21. 15:2, 7, 23. 24:26. 25:11—13.) SCOTT.

V. 27. 'Pure religion,' the holy worship and service of God, free from corrupt mixtures, and undefiled by corrupt motives and carnal passions, as exercised in the sight of 'God, even the Father,' with his approbation, by his adopted children in Christ Jesus, essentially consists in disinterested, humble, self-denying love to men, for the Lord's sake, and from love to Him; and in taking pleasure, from these motives, in visiting 'orphans, widows,' and other afflicted or destitute persons; to soothe their sorrows, relieve their wants, and afford them protection, counsel, and comfort in their distresses; and in keeping at a distance from the sinful pursuits, interests, pleasures, maxims, fashions, and pollutions of this wicked world; so that a man may have no stain upon his garments, no blemish on his character, no guilt upon his conscience, on that account.—Without some measure of this holy love, and this mortification to the world, no doctrines, forms, confidence, high affections, zeal, or apparent devotion, can prove a man an accepted worshipper of God. [Note, 1 Pet. 2:9, 12.] Our true religion is exactly equal to the measure, in which these things have place in our hearts, experience, and conduct; and these are therefore the criteria of 'pure and undefiled religion,' by which we should judge of it, in ourselves and in others, both as to the reality of it, and the degree in which it is possessed. But this holy love, and mortification to the world, can be produced only by faith in a crucified Savior, and the supply of his sanctifying Spirit; so that no appearance even of these things can be depended on, except they spring from, and are connected with, a credible and intelligent profession of faith, a reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for salvation, and the regular and fervent worship of God, in public and in private. True Christian love extends to both, and this resembles the love and compassion of Jesus Christ.' Edwards. ## CHAP. II.

It is not agreeable to Christian profession to regard the rich, and to despise the poor brethren: 13 rather we are to be loving and merciful: 14 and not to boast of faith where no deeds are, 17 which is but a dead faith, 19 the faith of devils, 21 not of Abraham, 25 and Rahab.

unspotted life must accompany an unfeigned love and charity; to keep himself unspotted from the world; this must be our constant endeavor. Herein consists pure and undefiled religion. The very things of the world too much taint our spirits, if we are much conversant with them; but the sins and lusts of the world deface and defile them very woefully indeed. John comprises all that is in the world, which we are not to love, under three heads; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life; and to keep one's self unspotted from all these, is to keep ourselves unspotted from the world. May God by his grace keep both our hearts and lives clean from the love of the world, and from the temptations of wicked worldly men.

CHAP. II. V. 1—7. The apostle here reproves and shows the mischief and sin of neighbor: he must excel in the duties of good neighborhood. Neighbors be concerned that the orphans and widows be well provided for. By the same rule also all the afflicted in the neighborhood are to be considered. Would it be too much for you once a week, at least, to think, "What neighbor is reduced to pinching and painful poverty? What neighbor is languishing in sickness? What neighbor is broken-hearted with the loss of a dear relative? What neighbor has a soul assailed by the enemy of souls?" and then consider, "What can be done for such neighbors?"

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—4. Some expositors, supposing the passage could scarcely consist with rendering honor to civil superiors, as required in other scriptures, have endeavored to explain it of partiality in deciding causes, in favor of the rich, and against the poor; because some courts of justice used to be held in the Jewish synagogues. But had the apostle intended to point out so gross an iniquity, he would doubtless have spoken of it with far more decided severity. If such partiality were used in the determinations of those matters, which came before the churches, it would certainly be condemned by what he said; yet the language does not at all relate to judicial proceedings of any kind; but to an improper respect shown towards some, and contempt expressed towards others, merely on account of external appearance.—No doubt this is very reprehensible, and the effect of a carnal judgment, how common soever it may be; nor does civil respect to superiors, or to those in authority, render such difference of conduct towards the rich and the poor, in religious concerns, at all necessary; especially when the rich have nothing but their wealth and splendor to recommend them, and the poor are persons of pious character and good behavior. As places of worship cannot be built and maintained, without much expense, it may be proper that they, who contribute towards defraying it, should be accommodated accordingly; but were all professed Christians more spiritually minded, less disparity would be made, and the poor would be treated with far more attention and regard, than they commonly are in worshipping congregations. And we may conclude without the least hesitation, that if the apostle could witness what takes place generally in our days, in this matter, and give his opinion of it, he would repeat the censure that we were 'become partial in ourselves,' and 'judges' influenced by evil thoughts, corrupt reasonings, and erroneous calculations; and add many like, and even more severe words.—(1) Our Lord, &c.] 'Jesus Christ our Lord, and of glory;' not a very corrupt practice,—respect of persons, which seems to have been a very growing evil in the churches of Christ, even in those early ages, and has, in these after-times, sadly corrupted and divided Christian nations and societies. Here we have,

I. A caution against this sin, v. 1. Observe, 1. The character of Christians fully implied; they are such as have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. 2. How honorably James speaks of Jesus Christ; he calls Him the Lord of glory; and Christ's being the Lord of glory should teach us not to respect Christians for anything so much, as their relation and conformity to Christ. In professing the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, we should not show respect to men, so as to cloud or lessen the glory of our glorious Lord; however any may think of it, this is certainly a very heinous sin.

II. We have this sin described and cautioned against, by an instance or example of it, v. 2, 3. Assembly here is meant of meetings appointed for deciding matters of difference among the members of the church; or, for determining censures, so the Greek word, here used, signifies; such an assembly as that in the Jewish synagogues, when they met to do justice; see Maimonides, as quoted by Dr. Manton; who says, 'it was expressly provided, by the Jews' constitutions, that when a poor man and a rich plead together, the rich shall not be bidden to sit down, and the poor stand, or sit in a worse place, but both sit, or both stand alike.* But we must be careful not to apply what is here said to the common assemblies for worship; for in these certainly there may be appointed different places for persons, according to their rank and circumstances, without sin. They do not understand the apostle, who fix his severity here on this practice; they do not consider the word judges (used in v. 4.), nor what is said of their being convicted as transgressors of the law, if they had such a respect of persons as is here spoken of, according to v. 9. Observe hence, 1. God has his remnant among all sorts of people, among those that wear soft and gay clothing, and among those that wear poor and vile raiment. 2. In matters of religion, rich and poor, [black and white,] stand on a level; no man's riches set him in the least nearer to God, nor does any man's poverty set him at a distance from God. 3. All undue honoring of worldly greatness and riches should especially be watched against in Christian societies; civil respect must be paid to persons of different ranks; but must never be such as to influence the proceedings of Christian societies in disposing of the offices of the church, or in passing the censures of the church, or in anything that is purely a matter of religion; here we are to know no man after the flesh. If a poor man be a good man, we must not value him the less for his poverty; and if a rich man be a bad man, we must not value him the more for his riches. 4. It is important to take care what rule we go by in judging of men; commonly, to judge by outward appearance, will too much influence our spirits and our conduct in religious assemblies; many a man is vile and despicable, who yet makes a figure in the world; and on the other hand many a humble, heavenly, good Christian, is clothed meanly; but neither should he nor his Christianity be thought the worse of on this account.

III. The greatness of this sin, v. 4, 5. 1. In it there is shameful partiality; Are ye not then partial in yourselves? The question is here put, as what could not fail of being answered by every man's conscience, that would put it seriously to himself. According to the strict rendering of the original, the question is, 'Have ye not made a difference? And, in that difference, do you not judge by a false rule, and go upon false measures? And does not the charge of a partiality, condemned by the law, lie fully against you? Does not your own conscience tell you that you are guilty?' 2. This respect of persons is owing to the evil and injustice of the thoughts. 'Ye are become judges of evil thoughts; ye are judges, according to those unjust estimations and only, 'our Lord,' but 'the Lord of glory;' the Fountain and Source of honor; constituting those related to Him truly honorable, however poor. Mat. 12:46—50. 25:34—40.—(2) Assembly.] Synagōgēn. Rev. 2:9. 3:9.—The place of worship seems intended, and that of Christians, not of Jews. The word was first used for the assembly, and, at length, for the place of assembling; as ekklesia, church, has since been.—(3) Are ye not partial.] 1:6. Jude 22. 'Do ye not distinguish?' i. e. 'unjustly.' Note, Job 31:17—19.

(2.) Gold ring.] 'Among the Romans, those of the senatorial and equestrian orders were distinguished from the common people, by wearing a gold ring. In time the use of them became promiscuous, [and general among the rich.] Burder. The Gr. refers to a ring worn on the finger. See the cuts, Dan. 6:17. and Concordance, (in the Supplement,) under the word 'Signet.'

(4.) 'Are ye not judges who form your judgments on erroneous reasonings and false estimates, viz. of any one's worth by his outward appearance.' Bl. It is plain, the same distinction of genteel and ungentle Christians prevailed then as now, when fine broadcloth has taken the place of gold rings, in Christian estimation. True, the vulgar and gross, those of unrefined taste, have no right to inflict their society upon those of better and purer tastes, for this injustice and tyranny would prevent social progress. But how can one Christian consider another, whom he or she really thinks to be a Christian, as vulgar? Is not Christianity the very essence of good-breeding and good taste, the beauty of the soul; and can any of Christ's brethren and family be less than noble? Can any one with whom Christ sympathizes, and in whom He lives, be too vulgar for a Christian's sympathy and intimacy? Will ye wound the Savior in the very house of his friends,—will ye thus crucify Him afresh, by the indulgence of that same vulgar and exclusive selfishness which nailed Him to the cross?

V. 5—7. The apostle endeavored to fix the attention of his brethren on the subject, by inquiring, whether they did not know that 'God had chosen the poor of this world.' Were not his people generally of that rank in life, with only a few exceptions? 1 Cor. 1:26—31. If the Lord, therefore, chiefly blessed the Gospel for the conversion of the poor, it must be evident, that He had appointed that lowly state for his chosen people, as the safest, and most comfortable, and advantageous for them; as most conducive to their progressive sanctification, most favorable to their inward peace, and most suited to show forth the power, and bless-

6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats?

7 Do not they blaspheme that <sup>h</sup> worthy name by the which ye are called?

8 If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, <sup>1</sup>Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well:

9 But if ye have respect <sup>j</sup> to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors.

corrupt opinions which you have formed to yourselves. You secretly prefer outward pomp before inward grace, and the things that are seen before those which are not seen. The deformity of sin is never truly and fully discerned, till the evil of our thoughts be disclosed; and it is this which highly aggravates the faults of our tempers and lives,—that the imagination of the thoughts of the heart are evil, Gen. 6:5.

3. This respect of persons is a heinous sin, because it is to show ourselves most directly contrary to God, v. 5, 6. God has made those heirs of a kingdom, whom you make of no reputation; and has given very great and glorious promises to those, to whom you can hardly give a good word or a respectful look. And is not this a monstrous iniquity in you, who pretend to be the children of God, and conformed to Him? Their being God's chosen does not prevent their being poor; their being poor does not at all prejudice the evidences of their being chosen, Mat. 11:5. The poor are evangelized. God designed to recommend his holy religion to men's esteem and affection, not by the external advantages of gayety and pomp, but by its intrinsic worth and excellency; and therefore chose the poor of this world. Again notice, That many poor in the world, are rich in faith; thus the poorest may become rich; and this is what they ought to be especially ambitious of; it is expected from those who have wealth and estates, that they be rich in good works; because the more they have, the more they have to do good with; but it is expected from the poor in the world, that they be rich in faith; for the less they have here, the more they may, and should, live in the believing expectation of better things in a better world. Notice further, Believing Christians are rich in title, and in being heirs of a kingdom, though they may be very poor as to present possessions; what is laid out on them is but little, what is laid up for them is unspeakably rich and great. Note again, Where any are rich in faith, there will be also divine love; faith working by love, will be in all the heirs of glory. Note once more, under this head, Heaven is a kingdom, and a kingdom promised to them that love God. We read of the crown promised to them that love God, in the former chapter, v. 12. here a kingdom too. And as the crown is a crown of life, so the kingdom will be an everlasting kingdom.

All these things, laid together, show how highly the poor in this world, if rich in faith, are now honored, and shall hereafter be advanced by God; and consequently how very sinful a thing it was for them to despise the poor. After such considerations as these, the charge is cutting indeed; But ye have despised the poor, v. 6.

4. Respecting persons, in the sense of this place, on account of their riches or outward figure,* is shown to be a very great sin, because of the mischiefs which are owing to worldly wealth and greatness, and the folly which there is in Christians' paying undue regards to those who had so little regard either to their God or them, v. 7. 'Consider how commonly riches are the incentives of vice and mischief, of blasphemy and persecution; consider how many calamities you yourselves sustain, and how great reproaches are thrown upon your religion and your God, by men of wealth, and power, and worldly greatness; and this will make your sin appear exceeding sinful and foolish, in setting up that which tends to pull you down, and to dishonor that worthy name by which you are called.' The name of Christ is a worthy name; it reflects honor, and gives worth to them who wear it.

V. 8—13. The apostle, having condemned the sin of those who had an undue respect of persons, and having urged what was suffi-

ed effects, of his grace bestowed on them. It was, therefore, evident, that the Lord peculiarly honored and favored men of low condition; [among whom most reforms have originated, likewise, since the great one of Christianity;] whereas, his worshippers despised the poor, and slighted them, as if beneath their notice! Or, they 'despised the poor man,' for the word is singular. Prov. 15:21, 31. 17:5. Ec. 9:13—18. Lu. 2:1—14.—Could they imagine, that the enemies of Christ and his church, and persons of the worst characters, ought to be treated with more respect, on account of wealth alone, than their poor brethren and neighbors were entitled to?—This implies, that the apostle principally referred to the case of such rich persons, as occasionally came to their assemblies, to whom vast attention was paid, whilst the poor were despised; whereas the latter were far more likely to profit by the Word preached, than the former. He does not seem to have meant, that the rich, who were stated attendants on their assemblies, and pious persons, ought to have no degree of superior regard shown them; provided the poor were not despised and neglected.—One of the last observations which the author heard from the lips of a very wealthy and zealous servant of Christ, (John Thornton, Esq.,) was this: 'Ministers in London bestow more pains to get full congregations, than to profit those who attend; and aim more at the rich, than the poor; but they will always be most successful with the poor. These are two principal mistakes.'—(7) By which ye are called. Which is called upon you. 'From whom they derived their name of Christians.' Mat. 23:19, 20. Acts 11:25, 26. SCOTT.

(5.) 'What heraldry can go so high, as "our Father which art in heaven?" Who so high-born, as he that is born of God; a child of the Most High; that bears the image of the heavenly? To have a name written in heaven,—oh, how far is it above all the names on earth? To have a new nature,—how much nobler, than to be of the most ancient house! What though I be left behind in the world, when I am owned by the Lord? For Him to say, as Is. 41:1. "I have called thee by thy name;" how much more is it, than to be known and admired of all the world! For, to many men of note, He may say at last, "I know you not. For not many noble are called!" 1 Cor. 2:26. No; there is somewhat uses to call them another way: they will not stain their honor to come, on submission, to a despised Savior. They see it no such great matter, to be Christ's mother, and sister, and brother. They who scorn their brethren as mechanics; why should they not also disown the apostles of our Lord, as such? Yea, and the Redeemer Himself; as the earpenter's son? And shall I then envy them their honor; which they so abuse as to dishonor themselves; yea, and the Lord of glory? This is an honor that shall not run long in their veins: the bubble will soon cient to convict them of the greatness of this evil, now proceeds to show how the matter may be mended; it is the work of a gospel-ministry, not only to reprove and warn, but to teach and direct, Col. 1:28. And here,

1. We have the law, that is to guide us in all our regards to men, set down in general, v. 8. Observe, (1.) The rule for Christians to walk by, is settled in the Scriptures; if, according to the Scriptures, &c. It is not great men, nor worldly wealth, nor corrupt practices among professors themselves, that must guide us, but the Scriptures of truth. (2.) The Scripture gives us this as a law, to love our neighbor as ourselves; it is what still remains in full force, and is rather carried higher and further by Christ, than made less important to us. (3.) This law is a royal law, it comes from the King of kings; our King; is of worth and dignity in itself, and is the law, by which all Christians now are to regulate all their actions to one another. (4.) A pretence of observing this royal law, when it is interpreted with partiality, will not excuse men in any unjust proceedings; the apostle allows, that, so far as they were concerned to observe the duties of the second table, they did well in giving honor to whom honor was due; but this fair pretence would not cover their sin, in that undue respect of persons which they stood chargeable with; for,

2. This general law is to be considered together with a particular law, v. 9. 'Notwithstanding the law of laws, To love your neighbor as yourselves, and to show that respect to them which you would be apt to look for yourselves if in their circumstances, yet this will not excuse your distributing either the favors or the censures of the church according to men's outward condition; but here you must look to a particular law, which God, who gave the other, has given you together with it, and by this you will stand fully convicted of the sin I have charged you with; this law is in Lev. 19:15. Yea, the very royal law itself, rightly explained, would serve to convict them, because it teaches them to put themselves as much in the places of the poor as in those of the rich, and so to act equitably towards one as well as the other. Hence he proceeds,

3. To show the extent of the law, and how far obedience must be paid to it; they break, and the shadow flee away. Oh, what is that glory from the blood running in our veins, to the glory that redounds from the good done in our lives? May I but be numbered with them whom the Lord will honor; and upon whom rests the Spirit of God and of glory: and then take who will, for me, all that the world can contribute, to make them great and renowned. I know, they are not rich dresses, nor high places; but pure virtues, and heavenly graces, that truly do ennoble the owners. Nor can I count it so honorable, to glare like blazing, frightful comets; as to shine like sweet, useful lights in the world. Nay, let who will take it for a paradox, there is no "bearing," in any escutcheon, like the bearing of the cross of Christ; in which his followers do, and well may glory, to the contempt of all worldly glory. Oh, what so great correspondence as to be great with the blessed God! and what so great a thing can the world show, as a heart above all the greatness of this world! To have the top of all our kindred, the Most High, Himself; our house, heaven; our garden, paradise; our diet, manna; our clothing, the garments of salvation; our jewels, the graces of God's Spirit; our attendants, the angels of light; and our inheritance, a glorious, everlasting kingdom: Oh, how does this cloud all the royalties of the world! My soul, return to thy rest!—Meditations.

(6.) 'Christians, on whom the Lord Jesus has bestowed affluence, rank, or talents, should be the last to disdain their fellow-men, or to look with indifference on indigence and grief. Pride, unseemly in all, is detestable in them who confess, by grace they are saved. The Lord Jesus came to deliver the needy. And surely an object which was not unworthy the Son of God, cannot be unworthy of any who are called by his name. How many hands that hang down would be lifted up; how many feeble knees confirmed; how many tears wiped away; how many victims of despondency and infamy rescued, by a close imitation of Jesus Christ!'

DR. J. M. MASON.
V. 8—13. It is of vast importance to observe, how often this abstract of the second table of the law is referred to in the N. T., as a rule of conduct to believers; as this alone is sufficient to show the fatal mistake of those, who deny the moral law to be the rule of our duty.—A man is liable to the sentence of death, by the law of this land, who offends in one capital matter, though he be clear in all others. The chain, consisting of many links, is broken, when any one link is broken. According to the covenant of works, a single violation of any one command brings a man under condemnation, from which no obedience, past, present, or future, can deliver him [for each act of obedience being a duty, only fills its duty, and lays up nothing of supererogation]: and, according to the covenant of grace, the allowed, known, and habitual transgression of must fulfil the royal law, have a regard to one part as well as another, otherwise it would not stand them in stead, when they pretended to urge it as a reason for any particular actions, v. 10. This may be considered, (1.) With reference to the case James has been upon; respect to the rich, and due regard to the poor. Whosoever shall keep the whole law, if he offend in one point, wilfully, allowedly, and with continuance, and so as to think he shall be excused in some matters, because of his obedience in others, he is guilty of all; not that all sins are equal, but all carry the same contempt of the authority of the Lawgiver, and so bind over to such punishment as is threatened on the breach of that law. This shows us what a vanity it is to think that our good deeds will atone for our bad deeds, and plainly puts us on looking for some other atonement. (2.) This is further illustrated by putting a case different from that before mentioned, v. 11. One, perhaps, is very severe in the case of adultery, but less ready to condemn murder; another has a prodigious dread of murder, but more easy thoughts of adultery, [such as, in the words of a witty, though gross writer, would 'compound for sins they are inclined to, by damning those they have no mind to.' Ed.] whereas, one who looks at the authority of the Lawgiver, more than the matter of the command, will see the same reason for condemning the one as the other. Obedience is then acceptable, when all is done with an eye to the will of God; and disobedience is to be condemned, in whatever instance it be, as it is a contempt of the authority of God; and, for that reason, if we offend in one point, we condemn the authority of Him who gave the whole law, and so far are guilty of all. Gal. 3: 10.

4. He directs Christians to govern and conduct themselves more especially by the law of Christ, v. 12. This will teach us, not only to be just and impartial, but very compassionate and merciful to the poor; and it will set us perfectly free from all sordid and undue regards to the rich. Observe, (1.) The Gospel is called a Law; it has all the requisites of a law; precepts, with rewards and punishments annexed; it prescribes duty, as well as administers comfort; and Christ is a King to rule us, as well as a Prophet to teach us, and a Priest to sacrifice and intercede for us. We are under the Law to Christ. (2.) It is a Law of liberty; a law we have no reason to complain of, as a yoke or burden; it sets us at liberty from all slavish regards, either to the persons or the things of this world. (3.) We must all be judged by this law of liberty; men's eternal condition will be determined according to the Gospel; this is the book that will be opened, when we shall stand before the judgment-seat; there will be no relief to those whom the Gospel condemns, nor will any accusation lie against those whom the Gospel justifies. (4.) It concerns us therefore so to speak and act now, as becomes those who must shortly be judged by this law of liberty; i. e. that we come up to gospel-terms, that we make conscience of gospel-duties, that we be of a gospel temper, and that our conversation be a gospel-conversation, because by this rule we must be judged. (5.) The consideration of our being judged by the Gospel, should engage us more especially to be merciful in our regards to the poor, v. 13. Notice here, The doom which will be passed on impenitent sinners at last, will be judgment without mercy; there will be no mixtures or allays in the cup of wrath, and of trembling, the dregs of which they must drink. Notice again, Such as show no mercy now, shall find no mercy in the great day. But we may note, on the other hand, that there will be such as shall become instances of the triumph of mercy, in whom mercy rejoices against judgment: all men, in the last day, will be either vessels of wrath, or vessels of mercy. It concerns all to consider among which they shall be found; and let us remember, that blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.

V. 14—26. In this latter part of the ch., the apostle shows the error of those who rested in a bare profession of the Christian faith, as if that would save them, while the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives were altogether disagreeable to that holy religion they professed. To let them see, therefore, what a wretched foundation they built their hopes upon, it is here proved at large, that a man is justified, not by faith only, but by works. But here arises a great question, namely, how to reconcile Paul and James? Paul, in Romans and Galatians, seems to assert the directly contrary thing to what James here lays down, saying it often, and with great emphasis, that we are justified by faith only, and not by the works of the law. Nothing, says Mr. Baxter, but men's misunderstanding the plain drift and sense of Paul's epistles, could make so many take it for a matter of great difficulty to reconcile Paul and James: it may be sufficient only to observe these few things following:

1. When Paul says, a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law, Rom. 3: 28. he plainly speaks of another sort of works than James does, but not of another sort of faith. Paul speaks of works wrought in obedience to the law of Moses, and before men's embracing the faith of the Gospel; James, of works done in obedience to the Gospel, and as the proper and necessary effects and fruits of a sound believing in Christ Jesus. Both are concerned to magnify the faith of the Gospel, as that which alone could save us, and justify us; but Paul, by showing the insufficiency of any works of the law before faith, or in opposition to the doctrine of justification by Jesus Christ; James, by showing what are the genuine and necessary products and operations of it.

2. Paul not only speaks of different works from those insisted on by James, but of a quite different use made of good works, from what is here intended. Paul had to do with those who depended on the merit of their works in the sight of God; thus he might well make them of no manner of account; James had to do with those who cried up faith, but would not allow works to be used even as evidences; and with these he might well urge the necessity and vast importance of good works: those who cry up the gospel, so as to set aside the law, and those who cry up the law, so as to set aside the gospel, are both in the wrong; for we must take our work before us; there must be both faith in Jesus Christ, and good works the fruit of faith.

3. The justification Paul speaks of, is different from that spoken of by James; the one speaks of our persons' being justified before God, the other of our faith being justified before men; our persons are justified before God by faith, but our faith is justified before men by works. This is so plainly the scope and design of the apostle James, that he is but confirming what Paul, in oth-

any part of the moral law, as given to us from the hands of a Mediator, proves a professed Christian to be impenitent, a hypocrite, an unreconciled enemy, and a rebel against God; and that his obedience, in other respects, is not the result of a sincere regard to the authority and glory of God. For if it were, the same principle would induce him to a constant endeavor and purpose of obeying every commandment.—Some explain the expression, 'mercy rejoiceth against judgment,' to denote the cheerful expectation of a future judgment, with which the exercise of mercy to others inspires the true Christian's heart. But though this may be implied, it seems not to be the proper meaning of the passage, or construction of the words; for to 'glory against,' or 'to rejoice against,' does most properly denote, to rejoice and glory in obtaining the ascendancy or victory over a competitor, as mercy is figuratively represented to do, over the severity of God's judgment, when they are justified and saved, who deserve to be condemned.

(8) Royal. 'I. e. pre-eminent, of superior obligation.' BL.—'With multitudes, the thought of giving to God never entered their minds. Go to them for their proportion to support the Gospel at home, and they will turn you away, or deal out a paltry pittance that makes you ashamed. Go to them in behalf of the heathen, and they have nothing to spare, though their poorer neighbors are giving by handfuls. They are so in debt for new lands and tenements, that they cannot give a cent to save a world from death. It is not more evident, that Lucifer himself has a separate interest from Christ, than that these men have. Wrapt up in themselves, they mean that the universe shall take care of itself. It is not for them to go abroad to inquire how it fares with other nations; their business is at home. In their own little, sordid selves, they lie buried, and not a meaner object is to be seen in the universe of God.'

GRIFFIN.

(10.) As Christ says, that on this precept hangs the whole law, Bp. Bull thinks it here meant, he that sins against this precept, sins against the whole. But this seems to confine the sense. We owed perfect obedience, and always did, and shall; if we fail in a little, our obedience is imperfect, as it always was, and ever must be; we are then cast out of the covenant of works, as much as if we had broken every command; and need atonement. Ed.—'Sin is like some distempers of the eye, which present things in different colors from those which belong to them. Many persons, in a bad frame of mind, waste their time in poring over past 'experience,' and in examining themselves by evidences proposed from the pulpit, or in books, when, in fact, there is other work for them to do. The accursed thing must be removed from the camp; Achan is to be slain; and, until this is done, they must be in darkness and trouble.'

V. 14—18. It is plain, that the apostle here argued against those, who substituted a notional belief of the Gospel, for the whole of evangelical religion, and who were ready to answer exhortations and reproofs, (as many now do,) by saying, 'We are not justified by our works, but by faith; we believe, and we have all things in Christ.' No doubt true faith, interesting men in the righteousness of Christ, his atonement and grace, saves their souls: (Mark 16:14—16. Jn. 3:14—16. 5:24—27. 20. 30, 31. 1 Cor. 15:1,2. Eph. 2:4—10.) but then it also produces holy fruits, and is evincing to be genuine, by its effect on their hearts and lives; whereas, a speculative assent to any doctrine, or a historical belief of any facts, essentially differs from this saving faith.—Most copies read, 'Show me thy faith by thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works.'—'Thou professest to believe, and disgracest that profession by thy conduct; but do not expect to be considered as a believer, till thou showest thy faith by the good works of a holy life; and thou earnest me,

15 If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food,

16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?

17 Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.

18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble.

20 But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?

er places, says of his faith; that it is a laborious faith, a faith working by love, Gal. 5:6. 1 Thess. 1:3. Titus 3:8. and many other places.

4. Paul may be understood as speaking of that justification which is inchoate, James of that which is complete; by faith only, we are put into a justified state, but then good works come in for the completing of our justification at the last great day; then, Come, ye children of my Father;—for I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, &c.

Thus, having cleared this part of Scripture from everything of a contradiction to other parts of it, let us see what is more particularly to be learnt from this excellent passage of James; we are taught,

I. That faith without works will not profit, and cannot save us, v. 14. Observe, here, 1. That faith which does not save, as not sufficiently exact, or zealous in respect of faith; but I deem it better to evince it by my works, than by disputing about it.' Either reading warrants the same inference, namely, that there is no possible way to show that we really do believe in Christ, except by being 'zealous of good works,' from evangelical motives and for evangelical purposes; and where good works are evidently wanting, the most confident profession, of the most orthodox creed, can only prove a man to be a well instructed hypocrite, who has received a system of doctrine into his understanding as true; but has never been so convinced of its excellency, as to admit it into his heart, experimentally, as the influential principle of his conduct towards God and man, 2 Cor. 5:13-16. Gal. 5:1-6. 1 Thes. 1:1-4. Heb. 11.—'He has received the knowledge of the truth,' but not 'the love of the truth.' 2 Thes. 2:8-12. Heb. 10:26, 27.—'A wicked opinion having sprung up, even in the apostle's days, by misunderstanding Paul's arguments; Peter, John, James, and Jude, aimed in their epistles principally at this end; to vindicate Paul's doctrine from the false consequences charged upon it, and to show that "faith without works is nothing worth." But indeed Paul does not speak of faith at large, but only of that living, fruitful, and evangelical faith, which, he says, "worketh by love." As for that faith, void of good works, which these men thought sufficient to salvation, he declareth positively against it.—Peter calls it resting; (2 Pet. 3:6.) because Paul was in truth of the same opinion with the other apostles, and held eternal life impossible to be attained by any faith, which had not the attestation of a holy life.' AUGUSTINE.

(16.) 'We have sometimes thought, that an amusing fiction might be written, in which a disciple of Epictetus, and a disciple of Bacon should be introduced as fellow travellers. They come to a village where the small-pox has just begun to rage; and find houses shut up, intercourse suspended, the sick abandoned, mothers weeping in terror over their children. The Stoic assures the dismayed population, that there is nothing bad in the small-pox, and that to a wise man diseases, deformity, death, the loss of friends, are not evils. The Baconian takes out a lancet and begins to vaccinate. They find a body of miners in great dismay. An explosion of noisome vapors has just killed many of those who were at work; and the survivors are afraid to venture into the cavern. The Stoic assures them, that such an accident is nothing but a mere "apoproëgnon." The Baconian, who has no such fine word at his command, contents himself with devising a safety-lamp. They find a shipwrecked merchant wringing his hands on the shore. His vessel, with an inextinguishable cargo, has just gone down, and he is reduced, in a moment, from opulence to beggary. The Stoic exhorts him not to seek happiness in things which lie without himself, and repeats the whole chapter of Epictetus, "pros tous tēn aporian dedoikotas." The Baconian constructs a diving-bell, goes down in it, and returns with the most precious effects from the wreck. It would be easy to multiply illustrations of the difference between the philosophy of thorns and the philosophy [as Bacon calls it] of fruit,—the philosophy of words, and the philosophy of works.' Life of Lord Bacon, EDINB. will not really profit us; it may procure in some cases, worldly good things; but what profit will this be, for any to gain the world, and to lose their souls? All things should be accounted profitable or unprofitable as they tend to forward or hinder the salvation of our souls. 2. For a man to have faith, and to say he has faith, are two different things; the apostle does not say, If a man have faith without works, for that is not a supposable case; the drift of this place of Scripture is plainly to show, that an opinion, or speculation, or assent, without works, is not faith; but the case is put thus, If a man say he hath faith, &c. Men may boast of that to others, and be conceited of that in themselves, which they are really destitute of.

II. We are taught, that, as love or charity is an operative principle, so is faith; or that neither of them is good for anything; and, by trying how it looks for a person to pretend he is very charitable, who yet never does any works of charity, you may judge what sense there is in pretending to have faith, without the proper and necessary fruits of it, v. 15-17. What will such a charity as this, that consists in bare words, avail either you or the poor? We are too apt to rest in a bare profession of faith, and to think that this will save us; it is a cheap and easy religion to say, 'We believe the articles of the Christian faith'; but it is a great delusion to imagine that this is enough to bring us to heaven; those who argue thus, wrong God, and cheat their own souls.

III. We are taught to compare a faith boasting of itself without works, and a faith evidenced by works, by looking on both together, to try how that will work on our minds, v. 18. Suppose a true believer thus pleading with a boasting hypocrite, 'Thou makest a profession, and sayest thou hast faith; I make no such boasts, but leave my works to speak for me. Now, give any evidence of having the faith thou professest without works, if thou canst, and I will soon let thee see how my works flow from faith, and are the undoubted evidences of its existence.' This is the evidence by which the Scriptures all along teach men to judge both of themselves and others. And this is the evidence according to which Christ will proceed at the day of judgment; Rev. 20:12.

IV. We are taught to look upon a faith of bare speculation and knowledge as the faith of devils, v. 19. That instance of faith which the apostle here chooses to mention, is the first principle of all religion. The word tremble is commonly looked upon as denoting a good effect of faith; but here it may rather be taken as a bad effect, when applied to the faith of devils. They tremble, not out of reverence, but hatred [fear] and opposition to that one God on whom they believe. To rehearse that article of our creed, therefore, I believe on God the Father Almighty, will not distinguish us from devils at last, unless we now give up ourselves to God as the Gospel directs; and love Him, and delight ourselves in Him, and serve Him, which the devils do not, cannot do.

V. We are taught that he who boasts of faith without works, is to be looked upon at present as a foolish, condemned person, v. 20. The words translated vain man, are observed to have the same signification with the word Raca; which must never be used to private persons, or as an effect of anger, Mat. 5:22. but may be used, as here, to denote a just detestation of such a sort of men as are empty of good works, and yet boasters of their faith. And it plainly declares them fools and abjects in the sight of God. Faith without works is said to be dead, not only as void of all those operations which are the proofs of spiritual life; but as unavailable to eternal life: such believers as rest in a bare profession of faith, are dead while they live.

VI. We are taught that a justifying faith

(18.) Without.] Chōris: read rather, ek, from. There are few passages that, with the appearance of plainness, have more perplexed expositors than this; as will be seen by consulting Poole, Wolf, and Pott. That it perplexed the ancients, and called forth the arts of the emendatores, we may infer from the various readings, especially that remarkable one by which, instead of the Vulg. ek, 14 MSS. and most of the ancient versions, have chōris; where one must be an alteration of the other. The former reading has been adopted by almost all critics, and edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Pott, Vater, Titman. It is far more likely that ek should have been altered to chōris, than chōris to ek, (for chōris tōn ergōn, [without works,] occurs at v. 20.) and chōris is as inferior in internal as in external testimony; for it is as impossible to conceive how so plain a reading as chōris could ever be altered; and it could not accidentally be changed into ek. Nor are we warranted in rejecting so strongly attested a reading as ek, unless it could be shown to yield either no sense, or one utterly unsuitable; which is not the case. But the sense is not only good in itself but perfectly suitable to the context, full as much so as chōris. See Hottinger, Mill, or Thiele. BL.—'Evidence of piety is not so much to be sought in high emotions of any kind, as in real humility, sorrow for sin, and a continual effort in every day life, to regulate our feelings and conduct by the Word of God. It is the nature, and not the degree of our affections, which is to be regarded in our examination of our evidences. The best way to know our feelings is, to see how they influence our conduct.' Rev. Dr. BECHER.—'Reader, suppose thyself standing before the judgment-seat of Christ! a necessary, a prudent supposition: it ought to be a very frequent one. The Judge demands, "What hast thou to plead for a portion in the blessedness of the righteous?" The plea must be, "Oh, my glorious Judge, Thou hast been my sacrifice: my righteousness is on the bench. Surely, in the Lord have I righteousness." The Judge proceeds: "But what hast thou to plead, that thy faith should not be rejected, as that of the hypocrite?" Here the plea must be, "O Lord, my faith was thy work. It was a faith which disposed me to all the good works of thy holy religion. It caused me, with sincerity, to love and keep thy commandments, and, with assiduity, to serve the interests of thy kingdom in the world." Thus you have Paul and James reconciled. Thus you have good works provided for. The actions of men are more certain indications of what is within, than all their sayings.'

MATHER.

V. 19, 20. It is vain to say, as some have done, that devils are not under a dispensation of mercy, and therefore they have no ground for appropriating the revelation, and promise of salvation to themselves. For the apostle is not speaking of the different circumstances of fallen angels, and fallen men; but of the difference between dead, inactive, inefficient faith, and that 'faith which worketh by love'; and his argument proves, beyond all doubt, that a faith, which is of no better kind than that of the devils, cannot possibly profit the possessor, however he may be circumstanced: for this plain reason, because it is not that faith [yielding up the will] to which the promises are made. Devils, Demonia, demons. Ho diabolos, the devil: but the plural is not used of evil spirits.

SCOTT.

21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?

22 Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?

23 And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God.

24 Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

25 Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

cannot be without works, from two examples, Abraham and Rahab.

Abraham, James says, was justified by works, v. 21. Paul, on the other hand, says, Rom. 4. Abraham believed, and it was counted to him for righteousness: these are well reconciled, by observing what is said in Heb. 11. which shows that the faith, both of Abraham and Rahab, was such as to produce those good works of which James speaks; and which are not to be separated from faith as justifying and saving. By what Abraham did, it appeared, that he truly believed. Thus the faith of Abraham was a working faith, v. 22. And by this mean you come to the true sense of that scripture which saith, v. 23. Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness. And thus he became the friend of God. Faith, producing such works, endeared him to the Divine Being, and advanced him to very peculiar favors and intimacies with God. You see, then, v. 24. how that by works a man is justified, (comes into such a state of favor and friendship, with God,) and not by faith only; not by a bare opinion or profession, or believing without obeying, but by having such a faith as is productive of good works.

Now beside the explication of this passage and example, as thus illustrating and supporting the argument James is on, many other useful lessons may be learned by us from what is here said concerning Abraham. Those who would have Abraham's blessings, must carefully copy his faith. Those works which evidence true faith, must be works of self-denial, such as God Himself commands, and not such works as [have no reference to God as our Master, are merely] pleasing to flesh and blood, and may serve our interest, or are the mere fruits of our own imagination and devising. What we piously purpose and sincerely resolve to do for God, is accepted as if actually performed, as Abraham in offering Isaac. The actings of faith make it grow perfect, as the truth of faith makes it act. Such an acting faith will make others, as well as Abraham, friends of God. Thus Christ says to his disciples, John 15:15. I have called you friends. All transactions betwixt God and the truly believing soul are easy, pleasant, and delightful.

The second example of faith's justifying itself and us, with and by works, is Rahab, v. 25. whose faith was meaner and of a much lower degree; so that the strongest faith will not do, nor the meanest, without works. Very probably Rahab's character was infamous; and such an instance is mentioned, to show that faith will save the worst, when evidenced by proper works, and will not the best without such works. This Rahab had heard of God's powerful presence with Israel; but what proved her faith sincere, was, that, to the hazard of her life, she received the messengers, and sent them out another way. Observe, here, The wonderful power of faith in transforming and changing sinners, and the regard which an operative faith meets with from God, to obtain his mercy and favor. Observe, Where great sins are pardoned, there must be great acts of self-denial. Rahab must prefer the honor of God and the good of his people, before the preservation of her own country. After she is justified, yet her former character must be remembered; not so much to her dishonor, as to glorify the rich

PRACT. OBS. The Lord Jesus is the true Fountain of honor, and they are the most honorable, who best serve Him and most resemble Him, whatever their external rank or appearance may be. But how difficult is it for us to divest ourselves of carnal reasonings, and corrupt prejudices, in such matters; and to give due respect to superiors, without a partial regard to the affluence and splendor, which too often are the appendages, or heralds, of vice and folly! [Let fashionable and worldly Christians ask themselves, if they would receive Christ or Paul to their families, 'circles,' or tables, with honor, or ill-disguised condescension, should either of them appear in the streets of the metropolis, in the 'ungentle' garb and simple manners and habits they once appeared in on earth. And if not, why? Ed.] We should watch and pray against so corrupt a judgment, especially in the worship of God, before whom 'the rich and the poor meet together,' and are regarded entirely according to their characters, and not in the least according to their rank.—The poor should hence learn to seek these riches and honors, and the assurance of them, with increasing earnestness; to be contented in their low estate, to rejoice in their spiritual privileges, to be cheerful in the humble duties of their station, to be thankful for their advantages; and to pray for their rich neighbors, that they may not be satisfied with a perishing inheritance.—If our obedience be sincere, it will be universal, as far as we are acquainted with our Lord's will; for the same authority is opposed and affronted, whatever command is broken.—In vain do men urge that they are 'not under the law,' whilst they allow themselves in known sin: the very gospel will consign them over to the righteous vengeance of God, and all the curses of the law will be executed on them, with a tremendous increase of punishment, for having 'sinned on, that grace might abound.' Vain men, while neglecting 'judgment, mercy, and the love of God,' Mat. 23:23, 24. quiet their consciences, and ward off reproof, by speaking of faith, of grace, of salvation; but God will no more regard their heartless assent to truth, or their indolent, presumptuous reliance on his mercy, than their hollow expressions of love to their poor destitute neighbors. Let no man deceive himself: 'faith, being alone,' and not productive of good works, is no better than the faith of devils, and will leave the possessor in their company to all eternity. Would we have our inheritance with Abraham, 'the friend of God;' (Note, John 15:12—16.) we must both believe his promise, trust his mercy, and obey his commandment: or else 'publicans and harlots will enter heaven before us;' and a believing Rahab shall be 'justified by her works,' and distinguished from all open unbelievers, and from all those whose faith was dead, before the assembled world; when many disputers for orthodox creeds, which they have disgraced by their lives, shall 'have their portion with the workers of iniquity, in outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth.' S.

V. 21—24. The apostle next proved his assertion by examples. The attentive reader must see, in what a powerful manner his [Abraham's] faith in the promises of God operated to produce good works, in obedience to his commands, in the most trying circumstances, universally, and without reserve. Abraham's justification by faith took place many years before he was commanded to sacrifice Isaac: but his obedience in that respect proved him to be a sound character, and justified him as a true believer, and a devoted servant of God. So that it was evident, there was a good and important sense, in which 'a man was justified by works and not by faith only;' as his works must be appealed to, for the justification of his professed faith, before men; and as they will be adduced before the tribunal of God, to distinguish true believers from hypocrites: Mat. 25:34—46. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. nor will faith justify any man before God, who is not thus justified before the world by his works also. Not that this will be a second justification by works, in the sense for which many contend; as the redemption and righteousness of Christ, depended on by living faith, can alone 'justify a sinner before God,' from first to last: but the good works of the true believer, from the time when he received Christ, to that of his death, how long or how short soever that space may be, will suffice to distinguish his living faith from the dead faith of mere professors, to justify him against every charge of hypocrisy; and to prove him entitled 'to the gift of God, even eternal life through Jesus Christ.'

(24.) 'Ye see therefore that works may contribute to show a man's justification, and the act of faith is not the only thing which proves it.' Dr. Burton, and Bl. This shows, that there is no discrepancy between James and Paul; and, on this head, the worthy B. Jenks remarks, (in his popular Treatise on Submission to the Righteousness of God,) 'I cannot agree with those, who, to invalidate the credit of Paul, bring him in speaking more darkly; and not so well advised: and would have James to come after, as his interpreter, to help him out: who (no doubt) was very well able to explain himself; and rightly to manage and apply his own doctrine, which he insists upon so stately and largely: when James does but touch upon it collaterally, and sparingly. And if we must question the authority of either, it should be rather of the last named: because his epistle has been sometimes called in doubt; and the other's never was. But I would not offer to question either as not authentic: nor have we any need to go that way to work, when they are so easily reconciled; and all the clashing is only in appearance. For that James does not mean the justification of our persons before the Lord, is to me evident; because he makes faith to have little or no concern in it; which yet all that hear the Scripture, must own to be a con-cause, at least, if not the only cause: yea, because the allegation which he brings in 2:23. would overthrow all his cause, if he intended the justification in God's sight. For "the Scripture (says he) was fulfilled, which saith, Abraham believed and it was imputed to him for righteousness," i. e. Abraham obeying God, in that difficult service of 'offering up his only son, did make appear what was spoken of him in that scripture; and gave the evidence and verification of it; that his faith was imputed to him for justification: though that justification was indeed many years before he made this attempt, to sacrifice Isaac; and long before Isaac was born. And if Abraham was justified before he wrought the works, then he could not be justified by the works: unless it be in some other sense of justification. Whence it appears, that James speaks of the declarative justification. And so, it is observable, how he makes his demand (deixon moi); make appear, demonstrate, and show me thy faith, v. 18. Let me see such signs of it, that, in the judgment of charity (though not of infallibility), I may conclude upon it; and so pronounce, as the Lord did in the case of Abraham, Gen. 22:12. "Now, I know that thou fearest God:" though before, the thing was not latent to me; yet now thou hast given a proof and manifestation, that thou hast not only a form of godliness, but the power. And thus thy faith is made perfect: i. e. showed to be so; as good fruits do not make, but they manifest, the tree to be good. And thus is the word used, 2 Cor. 12:9. "My strength is made perfect in weakness." For how can our weakness add to God's almightiness; but only illustrate and glorify it the more.' Pp. 46—48, 4th ed.

V. 25, 26. It is unnecessary to use further arguments, to prove the consistency of James' doctrine with that of the apostle Paul. Paul evidently meant, that faith alone interested a sinner in the mercy of God, through the redemption and righteousness of Christ, for justification: but the faith, of which he spoke, 'wrought by love,' 'constraining to obedience,' and was connected with a new creation unto holiness. James meant, that no faith, which was not productive of good works, could justify a man before God: that a speculative assent, or an indolent reliance, separate from repentance, diligence in the use of appointed means, and holy obedience, 'was dead' and unprofitable; [did not prove grace and mercy of God. Though justified, she is called Rahab the harlot.

Upon the whole matter, the apostle draws this conclusion, v. 26. read differently; some reading, As the body without the breath is dead, so is faith without works: and then they show, that works are the companions of faith, as breathing is of life. Others, As its own identity, because it wanted the characteristics inseparable from that identity; and that, consequently, there was a sound sense, in which a man might be said to be justified by his works, and in perfect consistency with 'his faith being imputed to him for righteousness'; as in the case of Abraham. But Paul opposed those who objected to the doctrine of justification by faith, and James wrote against such as perverted it. Both views of the subject are useful to the humble, upright, and attentive: but the Lord sees good, that the self-wise, the proud, the heedless, and the licentious, should have somewhat to cavil at and stumble over. Indeed, the same interpretation, which is necessary to render one part of these verses consistent with another, at the same time renders them consistent with the doctrine of Paul, concerning justification by faith (23).—'It is one thing to say, the faith which is without works "is dead," and another to say, that faith is dead without works; as if faith derived its life and power from works; which is not less... absurd, than if we should say, that the body is dead without sense and motion, as if sense and motion were the cause of life; when we should say, that the body, which is without sense and motion, is dead: for the cause is understood from the necessary effects; and works are the evidences and effects of living faith, and not the cause of it.' Beza.—The apostle frequently calls the faith which does not justify dead: but he does not use the word living; and some persons are so absurd as to ask what we mean by living faith! Simply, 'that faith which is not dead;' but active, operative, influential, like a 'lively' or living 'hope.' 1 Pet. 1:3—5. Sc.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The word rendered 'masters,' evidently signifies teachers. Indeed, that is the obvious meaning of the word, when used concerning any of the Jewish Scribes, and of our Lord Himself. 'When the apostle forbids many to be such, he seems to allow that some may; and consequently I think, "teachers" ought to be explained in an innocent sense.' Doddr.—An arrogant, self-preferring, dogmatical temper, whether it led men, without a proper call or suitable qualifications, to aspire to the office of teachers, or whether it induced them to assume pre-eminence in other ways, was the general object of the apostle's reprehension; though the former, as the effect of such a temper, seems to have been principally intended. Mat. 20:20—23. 23:8—12. Luke 22:24—27. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. Many converts to Christianity would be desirous of the distinction of 'teachers,' with a view to the credit and pre-eminence of that office, or from a mistaken idea, that they could not glorify God, and do good to man, in other stations; while perhaps they were not duly aware of the weight and difficulty of the work, and the solemn account which must be given of it. But they ought to know, and seriously consider, that 'teachers' must stand a greater, or more strict, judgment than other men, and that false, unfaithful, ambitious, and selfish teachers would be subject to a greater and more awful condemnation than other sinners. This is also, no doubt, in a degree, applicable to the case of censorious, assuming, and domineering persons in any station. 4:11, 12. Mat. 7:1—6. Lv. 6:37, 33. 3 John 9—12.—Indeed, even true believers, though preserved from final condemnation, if employed as teachers, must expect to be called to a more strict account than their brethren. As their conduct would be more severely scrutinized by men, than that of others, so they would be more sharply rebuked and chastened by God for their offences, in order to the display of his glory, and the prevention of scandals in the church: so that every attempt, made by any of them, to force themselves into eminent and conspicuous stations, would incur a larger measure of painful and mortifying trials. 1 Cor. 11:29—34. Nor could any man expect to behave so, as to escape correction or condemnation, for in many things all offended, without excepting the apostles themselves; and the more men were advanced and distinguished, the greater would be their dangers, the more noticed their transgressions, and the more needful their rebukes and chastisements. Ec. 10:1. Especially, it would be found extremely difficult, to speak so much and so often, as the public and private duties of the ministry required, without often uttering unadvised words, dishonorable to God, injurious to men, or the result of the body without the soul is dead, so faith without works is dead also: and then they show, that as the body has no action, nor beauty, but becomes a loathsome carcase, when the soul is gone; so a bare profession without works is useless, yea, loathsome and offensive.

The best works, without faith, are dead; and the most plausible profession of faith, without works, is dead. Faith is the root, good works are the fruits, and we must see to it that we have both. This is the grace of God, wherein we stand, and we should stand to it.

CHAP. III. V. 1—12. The foregoing ch. shows how unprofitable and dead faith is without works; it is plainly intimated, by what this chapter first goes upon, that such a faith is, however, apt to make men conceited and magisterial in their tempers and their talk. We are therefore taught,

I. Not to use our tongues so as to lord it over others, v. 1. These words do not forbid doing what we can to direct and instruct, or to reprove, in a Christian way; but we must not affect to speak and act as those who are continually assuming the chair. 'Therefore, be not many masters;' (or teachers, as some read it [so Scott];) 'do not give yourselves the air of teachers, imposers, and judges, but rather speak with the humility and spirit of learners; do not censure one another, as if all must be brought to your standard.' This is enforced by two reasons. 1. Those who thus set up for judges and censurers, shall receive the greater condemnation, Mat. 7:1. 2. Another reason given against such acting the master, is, because we are all sinners, v. 2. Were we to think more of our own mistakes and offences, we should be less apt to judge other people. We are all guilty before God; and they who want it over the frailties and infirmities of others, little think how many things they offend in themselves. Nay, perhaps, their magisterial managements, and censorious tongues, may prove worse than any faults they condemn in others. Let us learn to be severe in judging ourselves [whose sins we know best], but charitable in our judgments of other people.

II. We are taught to govern our tongue so as to prove ourselves perfect and upright men. It is here implied, that he whose conscience is affected by tongue-sins, and who takes care to avoid them, has an undoubted sign of true grace. But, on the other hand, if a man bridle not his tongue, whatever profession he makes, that man's religion is vain. Further, he that offends not in word, will not only prove himself a sincere Christian, but a very much advanced and improved Christian. For the wisdom and grace which enable him to rule his tongue, will enable him also to rule all his actions. This we have illustrated by two comparisons:

1. The governing and guiding all the motions of a horse, by the bit which is put into his mouth, v. 3. The more quickly and live-pride, anger, or some unhallowed passion. So that idle and evil words must be multiplied, in consequence of men's improperly entering into the pastoral office; nor could any wholly escape this guilt, though such as were duly called to the service might expect proportionable grace and mercy. Is. 6:5—8. Mat. 12:33—37.—The Jews at that time, even when grossly ignorant and vicious, were exceedingly prone to consider themselves, as called and qualified to be the religious teachers of mankind; Rom. 2:17—21. and probably the apostle saw, that many of the Jewish converts to Christianity were influenced by the remains of the same disposition, to aspire prematurely, from questionable motives, or without proper qualifications and weight of character, to the office of teachers or ministers; which he counted it needful thus to repress.—Condemnation.] Krīma. See on 1 Cor. 11:29. The word is often tr. condemnation, and even dammation; and sometimes it is plain, that to krīma must be eis katakrīma, 'judgment unto condemnation;' Rom. 5:16. but the general meaning is judgment. 1 Cor. 11:29—34. Scott.

(1.) 'The connexion here is undetermined. I see not why the ch. may not have been intended to further develop the injunction at 1:19. where the apostle treats of the pruritus dicendi. And so Thiele.' BL.

(2, 3.) He infers the foregoing precept, from the difficulty of governing the tongue; adverting to one especial error into which persons who set up for teachers mostly run,—namely, that of two great vehemence and bitterness of censure. Bits in the horses' mouths.] The cut, is of a Medo-Perian sculpture, at Persepolis, and illustrates the ancient bits and bridles, as also the phrase, 'bells upon the horses,' Zech. 14:20. The curious reader may compare the ancient bits and bridles, seen in the cuts, Gen. 41:42, 43. Ex. 14:6. Is. 22:6, 7, &c. Ep. V. 3—6. To show its importance the estimate must not be made according to appearance, but by the effect.—(6) The course of nature.] 1:23.—'Our whole life, which like a wheel goes on, not only without ceasing, but ever variably;... now lifting a man up, now depressing him.' Leigh.—Hell.] Geōmētēs. 5 Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!

6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell.

ly the tongue is, the more should we take care to govern it. Otherwise, as an unruly and ungovernable horse runs away with his rider, or throws him, so an unruly tongue will serve those in like manner, who have no command over it.

2. The governing of a ship by the right management of the helm, v. 4, 5. The right governing of the helm or rudder will steer and turn the ship as the governor pleases; and a right management of the tongue is, in a great measure, the government of the whole man. There is a wonderful beauty in these comparisons, to show how things of small bulk, yet may be of vast use. And from hence we should learn to make the due management of our tongues more our study; because, though they are little members, they are capable of doing a great deal of good, or a great deal of hurt. Therefore,

III. We are taught to dread an unruly tongue, as one of the greatest and most pernicious evils. It is compared to a little fire, placed among a great deal of combustible matter, which soon raises a flame and consumes all before it, v. 5, 6. There is such an abundance of sin in the tongue, that it may be called a world of iniquity. How many defilements does it occasion! How many and dreadful flames does it kindle! Observe, hence, There is a great pollution and defilement in sins of the tongue; by it defiling passions are kindled, vented, cherished; the whole body is often drawn into sin and guilt by the tongue, Eccl. 5:6. It setteth on fire the course of nature. The affairs of mankind and of societies are often thrown into confusion, and all is on a flame, by it. Some read it, all our generations are set on fire by the tongue. There is no age of the world, nor any condition of life, private or public, but will afford examples of this. And it is set on fire of hell. Observe, hence, Hell has more to do in promoting the fire of the tongue than men are generally aware of. The devil is expressly called a liar, a murderer, an accuser of the brethren; and whenever men's tongues are employed any of these ways, they are set on fire of hell. The Holy Ghost, indeed, once descended in cloven tongues as of fire, Acts 2. And where the tongue is thus guided and wrought upon by a fire from heaven, here it kindleth good thoughts, holy affections, and ardent devotions. But when it is set on fire of hell, as in all undue heats it is, there it is mischievous, producing rage and hatred, and those things which serve the purpose and designs of the devil. As therefore you would dread fires and flames, you should dread contentions, revilings, slanders, lies, and everything that would kindle the fire of wrath in your own spirit, or in the spirits of others. But,

IV. We are next taught how very hard a thing it is to govern the tongue, v. 7, 8. No man can tame the tongue without supernatural grace and assistance. The apostle does not intend to represent it as a thing impossible, but as a thing extremely difficult, which therefore will require great watchfulness, and pains, and prayer. And sometimes all is too little, for it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison. Brute creatures may be kept within certain bounds; they may be managed by certain rules; and even serpents may be so used as to do no hurt with all their poison: but the tongue is apt to break through all bounds and rules, and to spit out its poison on one occasion or other, notwithstanding the utmost care. So that it does not only need to be watched, and guarded, and governed, as much as an unruly beast, or a hurtful and poisonous creature; but much more care and pains will be needful, to prevent the mischievous outbursts and effects of the tongue. However,

V. We are taught to think of the use we make of our tongues in religion and in the service of God, and by such a consideration to keep it from cursing, censuring, and everything that is evil on other occasions, v. 9, 10. How absurd is it, that they who use their tongues in prayer and praise, should ever use them in cursing, slandering, and the like! That tongue which addresses with reverence the Divine Being, cannot, without the greatest inconsistency, turn upon fellow-creatures with reviling, brawling language. These things ought not so to be; and, if such considerations were always at hand, surely they would not be. Piety is disgraced in all the shows of it, if there be not charity.

Further, to fix this thought, the apostle shows that contrary effects from the same causes are monstrous, and not to be found in nature; and therefore cannot be consistent with grace, v. 11, 12. True religion will not admit of contradictions; and a truly religious man can never allow of them either in his words or his actions. How many sins would this prevent, and recover men from, to put them on being always consistent with themselves.

V. 13-18. As the sins before condemned arise from an affectation of being thought more wise than others, and being endued with more knowledge than they; so the apostle, in these vs., shows the difference between men's pretending to be wise, and their being really so; and between the wisdom which is from beneath, (from earth or hell,) and that which is from above.

I. Some account of true wisdom, with the distinguishing marks and fruits of it, v. 13. A truly wise man will not set up for the reputation of being wise, without laying in a good stock of knowledge; he will not value himself merely on knowing things, if he has not wisdom to make a right application and use of that knowledge. These two things must be put together, to make up the account of true wisdom. If we are wiser than others, this should be evidenced by the goodness of our conversation, not by the roughness or vanity of it. True wisdom may be known by its works. The conversation here does not refer only to words, but to the whole of men's practice; therefore it is said, Let him show, out of a good conversation, his works. Not he who thinks well, or he who talks well, is, in the sense of the Scripture, allowed to be wise, if he do not live and act well. True wisdom may be known by the meek-

(6.) Course of nature.] Some refer this to forests on fire; whose terrific effects, wrapping whole townships in flames, are sometimes experienced in our new settlements. All nature, the whole world, seems on fire. and birds, beasts, dwellings, and men, are sometimes devoured together. See the account of the conflagration at New Brunswick, Nova Scotia; some years ago. The word for course is trochos, a wheel; and Burder thinks, 'there is an allusion to a wheel, catching on fire, by its rapid motion, spreading its flames around, and at last involving the whole machine in destruction: the true version is, it setteth on fire the wheel of human life, and thus finally destroyeth the human body.' But, says Bl., 'the best interpretation seems to be that adopted by Grot., Heins., Mich., Carpz., Ros., Pott, and Schl. "It is that which sets on fire, and destroys the whole course of life, from boyhood to old age;" i. e. by raising and nourishing hatred, and enmity, [and conceit,] it renders life a scene of misery. For, as Bp. Butler observes, "it begets resentment in him who is the subject of this wantonness of speech. It sows the seeds of strife among others, and inflames little [jealousies] disgusts and offences, which if let alone would wear away of themselves. [How much more commonly do we believe and report what is said to the disadvantage, than what is said to the praise of another!] It is often of as bad effect upon the good name of others, as deep envy or malice; and, to say the least of it in this respect, it destroys and perverts a certain equity of the utmost importance to society to be observed, namely, that praise and dispraise, a good or bad character, should always be bestowed according to desert." By geinnes we may understand the powers [and influences] of hell.' Bl. Let us remember the precept and the threatening, Mat. 12:36.

V. 7-12. Every kind, or nature, of living creatures, however monstrous, ravenous, fierce, or venomous, on the dry land, and in the ocean, has been, and is, in some instances, subdued by the reason, courage, and persevering efforts, of the human species; by which means the mischiefs, which otherwise would have been occasioned by them, are in a great measure prevented. But no man could ever find out a way to subdue the tongue, or to hinder wicked men from corrupting the principles, polluting the imaginations, and inflaming the passions of others, by their mischievous discourse.—The word rendered tame, properly means subdue. It could scarcely be said, that all kinds of sea-monsters, crocodiles, and serpents, had been tamed, or rendered tractable, by men; but they have all been brought under subjection, in one way or another; whereas, no efforts could ever prevent the malignant effects of the unbridled tongues of ungodly men.—Pious, pure, loving, candid, sincere, humble, and edifying language is the genuine produce of a sanctified heart; and none, who understand Christianity, would expect to hear curses, lies, boastings, and revilings from a believer's mouth, any more than they would look for figs upon a vine, or olive-berries on a fig-tree. Mat. 7:15-20. 12:33-37.—(9) Curse, &c.] Perhaps the apostle in this glanced at the unconverted Jews, who... often cursed the Christians bitterly in their synagogues.' Mackn.—(7) Mankind.] The nature of man subdues the nature of beasts, of every sort. SCOTT.

(7.) 'The distribution of the brute creation, is [Jewish, comp. pt. iv. of Guide, in Suppl., and] founded on Gen. 9:2, 3. Ps. 8:7, 8. Sept., which passages are the best illustration of the present.'

V. 13-16. The apostle had digressed from his subject, by showing the consequences of an assuming temper, and an improper desire to be 'teachers;' but he here resumes it. If therefore any of those, into whose hands his epistle might come, were, or desired to be thought, persons of superior wisdom, understanding, and genius, and endued with much knowledge of the Gospel; let them not think themselves buried in a private or obscure station, or indulge a proud, aspiring, and discontented spirit; but let them 'show forth,' by the general tenor 'of a good ness of the spirit and temper; Let him show with meekness, &c. It is a great instance of wisdom, prudently to bridle our own anger, and patiently to bear the anger of others. And as wisdom will evidence itself in meekness, so meekness will be a great friend to wisdom. For nothing hinders the regular apprehension, the solid judgment, and impartiality of thought, necessary to our acting wisely, so much as passion.

II. The glorying of those taken away, who are of a contrary character to that now mentioned; and their wisdom exposed, in all its boasts and productions, v. 14—16. 'Pretend what you will, and think yourselves ever so wise, yet you have abundance of reason to cease your glorying, if you run down love and peace, and give way to bitter envying and strife. Lie not thus against the truth.'

Observe, Envy and strife are opposed to the meekness of wisdom; both cannot dwell together in the same heart. Holy zeal and bitter envying are as different, as the flames of seraphim and the fire of hell. Observe, the order of things here laid down. Envy is first, and excites strife; strife endeavors to excuse itself by vainglory and lying; and then, v. 16. hereupon ensue confusion and every evil work. And is such wisdom as produces these effects, to be gloried in? This cannot be without giving the lie to Christianity; and pretending that this wisdom is what it is not. For, observe, whence such wisdom cometh, v. 15. It springs from earthly principles, acts on earthly motives, is intent on serving earthly purposes; is sensual, indulging the flesh, and making provision to fulfil the lusts and desires of it: Or, according to the original word, it is animal or human, the mere working of natural reason, without any supernatural light. And it is devilish, such being the wisdom of devils, to create uneasiness, and to do hurt; and, being inspired by devils, whose condemnation is pride, 1 Tim. 3:6. and who are noted in other places of Scripture for their wrath, and their accusing of the brethren, therefore, those who are lifted up with such wisdom as this, must fall into the condemnation of the devil.

III. The lovely picture of that wisdom which is from above more fully drawn, and set in opposition to this which is from beneath, v. 17, 18.

Observe, here, I. True wisdom is God's gift, not gained by conversing with men, or by the knowledge of the world, but it comes from above. It is pure, without mixture of maxims or aims that would debase it; and it is free from iniquity and defilements, not allowing of any known sin, but studious of holiness, both in heart and life. 2. It is peaceable. Peace follows purity, and depends on it. In kingdoms, in families, in churches, in all societies, and in all interviews and transactions, heavenly wisdom makes men peaceable. 3. It is gentle, not standing on extreme right in matters of property; not rigorous in points of censure, not furious about opinions, urging our own beyond their weight, or theirs who oppose us, beyond their intention; not rude and overbearing in conversation, nor harsh and cruel in temper. Gentleness may thus be opposed to all these. 4. It is easy to be entreated, very persuadable, either to what is good, or from what is evil. There is an easiness that is weak and faulty; but it is not blamable to yield ourselves to the persuasions of God's Word, and to all just and reasonable counsels or requests of our fellow-creatures; no, nor to give up a dispute, where there appears a good reason for it, and a good end may be answered by it. 5. It is full of mercy and good fruits, inwardly disposed to everything that is kind and good, both to relieve those who want, and to forgive those who offend, and actually to do this whenever proper occasions offer. 6. It is without partiality. The original word signifies to be without suspicion, or free from judging; making no undue surmises, or differences in our conduct towards one person more than another. The margin reads it, without wrangling; not acting the part of sectaries, and disputing merely for the sake of a party; or censuring others purely on account of their differing from us. The wisest men are least apt to be censurers.

Tit. 3:1—3.*—The word rendered sensual, (phusikē), is in the passage referred to, natural; and I apprehend it should be so rendered in this place; for it seems rather to relate to man's natural depravity, [rather his animal and selfish propensities,] in general, than to his sensuality in particular, to which ambitious disputants are commonly less addicted than to malignant passions. Sensual.] 1 Cor. 2:14. 15:46. Jude 19.—It is opposed to the regenerate, and to the glorified. Leigh. (16) Envyng.] This word (which signifies a vehement and earnest commotion), and its derivatives, are used in a bad sense, *Acts 5:17. 7:9. 13:45. 17:5. 21:20. 22:3. (13.) Meekness.] Comp. Phil. 2:3. 'A real saint may know that he possesses real grace, but it does not follow that an eminent one is particularly sensible that he is eminent compared with others. He who possesses much grace, may know that he is thus distinguished, but it will not be obvious to him that he is better than others, so that this should become a foremost thought. It may be remarked as infallibly true, that the person who, upon comparing himself with others, is apt to think himself a very eminent saint, in whom this is a leading thought, often recurring, is certainly mistaken; he is no eminent saint, but under the prevalence of a proud, self-righteous spirit; and, if this is the habitual and prevailing temper of his mind, he is no saint at all.'

(14.) Envyings.] To these, a social state like ours, where love of notice is so much cultivated, and where ranks are not ascertained, acknowledged, and fixed, is peculiarly exposed. Bl. refers on this text to a sermon, by Dr. Smith, 'where he shows, 1. what envy is, and wherein it consists. 2. Its causes, on the part (1) of the envier, great malice, and baseness of nature, [the Ed. would add, a prurient desire to be noted,] rapacity, and an inward sense of a man's weakness and idleness; (2) of the person envied, great natural abilities, the favor of the [multitude, or of the] great; wealth, and prosperity, esteem, and reputation. 3. Its effects, confusion [add, discomfort] and every evil work, (1) to the envier; (2) to the envied; a prying into all his concerns, calumny, and utter ruin.'

V. 17, 18. Heavenly wisdom, according to James' description of it, is very nearly allied to that love, for which Paul contended; 1 Cor. 13:4—7. and we may observe of both, that they are described, as they are in themselves, and that every man may ascertain the reality, or the degree, of his attainments in them, by their effects on his temper and conduct. For, whatever bigots and zealots may imagine, 'the fruit of righteousness,' or that good seed whence the blessed fruit of righteousness grows here on earth, 'is sown in peace;' men of peaceable, loving tempers, preaching the Gospel, or in any scriptural way endeavoring to make it known to mankind, adorning it in their lives, and watering it with their prayers, 'sow the seed,' which God blesses to the conversion of sinners, and the propagation of true religion in the world. It 'is sown in peace,' not amidst great noise and disturbance, and by those 'who make peace,' who are both peaceable and peace-makers, in the church and in the world. 1:19—21. Mat. 5:9. Heb. 12:9—14.—(17)

Easy to be entreated.] Here only. 'It may be used either actively or passively, i. e. easily to be persuaded to the best, or apt to persuade others with good speeches.' Leigh.

(17.) 'There are two kinds of hypocrites; the one are deceived by their morality and external religion; the other by false discoveries, (impulses, and imagined revelations, and suggestions respecting the goodness of their state, falsely called the witness of the Spirit,) and elevations of mind. These last often declaim against dependence on good works, and talk much of free grace, but yet make a righteousness of their "experience." They are more confident in this hope, than the former; and I have scarcely known an instance of their being undeceived.'

(18.) Peace.] 'Man's hostility to God manifests itself in ten thousand acts of resistance to his pleasure. While God claims the supreme love, and implicit obedience, of every intelligent creature, man denies both his claims, and the rights on which they are founded; and boldly sets up, in opposition to them, claims and rights of his own; which he determines to support to the utmost of his power. For this end he commences a progress of revolt, and contention, which occupies most of his time, and most of his thoughts; and at death leaves, not unfrequently, the controversy undecided.—With his fellow-men his contention arises from two sources: his own selfishness, and theirs. The mind in which selfishness reigns, always wishes, intends, and labors, to make every other interest subservient to its own; or, at least, to prevent it from disturbing, precluding, or diminishing its own. From this source have sprung all the private, and all the public contentions, which have destroyed the peace of neighborhoods, and ravaged the world; the sufferings and the sighs, the tears and the groans, which have spread from one end of heaven to the other.—Nor is man less busily employed in conflicting with himself. The passions and appetites of the human heart, have ever opposed the dictates of conscience, intended by God to regulate the moral conduct. Though it strenuously asserts its right to this most necessary control, the passions still more strenuously rebel against it; force the man to submit to their own dictates; and hurry him into a course of disobedience. In this progress of guilt, conscience holds out her dreadful mirror to his terrified eye; and exhibits him to himself, odious, deformed, and fearfully exposed to the anger of God.—To this distracted, miserable being, peace is announced (John 14:27.) by Him, who knew all the wants, sufferings, and dangers of our race. His legacy will be found to be exactly suited to their state,—as it is . . . a happy state of the mind, or intellect . . . of the affections . . . of the conscience . . . of the life. When the soul has sincerely said, thy will be done; conscience, unopposed and undisturbed, dictates whatever is to be done; and smiles its approbation, whenever it is performed. . . . To himself he is no longer a stranger,—prayer he no longer dreads,—from his moral character he no longer shrinks,—at his future destiny he ceases to shudder. A daily, welcome, cheerful visiter at the internal fire-side, he finds there nothing but peace, harmony, and pleasure.'

'Not as the world giveth, doth Christ give this evangelical peace, his own peace. The world gives with an intention to gain, at least as much as it gave; and thus gives for its own benefit; not for ours. The world gives by halves, and often resumes what it has given. The world gives grudgingly; with a meanness which embitters the boon; in pretence, not in reality; its gifts being, at best, of little value, and of momentary duration. Finally, the world reproaches us, as being deeply indebted for its largesses; and imperiously demands servile acknowledgments, and base compliances, as a proper return for the obligations is sown in peace of them that make peace.

CHAP. IV.

PRACT. OBS. Did men duly weigh the importance and difficulty of the sacred ministry, the account which must be given of it, and the trials and temptations to which it must expose them, they would be less forward, than they sometimes are, in aspiring to that distinction. 1 Tim. 3:1. If then, the glory of God, the good of mankind, and an evident call in Providence, did not require the contrary, a wise and humble man, possessed of much self-knowledge, and knowledge of human nature, and the state of the world and the church, would choose obscurity and privacy, to be out of the way of temptation, to shun the danger of dishonoring the Gospel, and to escape trials, as much as this present state will admit of it. [See a case in the life of Doddridge. Biography, in Suppl.]—Nothing is more arduous, than the proper government of the tongue; and . . . facts abundantly prove, that more professed Christians succeed in bridling their senses and appetites, than in duly restraining their tongues; and whilst we contemplate, with grief and astonishment, the horrible effects produced by this 'unruly evil,' let us particularly inquire, what use we make of our tongues. As no man is able to subdue and tame the tongue, no, not his own tongue, without the help of divine

it has conferred. Christ, on the contrary, never reproaches us on account of his blessings, but gives with perfect liberality, and unlimited bounty; cheerfully; demanding no unworthy sacrifices; never resuming what He has given; for our benefit only; really, and not in pretence; with absolute sincerity, and supreme nobleness of disposition, gifts that endure for ever. . . . A guest, fresh from heaven, and from the presence of God, Peace bears all the characteristics of the world from which she descends; of the regions in which she was born; of the family to which she is allied; and of the Parent, from whom she sprang. Gentle and serene, beautiful and lovely, she becomes a willing companion to every humble, faithful follower of the Lamb; to every genuine child of God. Her own angelic disposition, she breathes insensibly into the soul; her softness and gentleness she infuses into the heart; and her living smiles she spreads over the aspect. At once, the man is changed into a new creature. His soul, before the region of darkness and storm, is cleared, at once, of the clouds by which it was overcast. Its tempestuous passions cease to rage, and ravage; and a heavenly sunshine illumines the world within. The universe, to him heretofore a vast kingdom of war, and opposition, is converted into a delightful residence of quiet and harmony; in which an immense multitude of the inhabitants, such as no man can number, are become his friends, and in which the hostilities of the rest will only work together for his good. God, also, seen by him before in clouds and darkness, which were very tempestuous round about Him, has unfolded to him the light of his countenance; and given him a lively and transporting earnest of serene, unclouded, everlasting day. Sermon 84. DWIGHT.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. 1—3. 3:13—18. The apostle is generally supposed to have, in this place, addressed the unconverted Jews; to the conduct of whom his language is peculiarly applicable, according to the history of those times. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, that persons, continuing members of the Christian church, at so early a period, were guilty of the enormities here mentioned: though the passage, alas! is applicable enough to nominal Christians in subsequent ages.—This seems to refer to the eager desires of the Jewish nation after temporal prosperity, and liberty from the Roman yoke; and to the violent and impious measures, which they adopted in order to obtain them: for these measures effected nothing, except the increase of their miseries; and they were hastening their own destruction, because they trusted not in God.—Some of them, however, it might be supposed, kept up the form of religion, and prayed for liberty from their oppressors, and for temporal prosperity.

(1, 2.) Wars (come) of your lusts. 'There is not a nation in Europe that could be led on to war against a harmless, just, forgiving, and defenceless people; for most commonly the love of plunder and of glory are the causes of national war. Have wars prevented men from being subjected and enslaved? Is there a country of Europe that has not been overrun with troops several times, even within the present century. And still more, is it not most commonly the case, that the very means by which we repel a despotism from abroad, only establish over us a military despotism at home. Since, then, the principle of retaliation will not, with any certainty, save a country from conquest, the CHAP. IV. V. 1—10. The former eh. speaks of envying one another, as the great spring of strifes and contentions; this, of a lust after worldly things, and setting too great a value on worldly pleasures and friendships, as that which carried their divisions to a shameful height.

1. The apostle here reproves the Jewish Christians for their wars, and for their lusts, as the cause of them, v. 1. The Jews were very seditious, and had frequent wars with the Romans; they were a very quarrelsome, divided people, often fighting among themselves; and many of those corrupt Christians, against whose errors and vices this epistle was written, seem to have fallen in with the common quarrels; hereupon, our apostle informs them, that the origin of wars and fightings was not (as they pretended) a true zeal for their country, and for the honor of God, but that their prevailing lusts were the cause of all. Observe, from hence, What is sheltered and shrouded under a specious pretence of zeal for God and religion, often comes from men's pride, malice, covetousness, ambition, and revenge. But one would think here is enough said to subdue those lusts; for,

1. They make a war within, as well as fightings without; impetuous passions and desires first war in their members, and then raise feuds in their nation. Apply this to private cases, and may we not then say of fightings and strifes, among relations and neighbors, that they come from those lusts which war in the members?

2. It should kill these lusts to think of their disappointment, v. 2. 'You covet great things for yourselves, and think to obtain them by your victories over the Romans, or by suppressing this and the other party among yourselves; * but, alas, you are losing your labor and your blood, while you kill one another with such views as these.' Inordinate desires are either totally disappointed, or, however, not to be appeased and satisfied by obtaining the things desired. The words here rendered, cannot obtain, signify, cannot gain the happiness sought after. Note, hence, Worldly and fleshly lusts are the distemper which will not allow of contentment or satisfaction in the mind.

3. Sinful desires and affections generally exclude prayer, and the working of our desires toward God; 'Ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. You fight, and do not succeed, because you do not pray; or else, grace, we are reminded to beg of God to do it for us; for the 'things which are impossible with man, are possible with God.' Depending on his grace, let us take heed 'to bless, and not curse.' Mat. 5:43—48. Rom. 12:14—16. 1 Pet. 3:3—12. let us aim at a consistency of conversation and conduct, and see to it that our love to men proves the sincerity of our professed love to God, and that our conduct, out of the place of worship, corresponds with our language and professions in it. For very many things are, even among Christians, that ought not to be so; and the odium theologium has passed into a proverb. The strong language of the apostle likewise applies to the use and abuse of the pen.—Instead of seeking the reputation of wisdom and knowledge, by ostentatiously aspiring after pre-eminence: let us be careful to 'show out of a good conversation our works with meekness of wisdom,' avoiding all bitter 'envyings, and zeal, and strife in our hearts' as well as in our words and actions; not glorying in such things as are indeed a shame to any man, or scandalizing the truth by disgraceful contentions about it, and slandering it by pleading that it calls for this bitter zeal. SCOTT.

real question, as before, is, by obedience to which law will a nation be most likely to escape it, by the law of retaliation, or by that of benevolence?

'I go still farther. The Scriptures teach us, that God has created men, both as individuals and as societies, under the law of benevolence; and that He intends this law to be obeyed. Societies have never yet thought of obeying it in their dealings with each other; and statesmen would generally consider the allusion to it as puerile. But this alters not the law of God, nor the punishments which He inflicts upon nations for the violation of it. This punishment I suppose to be war. I believe aggression from a foreign nation to be, the intimation from God that we are disobeying the law of benevolence; and that this is his mode of teaching nations their duty, in this respect, to each other. So that aggression seems to me, to be in no manner a call to retaliation and injury, but rather a call to special kindness and good-will. And still further, the requiting evil with good, tends just as strongly to the cessation of all injury in nations as in individuals. Let any man reflect upon the amount of pecuniary expenditure, and the awful waste of human life, which the wars of the last hundred years have occasioned, and then I will ask him, whether it be not self-evident, that the one hundredth part of this expense and suffering, if employed in the honest effort to render mankind wiser and better, would long before this time, have banished wars from the earth, and rendered the civilized world like the garden of Eden.

'The cultivation of a military spirit, then, is the cultivation of a great curse to a community.

'I am aware, all this may be called visionary, romantic, and chimerical. This, however, neither makes nor shows it so. . . . And if it be said, these principles may all be very true, but you can never induce nations to act upon them; I answer, this concession admits that such is the law of God. If this be the case, that nation will be the happiest and the wisest, which is the first to obey it. And if it be said, it would be wisest and best to obey the law of benevolence, but men will never obey it; I answer, here is manifestly the end of the argument. . . . It is a matter to be settled between men and their God. It remains, however, to be seen, whether God will or will not cause his laws to be obeyed; and whether omniscience and omnipotence have not the means of teaching his creatures submission to his will.' On Benevolence towards the Injurious. Elys. Mor. Sci.

(2.) Lusts. Hēdonōn: lit. pleasures. It has been thought a horrible doctrine, that man should be endowed with propensities which could take pleasure in destroying, &c. But were not this spontaneous impulse natural, evil would not be destroyed, nor energy supplied for good deeds, the murderer convicted and punished, or the wild beast slain. It is the abuse of the propensities which take pleasure in opposing and destroying; their lusts, i. e. inordinate energy, unrestrained by higher than selfish motives, that causes wars and fightings; and every soldier will acknowledge he has felt a pleasure even in killing his fellow men, and the Roman poets speak of the gaudia certaminis, the fierce battle-joy. The poet Young, true to nature, speaks of the 'lust of death.' How necessary, that reason should control the faintest stirring of this impulse,

3 Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy?

6 But he giveth more grace: Wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

7 Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded.

4. 'Your lusts spoil your prayers, and make them an abomination to God, whenever you put them up to Him,' v. 3. As if it had been said, 'Though perhaps you may sometimes pray for success against your enemies, yet it is not your aim to improve the advantages you gain, so as to promote true piety and religion, either in yourselves or others; but pride, vanity, luxury, and sensuality, are what you would serve by your successes, and by your very prayers; you want to live in great power and plenty, in voluptuousness, and a sensual prosperity; and thus you disgrace devotion, and dishonor God, by such gross and base ends; and therefore your prayers are rejected.'

Let us learn, hence, in the management of all our worldly affairs, and in our prayers to God for success in them, to see that our ends be right. Let us remember this, that, when we speed not in our prayers, it is because we ask amiss; either we do not ask for right ends, or not in a right manner; not with faith, or not with fervency: unbelieving and cold desires beg denials; and this we may be sure of, that, when our prayers are rather the language of our lusts than of our graces, they will return empty.

II. We have fair warning to avoid all criminal friendships with this world, v. 4. Worldly people are here called adulterers and adulteresses, because of their perfidiousness to God, while they give their best affections to the world. Covetousness is elsewhere called idolatry, and here adultery: it is a forsaking Him to whom we are devoted and espoused, to cleave to other things; there is this brand put on worldly-mindedness,—that it is enmity to God. A man may have a competent portion of the good things of this life, and yet may keep himself in the love of God; but he who sets his heart on the world, who places his happiness in it, and will conform himself to it, and do anything rather than lose its friendship, he is an enemy to God; it is constructive treason and rebellion against God, to set the world on his throne in our hearts. Ye cannot serve God and mammon, Mat. 6:24.

'Think seriously what the spirit of the world is, Do you think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us, lusteth to envy?' v. 5. The account given in the Holy Scriptures of the hearts of men by nature, is, that their imagination is evil, only evil, and that continually, Ge. 6:5. Natural corruption principally shows itself by envying, and there is a continual propensity to this; now this is the way of the world, which occasions strifes and quarrels; therefore Christians, to avoid contentions, must avoid the friendship of the world, and show that they are actuated by nobler principles; for if we belong to God, He gives more grace than to live and act as the generality of the world do; yea, the grace of God will correct and cure the spirit that naturally dwells in us; where He giveth grace, He giveth another spirit than that of the world.

III. We are taught to observe the difference God makes between pride and humility, v. 6. This is represented as the language of Scripture in the O. T.; for so it is declared, Ps. 18:27. and Prov. 3:34. Two things are here to be observed; 1. The disgrace cast on the proud; God resisteth them; the original word signifies, God's setting Himself as in battle-array against them; and can there be a greater disgrace, than for God to proclaim a man a rebel, and to proceed against him as such? The proud resisteth God; in his understanding he resisteth the truths of God; in his will the laws of God; [in his purposes, he has no reference to God; God is in none, or never in all of his thoughts;] in his passions he resisteth the providence of God; therefore no wonder God sets Himself against the proud. Let proud spirits hear this and tremble, God resisteth them. Who can describe the wretched state of those who make God their enemy? Observe, 2. The honor and help God gives to the humble; grace, as opposed to disgrace, is honor; this God gives to the humble; and where God gives grace to the humble, there He will give all other graces; and, as in the beginning of this v. 6. He will give more grace. Whenever God gives true grace, He will give more; for to him that hath, and useth what he hath aright, more shall be given. He will especially give more grace to the humble, because they see their need of it, will pray for it, and be thankful for it; and such shall have it. For this reason,

IV. We are taught to submit ourselves entirely to God, v. 7. Christians should forsake the friendship of the world, and watch against that envy and pride which they see prevailing in natural men, and should by grace learn to glory in their submissions to God. We are subjects, and as such must be submissive; not only through fear, but through love; not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake.

Now as this subjection and submission to God are what the devil most industriously strives to hinder, so we ought with great care and steadiness to resist his suggestions. If we basely yield to his temptations, he will continually follow us; but if we put on the whole armor of God, and stand it out against him, he will be gone from us. Resolution shuts and bolts the door against temptation.

V. We are directed how to act toward God, in our becoming submissive to Him, v. 8—10. 1. Draw nigh to God; the heart, that has rebelled, must be brought to the foot of God; the spirit, that was distant and estranged from a life of communion and converse with God, must become acquainted with Him. 2. Cleanse your hands; he who comes unto God, must have clean hands, 1 Tim. 2:8. hands free from blood and bribes, and everything unjust or cruel. 3. The hearts of the double-minded must be purified; those who halt between God and the world, are here meant by the double-minded; to purify the heart, is to be sincere, and to act on (acerbity, malice, &c.) so terrible when, unchecked, it rules with sympathetic flame in the hearts of marshalled legions, bending every energy to destroy each other! When shall the war-cry of the death-lust cease over its prey,—when shall the Prince of Peace triumph in the hearts of individuals and of nations? Ed.

V. 3. 'We must not employ our good actions as persons use water which they pour into a pump,—to draw up something for ourselves.' GORTON MATHER.

V. 4—6. The Jews were still the professed worshippers of God, and the nation had been espoused to Him by special covenant: idolatry, therefore, and other direct violations of the national covenant, were spiritual adultery; and the rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah was the grossest instance of that crime, which could be committed. They moreover idolized worldly interests and pleasures, in the most excessive manner: as if these had been their portion, and religion no farther valuable than as it subserved that primary object. It is also probable, that many nominal Christians had renounced, concealed, or belied, their profession, from regard to the world, to such a degree as to merit the severe rebuke contained in this address. Both descriptions might justly be called 'adulterers and adulteresses,' in respect of their unfaithfulness to that God, whose professed worshippers they were; though perhaps not guilty of adultery, in the common acceptation of the word; as no doubt many of the Jews were. The world, or mankind in general, being under the influence of Satan, and consequently governed by unholy maxims, the result of a carnal judgment and disposition; he who will, at any rate, be on terms with the world, must not profess the truth, attend on the ordinances, or keep the commandments of God; above all, he must not be zealous for the honor, cause, and Gospel of Christ, in that manner and measure, to which every believer is bound, and in fact, disposed. Gen. 3:14, 15. 4:3—12. Mat. 10:21—26. John 7:3—10. 8:41—47. 15:17—21. 17:13—16. Rom. 8:5—9. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 John 3:11—15. 4:4—6. 5:19.—It is evident from the whole tenor of the O. T., that the natural disposition of fallen man, as instigated by Satan, so eagerly covets worldly things, as to envy all those who possess them, and thus prompts to ambition, contention, hatred, fraud, injustice; and that it leads [him] to envy, or to hate, those who love God, as Cain envied, hated, and murdered his brother Abel. Some expositors, not finding any text in the O. T. expressly declaring, that 'the spirit which is in us lusteth to envy,' and not satisfied with the general tenor of the Scripture on that point, read the last clause as a separate interrogation: 'Do ye think, that the Scripture speaketh in vain' against this worldly-mindedness? or, 'doth the Spirit, which dwelleth in us, lust to envy?' That is, does the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in all Christians, or that new nature which He creates, produce such fruit? Gal. 5:22—26. The meaning is nearly the same: but the first seems the true interpretation. The apostle quotes the Sept., except as God is substituted for the Lord. The Heb. reads 'He scorneth the scorers;' but the scorers are the proud, and the Lord resisteth those whom He scorers. Ps. 2:4—6. [4] Enmity.] Luke 23:12. Rom. 8:7. Gal. 5:20. Eph. 2:15, 16. V. 7—10. From the preceding reproofs and arguments, the apostle took occasion to exhort the unconverted Jews, or nominal Christians, who should read his epistle, to 'submit themselves to God.' SCOTT.

(7, 10.) 'The convictions of sin in some persons are vastly different from what they are in others. Some, as Dr. Scott, for instance, have comparatively very little conviction of sin before their conversion. Others have dreadful and pungent convictions. They are borne down into the dust in view of a holy God, and their awful depravity. Their terrors of mind affect their animal nature, deprive them of sleep, and prevent them from pursuing their worldly occupations. And their apprehensions of guilt and misery increase as they approach the time of conversion. This was the case with John Bunyan. Others again have deeper convictions of guilt after they obtain a hope than before. This was the case with President Edwards, the elder. Some are convicted for a short time only, as the 3000 on the day of Pentecost. Others are convicted for days; others, for weeks, and others again, for months, before they experience a change of heart. And some are impressed with their sinfulness and danger, whose convictions after a time wear off, and who do not entertain a hope, that they have spiritually passed from death unto life. This was the case with Felix. Some have their consciences

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness.

10 Humble yourself in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up.

11 Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.

12 There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou that judgest another?

this single aim and principle, rather to please God [and conform our wills to his] than to seek after anything in this world; hypocrisy is heart-impurity; but they who submit themselves to God aright, will purify their hearts as well as cleanse their hands. 4. 'Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep; what afflictions God sends, take them as He would have you, and be duly sensible of them; be afflicted when afflictions are sent, and not despise them; or be afflicted in your sympathies with those who are so, and in laying to heart the calamities of the church of God; mourn and weep for your own sins and the sins of others.' This may be taken, either as a prediction of sorrow, or a prescription of seriousness; let men think to set grief at defiance, yet God can bring it on them; none laugh so heartily, but He can turn their laughter into mourning; and this, the unconcerned Christians James wrote to, are threatened should be their case; they are therefore directed, before things come to the worst, to lay aside their vain mirth and their sensual pleasures, that they might indulge godly sorrow and penitential tears. 5. Humble yourself in the sight of the Lord; let the inward acts of the soul be suitable to all those outward expressions of grief, affliction, and sorrow before mentioned. Humble yourself.

VI. We have great encouragement to act thus toward God, v. 8—10. Those that draw nigh to God in a way of duty, shall find God drawing nigh to them in a way of mercy. If there be not a close communion between God and us, it is our fault, and not his. He shall lift up the humble. Thus much our Lord Himself declared, Mat. 23:12. If we are truly penitent and humble under the marks of God's displeasure, we shall in a little time know the advantages of his favor. Before honor is humility. The highest honor in heaven will be the reward of the greatest humility on earth.

V. 11—17. In this part of the ep.,

I. We are cautioned against the sin of evil-speaking, v. 11. The Greek word signifies speaking anything that may hurt or injure another; we must not speak evil things of others, though true, unless there be some necessary occasion for it; much less report evil things, when they are false, or, for aught we know, may be so; our lips must be guided by the law of kindness, as well as truth and justice; this, which Solomon makes a necessary part of the character of his virtuous woman, Prov. 31:26, must needs be a part of the character of every true Christian. Speak not evil one of another.

1. Because ye are brethren. The compellation, as used by the apostle here, carries an argument along with it. Consider, ye are brethren.

2. Because this is to judge the law; the law of Moses, Lev. 19:16. the law of Christ, Mat. 7:1. The sum and substance of both is, that men should love one another. A detracting tongue therefore condemns the law of God, and the commandment of Christ, when it is defaming its neighbor. The Christians to whom James wrote, were apt to speak very hard things of one another, because of their differences about indifferent things, as appears Rom. 14. 'Now,' says he, 'he who censures and condemns his brother for not agreeing with him in those things which the law of God has left indifferent, thereby censures and condemns the law, as if it had done ill in leaving them indifferent; he who quarrels with his brother, and condemns him for the sake of anything not determined in the Word of God, [note, Titus, 3:10.] does thereby reflect on that Word of God, as if it were not a perfect rule; let us take heed of judging the law, for the law of the Lord is perfect; if men break the law, leave that to judge them; if they do not break it, let not us judge them.'

3. Because God, the Lawgiver, has reserved the power of passing the final sentence on men wholly to Himself, v. 12. Princes and states are not excluded, by what is here said, from making laws; nor subjects at all encouraged to disobey human laws [which conflict not with conscience]; but God is still to be acknowledged as the Supreme Lawgiver, who only can give law to the conscience, and who alone is to be absolutely obeyed. He has power fully to reward the observance of his laws, and to suddenly smitten by the news of the conviction and conversion of others, or by something of a religious nature heard in public or private, or by some passages of Scripture, or by some sermon, or by some striking dispensation of Divine Providence. Others are affected more gradually. They first become thoughtful, and then, by meditating upon those things of religion which have an awakening tendency, deep conviction ultimately takes fast hold on them. Some who have been concerned in a degree for their salvation many years, are roused to a greater sense of their guilt and danger. Some are affected by the justice of God; others, by his mercy; some at a view of heaven and its glories; others, at a view of hell and its miseries. Some have their minds fixed on particular sins they have committed; others, on particular mercies of God towards them. Some are deeply impressed at the truth of the Gospel in general; others at the truth of some particular doctrine. Thus conviction of sin in different persons varies in the degree, duration, manner, and occasion of it. But in one absolutely essential feature it is alike in all,—a sense of their entire depravity, guilt, and ruin.' Harbinger of the Millennium; ch. on Revivals. Rev. Dr. COGSWELL.

V. 11, 12. Nothing can more completely demonstrate any proposition, than this passage demonstrates, that the moral law is the believer's rule of duty; and that every word or action, which dishonors the law of God, is rebellion, if not blasphemy, against our one Lawgiver and Judge. At the same time, it exposes, in a most striking manner, the wickedness of that presumptuous, rash, and censorious way, in which zealous and bigots condemn and anathematize those, who in any respect differ from them, to the immense scandal of the Gospel, and disturbance of the church; and this conduct in fact is almost always found to accompany antinomian tenets, and is perfectly congenial to them, though not confined to those who adopt them. SCOTT.

(11, 12.) Judge . . . lawgiver. 'A church has no right to command, as a duty, a particular mode of showing our attachment to Christ, unless He had Himself commanded it: . . . nor has it a right to resolve itself into a temperance, abolition, missionary, peace, or any other society. . . Nor can it pledge any member to anything but what he has pledged himself to. He has united himself to a particular church, by promising to obey it in all that Christ has commanded, and in nothing more. In everything else he is perfectly unpledged and uncommitted. An hundred thousand men have, in like manner, united themselves with particular churches, on the same general principle. All are bound to their particular churches, by the same ties, and this is all. All are united to each other by identity of belief and practice, in the things which they all believe Christ to have commanded, and in nothing else. In everything else, every one is as free as the air he breathes, free not only of his particular church, but also of the whole church or denomination. To the particular church with which he is united, he is responsible, under Christ, for his belief and practice, but not to the denomination, nor to any one else. If he imbibe false doctrine, or, by his conduct, give evidence, that the love of Christ is not in him, they may reprove him, or withdraw themselves from him. And here the matter ends. Each voluntary association is thus final within itself. The denomination can neither control nor overrule the decisions of a church, nor approve or censure a single individual. If a man stand faultless before his church, he is faultless before his sect. And for them to assume any authority over him or them, is gross and unblushing arrogance.—Hence, a denomination, as it is called, is a very different thing from what it is currently supposed to be. It is not an association, into the common stock of which a man throws his conscience, his property, his character, and opinions, to be used or abused, to be directed or controlled, by the will of a majority. It is not a clan, of which every member is bound to espouse the quarrels of every other, and of which all the members must rally at the call of him who claims to be their leader, or who volunteers to be their representative. There is no such clanship, for, except in those matters which Christ has enjoined, they are not in any respect committed to each other. There is no such representation, for there is no power to be delegated; and he who assumes it, and those who allow it to be assumed, act in direct variance with the first principles of Independency.

'I insist the more upon this, because, at the present time, there is great danger lest it should all be forgotten. . . If associations, however excellent, wandering beyond their proper limits, assume to legislate over churches, and to control the opinions and the consciences of individuals, by majorities, or by fictitious public opinion, an irresponsible hierarchy will be created in the very bosom of independency. . . A church never invests its delegates to such assemblies, with power to pledge it for anything, nor can it; for no member of it can delegate to any man or set of men, the answering of the question, what does or does not Christ require of me.—I must answer this question for myself, no one else can answer it for me. . . The church is responsible for the cultivation of piety in the hearts of its members. If, through the neglect of piety, benevolence in any respect languishes, for the neglect of piety the church is responsible to Him who is her Head. But she is responsible in no other respect. [Again.] if the church have a right to enjoin a particular matter, on its own authority, it has an equal right to forbid on the same authority; for the right, in both cases, is the same. If a church may command me, on pain of exclusion, to do this particular good in this particular way, it may, if it so choose, enjoin me, on the same authority, to leave it undone. Now this is manifestly a most gross violation of right, and every one, not demented, so esteems it. . . If we surrender the doctrine, that Christ is the sole [Lawgiver or] Legislator for every individual of his church, and allow that the church may itself make laws, binding on the conscience of the individual, what is the result? We become papists at once. This is the very essence of the Romish error. That corrupt church assumes, that it has the power and the right to bind the conscience in all matters, both of faith and practice; and upon this assumption, all the superstructure of her hideous superstition has been reared. But the principle is the same in both cases. If my conscience is to be bound by my fellow-men, it matters not whether these men be a conclave of bishops, and cardinals, or whether they be my brethren whom I meet every day, and with whom I sit down around the same communion table. My brethren will, I doubt not, use this usurped authority more mildly; but this alters not the fact, that the authority is usurped, nor does it offer any guarantee that it may not, in the end, become as oppressive as the other.

'I delight to see every man choosing that form of ecclesiastical association which pleases him. But I may, without offence, ask every Independent to understand and to maintain his principles. In maintaining them, our fathers suffered bonds, confiscation, banishment, and death. Let us not be unmindful of the heritage which they have left us. Let us stand fast in the liberty with which Christ has made us free.' Limitations of Human Responsibility. WAYLAND.

CHAP. V.

punish all disobedience; and therefore should be feared and obeyed as the great Lawgiver, and all judgment should be committed to Him. Since there is one Lawgiver, we may infer, that it is not for any man or company of men in the world, to pretend to give laws immediately to bind conscience; for that is God's prerogative, which must not be invaded; there is one Lawgiver.

II. We are cautioned against a presumptuous confidence of the continuance of our lives, and against forming projects thereupon, with assurance of success, v. 13, 14. The apostle, having reproved those who were judges and condemners of the law, now reproves such as were disregarding of Providence; 'Go to now, an old way of speaking, designed to engage attention; the Greek word may be rendered, Behold now! or See, and consider. Reflect a little on this way of thinking and talking, call yourselves to account for it.' Observe, on this, How apt worldly and projecting men are to leave God out of their schemes; how much of worldly happiness lies in the promises men make to themselves beforehand; therefore observe, how vain a thing it is to look for anything good in futurity, without the concurrence of Providence. We will go to such a city; (say they;) perhaps to Antioch, or Damascus, or Alexandria, which were then the great places for traffic; but how uncertain their journey, their stay, their success, their life! God hath wisely left us in the dark concerning future events, and even concerning the duration of life itself; we know not what shall be on the morrow; we may know what we intend to do, and to be, but a thousand things may happen to prevent us; we are not sure of life itself, since it is but as a vapor; appears but for a little time, and then vanisheth away, vanisheth as to this world, but there is a life that will continue in the other world; and since this life is so uncertain, it concerns us all to prepare and lay up in store [a character] for that to come.

III. We are taught to keep up a constant sense of our dependence on the will of God, for life, and all the actions and enjoyments of it, v. 15. The apostle, having reproved them for what was amiss, now directs them how to be and do better, v. 15. This must be said, not in a slight, formal, and customary way, but so as to think what we say, and so as to be reverent and serious in what we say. 1. If the Lord will, we shall live. We must remember our times are at God's disposal; we live as long as God appoints, and in the circumstances God appoints, and therefore must be submissive to Him, even as to life itself; and then, 2. If the Lord will, we shall do this or that. We may propose for ourselves, or families, or friends; but Providence sometimes breaks all our measures, and throws our schemes into confusion; therefore both our counsels for action, and our conduct in action, should be entirely referred to God; all we design, and all we do, should be with a submissive dependence on God.

IV. We are directed to avoid vain boasting, and to look upon it not only as a weak, but a very evil thing, v. 16. They promised themselves life and prosperity, and great things, in the world, without any just regard to God; and then they boasted of these things, and rejoiced in them. Such is the joy of worldly people, to boast of all their successes, yea often to boast of their very projects before they know what success they shall have. How common is it for men to boast of things which they have no other title to, than what arises from their own vanity and presumption. Such rejoicing, says the apostle, is evil; it is foolish and hurtful for men to boast of worldly things, and of their aspiring projects, when they should be attending to the humbling duties before laid down in v. 8—10. It is a great sin in God's account, it will bring great disappointments on themselves, and will prove their destruction in the end. If we rejoice in God, that our times are in his hand, that all events are at his disposal, and that He is our God in covenant, this rejoicing is good; the wisdom, power, and providence of God, are then concerned to make all things work together for our good; [when our wills are consonant with his;] but if we rejoice in our own vain confidences and presumptions, this is evil; it is an evil carefully to be avoided by all wise and good men.

V. We are taught, in the whole of our conduct, to act up to our own convictions, and, whether we have to do with God or men, to see that we never go contrary to our own knowledge, v. 17. To do so is aggravated sin, and is to have the worst witness against us that can be, even our own conscience. Observe, This stands immediately connected with the plain lesson of saving, If the Lord will, we shall do this or that; they might be ready to say, 'This is a very obvious thing; who knows not that we depend on Almighty God for life, and breath, and all things?' Remember then, if you do know this, that whenever you act unsuitably to such a dependence, to him that knows to do good, and does it not, to him it is sin, the greater sin. Let us therefore take care that conscience be rightly informed, and then that it be faithfully and constantly obeyed; for if our own hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God; but if we say, We see, and do not act suitably to our sight, then our sin remaineth, John 9: 41.

CHAP. V. V. 1—11. The apostle here addresses first sinners, and then saints.

I. Sinners; here James seconds what Christ had said, Luke 6:24. Those here

PRACT. OBS. The carnal affections of the heart having cast off the rule of reason and wisdom, anarchy, and civil war, takes place in the soul; while one member of the corrupt nature wars against the rest, and they in turns prevail and are gratified; and while the members of the body are the instruments of their pernicious purposes, and obey the dictates of the tyrant of the hour.—This being, in one way or another, the case with the unnumbered millions of the human species, (except the remnant who are 'born again,') we need not wonder at the confusion, crimes, and miseries, which have, in every age, abounded in all parts of the world, though we ought deeply to mourn over them.—Alas! how many nominal Christians might be addressed in the apostle's words, 'as adulterers and adulteresses,' both literally and spiritually! And yet, how would they be disgusted and enraged, if a minister were to accost them in such language, however justly and scripturally applied! But, in whatever terms the offensive truth be conveyed, we are bound to declare, most perspicuously, that 'the friendship of the world is enmity against God; and that whosoever willeth and purposeth to be the friend of the world, he is the enemy of God.' Such a profession of the Gospel, as gives no offence to a 'world that lieth in wickedness,' will leave a man to perish with the enemies of Christ. Let us then endeavor to be friends to mankind, and to do good to all: to separate from the intimate society of ungodly men, and to profess the truths and obey the precepts of Christ; not inquiring how far we may do it without incurring reproach, contempt, opprobrious names, or other kinds and degrees of persecution.—Alas! too many professed Christians seem openly to quit the place of the servants of God, and doers of his commandments, to set up for judges, and to prescribe to their fellow-servants, or decide on their eternal state. But let us leave them, and all others, to their own Master, remembering, that 'there is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy;' and let us be careful to judge ourselves, that we may not be condemned by Him; Rom. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 11:29—34. remembering, that omitting known duty is as criminal as committing known sin. S.

V. 13—17. The apostle next proceeds to reprove and expose the self-sufficiency, worldly spirit, and unbelieving, irreligious language, which were manifested by many in another way. The expression, 'Go to now,' or 'Come now,' here implied strong disapprobation, and a call to any one to consider the absurdity, or ungodliness of his conduct. M. R. l.

(17.) 'I appeal to every man who has ever used his [time and] substance for the welfare, and especially the spiritual welfare, of others. Of all the money he has expended that has yielded him the most pleasure which has been devoted to benevolent purposes. On the score of enjoyment, the gratification of all the animal appetites, all the selfish desires, and even the domestic and social affections falls infinitely below the gratification of Christian benevolence. And, as it is so much superior to other pleasures, so it is more permanent. Low, selfish gratifications afford no pleasure in review, and are generally succeeded by the bitterness of remorse. Hence, the lovers of worldly pleasure avoid reflection, and seek relief in new scenes of dissipation. But the man of active benevolence loves to recall past pleasures, and in the recollection, with a peaceful conscience and new excitement of benevolent feeling, he enjoys them again and again. Be rich therefore in good works.' Rev. Dr. Woods. — 'Though the assertion may fly like chain shot among us, and rake down all before it, I will again and again assert, that every one of us might do more good than he does: and therefore we ought to be exceedingly humbled, that we have done so little good in the world. I am not uncharitable in saying, that I know not one assembly of Christians on earth, which ought not to be a Boshim on this consideration. The most useful men in the world have gone out of it, crying, "Lord forgive our sins of omission." — "Those who devote themselves to good devices, and who duly observe their opportunities to do good, usually find a wonderful increase of their opportunities. addressed were not professed Christians, but the worldly, unbelieving Jews, such as are here said to condemn and kill the Just; the infidel Jews would not hear the Word, therefore it is written, that they might read it; it is observable, this epistle is not directed, as Paul's epistles were, to the brethren in Christ, but, in general, to the twelve tribes; and the salutation is not, grace and peace from Christ, but, in general, greeting; ch. 1:1. many poor among the Jews believed; but the generality of the rich rejected Christianity, were hardened in unbelief, and hated and persecuted those who believed; to these oppressing, unbelieving, persecuting, rich people, the apostle directs himself in the first six verses.

He foretells the judgments of God, that should come on them, v. 1, 3. miserics, and such dreadful miserics, that the very apprehension of them was enough to make them weep and howl; miserics that should arise from the very things in which they placed their happiness, and miserics that should be completed by these things witnessing against them at the last, to their utter destruction; and they are now called to reason upon, and thoroughly to weigh, the matter, and to think how they will stand before God in judgment. Rich men are apt to say to themselves, (and others are ready to say to them,) Eat, drink, and be merry; but God says, Weep and howl. It is not said, Weep and repent, for this the apostle does not expect from them, (he speaks in a way of denouncing rather than admonishing,) but, Weep and howl, for, when your doom comes, there will be nothing but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Those who live like beasts, are called to howl like such. Public calamities are most grievous to rich people, who live in pleasure, and are secure and sensual; and therefore they shall weep and howl more than other people for the miserics that shall come upon them. They think to heap up treasure for their last days, to live plentifully on when old; but alas! they are only heaping up treasures to become a prey to others; (as the Jews had all taken from them by the Romans;) and treasures that will prove at last to be only treasures of wrath, in the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God; then shall their iniquities, in the punishment of them, eat their flesh, as it were with fire. In the ruin of Jerusalem, many thousands perished by fire; in the last judgment the wicked shall be condemned to everlasting burnings, prepared for the devil and his angels.

The Lord deliver us from the portion of wicked rich men! and, in order to this, let us take care that we do not fall into their sins, which we are next to consider.

1. Covetousness; laid by garments, and hoarded up gold and silver: it is a very great disgrace to these things, that they carry in them the principles of their own corruption and consumption; but the disgrace is most heavy on those who hoard and lay up these things till they come to be thus corrupted, and cankered, and eaten. God gives us our worldly possessions, that we may honor Him, and do good with them; but if, instead of that, we sinfully hoard them up, through an undue affection toward them, or a distrust of the providence of God for the future, this is a very heinous crime, and will be witnessed against by the very rust and corruption of the treasure thus heaped together.

2. Oppression, v. 4. Those who have wealth in their hands, get power into their hands, and then they are tempted to abuse that power to oppress such as are under them: the rich, having power in their hands, probably made as hard bargains with the poor as they could; and, even after that, would not make good their bargain as they should have done. This is a crying sin, an iniquity that cries so as to reach the ears of God; and, in this case, God is to be considered as the Lord of sabaoth, or the Lord of hosts,—a phrase often used in the Old Test. when the people of God were defenceless, and wanted protection; and when their enemies were numerous and powerful. The Lord of hosts, who has all ranks of beings and creatures at his disposal, and who sets all in their several places, He hears the oppressed when they cry, by reason of the cruelty or injustice of the oppressor, and He will order some of his hosts,—angels, devils, storms, distempers, or the like,—to avenge the wrongs done to those who are dealt with unrighteously and unmercifully. Take heed of this sin of defrauding and oppressing, and avoid the very appearances of it.

3. Sensuality and voluptuousness, v. 5. God does not forbid us to use pleasure; but to live in it as if we lived for nothing else, is a very provoking sin; and to do this on the earth, where we are but strangers and pilgrims, to continue but for a while, and where we ought to be preparing for eternity,—this is a grievous aggravation of the sin of voluptuousness. Luxury makes people wanton, as in Hos. 13:6. It is hard for people to have great estates, and not too much indulge themselves in carnal, sensual pleasures. Some may say, 'What harm in good cheer, provided people do not spend above what they have?' What! is it no harm for people to spend that in superfluities, which ought to be spent in charity; and to unfit themselves for minding the concerns of their souls, by indulging the appetites of their bodies? Surely that which brought flames on Sodom, and would bring these miserics for which rich men are here called to weep and howl, must be a heinous evil!

desolations, which Christ had predicted, and his disciples expected, Mat. 24: Mark 13: Luke 21: Above all their other crimes, the Jews had iniquitously condemned and crucified, with the suffrage, as it were, of the whole nation, that 'Just One' who had come among them, even 'Jesus Christ the righteous,' and they still perpetuated that enormous crime, by persecuting his meek and harmless followers. Hitherto He had not resisted them, but had meekly and patiently endured their injuries, and they had no pretence for their outrageous enmity and cruelty to Him and his disciples. But He was about to come, and to execute most terrible vengeance on them. (3) Cankered.] From ios, poison, or rust, 3:8. Rom. 3:13. The rust of some metals is poisonous; hence the same word signifies both rust and poison.—(4) Lord of sabaoth.] JEHOVAH sabaoth, 'Lord of hosts,' occurs continually in the O. T. and the apostle, referring to it, retains the Heb. word sabaoth; yet substitutes Kurios, Lord, for JEHOVAH, which is not used in the N. T. Se.

(2, 3.) 'Those treasures which have been amassed, and suffered to rust and decay in useless hoards, instead of having been brightened by a liberal circulation, "will be a witness against you, and will eat your flesh as it were fire," i. e. will show that you have not properly employed them, and will consequently occasion severe misery and woe.' Holden, Mat. 8:4. 10:18. [Indeed, as wealth is a talent committed to one's stewardship, it seems improper to wait till the grasp upon it is loosening by death, before it is employed, for one knows not the mischief or good it may do; whereas, were it properly laid out by its possessor in service to God and man, while enjoying the use of his abilities, its disposal could be regulated to the best advantage. And this would seem to be a duty; and the accumulation of wealth, with an intention to give it away, when one can retain it no longer, is unwise, at the least.]

'Bp. Jebb well remarks, that "the enumeration of the various kinds of wealth, is a poetical amplification, containing a climax. Three kinds of wealth are intended: 1. stores of corn, wine, oil, &c. liable to putrefaction; 2. wardrobes of rich garments; among the ancients, especially the orientals, a principal portion of their wealth [for their fashions do not change], and proverbially the prey of the moth (see Is. 51:8.); 3. treasures of gold and silver, liable to rust, or, at least, to change of color.—Again, the rust of the precious metals, rising as a witness against avaricious hoarders, is a very noble personification; and the terror is heightened, when, in the next line, it becomes a fire that preys upon their vitals." From the classics, it fully appears, that the gold and silver utensils of ancient times, were subject to something like rust; probably from the metal having a greater proportion of alloy than that of modern times. [Certain gases tarnish both gold and silver.] In eat, &c. Pott supposes an image, borrowed from the painful and deleterious effects of rust when rubbed into raw flesh; an apt designation of the present misery and future woe, unutterable and never ending, which results from the abuse of riches, or the amassing of them by unlawful methods. Yet there is, I conceive, also an allusion to the "fire that is not quenched," which must partly be alluded to in the next clause; with which, indeed, many eminent contrs. ancient and modern, construe the preceding words, in the sense, "ye have, as it were, treasured up fire to consume you in the last days." But there appears no reason to abandon the common construction, by which the words are taken with the preceding. As to Dr. Burton's objections, that "it occasions a confusion of metaphor, and leaves the verb lay up without an accusative;" the former is of no weight in a passage, like this, of Æschylean sublimity; and the latter is utterly without force; since the accusative, by a common idiom, is included in the verb itself. So Bp. Jebb well explains, "Ye have laid up treasures for the 'last days':—treasures! but of what kind? Let the last days tell: the days of the destruction of your nation." Paul (Rom. 2:5.) fully expresses what James indignantly suppresses, "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." The mythological fiction of Tantalus (who was punished with an insatiable desire for what he could not enjoy), imitates a fine moral lesson, respecting the punishment of avarice even in this world." See Bloomfield's N. T. with Notes. B.

(3.) 'The man who possesses riches, and who lives and dies in an age like this, without giving any considerable portion to benevolent and pious objects, has no honor from God, and deserves none from man. He sinks himself, his name, and his riches, into contempt: and though he leaves a large estate to his heirs, he leaves no blessing of God with it.' Rev. Dr. Woods.

(4.) Hire of laborers kept back by fraud.] How common a sin, yet how seldom noted! How often, in a case of bankruptcy, are the rich secured, and the poor denied their hard earnings. How much of their only property, time, is stolen, by compelling day-laborers to call again and again for daily or weekly wages, 'kept back:' and how entirely is the consequent misery forgotten, yea, their wages spent in extravagance, and wanton luxuries. How many females are thus, or from insufficient wages, tempted to prostitution, how many negroes to despair in bitter bondage by this selfishness! Better, far better, for master and for slave, white or black, to hire liberally and pay punctually. See treatises on Political Economy. Ed.—'Alas! how much of the silver and the gold of the world is buried in hands, where it is little better than conveyed back to the mines whence it came!' MATHER.

(6.) The just.] 'Bp. Middleton remarks, that the hypothetic use of the article, by which ton dikaion [singular] would be for tous dikaios, [plural], is much too strong; and the strictly definitive use would point out the eminently Just One. On any other supposition than that the passage was meant of the condemnation of our Savior, terms so obvi-

Pride, and idleness, and fulness of bread, mean the same thing with living in pleasure, and being wanton, and nourishing the heart as in a day of slaughter.

4. Persecution, v. 6. This fills up the measure of their iniquity. They oppressed, to get estates; when they had them, they gave way to luxury and sensuality, till they had lost all sense and feeling of the wants or afflictions of others; and then they persecute and kill without remorse: they pretend to act legally, indeed; they condemn before they kill; but unjust prosecutions, whatever color of law they may carry in them, will come into the reckoning when God shall make inquisition for blood, as well as massacres and downright murders. Thus far the address to sinners goes.

II. We have next subjoined an address to saints: some despise or condemn this way of preaching to sinners, and to saints; but, from the apostle's here taking this method, we may conclude, that this is the best way rightly to divide the Word of truth. From what has been said concerning wicked and oppressing rich men, occasion is given to administer comfort to God's afflicted people.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-11. The rich, who are luxurious and haughty, yea, all who now scornfully refuse to mourn for their sins, will soon be forced to weep and howl, under the miseries which are coming upon them. The doom of unfaithful stewards will then be very dreadful; but the cruel injustice and oppression, with which many treat their dependents and laborers, by whose toil and ingenuity they are enriched, and whom they leave to penury and distress, will cry for most tremendous vengeance, 'in the ears of the Lord of hosts.'—But let the poor and afflicted Christian patiently wait for the coming of his Lord, as 'the husbandman waits for the precious fruit of the earth;' the good seed, which he now sows in pain, and waters with tears, will spring up and soon ripen to a harvest of eternal joy. Ps. 126:5, 6. P. O. Let us ously applicable to that event would hardly have been employed. "Moreover," says Bp. Jebb, "our Lord is often so styled in Scripture; as Ac. 3:14, 15. 7:5. And the murder of our Lord was the great national transgression of the Jews, and therefore likely to be mentioned by James as the consummation of their apostasy." Midl. tr. "The Savior opposes not your perverseness, but leaves you a prey to the delusion;" or, as Bp. Jebb paraphrases, "He is not arrayed against you; you feel secure; you despise the Crucified, as still powerless to vindicate his own cause, and to protect his followers: but wait: the time of his array will come; the day of vengeance is at hand." BLOOMF.

V. 7, 8. He primarily meant the providential coming of the Lord Jesus, to deliver them from the persecution of the Jewish rulers, and to execute vengeance on that devoted nation; yet He intended, no doubt, to lead their thoughts forward to the hour of death, and the coming of Christ to judgment. Mat. 24: 25. (7) Be patient.] The verb, and its derivatives, are used, for the forbearance, which God exercises towards sinners, in delaying to punish them; 10, Rom. 2:4. 9:22. 2 Pet. 3:9, 15. of the same lenity, exercised by men; Mat. 18:26, 29. Acts 26:3. 1 Cor. 13:4. Eph. 4:2. 1 Thes. 5:14; of the Lord's delay to rescue his persecuted servants; Luke 13:7. and of man's patient waiting for and expecting promised mercies, in persevering faith and obedience; Gal. 5:22. Heb. 6:15. SCOTT.

1. Attend to your duty; Be patient, v. 7. stablish your hearts, v. 8. grudge not one against another, brethren, v. 9. Consider well the meaning of these three expressions: (1.) 'Be patient; bear your afflictions without murmuring, your injuries without revenge; and though God should not in any signal manner appear for you immediately, wait for Him. Let your patience be lengthened out to long-suffering;' so the word here used signifies. When we have done our work, we have need of patience to stay for our reward. Be patient to the coming of the Lord. And because this is a lesson Christians must learn, though ever so hard or difficult, it is repeated in v. 8. Be ye also patient. (2.) 'Stablish your hearts; let your faith be firm, without wavering; your practice of what is good, constant, and continued, without tiring; and your resolutions for God and heaven fixed, in spite of all sufferings or temptations.' The prosperity of the wicked, and the affliction of the righteous, have, in all ages, been a very great trial to the faith of the people of God. So David, Ps. 73:2. Some to whom James wrote, might probably be in the same tottering condition; therefore they are called on to establish their hearts; faith and patience will establish the heart. (3.) Grudge not one against another; the words signify, Groan not one against another; that is, 'Do not make one another uneasy by your murmuring groans at what befalls you; your distrustful groans as to what may further come upon you; your revengeful groans against the instruments of your sufferings; or by your envious groans at those who may be free from your calamities: do not make yourselves and one another uneasy, by thus groaning to and grieving one another.' Dr. Manton thinks James refers here to different classes of Christians, as of circumcision and uncircumcision, at variance with each other. Those who are in the midst of common enemies, and in suffering circumstances, should be more especially careful not to grieve one another, otherwise judgments will come on them as well as others; and the more such grudgings prevail, the nearer do they show judgment to be.

2. Consider what encouragement here is for Christians to be patient, to stablish their hearts, and not to grudge one against another. (1.) 'Look to the example of the husbandman; and if you should be called to wait a little longer than the husbandman, is not a crown of glory something proportionably greater, and infinitely more worth your waiting for?' 'But,' (2.) 'Think how short your waiting time may possibly be, v. 8, 9. Do not be impatient, do not quarrel with one another; the great Judge, who will set all to rights, is at hand: He should be conceived by you as at the door.' The coming of the Lord, to punish the wicked Jews, was then very nigh, when James wrote this epistle; and, whenever the graces of his people are tried in an extraordinary manner, the certainty of Christ's coming as Judge, and the nearness of it, should establish their hearts. The Judge is now a great deal nearer, in his coming to judge the world, than when this epistle was written; therefore this should have the greater effect on us. (3.) The danger of our being condemned when the Judge appears, should excite us to mind our duty as before laid down; Grudge not, lest ye be condemned. Fretfulness and discontent expose us to the just judgment of God, and we bring more calamities on ourselves by our murmuring, distrustful, envious groans and grudgings against one another, than we are aware of. If we avoid these evils, and be patient under our trials, God will not condemn us. Let us encourage ourselves with this. (4.) We are encouraged to be patient, by the example of the prophets, v. 10. Observe, here, The prophets, on whom God put the greatest honor, and for whom He had the greatest favor, were most afflicted: and when we think that the best men have had the hardest usage in this world, we should hereby be reconciled to affliction. Observe, further, Those who were the greatest examples of suffering affliction, are also the best and greatest examples of patience: tribulation worketh patience. Hereupon James gives it us as the common sense of the faithful, v. 11. We count them happy who endure: we look upon righteous and patient sufferers as the happiest people. See ch. 1:2-12. (5.) Job also is proposed as an example for the encouragement of the afflicted, v. 11. Under all his miseries, he was patient and humble; and what came to him in the end? Why, truly, God accomplished and brought about those things for him, that plainly prove the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. The best way to bear afflictions, is, to look to the end of them; and the pity of God is such, that He will not delay the bringing of them to an end, when his purposes are once answered; and the tender mercy of God is such, that He will make his people an abundant amends for all their sufferings and afflictions.

V. 12-20. This epistle now drawing to a close, the penman goes off very quick from one thing to another; hence it is that mat-

then 'patiently continue in well doing,' having 'our hearts established with grace,' and realizing expectations of the great day of retribution.—It does not become Christians to grudge one against another, or to envy, repine, despond, or dispute; rather let us prepare to meet our 'Judge, who standeth at the door,' that we may not be condemned at his coming.—The event will clear up the darkness of all the Lord's dealings with his people; and whatever they or others have thought during the continuance of their trials, in the end it will appear as evident in the case of every one of them, as it did in that of Job, nay, far more illustriously evident, that 'the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy,' and that they are happy, who patiently trust in Him, and keep his commandments. SCOTT.

V. 9-11. It would also be wholly inconsistent for the Christians to grudge one another the transient advantages which some possessed and others did not; or to give way to envy, discontent, repinings, or resentment; lest 'the coming of the Lord' should prove their condemnation, instead of their redemption.—(9) Grudge.] Mark 7:34. Rom. 8:23. 2 Cor. 5:2. Heb. 13:17.—The temptation to envy the prosperity of their oppressors, to murmur under their own sufferings, and to allow a spirit of resentment against their enemies, seems especially meant. SCOTT.

(10.) 'The example of God is constantly proposed to us in Scripture, as the most unexceptionably worthy of our imitation. But God being no object of our senses, the Scripture hath added to it that of Christ, the visible Image of the invisible God. But here, again, there is a sort of excuse for falling so very far short of our Pattern, from the frailties of our nature, and the turbulencies of our passions. To remove, therefore, all exceptions of this sort, we have the rules of morality reduced to practice, by men like ourselves, who had, indeed, the divine assistance to strengthen their infirmity; and so may we, if we seek it as they did.' Dr. JORTIN.

V. 12. 'It was a proverbial manner, among the Jews, . . . of characterizing a man of strict probity and good faith, by saying, His yes is yes, and his no is no; i. e. you may depend on his word; as he declares, so it is; and as he promises, so he will do.' Campbell. 'We ought never to ren, swear 'not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.

13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms.

14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:

ters so very different are insisted on in these few verses.

I. The sin of swearing is cautioned against, v. 12. Some understand this too strictly, as if the meaning was, 'Swear not at your persecutors;' but the apostle's warning extends to other occasions of swearing as well as this; some have translated above, by before; and so made the sense to be, that they should not, in common conversation, before everything they say, put an oath. Profane swearing was very customary among the Jews; and, since this epistle is directed in general to the twelve tribes scattered abroad, we may conceive this exhortation sent to those who believed not. It is hard to suppose swearing should be one of the spots of God's children; but, possibly, some of the looser sort of those called Christians, might, among other sins here charged on them, be guilty also of this. It is a sin that has most scandalously prevailed, and many make light of nothing so much as common profane swearing! But why, above all things, is swearing here forbidden? Because it strikes most directly at the honor of God, and has, of all sins, the least temptation to it; neither gain, nor pleasure, nor reputation, that can move men to it, but a wantonness in sinning, and a needless showing of enmity to God, Ps. 139:20. This is a proof of men's being enemies to God; it is also a sin that is most hardly left off when once men are accustomed to it; therefore it should, above all others, be watched against. And once more, Above all things, swear not; for how can you expect God should be a strong tower to you in your distress?

Baxter observes, 'All this is so far from swear, but to be so universally observant of truth in our conversation, that our word may always be regarded as an oath.' Philo, in Campbell.

(13.) Notes, Eph. 5:19. Col. 3:16. 'The heathens, in their drunken festivals to the god of wine, used to celebrate his bounty in impure and wanton songs. The Ephesians, [&c.] just converted from paganism, the apostle instructs in a more excellent devotion,—to sing not impure, but spiritual songs; not to the god of wine, but to the Lord of nature; not so as to corrupt but to comfort and edify one another. Singing is enjoined [on us] as a sacred branch of social worship. We are wonderfully made; and the capacity of uttering a tuneful variety of sounds, is not the smallest wonder in our formation; and there is the same reason why the musical, as any other faculty, should be consecrated to God.—Psalmody was an instituted part of the Jewish worship. Many devout songs and psalms were composed by inspiration, and from the days of David, there was a select number of singers, instructed and supported at public expense, to carry on this branch of worship. In the N. T. we find that psalmody is an ordinance of Christ. After the institution of the Lord's Supper, "they sung a hymn." Paul and Silas in prison, "sang praises to God." The apostle exhorted the Ephesians and Colossians, to maintain this branch of worship. The early fathers exhorted the church to do the same, and heathen writers say, "It was a custom among Christians to assemble on a certain day, and sing hymns to Christ, as unto God;" and the church in heaven are represented as "singing the song of Moses and the Lamb," and "singing a new song." By psalms, then, is doubtless intended that book which passes under this name, and is canonical; by hymns, perhaps such compositions as those of Moses, Hannah, Simeon, &c.; by spiritual songs, those which were composed under the immediate influence of the Spirit. That there was such a spiritual gift in the apostolic age, is evident from 1 Cor. 14.—The apostle directs us to sing, making melody,—with the understanding,—with grace,—teaching and admonishing one another. The use of music in worship, is, to assist and enliven the devotion of the heart; and when performed with skill, melody of sound, and exactness of time, and harmony, it greatly contributes to this end. But a confused and grating discord chills devotion, and damps the ardor of the soul. Great care was taken that singers, in Jewish worship, should be well instructed. We may form some conception of the solemnity of the temple-worship, forbidding necessary oaths, that it is but to confirm them, by preserving the due reverence of them.' And then he further notes, 'That the true nature of an oath is, by our speech, to pawn the reputation of some certain or great thing, for the averring of a doubted less thing; and not, as is commonly held, an appeal to God, or other judge.' Hence it was that swearing by the heavens, and by the earth, and by the other oaths the apostle refers to, came to be in use. The Jews thought if they did but admit the great oath of Chû-Eloah, they were safe. But they grew so profane as to swear by the creature, as if it was God; while, on the other hand, they who swear commonly and profanely by the name of God, do hereby put Him on the level with every common thing.

But let your yea be yea, and your nay nay; lest you fall into condemnation; that is, 'Let it suffice you to affirm or deny a thing as there is occasion; it is being suspected of falsehood, that leads men to swear. Let it be known that you keep to truth, and are firm to your word, and by this mean you will find there is no need to swear to what you say. Thus shall you escape the condemnation which is expressly annexed to the third commandment; The Lord will not hold him guiltless, that taketh his name in vain.'

II. As Christians, we are taught to suit ourselves to the dispensations of Providence, v. 13. Our condition in this world is various; and our wisdom is to submit to its being so, and to behave as becomes us, both in prosperity and under affliction. Afflictions should put us on prayer; and prosperity should make us abound in praise. Not that prayer is to be confined to a time of trouble, or singing to a time of mirth; but these several duties may be performed with special advantage, and to the happiest purposes, at such seasons.

1. In a day of affliction, nothing is more seasonable than prayer. The person afflicted must pray himself, as well as engage the prayers of others for him. Times of affliction should be praying times. Is any afflicted? Let him pray.

2. In a day of mirth and prosperity, singing psalms is very proper and seasonable. In the original it is only said, sing, without the addition of psalms, or any other word; and we learn from the writings of several in the first ages of Christianity, (particularly from a letter of Pliny's, and from some passages in Justin Martyr and Tertullian,) that the Christians were used to sing hymns, either taken out of Scripture, or of more private composure, in their worship of God. Though some have thought that Paul's advising both the Colossians and Ephesians to speaking one to another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, refers only to the compositions of Scripture; the Psalms of David being distinguished in Heb. by Shurim, Terhillim, and Mizmorim, words that exactly answer these of the apostle. Let that be as it will, this we are sure of, that singing psalms is a gospel-ordinance, and that our joy should be holy joy, consecrated to God. Holy mirth becomes families and retirements, as well as public assemblies. Let our singing be such as to make melody with our hearts unto the Lord, and God will assuredly be well pleased with this kind of devotion.

III. We have particular directions given as to sick persons; and healing, pardoning mercy promised, on the observance of those directions, v. 14, 15. If any be sick, they are required, 1. To send for the elders, the presbyters, pastors or ministers of the church. It lies on sick people as a duty, to send for ministers, and to desire their assistance and their prayers. 2. It is the duty of ministers to pray over the sick, when thus desired and called for. 3. In the times of miraculous healing, the sick was to be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. Expositors generally confine this anointing with oil to such as had the power of working miracles; and when miracles ceased, this institution ceased also. In Mark's gospel we read of the apostles' anointing with oil many that were sick, and healing them, Mk. 6:13. And we have accounts of this being practised in the church two hundred years after Christ; but then the gift of healing also accompanied it; when that miraculous gift ceased, this rite was laid aside. The papists, indeed, have made a sacrament of this, which they call the extreme unction. They use it, not to heal the sick, as it was used by the apostles; but, as they generally run counter to Scripture, in the appointments of their church, so here they ordain, that this should be administered only to such as are at the very point of death. The apostles' anointing was in order to heal the disease; the popish anointing is for the expulsion of the relics of sin, and to enable the soul, as they pretend, the better to combat with the powers of the air. Some Protestants have thought that this by the allusions to it in Rev. 5, &c.—Singing being a part of religious worship, it should as well as our prayers be directed to God. We must "make melody in our hearts,"—sing with a sense of God's presence, and with affections corresponding to the matter of the psalm. If the subject be petition, confession, thanksgiving, or adoration, our hearts must harmonize with it. All should take a part in it, and if any are unable to join with their voices, they should not less than others make melody in their hearts. Every one according to his ability is bound to promote the psalmody of the church; as many as are capable, by acquiring the skill and taking an active part, and they who cannot do this, by aiding and furnishing others the means of instruction, by countenancing efforts to improve it, and by cheerfully sharing in the expense of maintaining it. Finally, let the thought be deeply impressed on every heart, that psalmody is a branch of divine worship; not a theatrical exhibition, but a religious solemnity. [Comp. Eph. 5:19.] LATHROP.

V. 14, 15. As miraculous cures are not now expected, the symbolical action of 'anointing with oil' cannot properly be retained.—It need scarcely be observed, that the extreme unction, used by the church of Rome, totally differs from the anointing recommended by James; for that is never administered, till the sick person is supposed to be at the point of death, and no hope is entertained of his recovery: so that a spiritual benefit alone can be proposed by the ceremony; which on the contrary serves merely as an opiate, to quiet and stupify the consciences, both of the dying, and of the living.—It cannot be supposed, that these miraculous cures could be performed at all times: but there seems to have been some impression on the mind of the person, who wrought the miracle, and a peculiar exercise of faith in Christ for that purpose. It might be proper for Christians, always, when sick, to send for their pastors to counsel and pray for them; though the visiting of the sick, by ministers exclusively, is not particularly spoken of in Scripture, as it might have been expected that it would.—The indiscriminate visiting, praying in the same words for persons of all characters, and giving the Lord's supper to sick and dying persons, without particular and appropriate instructions and exhortations, as it is too commonly managed, is doubtless of extremely bad tendency, and a relic of popish superstition and formality. For it not only gives a false quiet to many of those, who have then first begun to think about God and their souls, but it encourages others to procrastinate, under a delusive imagination, that a anointing was only permitted or approved by Christ, not instituted. But it should seem, by James here, that it was enjoined in cases where there was faith for healing. And some Protestants have argued for it with this view. It was not to be commonly used, not even in the apostolical age; and some have thought it should not be wholly laid aside in any age; but that, where there are extraordinary measures of faith in the person anointing, and in those who are anointed, an extraordinary blessing may attend the observance of this direction for the sick. However that be, one thing is carefully to be observed here, that the saving of the sick is not ascribed to the anointing with oil, but to prayer, v. 15. So that, 4. Prayer over the sick must proceed from, and be accompanied with, a lively faith. There must be faith both in the person praying, and in the person prayed for. 5. We should observe the success of prayer. The Lord shall raise up; that is, if God has anything farther for such a person to do in the world. And if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him; i. e. where sickness is sent as a punishment for some particular sin, that sin shall be pardoned; and in token thereof, the sickness shall be removed. As when Christ said to the impotent man, Go and sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee, it is intimated that some particular sin was the cause of his sickness. The great thing, therefore, we should beg of God for ourselves and others in the time of sickness, is, the pardon of sin. When healing is founded on pardon, we may say as Hezekiah did; Thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption, Isa. 38:17. When you are sick, and in pain, it is most common to pray and cry, Oh give me ease! Oh restore me to health! But your prayer should rather and chiefly be, Oh that God would pardon my sins!

IV. Christians are directed to confess their faults one to another, and so to join in their prayers with and for one another, v. 16. Some expositors connect this v. 16. with v. 14. As if, when sick people send for ministers to pray over them, they should then confess their faults to them. Indeed, where any are conscious that their sickness is a vindictive punishment of some particular sin, it may be proper they should do so, that those who pray over them may know how to plead rightly for them. But the confession here required, is, that of Christians one to another, and not, as the papists would have it, to a priest. Where persons have injured one another, acts of injustice must be confessed to those against whom they have been committed. Where persons have tempted one another to sin, or have consented in the same evil actions, there they ought mutually to blame themselves, and excite each other to repentance. Where crimes are of a public nature, and have done any public mischief, there they ought to be more publicly confessed, so as may best reach to all who are concerned. And sometimes it may be well to confess our faults to some prudent minister, or praying friend, that they may help us to plead with God for mercy and pardon. But then we are not to think James puts us on telling everything that we are conscious is amiss in ourselves, or in one another: but so far as confession is necessary to our reconciliation with such as are at variance with us, or for reparation of wrongs done to any, or for gaining information in any point of conscience, and making our own spirits quiet and easy; so far, we should be ready to confess our faults. And sometimes, also, it may be of good use to Christians, to disclose their peculiar weaknesses and infirmities to one another, where there are great intimacies and friendships; and where they may help each other by their prayer to obtain pardon of their sins, and power against them. Those who make confession of their faults one to another, should, thereupon, pray with and for one another. The 13th verse directs persons to pray for themselves; Is any afflicted, let Him pray: the 14th directs to seek for the prayers of ministers; and the 16th directs private Christians to pray one for another; so that here we have all sorts of prayer (ministerial, social, and secret) recommended.

V. The great advantage and efficacy of prayer is declared and proved; witness the example of Elias, v. 17, 18. He who prays, must be a righteous man; not righteous in an absolute sense, (for this Elias was not, who is here made a pattern to us,) but righteous in a gospel-sense; not loving or approving of any known iniquity, Ps. 66:18. Further, the prayer itself must be a fervent, IN-WROUGHT, well-wrought prayer, a pouring out of the heart to God, from faith unfeigned. Such prayer avails much. It is of great advantage to ourselves, may be very beneficial to our friends, and we are assured is acceptable to God. It is good having those for friends, whose prayers are available in the sight of God.

The power of prayer is here proved from the success of Elijah, who prayed earnestly, or as it is in the original, in prayer he prayed. Thus, you see, prayer is the key which opens and shuts heaven, to which Rev. 11:6. alludes, and this instance of the extraordinary efficacy of prayer is recorded, for encouragement even to ordinary Christians to be instant and earnest in prayer. If Elijah by prayer could do such great and wonderful things, surely the prayers of no righteous man shall return void.

VI. This epistle concludes with an exhortation to do all we can in our places to further and promote the conversion and salvation of others, v. 19, 20. Some interpret these vs. as the apostle's apology for so plainly and sharply reproving the Jewish Christians for their many faults and errors. But we are not to restrain this place to the apostle's converting such as erred from the truth; since, let him be who he will that does so confession, a prayer, a ministerial absolution, and the sacrament, will set all right at last; without any previous diligence in the duties of a godly life. On the other hand, if nothing but a miraculous cure was sought, there could be no sufficient reason, why 'the elders of the church,' rather than others, who were endued with miraculous gifts should be sent for. The plural number is used; and, where it could be obtained, the presence of more than one minister would be desirable: but it cannot be supposed, that this was indispensably necessary.—That any difficulty should be found, about the persons intended by 'the elders of the church,' would have been inconceivable to the author, had he never read anything on the subject, except the N. T.: but some have supposed that the apostles themselves are meant! SCOTT.

(14.) Oil, &c.] On this subject we get little satisfaction from comtrs., who take opposite views, according to their respective habits of believing too little or too much: and the reader will form his opinion from the text. 'There can be little doubt,' says Bl., 'that in the next generation the thing became (what, indeed, most recent comtrs. here suppose it) a solemn religious ceremony, comprehending a symbolical rite, the use of which tended to produce the blessings prayed for, as far as was consistent with the plans of divine Providence.' 'As the miraculous gifts of healing have long ceased, the symbolical ceremony of anointing with oil ought not to be retained.' Bl. Ed.

V. 16—18. Such a confession of faults one to another, does not in any respect resemble the practice, which the church of Rome had absurdly grounded upon it, of the laity being required to confess all their secret sins to the priests, in order to their being pardoned and absolved. For thus, that order of men, who are in themselves no less ambitious, interested, and prone to vice, than other orders in the society, is put in possession of the secrets of families, nay, of councils and princes, of which they have made abundant use, to their own aggrandizement, to the enslaving of the laity, and for many other most mischievous purposes. Thus also they discover the weak and vulnerable side of almost every individual; which opens the way to their attempting and committing crimes of every kind. But 'the confession of faults,' spoken of by the apostle, is no more that of a layman to a priest, than that of a priest to a layman: it is reciprocal between Christians; and voluntary, that it may be regulated according to prudence and propriety, for the benefit of mutual exhortations and prayers.—This example [of Elias or Elijah] seems rather to favor the opinion of those, who supposed the apostle to refer to 'the prayer of faith,' as it respected miraculous interpositions: but the efficacy of that prayer, which is, in all ages, presented under the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit, is throughout the Scripture so fully declared, that this exclusive interpretation is here inadmissible. (16) Effectual fervent. Energoumenè. 1 Cor. 12:6, 11. Ep. 1:11. 2:2. 3:20. Ph. 2:13. It may be understood either actively, (as the middle voice,) or passively. Actively, it signifies efficacious, effectual; but this seems a mere tautology, being equivalent to availeth; or, it means energetic, implying the earnestness and fervency employed. Passively, it denotes the energy by which the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for genuine prayer. Ps. 10:17, 18. Rom. 8:24—27. 'The earnest prayer of a righteous man, the effect of good affections wrought in his heart by the energy of the Holy Spirit, is of great efficacy.' Doddr.—[For it is the will of God acting itself out, with omnipotence; and the word signifying inwrought. Rom. 8:26, 27. Ed.] SCOTT.

(16.) 'Of course, this passage will by no means support the Romish practice of auricular confession, especially to a priest; for the confession, in the present case, is supposed to be made to the injured person, in order to be forgiven.' It is astonishing that human nature should become so degraded, and should so have lost the principles of liberty of thought and of conscience, as to submit to so flagrant an imposition of priestcraft. Indeed the Editor has known of some, who have been so trampled under spiritual despotism, as actually to believe, that their priest could smite with death, turn one black, or arrest a mortal blow by a word or wish! What a pitiable object is such a darkened and spell-bound soul; how deeply should it move the Christian freeman to use every proper exertion, with all love and meekness, by precept, and especially example, to bring such a fellow-creature into the light and liberty of Christ! Ed.—'There is no conflict between our doctrine of prayer and that of the divine purposes.—The purposes of God embrace all events, and in that very order in which they occur in time. If, in the order of actual occurrence, prayer always precedes the bestowal of blessings, it precedes it agreeably to the divine purposes. If, in the purpose of God, prayer eternally stands present as the immediate condition of his favor, it were inconsistent, if things were not so in the event.'

REV. DR. SKINNER.
(17.) 'Elias was a man, &c. says James, to wean Christians from that false idea which makes us reject the examples of the saints, as disproportioned to our own condition. They were saints, we say, and not men like us.'

PASCAL.
V. 19, 20. Among other important works of love, which believers ought to attempt by faith and prayer, the recovery of such professed Christians as had run into dangerous heresies, or fallen into sin, was peculiarly to be attended to: especially as many evils of this kind had taken place among them. Gal. 6:1—5. Jude 22—25.—'Surely it cannot be the good an office, he is therein an instrument of saving a soul from death. Those whom the apostle here calls brethren, he yet supposes liable to err. It is no mark of a wise or holy man, to boast of his being free from error, or to refuse to acknowledge when he is in an error. Nor if any do err, must you be afraid to show them their error; and be they ever so weak, and little, you must not disdain to make them wiser and better. We are not presently to accuse and exclaim against an erring brother, and seek to bring reproaches and calamities on him, but to convert him: and if, by all our endeavors, we cannot do this, yet we are nowhere empowered to persecute and destroy him. If we are instrumental in the conversion of any, we are said to convert them, though this be principally and efficiently the work of God. And if we can do no more toward the conversion of sinners, yet we may do this, pray for the grace and Spirit of God to convert and change them. And let those that are any way serviceable to convert others, know what will be the happy consequences of their doing this: they may take great comfort in it at present, and they will meet with a crown at last.

He that is said to err from the truth, v. 19. is described as erring in his way, v. 20. and we cannot be said to convert any, merely by altering their opinions, unless we can bring them to correct and amend their ways. This is conversion; and he who thus converteth a sinner from the error of his ways, shall not only save a soul from death, but by such conversion of heart and life, a multitude of sins shall be hid; a most comfortable scripture. Some make the sense of this text to be, that conversion shall prevent a multitude of sins; and it is true many sins are prevented in the party converted; many also may be in others that he may have an influence upon, or may converse with. Upon the whole, how should we lay out ourselves with all possible concern for the conversion of sinners! It will be for the happiness and salvation of the converted; it will prevent much mischief, and the spreading and multiplying of sin in the world; it will be for the glory and honor of God; and it will mightily redound to our comfort and renown in the great day. They that turn many to righteousness, and they who help to do so, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

PRACT. OBS. V. 12—20. It is peculiarly important to the interests of genuine piety, that all who profess the Gospel, should reverence the name of God, and keep at a distance from the profane language, which abounds in the world, and from that insincerity which is intimately connected with it; that 'their yea may be yea, and their nay, nay.' Indeed, such as neglect these things have little reason to conclude, that they shall escape condemnation, when the Judge appears.—The voice of prayer should always accompany that of our lamentations, when we are afflicted, and our joy should be expressed in the language of praise and thanksgiving.—Christians may profitably confer together concerning their conflicts, sins, and temptations; that they may encourage, apostle's intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way, will conceal, from the eye of God's justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person, who does this charitable action, if he continueth in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned "from the error of his way," in order that his own soul may be saved from death.' Maekn. In no sense or way can it be said, that our good works, of whatever kind, 'cover the multitude of our sins,' or any of our sins; without either implying, that they purchase for us an indulgence, or dispensation, to continue in sin; or that they are efficacious in atoning for sin, either alone, or along with the blood of Christ; or that by them we become interested in his redemption and righteousness, and not by faith only. The words referred to, (for it cannot be called a quotation, the word charity, or love, being omitted.) are found in the Proverbs, in the Heb. and the Sept. The context there evidently excludes this interpretation, and the use, afterwards made of them by Peter, by no means favors it. Prov. 10:12. 1 Pet. 4:8.—'He shall save a soul from eternal death; and shall be the means that the many sins of that convert shall, through his true repentance, be forgiven and not imputed to him.' Bp. Hall.—The zeal and diligence thus shown might indeed be an evidence of grace, and conduce to a man's enjoying the comfort of the pardoning love of Christ, under chastenings and sorrows, notwithstanding his manifold defects: Ps. 41:1—3. yet this falls vastly short of the energy of the apostle's words, and seems not at all to have been in his thoughts; so that many learned men have labored in vain to put this construction upon them.

SCOTT.

(19, 20.) 'To the injunctions to mutual confession, forgiveness, and prayer for each other, the apostle now subjoins another, to co-operate mutually in correcting each other's errors in the doctrines, or failures in the practice of Christianity. Cover, &c. Expositors are not agreed whether this is to be understood, of the covering the sins of the converter, or of the converted. The former interpretation is espoused by Origen, and several Latin fathers, and of the moderns, by Han., Whit., Wells, Pale, Atterbury, and Dodd.; the latter, by Grot., Vorst., Est., Bp. Hall, Wolf, Benson, Sherlock, Ros., Maekn., Newe., Pott, Scott, and almost all recent comrs. They argue (to use the words of Stute) "that it seems hardly consonant with the language and doctrines of the Gospel, that any sin should be forgiven, if it be unrepented of, or persisted in; and if it be repented of and forsaken, it will be pardoned without the meritorious act here mentioned." Indeed, the context requires the latter interpretation, the high antiquity of which appears from its having been adopted by the Peshito Syriac translation. We are, however, only to understand, that the good offices of the reformer will powerfully tend to procure the forgiveness of sins, and the final salvation of the penitent sinner; since conversion does not necessarily imply final

EARLY RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. The space here left cannot be better occupied, than by the following hortatory appeals.

Ed.

Reader, I beg of you as from Christ, for his sake, for your soul's sake, for your children's sake, for the sake of the church and [world], that you will conscientiously and seriously set up family religion, calling upon God, singing his praises, and instructing your children and servants in the Scripture and catechism, and in a wise and diligent education of youth. Hear me, as if I begged it of you, with tears, on my knees. Alas, what doth the world suffer by the neglect of this! It is out of ungodly families that the world hath ungodly rulers, ungodly ministers, and a swarm of serpentine enemies of holiness and peace, and their own salvation. What country groaneth not under the confusions, miseries and horrid wickedness, which are all the fruits of family neglects, and the careless and ill education of youth? It is a work of great skill and constant care to instruct and educate your children, and to keep them from tempting company and snares. To cry out of dumb or unfaithful ministers, while you are worse at home yourselves, is but self-condemnation: are ministers more obliged to care for your children's souls, by nature, or by vow and covenant, than you are? Can they do that for whole parishes, which you will not do for one household, or your own children? The first charge and part is yours: if families treacherously neglect their part, and then look that all should be done at the church, you may as wisely send boys to the universities, warn, counsel, exhort, and properly pray for each other; and we ought greatly to desire, and highly to value, the prayers of our fellow Christians; and to abound in supplications for them, 'as the effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.'—In the use of all proper means, every one of us should seek the spiritual good of our children, relatives, friends, enemies, and all around us, and the conversion of ignorant and thoughtless profligates and sinners of every description. Let us then, in our several stations, keep these things in mind, and spare no pains, and shrink from no self-denial, and be wearied out by no ill success, in so charitable a service, and the event will prove that 'our labor was not in vain in the Lord.'

perseverance, and therefore cannot ensure salvation.' BLOOMF.
(20.) 'It is obvious to all, that the kingdom of Christ can be extended in our world only by the accession of individuals. His blood avails not to the salvation of men in the mass; but to those who individually repent and accept of mercy. Yet, to how great an extent are the prayers and contributions of Christians made, indefinitely, for the conversion of the world as a whole, while the salvation of no one individual is the object of their personal and persevering endeavors! The truth evidently is, that personal effort for the souls of individuals,—the lip, thoughts, and heart of a living man brought into contact with the lip, thoughts, and heart of a living man,—IS A GRAND INSTITUTION OF GOD FOR THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD. His command is, "As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another." Not only "the Spirit and the Bride," but "he that heareth," must "say come." Christians are to "shine as lights in the world, holding forth the Word of life." The parable of Nathan illustrates this principle. "Thou art the man," humbled the king in the dust. The same principle is exemplified in the success of the personal efforts of the pious mother; of the skilful Sabbath School Teacher, and of faithful pastoral visitation; in all which divine truth is happily pressed upon the heart of the individual. WHEREVER the Holy Spirit is largely poured out, the ministers, and members of the church, abound in prayer and faithful conversation with each other and the impenitent.—Paul, with all his crushing public responsibilities, could testify to the Ephesian elders, that he had labored among them, both "publicly and from house to house," and appeal to them as witnesses of his fidelity in the memorable and most emphatic words, "REMEMBER, THAT, BY THE SPACE OF THREE YEARS, I CEASED NOT TO WARN EVERY ONE, NIGHT AND DAY WITH TEARS." Of the signal outpouring of the Holy Spirit among the natives at Ceylon, Rev. M. WINSLOW states, there were few cases of permanent conviction, in which religious impressions were not cherished by much patient labor of the missionaries, or their assistants, in conversing and praying with individuals alone. It was this repeated and personal application of truth, which principally took effect. This was the secret of the wonderful success of Baxter, at Kidderminster.' See it also exemplified in the lives of numerous faithful ministers and private Christians, especially that of HARLAN PAGE, by Rev. W. A. HALLOCK, from which the above extract is taken. He, a humble, private Christian, BY THE POWER OF PRAYER AND PERSONAL EFFORT, was the means under God of the conversion of a large number of individuals. And what encouragement is given to those who thus labor: they that be wise (marg. teachers), shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars, for ever and ever. 1 Pet. 4: 10. Rev. 22:17. 1 John 5:16.

before they are taught to read or write in lower schools. If there be any hope of the amendment of a wicked, miserable, and distracted world, it must be mostly done by family-religion, and the Christian education of youth.'

BAXTER.

'Had I a voice, capable of reaching the remotest bounds of Christendom, I would lift it up in exhortation to parents and ministers, and say, Set your hearts on the promotion of early piety in the children and youth committed to your care. Let it engage, with peculiar interest, your daily studies, and your daily prayers. Parents! if you love your children, be intent, and let them see that you are earnestly intent on their eternal welfare. Begin as early as possible, and never intermit your diligence. Ministers! if you love immortal souls; if you love the church of God; if you desire to bind the hearts of parents and of children to your persons and your ministry, for their spiritual benefit; if you desire to build up the cause of Christ in the most effectual manner, let there be no delay or intermission in this most interesting work. Satan begins early to enlist youth into his service. Set yourselves to rescue them from his power, and train them up to God. Keep a catalogue of their names, residences, &c. Review it often with prayer. Notice them affectionately in your daily walks and visits. Catchise them diligently. Explain with condescension what you attempt to teach them. Guard against everything austere or repulsive in your manner. And follow all with earnest cries to God for success.'

Dr. MILLER.

AN EXPOSITION
FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. Z. Marryat.)

Two epistles we have in the canon of Scripture, written by Peter, a most eminent apostle of Jesus Christ, whose character shines brightly, as described in the gospels, and the Acts; but, as painted by the papists and legendary writers, a person of extravagant pride and ambition.

It is certain from Scripture, that Simon Peter was one of the first of those our Lord called to be his disciples and followers; a person of excellent endowments, both natural and gracious; of great parts, and ready elocution; quick to apprehend, and bold to execute, whatever he knew to be his duty. When our Savior called his apostles, and gave them their commission, He nominated him first; and, by his behavior toward him, He seems to have distinguished him as a special favorite among the twelve. Many instances of our Lord's affection to him, both during his life, and after his resurrection, are on record.

But many things, confidently affirmed of this holy man, are directly false: as, That he had a primacy and superior power over the rest of the apostles; that he was the sole universal pastor over all the Christian world, the only vicar of Christ on earth; that he was for above twenty years bishop of Rome, that the popes of Rome succeed to Peter, and derive from him a universal supremacy and jurisdiction over all churches and Christians on earth; and that all this was by our Lord's ordering and appointment. Whereas, Christ never gave him any pre-eminence of this kind, but positively forbade it, and gave precepts to the contrary. The other apostles never consented to any such claim. Paul declares himself not a whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles, 2 Cor. 11:5. 12:11. Here is no exception of Peter's superior dignity, whom Paul took the freedom to blame, and withstood him to the face, Gal. 2:11. And Peter himself never assumed anything like it, but modestly styles himself an apostle of Jesus Christ; and when he writes to the presbyters of the church, he humbly places himself in the same rank with them; The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, ch. 5:1. See Dr. Barrow on the pope's supremacy.

The design of this first epistle is, 1. To explain more fully the doctrines of Christianity to these newly-converted Jews. 2. To direct and persuade them to a holy conversation, in the faithful discharge of all personal and relative duties, whereby they would secure their own peace, and effectually confute the slanders and reproaches of their enemies. 3. To prepare them for sufferings. This seems to be his principal intention; for he has something to this purport in every chap., and does, by a great variety of arguments, encourage them to patience and perseverance in the faith, lest the persecutions and sad calamities that were coming on them, should prevail with them to apostatize from Christ and the Gospel.—It is remarkable, that you find not so much as one word savoring of the spirit and pride of a pope in either of these epistles. * HENRY.

The pretensions of the church and bishop of Rome are so absurd and extravagant, as to deserve little notice; it is not absolutely certain that Peter ever was at Rome; though it is highly probable he went thither, towards the close of his life; and was there put to death by crucifixion, at, or near the same time, when Paul, as a Roman citizen, was beheaded, during Nero's persecution. He wrote this epistle, probably, some time before, to the Christians in the different provinces of Asia Minor. Many, indeed, and some of high respectability, have endeavored to prove, that, as the apostle of the circumcision, he addressed the Jewish converts only: but Peter was distinguished, not only as the chief preacher to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, but also as the first preacher to the Gentiles. And as Paul, 'the apostle of the uncircumcision,' wrote to the Hebrews, and in all his epistles addressed the Jewish as well as the Gentile converts; we may well suppose, that Peter addressed the Gentile, as well as the Jewish converts; though perhaps with a peculiar reference to the case of the latter. Acts 2:10. Indeed, the contrary opinion is founded on some passages in the epistle, which are capable of another, and more natural interpretation: while the apostle's language in other places cannot at all consist with it. It also seems evident, that he wrote to the very churches, which had been founded by Paul, intentionally to corroborate his testimony, and to confute those, who maintained that his doctrine differed from that of the other apostles; and he sent the epistle by Silvanus, Paul's faithful and constant coadjutor; often, indeed, called Silas, by abbreviation; as Priscilla is called Prisca. 2 Tim. 4:19. And as those churches consisted of converted Jews and Gentiles; and as the epistle of Peter conveyed instruction equally suited to both; why should it be imagined, that he meant it for the perusal of only one part of them? The epistle is dated from Babylon, in the remains or vicinity of which city, it is probable, a Christian church had been planted, perhaps consisting principally of the descendants of the Jews, who remained in those regions after the Babylonish captivity. For no satisfactory reason can be assigned, for supposing, as many have done, in ancient and modern times, that here Babylon signifies Rome. Language of this kind suited the nature of John's Revelation; but was wholly unsuitable to the date of a letter. (Note, 5:13.)—We here find the same great doctrines, with which Paul's epistles are replete, applied to the same practical purposes. And it is peculiarly remarkable for the sweetness, gentleness, and humble love, with which it is written; which, indeed, forms a striking contrast to the domineering pride and severity, that characterize the pretended successors of this sacred writer.—Various opinions have been entertained of the time, when the epistle was written; but as no certainty seems attainable, it is dated according to the author's opinion on the subject; in which, however, he is by no means confident. SCOTT.

* T. H. Horne divides this epistle into four sections, besides the introduction and conclusion. 1. An exhortation to Jewish Christians to persevere in the faith, and to maintain a holy conversation, notwithstanding their sufferings and persecutions. This is enforced by considering the peculiar blessings and privileges freely bestowed on them, ch. 1:3—2:10. 2. Includes exhortations to a holy conversation in general, ch. 2:11, 12. and to the faithful discharge of their duties, as subjects to their rulers, vs. 13—17. servants to their masters, vs. 18—25. and husbands to their wives, ch. 3:1—13. 3. Patience, submission, and holiness of life, are enforced, by considering the example of Christ, ch. 3:14—18. by the punishment of the disobedient, as in the days of Noah, v. 19—22. by the example of Christ, by the conversion of believers become dead to the flesh, ch. 4:1—6. by the approaching destruction of the Jewish state, v. 7—11. and by the consideration, that, under the Gospel, afflictions are the portion of the believer, and matter of joy, v. 12—19. 4. Ministers and people are directed respecting their mutual behavior, chap. 5:1—11.

'This epistle,' says Leighton, 'is a brief, yet very clear summary, both of consolations and instructions needful for the encouragement and direction of a Christian, in his journey to heaven; elevating his thoughts and desires to that happiness, and strengthening him against all opposition in the way, both that of corruption within and temptations and afflictions from without. The heads of doctrine contained in it are many, but the main that are most insisted on, are these three; faith, obedience, and patience; to establish the Christians in believing, to direct them in doing, and to comfort them in suffering; often setting those to whom he wrote, the matchless example of the Lord Jesus, and the greatness of their engagements to follow Him.'

CHAP. I.

<sup>1</sup> He blesseth God for his manifold spiritual graces : 10 shewing that the salvation in Christ is no news, but a thing prophesied of old : 13 and exhorteth them accordingly to a godly conversation, forasmuch as they are now born anew by the Word of God.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In this inscription we have three parts.

1. Its author described. (1.) By his name, Peter. His first name was Simon, and Jesus gave him the surname of Peter, i. e. a rock, in commendation of his faith, and to denote that he should be an eminent pillar in the church of God, Gal. 2:9. (2.) By his office,—an apostle of Jesus Christ. The word signifies, one sent, a legate, a messenger, any one sent in Christ's name, and about his work ; more strictly, the highest office in the Christian church, 1 Cor. 12:28. Thus humbly Peter asserts his own character as an apostle. Hence, learn, A man may lawfully acknowledge, and sometimes is bound to assert, the gifts and graces of God to him. To pretend to what we have not, is hypocrisy ; and to deny what we have, is ingratitude. It concerns all, but especially ministers, to consider well their warrant and call from God to their work. This will justify them to others, and give them inward support and comfort under all dangers and discouragements.

2. The persons described, to whom this epistle was addressed.

(1.) By their external condition,—Strangers, dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. chiefly Jews, descended (so Prideaux) from Jews transplanted from Babylon into the cities of Asia the less, by order of Antiochus king of Syria, about 200 years before Christ : very likely, our apostle had been among them, and converted them, being the apostle of the circumcision, and that he afterward wrote this epistle to them from Babylon, where multitudes of the Jewish nation then resided : their circumstances were poor and afflicted.

(2.) By their spiritual condition, v. 2. These poor strangers were, Elect, &c. v. 2. Election is either to an office, as in case of Saul, to be king, 1 Sam. 10:24. and the twelve to be apostles, John 6:70. or to a church-state, for the enjoyment of special privileges ; as Israel was God's elect, Deut. 7:6. or to eternal salvation ; God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. This is the election here spoken of ; importing God's decree or resolution to save some, and bring them, through Christ, by proper means, to eternal life.

This election is said to be according to the foreknowledge of God, i. e. mere prescience, foresight, or understanding ; as the mathematician certainly foreknows that at such a time there will be an eclipse. Or, counsel, appointment, and approbation, as Acts 2:23. The death of Christ was not only foreseen, but foreordained, as v. 20. Take it thus here ; so the sense is, elect according to the counsel, ordination, and free grace of God.

It is added, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, by which, understand the first Person of the blessed Trinity. Thus, in the affair of man's redemption, election is, by way of eminency, ascribed to the Father, as reconciliation is to the Son, and sanctification to the Holy Ghost ; though in each of these one Person is not so entirely interested, as to exclude the other two. Hereby the persons of the Trinity are more clearly discovered to us, and we are taught what obligations we are under to each of them distinctly.

They were elect through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. God's decree for man's salvation always operates through sanctification of the Spirit, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus.

By sanctification, here, understand, not a federal sanctification only, but a real one, begun in regeneration, and carried on in the daily exercise of holiness, mortifying our sins more and more, and living to God in all the duties of a Christian life ; here summed up in one word, obedience, comprehending all the duties of Christianity.

By the Spirit, some would have the apostle to mean the spirit of man, the subject sanctified. Others, with better reason, think, that by Spirit is meant the Holy Ghost, the Author of sanctification. See Rom. 8:13. and Gal. 5:22, 23. This sanctification of the Spirit implies the use of means, John 17:17.

Unto obedience. This word, as pointed in our translation, is referred to what goes before it, and denotes the end of sanctification, which is, to bring rebellious sinners to universal obedience, to obey the truth and gospel of Christ, v. 22.

They were elected also to the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. Here is a manifest allusion to the typical sprinklings of blood under the law, which language these Jewish converts understood very well. The blood of the sacrifices must not only be shed, but sprinkled ; to denote that the benefits designed thereby, are applied and imputed to the offerers. Thus the blood of Christ, the grand and all-sufficient Sacrifice, typified by the legal sacrifices, was not only shed, but must be sprinkled and communicated to every one of these elect Christians, that through faith in his blood they may obtain remission of sins, Rom. 3:25. This blood of sprinkling justifies before God, Rom. 5:9. seals the covenant between God and us, of which the Lord's supper is a sign, Luke 22:20. cleanses from all sin, 1 John 1:7. and admits us into heaven, Heb. 10:19.

Note, The doctrine of the Trinity lies at the foundation of all revealed religion. If you deny the proper deity of the Son and Holy Spirit, you invalidate the redemption of the one, and the gracious operations of the other, and by that mean destroy the foundation of your own safety and religion.

3. The salutation follows : The blessings desired for them, are, grace and peace, as by Paul in his salutations in his epistles ; which see. Here is the request of prayer, in relation to these blessings,—that they may be multiplied ; which implies, that they were already possessed in some degree. They who possess spiritual blessings in their own souls, earnestly desire the communication of the same to others ; therefore, the apostles so often make this their prayer in the beginning and end of their epistles.

V. 3. We come now to the body of the epistle, which begins with a congratulation of the dignity and happiness of the state of these believers, brought in under the form

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The churches here addressed were situated in Asia Minor, (as distinguished from the continent of Asia,) and Asia (as mentioned separately) was the proconsular district, of which Ephesus was the capital city, Acts 19:8—12. so that they were chiefly the churches which had been planted by Paul, and by the evangelists who accompanied or helped him. (A. R. d—h.) The apostle called the persons to whom he wrote, 'strangers;' and some have labored to prove, that they were 'proselytes of the gate,' who had embraced the Gospel ; as Cornelius and his friends are supposed to have been before their conversion. Others confine it to the Jewish converts, who were thus distinguished, as living at a distance from the promised land, among the Gentiles. But as Christians are 'strangers and pilgrims on earth,' and as the sojourning of the patriarchs, or of the Jews, in foreign nations, was a type or emblem of this pilgrimage, 2:11. Heb. 11:13—16. it is more natural to understand it of believers in general, who were pilgrims or 'strangers,' in every city or country where they lived, and who were 'scattered' through the nations, to be as 'lights in the world, and the salt of the earth.' Mat. 5:13—16.—Sprinkling, &c. 'Men are not easily convinced . . . of the deep stain of sin, and that no other laver can fetch it out, but "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." Some, that have moral resolutions of amendment, dislike at least gross sins, and purpose to avoid them ; and it is to them cleanness enough to reform in these things ; but they consider not what becomes of the guiltiness that they have contracted already, or how that shall be purged.—Be not deceived in this ; it is not a transient sigh, or a light word, or a wish of God forgive me, nor the highest current of repentance, nor, that which is the truest evidence of repentance, amendment ; it is none of these, that purifies in the sight of God and expiates wrath. They are all imperfect and staid themselves, cannot stand and answer for themselves, much less be of value to counterpoise the former guilt of sin. The very tears of the purest repentance, unless they be sprinkled with this blood, are impure ; all our washings, without this, are but the washings of a blackamore ; it is labor in vain.' Abp. Leighton.—Scattered. John 7:35. Jam. 1:1.—This word may seem to favor the opinion, that the epistle was written to Jewish converts exclusively ; but the apostle used several terms, taken from what had been said of that nation, in relation to Christians, where this opinion cannot stand. 2:9, 10.—(2.) Be multiplied. 2 Pet. 1:2. This is not found in Paul's salutations ; at the same time Peter does not add, 'From God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ,' 1 Cor. 1:3. but in his second epistle he says, 'Through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord.' John 17:1—3. SCOTT.

(1.) Strangers, &c. 'I. e. all Christians, both Jewish and Gentile, in the countries out of Palestine.' Bl., after Wolf, Ros., and Pott. Ed.

(2.) Elect, &c. 'Chosen by God the Father, sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and justified by the atoning blood of Christ, which is evidently the meaning of being sprinkled by his blood : in which we may observe a perfect harmony with the doctrine of Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, ch. 8:29, 30.' WILLIAMS.—'The free election of God is the efficient cause of our salvation ; the material cause is Christ's obedience ; our effectual calling is the formal cause ; and the final cause is our sanctification.' BISHOP'S BIBLE, in Henry, abr.—Many persons, when first seriously awakened, are greatly distressed by the apprehension, that they cannot be saved because not predestinated. But, says Dr. Lathrop, 'A Savior has come to open a way of salvation for sinners. Salvation is offered to all, and the terms are the same to all. In God there is no insincerity. To Him belong secret things, things revealed only to us. THERE CAN BE NO DECREE WHICH FRUSTRATES THE DIVINE PROMISES. If we comply with the terms, the benefits promised are ours. By faith and patience we may inherit the promises.' Rev. Dr. LATHROP.—'The doctrine of election throws no obstacle in the way of a man's salvation. To make the matter plain, let us suppose for a moment, that the doctrine is not true. Mankind are free agents, an atonement has been provided, and salvation is freely offered to all ; and each individual is left to comply with the terms of salvation or not. In this case there would be no obstacle in the way of salvation but a man's own will. Now what alteration does the doctrine of election make ? It renders it certain, that some will comply with the terms of salvation. With regard to the rest, it does not affect their situation at all. They are still free agents,—an atonement has been made,—salvation is freely offered,—"the Spirit and the Bride say, come."—the door of heaven stands open, and all may enter if they will. The doctrine of election, therefore, alters no man's condition for the worse, although it does that of many for the better. It is simply an exhibition of mercy. The only sense in which God has REPROBATED any, is the same as that in which those who deny election suppose He has reprobated the whole race ; that is, 'He has determined to leave them to themselves.' of a thanksgiving to God. Other epistles begin in like manner, 2 Cor. 1:3. Eph. 1:3.

1. Here we have the duty performed, which is, blessing God. A man blesses God by a just acknowledgment of his excellency and blessedness.

2. The object of this blessing, described by his relation to Jesus Christ; the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; three names of one Person, denoting his threefold office; Lord, a universal King or Sovereign; Jesus, a Priest or Savior; Christ, a Prophet, anointed. This God, so blessed, is the God of Christ, according to his human nature, and his Father, according to his divine nature.

3. The reasons that oblige us to this duty of blessing God, are, in general, his abundant mercy; all our blessings are owing to God's mercy, particularly regeneration; He hath begotten us again, and this deserves our thanksgiving, especially if we consider the fruit it produces in us, that excellent grace of hope, and that not such a vain, dead, perishing hope as that of worldlings and hypocrites, but a lively hope, a living, strong, quickening, durable hope, as that hope must needs be, that has such a solid foundation as the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. Learn, hence,

A good Christian's condition is never so bad, but he has great reason still to bless God; but a sinner has always reason to mourn, notwithstanding his present prosperity.

Every unconverted person is a hopeless creature; whatever he pretends to of that kind, is all confidence and presumption; the right Christian hope is what a man is begotten again unto by the Spirit of God; not from nature, but free grace; and it has this excellency, it is a living hope; Job 27:8. being founded on The resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; which, as it is the act of the Father as a Judge, and of the Son as a Conqueror, demonstrates that the Father accepts his death in full discharge for our ransom, that He is victorious over death, the grave, and all our spiritual enemies; also, it is an assurance of our own resurrec- tion, there being an inseparable union between Christ and his flock; they rise by virtue of his resurrection as a Head, rather than by virtue of his power as a Judge. We are risen with Christ, Col. 3:1. From all this taken together, Christians have two fast, solid foundations whereon to build their hope of eternal life.

V. 4. The apostle continues his thanksgiving to God; and, having congratulated these people on their new birth, and their hope of everlasting life, he goes on to describe that life under the notion of an inheritance; a most proper way of speaking to them; for,

1. They were poor and persecuted, perhaps turned out of their inheritances to which they were born.

2. They were Jews, most of them, and so had a great affection to the land of Canaan, as the land of their inheritance, settled on them by God Himself; and to be driven out was looked upon as a sore judgment, 1 Sam. 26:19. To comfort them under this, they are put in mind of a noble inheritance reserved in heaven for them, such a one, that the land of Canaan was but a mere shadow in comparison of it.

Note, Heaven is the undoubted inheritance of all the children of God; the apostle argues, If children, then heirs, Rom. 8:17. God giveth his gifts to all, but the inheritance to his children, those that are his sons and daughters by regeneration and adoption, Heb. 9:15.

The incomparable excellences of this inheritance, are four.

It is incorruptible; in which respect it is like its Maker, who is called the incorruptible God, Rom. 1:23. and our house from above, which is eternal in the heavens, 1 Cor. 15:33.

It is undefiled, like the great High Priest now in possession of it, Heb. 7:26. Sin and misery, the two grand defilements that spoil this world, and mar its beauty, have no place there.

It fadeth not away, but always retains its vigor and beauty, ever entertaining and pleasing the saints who possess it, without the least weariness or distaste.

It is reserved in heaven for you; it is a glorious inheritance, for all that is in heaven is glorious, 1:18. it is certain, a reversion safely kept, till we come to the possession of it; and also it is for you, for us, for every one that is begotten again to a lively hope; this inheritance is preserved for them, and none but them; all the rest will be shut out for ever.

V. 5. This inheritance being described as future, the apostle supposes some doubt or uneasiness yet to remain on the minds of these people, whether they might not possibly fall short by the way; To this therefore he answers, that they should be safely guarded and conducted, kept and preserved from all such destructive temptations and injuries, as would prevent their safe arrival at eternal life; the blessing promised, is, preservation; Ye are kept; the Author of it, God; the means in us made use of for that end, our own faith and care; the end to which we are preserved, is, salvation; and the time when we shall see the safe end and issue of all, is, the last time.

Being kept, implies both danger and deliverance; the greatness of the work, the number of enemies, and our own infirmities, are such, that no power, but what is almighty, can preserve the soul through all unto salvation; therefore the Scripture often represents man's salvation as the effect of divine power, 2 Cor. 12:9. Rom. 14:4. yet the preservation of God's power does not supersede man's endeavor and care for his own salvation; here is God's power, and man's faith, which implies an earnest desire of salvation, a reliance on Christ, a vigilant care to do everything pleasing to God, and avoid whatever is offensive, an abhorrence of temptations, a respect to the recompense of reward, and persevering diligence in prayer; by such a patient, operating, conquering faith, we are kept, under the assistance of divine grace, unto salvation.

This salvation is ready to be revealed in the last time. It is now prepared, and made ready, and reserved in heaven; yet it is in a great measure hidden and unrevealed at present, not only to the ignorant, blind world, that never inquire after it, but even to the heirs of salvation themselves. 1 John 3:2. But it shall be fully and completely revealed in the last time, or at the last day of judgment. Life and immortality are now brought to light by the Gospel, but beyond this there will be a further and a final revelation of the amplitude and transcendency of the saints' felicity at the last day, when their bodies shall be raised, and re-united to their souls, and judgment shall pass on angels and men, and Christ shall publicly honor and applaud his servants in the face of all the world.

V. 6. The first word, wherein, refers to the apostle's foregoing discourse about the excellency of their present state, and their grand expectations for the future; in this condition you greatly rejoice, though now for a season, or a little while, if need be, ye are made sorrowful through manifold temptations. The apostle grants they were in great affliction, and propounds several things in mitigation of their sorrows.

Note, 1. Every true Christian has always something wherein he may greatly rejoice; and that is, things spiritual and heavenly, his relation to God and to heaven; in these he greatly rejoices; his joy arises from his treasure, which consists of matters of great value, and the title to them is sure.

2. The best Christians may yet be in great heaviness through manifold temptations; all sorts of adversities are temptations, or trials of faith, patience, and constancy; these seldom go singly, but are manifold, and come from different quarters; the effect of all which is great heaviness. Great heaviness is often necessary to a Christian's good; it may be for a season only; God does not afflict his people willingly; but there is a expediency and fitness, nay, an absolute necessity in the case, for so the expression signifies, it must be; therefore no man should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto, 1 Thess. 3:3. Troubles never come

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—5. As we, if true Christians, are 'strangers' on earth, we should expect contempt and unkindness from the men of this world, and continually prepare for a removal to our eternal home. All the redeemed were 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God the Father;' but this cannot be known by them, except 'through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience.' 1 Thes. 1:1—4. 'The lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading,' which springs from regeneration, is inseparably connected with faith in a crucified and risen Savior; is peculiar to the real Christian; and totally differs from the vain confidence of formalists, Pharisees, Antinomians, and enthusiasts of every description. If we thus hope for an undefiled felicity, and habitually prepare for it; we may well rejoice, and exult triumphantly, that it is 'reserved for us in heaven;' and that 'we are kept,' as in a castle, 'by the power of God, through faith unto salvation,' which is made ready, and will be openly revealed when the mystery of God shall be finished. SCOTT.

V. 3—5. A lively hope.] 'Living in death itself. The world dares say no more for its device, than, While I breathe, I hope; but the children of God can add, When I expire, I hope. It is a fearful thing when a man and his hopes expire together.' Abp. Leighton. — (5) Who are kept.] 2 Cor. 11:32. Gal. 3:23. Phil. 4:7. 'It properly signifies, being kept as in an impregnable garrison, secure from harin, under the observation of an all-seeing eye, and protection of an almighty hand.' Blackwall, in Doddr. 'Guarded, as in a strong and impregnable garrison.

by the almighty power of God, through the continued exercise of that faith, which this almighty power wrought in your hearts; and which He will still maintain unto that blessed hour, &c.' Doddr. SCOTT.

(5.) The last time.] 'Some understand this of the destruction of Jerusalem, or the gospel-age, the last end of the world. But it seems more natural to interpret it of the final consummation of all things.' BL. So Doddr.; also Guyse, who paraphrases: 'It will soon be seen, in all its riches and delights, when Christ shall judge the world.' Ed.

7 That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ :

8 Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory :

9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

[Practical Observations.]

10 Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you :

t Ja. 1:3,12. w Re. 1:7. y Jn. 16:22.

upon us but when we have need, and never stay any longer than needs must.

V. 7. These words express the end of good people's afflictions, and the ground of their joy under them.

Note, 1. The afflictions of Christians are designed for the trial of their faith. God's design in afflicting his people, is, their probation, not their destruction; their advantage, not their ruin; a trial, as the word signifies, is an experiment or search made on a man, by some affliction, to prove the value and strength of his faith; this trial is made upon faith principally, rather than any other grace, because the trial of that is, in effect, the trial of all that is good in us; our Christianity depends on our faith; the faith of good people is tried, that they themselves may have the comfort of it, God the glory of it, and others the benefit of it.

2. A tried faith is much more precious than tried gold; here is a double comparison of faith and gold, and the trial of the one with the trial of the other; gold is the most valuable, pure, useful, and durable, of all the metals; so is faith among the Christian virtues, it lasts till it brings the soul to heaven, and then it issues in the glorious fruition of God for ever; gold does not increase and multiply by trial in the fire, it rather grows less; but faith is established, improved, and multiplied, by the oppositions and afflictions that it meets with; gold must perish at last; but faith never will, Luke 22:32.

3. The trial of faith will be found to praise, and honor and glory. Honor is properly that esteem and value which one has with ap-ther, and so God and man will honor the saints. Praise is the expression or declaration of that esteem; so Christ will commend his people in the great day, Come, ye blessed of my Father, &c. Glory is that lustre wherewith a person, so honored and praised, shines in heaven, Rom. 2:10. If a tried faith be found to praise, honor, and glory, let this recommend faith to you, as much more precious than gold, though it be assaulted and tried by afflictions.

4. Jesus Christ will appear again in glory; and, when He does so, the saints will appear with Him, and their graces will appear illustrious; and the more they have been tried, the more bright they will then appear; the trial will soon be over, but the glory, honor, and praise will last to eternity. This should reconcile you to your present afflictions; they work for you a far more exceeding and an eternal weight of glory.

V. 8. The faith of these primitive Christians is further commended on two accounts: 1. The excellency of its Object, the unseen Jesus; the apostle had seen our Lord in the flesh, but these dispersed Jews never did, yet they believed in Him. 2. On account of two notable productions or effects of their faith, love and joy; and this joy so great, as to be above description; ye rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.

Learn, (1.) The faith of a Christian is properly conversant about things revealed, but not seen; faith ascends, and assures us of abundance of particulars that sense and reason could never have found out, on the credit of revelation; it is the evidence of things not seen.

(2.) True faith is never alone, but produces a strong love to Jesus Christ; it discovers itself in the highest esteem for Him, affectionate desires after Him, willingness to be dissolved, and to be with Him, delightful thoughts, cheerful services and sufferings, &c.

(3.) Where there are true faith and love to Christ, there is, or may be, joy unspeakable and full of glory; this joy is inexpressible, it cannot be described by words; the best discovery is by an experimental taste of it; it is full of glory, full of heaven; there is much of heaven and the future glory in the present joys of improved Christians; their faith removes the causes of sorrow, and affords the best reasons for joy; though good people sometimes walk in darkness, it is often owing to their own mistakes and ignorance, or to a fearful, melancholy disposition, or to some late sinful conduct, or perhaps to some sad occurrence of Providence, that sinks their comfort for the present; yet they have reason to rejoice in the

V. 9. Well might these Christians rejoice with joy unspeakable, since they were every day receiving the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. The word used alludes to the games at which the conqueror received or bore away, from the judge of the contest, a crown or reward, which he carried about in triumph; so the salvation of the soul was the prize these Christians sought for, the crown they labored for, the end they aimed at, which came nearer and more within their reach every day.

Learn, 1. Every faithful Christian is daily receiving the salvation of his soul; salvation is one permanent thing, begun in this life, not interrupted by death, and continued to all eternity. This was properly urged to these distressed people; they were on the losing side in the world, but the apostle puts them in mind of what they were receiving; if they lost an inferior good, they were all the while receiving the salvation of their souls.

2. It is lawful for a Christian to make the salvation of his soul his end; the glory of God and our own felicity are so connected, that if we regularly seek the one, we must attain the other.

V. 10. The apostle having described the persons to whom he wrote, and declared to them the excellent advantages they were under, goes on to show them what warrant he had for what he had delivered; and, because they were Jews, and had a profound veneration for the Old Test., he produces the authority of the prophets to convince them, the doctrine of salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ, was no new doctrine, but the same which the old prophets did inquire and search diligently into. They foresaw glorious times of light, grace, and comfort, coming on the church, which made them desire to see and hear the things which came to pass in the days of the Gospel. Observe the manner of their inquiry; they inquired and searched diligently; allusion is had to miners, who dig deep to come to the ore; so these holy prophets had an earnest desire to know, and were proportionably diligent in their inquiries after the grace of God, which was to be revealed in the days of the Messiah; their being inspired did not make their industrious search needless. Daniel understood by books, and study, the computations of time, ch. 9:2. Even their own revelation required their study, meditation, and prayer; for many prophecies had a double meaning; in their first intention they aimed at some person or event near at hand, but their ultimate design was to describe the Person, sufferings, or kingdom of Christ

PRACT. OBS. V. 6—9. 'The lively' and assured 'hope of an inheritance in heaven,' gives substantial joy to the soul, and to it we must have recourse in all our troubles, for support and animation: yet we cannot but sometimes 'be in heaviness,' when called to struggle with ' manifold temptations,' to conflict with inward enemies, to walk in darkness without sensible comfort, and to endure afflictions in body, mind, or circumstances.—But neither the trials of God's people, nor the peculiarly distressing circumstances connected with them, will be sharper, more numerous, or of longer continuance, than is needful. In the intervals of their temptations and conflicts, when composed enough to make observations on their experience, their trials, conflicts, and the event of

V. 8, 9. This faith, love, and joy, in respect of an unseen Savior, constituted the peculiar experience, and formed the distinguishing character, of real Christians; who thus were assured, that they should receive that 'salvation of their souls,' which was the end proposed by them, when they believed; indeed, they were continually receiving that salvation in the earnestness, comforts, and sanctification of it, amidst their trials and conflicts. John 20:24—29.—'8) In whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing.] On whom not yet looking, but believing, intimating, that at length they would behold Him. 1 John 3:1—3. SCOTT.

(8, 9.) 'The affection here demanded for Christ, is not founded on a personal intercourse with Him. The absence of strong encomiums on the most eminent human instruments of divine beneficence to the world, is a remarkable characteristic of the inspired writings. And in this passage the unmeasured character of the affection described, and the reason of the joy, the salvation of the soul, carry it infinitely out of the range of a rational application to any created nature.' J. P. Smith, in Henry, abr.—Whom not having seen, &c.] Wells, in Bloomf., understands an allusion to the case of Thomas, and to what Christ said on that occasion.

V. 10—12. For they [the prophets] did not know the full import of them, they can find, that they really do believe in and love an unseen Savior, and show that faith and love by cleaving to Him, and aiming to obey Him, in the midst of their troubles. This causes them to rejoice in his all-sufficiency and grace, in his glory and blessedness, and in admiring his infinite loveliness and loving kindness, with a 'joy which is unspeakable,' and which forms a sweet antepast of the heavenly felicity; tuning their hearts to the songs of the redeemed, and preparing them for their holy employments. Thus, by the way they receive in part, as an earnest and pledge, 'the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls.'

their own words, while they 'testified long before,' that the Messiah would pass through a variety of complicated sufferings, even unto death; and that He would afterwards be glorified, in his personal exaltation, and in the extent, peace, and duration of his mediatorial kingdom, the happiness of his subjects, and the destruction of his enemies. Ps. 2:22: 69: 72. Is. 9:6, 7. 11:1—10. 53: Dan. 9:24—27.—The Holy Spirit is here spoken of, as a distinct Person; and as 'the Spirit of Christ,' not only in that He spake of Him, but as sent forth by Him long before his incarnation.—Both in the express prophecies of the Messiah, and in all the typical persons, events, and institutions which related to Him, his sufferings were uniformly represented as introducing his glory, and the glories of his kingdom. The prophets had been immediately instructed, that they should not live to witness the accomplishment of their own predictions; and that neither they, nor their contemporaries, would derive the principal benefit of their ministry, or enjoy the privileges announced by them. But they were laboring for the benefit of future generations; whilst they declared those great events, which had at length taken place, and had been reported to the Jews and Gentiles, by the apostles of Christ, who had preached the Gospel to them; whose ministry was attested by the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit,

Observe, The doctrine of man's salvation by Jesus Christ, has been the study and admiration of the greatest and wisest of men; a good man is much affected and pleased with the grace and mercy of God to others, as well as to himself; they who would be acquainted with this great salvation, and the grace that shines therein, must inquire and search diligently into it; if it were necessary for an inspired prophet to do so, much more is it for persons so weak and injudicious as we are.

V. 11. What the ancient prophets chiefly searched into is here expressed; Jesus Christ was the main subject of their studies; and in relation to Him, they were most inquisitive into, 1. His humiliation and death, and the glorious consequences of it; the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow; this inquiry would lead them into a view of the whole Gospel, the sum whereof is this, that Christ Jesus was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification. 2. The time, and the manner of the times, wherein the Messiah was to appear; so far as the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, had signified anything toward that purpose. The nature of the times, as well as the times, was under their strict consideration, whether they would be quiet or troublesome; times of peace, or of war.

Learn, (1.) Jesus Christ had a being before his incarnation; for his Spirit then existed in the prophets. (2.) The doctrine of the Trinity was known to the faithful in the Old Test.; here is a plurality of persons [implied], and from other parts of the Old Test. a Trinity may be collected. (3.) The works here ascribed to the Holy Ghost prove Him to be God; He manifested to the prophets, many hundred years beforehand the sufferings of Christ, with a multitude of particular circumstances attending them; He also gave proof and evidence beforehand, of the certainty of that event, by inspiring the prophets to reveal it, to work miracles in confirmation of it, and by enabling the faithful to believe it. (4.) From the example of Christ Jesus, learn to expect a time of services and sufferings before you are received to glory; it was so with Him, and the disciple is not above his Lord; the suffering time is but short, but the glory is everlasting; let the suffering season be ever so sharp and severe, it shall not hinder, but work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. V. 12. These words contain an answer to the prophets' inquiry; they were informed, that these things should not come to pass in their time, but yet all was firm and certain, and should come to pass in the times of the apostles.

V. 12. These words contain an answer to the prophets' inquiry; they were informed, that these things should not come to pass in their time, but yet all was firm and certain, and should come to pass in the times of the apostles.

You have here three sorts of students, or inquirers into the great affair of man's salvation by Jesus Christ; prophets, apostles, and angels.

Learn, 1. A diligent endeavor after the knowledge of Christ, and our duty, will certainly be answered with good success. The prophets were answered with a revelation.

2. The holiest and best of men sometimes have their lawful and pious requests denied. It was both lawful and pious for these prophets to desire to know more, than they were permitted to know, about the time of the appearance of Christ in the world, but they were denied.

3. It is the honor and practice of a Christian, to be useful to others in many cases, rather than to himself; the prophets ministered to others, not unto themselves, Rom. 14:7. Nothing is more contrary to Christian principles, than for a man to make himself his own end, and live to himself.

4. The revelations of God to his church, though gradual, and given by parcels, are all perfectly consistent, and exactly agree, as coming from the same Spirit of God.

5. The efficacy of the evangelical ministry depends on the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; the Gospel is the ministration of the Spirit.

6. The mysteries of the Gospel, and the methods of man's salvation, are so glorious, that the blessed angels earnestly desire to look into them; they consider the whole scheme of man's redemption with deep attention and admiration, particularly the points the apostle had been discoursing of.

V. 13. Here the apostle begins his exhortation to them, whose glorious state he had before described, thereby instructing us, that Christianity is a doctrine according to godliness, designed not only to make us wiser, but better; Wherefore, since you are so honored and distinguished, as above,

'Gird up,' &c. i. e. 'as the traveller, racer, warrior, and laborer, gather in, and gird up, their long loose garments, that they may be more ready, prompt, and expeditious in their business; so do you by your minds; restrain their extravagances, and let the loins, or strength and vigor of your minds, be exerted in your duty; disengage yourselves from all who would hinder you, and go on resolutely in your obedience.

'Be sober, be vigilant against all your spiritual dangers and enemies, and be temperate and modest in eating, drinking, apparel, recreation, business, and in the whole of your behavior; be sober-minded also in opinion, as well as in practice, and humble in your judgment of yourselves.'

And hope to the end, &c. Some refer this to the last judgment, as if the apostle directed their hope to the final revelation of Jesus Christ; but it seems more natural to take it, as it might be rendered, 'Hope perfectly, or thoroughly, for the grace that is brought to you in, or by the revelation of Jesus Christ; by the Gospel which brings life and immortality to light; hope perfectly, trust without doubting to that grace which is now offered to you by the Gospel.' The main work of a Christian lies in the right management of his heart and mind. The best Christians need to be exhorted to sobriety; it is required of a bishop, 1 Tim. 3:2. of aged men, Tit. 2:2. young women and young men, Tit. 2:4, 6. A Christian must still hope and strive for more grace. A strong and perfect trust in God's grace is very consistent with our best endeavors in our duty; we must hope perfectly, and yet gird up our loins, and address ourselves vigorously to the work we have to do, encouraging ourselves from the grace of Jesus Christ.

V. 14. The exhortation is continued, and the words may be taken either as a rule of holy living, which is both positive and negative; or, as an argument to press them to holiness from the consideration of what they now are, children of obedience, and what they were when they lived in lust and ignorance. The children of God ought to prove and rendered successful by his life-giving and sanctifying influences, and who was 'sent down from heaven' to bear testimony to the performance of those prophecies, which He had of old inspired. Mark 16: 17, 20. Jn. 15:17—27. Acts 2:25—33. 5:32. Heb. 2:1—4. In fact, these mysteries of redemption contained such displays of the wisdom, power, truth, justice, holiness, and mercy of God; that 'the angels desired,' with great earnestness and persevering attention, 'to look into them,' and to join in adoration of the Divine Redeemer, like the cherubim who were represented as bowing down to look on the ark of the covenant. (Note, Ex. 25:10—21.) They, as it were, left the glories of heaven, to study the divine perfections, and to learn new songs of adoring praise, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the desert, in Gethsemane, on mount Calvary, and from 'the church,' which 'God, manifested in the flesh,' had 'purchased with his own blood.' Mat. 4:3—11. Luk. 2:8—11. 22:43. 24: 1—9. Ac. 1:9—12. Eph. 3:9—12. 1 Tim. 3:16. Rev. 5:11—14—11) Spirit of Christ.] Note, 3 19, 20.—I. e., say the Socinians, the spirit in them, which spake of Christ, &c. But in this sense, He might as well have been styled the Spirit of Antichrist, or the false prophets, because He also spake of them. All the ancients agree in the other sense, that Christ spake by his Spirit in the prophets, they being inspired with his grace, and taught by his Spirit; their words sprang from the divine Word moving them, and by Him they prophesied. He spake in Isaiah, in Elias, and in the mouth of the prophets. So the fathers. — Shall holy prophets be so desirous to know the time when these things should happen; and holy angels to look into these glorious revelations? And shall we, to whom, and for whose happiness, this Gospel was revealed, neglect, not only to obtain, but even to know, this great salvation? Whitby. To look into.] Luk. 24:12. Jn. 20:5. Jam. 1:25. MACKN.—Hope.] Pres. Edwards, the elder, remarks, on Heb. 6:19. 'Hope here is the same with the grace of faith, but only with respect to one kind of its exercises, viz. those that respect God's promises, or our own future promised good. Hope, in the N. T., is often spoken of as a great Christian grace and virtue, and one of the main things that distinguishes a true Christian; which would be difficult to account for, if by hope is meant no more than what we commonly understand by the word, viz. one's hoping well of his future state. That is not hard to do. But by hope is doubtless meant, an embracing the promises of God, and fiducial relying on them through Christ for salvation. In 1 Cor. 13: where faith and hope are distinguished, by the former is meant faith in a larger sense, without any regard to our own future interest in what is revealed. Hope, is our relying on God's truth as to what concerns our own future happiness.' EDWARDS.

15 But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation ;

21 Who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the themselves to be such, by their obedience to God, by their present, constant, universal obedience. The best have had their times of lust and ignorance. Persons, when converted, differ exceedingly from what they were formerly ; their inward frame, behavior, speech, and conversation, are much altered from what they were in times past. The lusts and extravagances of sinners are both the fruits and the signs of their ignorance.

V. 15, 16. Here is a noble rule enforced by three reasons, taken from the grace of God, in calling us ; from his command, it is written ; and from his example, Be ye holy, for I am holy.

The grace of God in calling a sinner, is a powerful engagement to holiness ; great favors are strong obligations ; they enable as well as oblige to be holy.

Complete holiness is the desire and duty of every Christian : here is a twofold rule of holiness ; 1. For extent, it must be universal ; we must be holy, and in all manner of conversation ; in all affairs, in every condition, towards all people, in all our intercourse and business. 2. For the pattern of it, we must be holy, as God is holy ; He is perfectly, unchangeably, and eternally holy ; and we should aspire after such a state.

PRACT. OBS. V. 10—16. While we discourse freely on evangelical and experimental subjects, numbers, either ignorantly or maliciously, charge us with holding novel doctrines, and introducing a new religion ; but in fact these principles were first published, as soon as 'sin entered into the world ;' though they have passed, so to speak, through several enlarged editions : but everything is new to him, who is hitherto unacquainted with it. Concerning these things the ancient 'prophets inquired' and searched with great diligence ; and shall not we then search diligently those Scriptures, which contain the joyful and interesting doctrines of salvation ? Or shall we neglect the means of appropriating to ourselves its everlasting benefits ? Far be this from us ! Rather let us throw aside all carnal encumbrances, and use every method of bringing our

V. 15, 16. 'We are to imitate our Father and our God, as good children do their parents. The sentiment is confirmed from Lev. 11:41.' Bl.

V. 17—21. The Christian's best state of mind is, a due proportion of humble fear and believing hope, at an equal distance from presumption and despondency. Without hope, a man is like a ship which has no anchor ; without fear, he resembles one without ballast. The fearless professor is defenceless ; and Satan 'takes him captive at his will ;' while he who desponds has no heart to avail himself of his advantages, and surrenders at discretion.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren to 'fear always,' as well as to 'hope to the end ;' especially considering at what a price they had been redeemed.—Once they had lived in a vain, unprofitable manner ; Jews had rested in the legal ceremonies, and the 'traditions of the elders ;' Gentiles in the absurd fables and idolatrous worship, transmitted to them from their ancestors ; both were at an immense distance from a spiritual religion. But they had been redeemed, not only by power exerted, but by a price paid for them, as a satisfaction to the justice of God, that He might act honorably in delivering them. This price had not consisted of the treasures which men generally most value ; but it had been paid with 'the blood of Christ,' 'the Son of the living God,' which was indeed most precious,

The written Word of God is the surest rule of a Christian's life, and by this rule we are commanded to be holy every way.

The O. T. commands are to be studied and obeyed in the times of the N. T. ; the apostle, by virtue of a command delivered several times by Moses, requires holiness in all Christians.

V. 17. The apostle here supposes these Christians would certainly call upon their heavenly Father, and from that argues with them to pass the time of their sojourning here in fear.

All good Christians look upon themselves in this world as pilgrims and sojourners, as strangers in a distant country, passing to another, to which they properly belong, Ps. 39:12. Heb. 11:13.

The consideration of God as a Judge, is not improper for those who can truly call Him Father. Holy confidence in God as a Father, and an awful fear of Him as a Judge, are very consistent ; to regard God as a Judge, is a singular mean to endear Him to us as a Father.

The judgment of God will be without respect of persons, according to every man's work. The works of men will in the great day discover their persons ; God will make all the world to know who are his by their works ; we are obliged to faith, holiness, and obedience, and our works will be an evidence whether we have complied with our obligations or not.

V. 18, 19. The apostle having exhorted to pass the time of our life in the fear of God, from this consideration, that we call on the Father, adds, in these words, a second argument, because, or forasmuch as we are redeemed by the Son, &c. Herein he reminds them of their redemption, of the price paid for it, of their knowledge of it, and of what they were redeemed from, a vain conversation received by tradition.

The consideration of our redemption ought to be a constant and powerful inducement to holiness, and the fear of God.

God expects a Christian should live answerably to what he knows, and therefore we have great need to be put in mind of what we already know, Ps. 39:4.

Silver and gold, and such corruptible things, can by no means purchase or procure a man's salvation ; they are corruptible, and, therefore, cannot redeem an incorruptible and immortal soul. The redemption of man is real, not metaphorical ; and the price is equal to the purchase, for it is the precious blood of Christ, it is the blood of an innocent Person, whom the paschal lamb represented, and of an infinite Person, being the Son of God, therefore it is called the blood of God, Acts 20:28.

Christ's design in shedding his most precious blood, was, to redeem us, not only from eternal misery hereafter, but from a vain conversation in this world ; empty, frivolous, trifling, and unserviceable to the honor of God, the credit of religion, the conviction of unbelievers, and comfort and satisfaction of a man's own conscience.

A man's conversation may carry an appearance of devotion, and may plead antiquity, custom, and tradition, in its defence, and yet, after all, be a most vain conversation. The Jews had a deal to say from these heads, for all their formalities ; yet their conversation was so vain, that only the blood of Christ could redeem them from it.

V. 20, 21. The Redeemer is further described, not only as a Lamb without spot, but as one foreordained or foreknown. When prescience is ascribed to God, it implies more than bare prospect or speculation. It imports an act of the will, a resolution that the thing shall be, Acts 2:23. God did not only foreknow, but determine and decree, that his Son should die for man, and this decree was before the foundation of the world.

Also, He was manifested in these last days for you ; manifested or demonstrated to be that Redeemer whom God had foreordained, by his birth, by his Father's testimony, and by his own works, especially by his resurrection, Rom. 1:4. 'This was done in these last times of the New Test. and of the Gospel, for you, you Jews, you sinners, you afflicted ones ; you have the comfort of the manifestation and appearance of Christ, if you believe on Him.'

God raised Him up from the dead, and gave Him glory. The resurrection of Christ, considered as an act of power, is common to all the three Persons, but as an act of judgment it is peculiar to the Father, who, as a Judge, released Christ, raised Him from the grave, and gave Him glory, proclaimed Him to all the world to be his Son, advanced Him to heaven, crowned Him with glory and honor, invested Him with all power in heaven and earth, and glorified Him with that glory which He had with God before the world was.

The redeemed are also described here by their faith and hope. The cause of this is, Jesus Christ ; 'You do by Him believe in God ; by Him as the Author, Encourager, Support, and Finisher of your faith ; your faith and hope now may be in God, as reconciled to you by Christ the Mediator.'

Learn hence, God had purposes of special minds into a proper frame for attending to this grand concern, and of doing the work of our great Master with alacrity and industry. Let us study to be 'sober,' in the midst of a giddy, sensual, and intoxicated world ; let us 'hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end ;' and show ourselves the 'obedient children' of God, by avoiding conformity to the world, and by taking care not to 'fashion ourselves according to the former lusts in our ignorance ;' 4:3—5. Rom. 12:1, 12. but especially watching and praying against those sins, to which we were then most prone or accustomed. Thus let us aim to become 'holy in all manner of conversation,' even 'as God who hath called us is holy ;' for He sanctifies all whom He saves, and 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord.'

If there is truth in his assurance, nothing can disappoint him, not sin itself, it is true ; but it is no less true, that if he do not fear to sin there is no truth in his assurance. It is not the assurance of faith, but the misperception of a secure and profane mind.' Leighton. Sc.

(17) 'Now follows the second argument, by which we are actuated to virtue, and that derived from the divine benignity and justice.' Bl.

favor toward his people long before He made any manifestations of them. The clearness of light, the supports of faith, the efficacy of ordinances, and the proportion of comforts; these are all much larger since the manifestation of Christ, than they were before. Our gratitude and services should be suitable to such favors. The redemption of Christ belongs to none but true believers: none [can scripturally] pretend to a general application of Christ's death for the salvation of all. Hypocrites and unbelievers will be ruined for ever, notwithstanding the death of Christ. God in Christ is the ultimate Object of a Christian's faith, which is strongly supported by the resurrection of Christ, and the glory that did follow.

V. 22. Here the apostle begins another

PRACT. OBS. V. 17-21. The God whom we worship 'is no Respeeter of persons;' but does now, and will at last, 'judge according to every man's work.' Knowing these things, and aware of the deceitfulness of our hearts, the subtlety of our enemies, and the manifold delusions which are propagated on every side; we should 'pass the time of our sojourning' in this perilous world, in humble, watchful, and jealous 'fear;' which will best secure us against fatal deceptions, and preserve us from dishonoring God and exposing ourselves to his fatherly corrections. Prov. 14:15, 16. 28:14. Rom. 11:16-21. It behooves us also frequently to remember, that all the riches of the world could never have saved one soul from eternal destruction. Why then should we covet such unavailing, perishing treasures? Ps. 49:6-9. Mat. 16:24-26. P. O. 21-23.—But how vast are our obligations to the Lord Jesus, the spotless 'Lamb of God,' whose precious blood was freely shed to ransom our souls, and to obtain eternal salvation for us! May we 'by Him believe in God, who raised Him from the dead and gave Him glory, that our faith and hope' may rest on the infinite perfection and love of God, for all things pertaining to our eternal salvation! SCOTT.

(21.) Who by Him believe, &c. 'Who by Him trust in God. The phrase is remarkable, and I think, with Hallet, the meaning is, that Christians, who, before their conversion, were ignorant of the true God, learnt his being and providence from the great fact of Christ's resurrection, and the power with which God invested Him on his ascension into heaven.' DONNR.

(21-23.) 'It is a fact beyond reasonable controversy, that there is not now, and within the memory of history there never was, a people who were not given up to gross idolatry, totally ignorant of God, and destitute of all true religious worship, except those who have been saved from this dreadful state, by the light of revelation. Yes, the Holy Bible is the sun of the moral system. Take it from any people, and that people is in darkness; take it from the world, and the world is blind. It enlightens, elevates, and purifies society, wherever it is introduced.' REV. BERIAH GREEN.

V. 22. They indeed were active and earnest in this matter, [their purification,] but He [the Holy Spirit] had given them both the will and the power. Fervently. Here only.—'With all their power, vehemently, permanently, liberally, with the whole soul.' Quol. in Leigh. Sc.

exhortation to brotherly love, wherein he supposes the Gospel had already such an effect on them as to purify their souls, while they obeyed it through the Spirit, and that it had produced at least an unfeigned love of the brethren; and from thence he argues with them to proceed to a higher degree of affection, to love one another with a pure heart fervently.

To purify the soul, supposes some great uncleanness and defilement which had polluted it, and that this defilement is removed. The Word of God is the great instrument of purification, and is effectual, if it be obeyed, John 17: 17. Many hear the truth, but are never purified by it, because they will not obey it.

The Spirit of God is the great Agent in purification; convinces of impurities, furnishes virtues and graces; faith, Acts 15: 9. hope, 1 John 3: 3. the fear of God, Ps. 34: 9. and the love of Jesus Christ. The aid of the Spirit does not supersede our own industry; these people purified their own souls, but it was through the Spirit.

The souls of Christians must be purified before they can so much as love one another unfeignedly. There are lusts and partialities in man, that without divine grace we can neither love God nor one another as we ought to do; there is no charity but out of a pure heart.

It is the duty of all Christians sincerely and fervently to love one another. Our affection to one another must be sincere and real, fervent, constant, and extensive.

V. 23. This duty, of loving one another with a pure heart fervently, the apostle further presses on Christians, from the consideration of their spiritual relation. Hence, we may learn,

That all Christians are born again; and by this, their new birth, are brought into a new and a near relation to one another, they become brethren.

The Word of God is the great mean of regeneration, Jam. 1: 18. which is a new, second birth, much more desirable and excellent than the first. This the apostle teaches, by preferring the incorruptible to the corruptible seed. By the one we become the children of men, by the other the sons and daughters of the Most High. Comparing the Word of God to seed, he teaches us its power and value, and how God works by means.

Those that are regenerate should love one another with a pure heart fervently; they are under the same government, partake of the same privileges, and are embarked in the same interest.

The Word of God is a living, or lively Word, Heb. 4: 12. a mean of spiritual life, animating and exciting us in our duty, till it brings us to eternal life; and it is abiding; it remains eternally true, and abides in the hearts of the regenerate for ever.

V. 24, 25. The apostle having given an account of the excellency of the renewed spiritual man, as born again, now sets before us the vanity of the natural man, taking him with all his ornaments and advantages about him; he is as grass and the flower of grass; and nothing can make him a solid, substantial being, but the being born again, of the incorruptible seed, the Word of God, which will transform him into a most excellent creature, whose glory will not fade like a flower, but shine like an angel; and this Word is daily set before you in the preaching of the Gospel.

Man is a withering, fading, dying creature. In his entrance into the world, in his life, and in his fall, he is like to grass, Job 14: 2. Is. 40: 6, 7. Take him in all his glory, even that is as the flower of grass; his wit, beauty, strength, vigor, wealth, honor; these are but as the flower of grass, which soon withers and dies away.

The Word of God, if received, and that only, will preserve him to everlasting life, and abide with him for ever.

The prophets and apostles preached the same doctrine, Isaiah and others, in the Old Test., the same which the apostles preached in the New.

CHAP. II. The general exhortation to holiness is continued and enforced by several reasons, taken from the foundation on which Christians are built, Jesus Christ, and from their spiritual blessings and privileges in Him. The mean of obtaining it, the Word of God, is recommended, and all contrary qualities are condemned. Particular directions are given how subjects ought to obey the magistrates, and servants their masters, patiently suffering in well doing, in imitation of Christ.

V. 1. Malice may be taken more generally for all sorts of wickedness, as Jam. 1: 21. 1 Cor. 5: 8. but, in a more confined sense, is anger resting, settled, overgrown, and retained till it inflames a man to design and PRACT. OBS. V. 22-25. It is highly important, that men should seriously consider, and be deeply convinced, that their souls must be purified from pollution, or they will inevitably perish; that there is a work and duty for them to attend on in this matter; that they can do nothing in it, except by 'obeying the truth;' that they cannot 'obey the truth' but by the 'Holy Spirit,' whom God has promised to give to those that ask Him; Luke 11 5-13. and that 'unfeigned love' of true Christians is one proper test and standard of evangelical purity of heart. All other distinctions will soon be lost, and as it were swallowed up, in the difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate; all other glory will wither, and terminate in everlasting shame and disgrace; all other unions will be dissolved, and perish. But those who are one in Christ Jesus, and are 'beautified with his salvation,' will be united in perfect love, glory, and felicity, for ever. As 'this Word of the Gospel,' which is the seed of eternal life, is preached to us also; let us see to it, that it dwells in our hearts, and brings forth holy fruit in our lives; and then we shall 'not be ashamed or confounded, world without end.' SCOTT.

V. 23-25. This brotherly love was indeed in some sense natural to them, not as men, but as Christians; as they were all children of one family, and more nearly related than any earthly brethren could be. The quotation, Is. 40: 6, 7. is nearly from the Sept., which accords to the Heb. 'It is grossly contrary to the truth of the Scriptures, to imagine, that they who are thus renewed can be unborn again.' SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1-3. The apostle here applied to Christ, as the context proves, what the Psalmist had spoken of Jehovah. Ps. 34: 8.—The Lord is merciful and kind, whether men believe it, or not; many have inefficacious notions of his mercy, without any experience or taste of it, and these notions commonly embolden them in rebellion; but regenerate persons believe that He is gracious; they apply to Him in that persuasion, and thus they taste and relish his grace, and have an

do mischief, or delight in any mischief that befalls another. Guile is deceit in words, and comprehends flattery, falsehood, and delusion, a crafty imposing on another's ignorance or weakness, to his damage. Hypocrisies, the word being plural, comprehends all sorts of hypocrisies. In matters of religion, hypocrisy is counterfeit piety; in civil conversation, counterfeit friendship, much practiced by those who give high compliments, or promise what they never intend to perform, or pretend friendship when mischief lies in their hearts. Envy is a grieving at the good of another; at their abilities, prosperity, fame, or successful labors. Evil speaking is detraction, speaking against another, or defaming him; it is rendered backbiting, 2 Cor. 12:20. Rom. 1:30. These are to be put off, as a vile garment.

Learn, 1. The best Christians have need to be cautioned and warned against the worst sins; they are but sanctified in part, and are still liable to temptations.

2. Our best services toward God will neither please Him, nor profit us, if we are not conscientious in our duties to men. The sins here mentioned are offences against the second table.

3. Whereas it is said, all malice, all guile, learn, That one sin, not laid aside, will hinder our spiritual profit and everlasting welfare.

4. Malice, envy, hatred, hypocrisy, and evil-speaking, generally go together; and all of them combine to hinder our profiting by the Word of God.

V. 2. The duty here exhorted to, is, a strong and constant desire of the Word of God, here called reasonable milk. Only that phrase not being proper English, our translators rendered it the milk of the Word, by which we are to understand food proper for the soul, or a reasonable creature. It must be sincere, not adulterated by the mixtures of men, who often corrupt the Word of God, 2 Cor. 2:17. The manner how they are to desire it is stated. He puts them in mind of their regeneration. They being newly born, must desire the milk of the Word, and for this end, that they may grow thereby; that we may improve in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Savior, 2 Pet. 3:18.

Learn, 1. Strong desires and affections to the Word of God, are a sure evidence of a person's being born again: the lowest evidence, but yet certain.

2. Growth and improvement in wisdom and grace are the design and desire of every Christian; all spiritual means are for edification and improvement. The Word of God, rightly used, does not leave a man as it finds him, but improves and makes him better.

V. 3. If so be, or since that, or forasmuch as, ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious. The apostle does not doubt, but affirms that these good Christians had tasted the goodness of God, hence he argues with them, as v. 1, 2. The next verse assures us, that the Lord, here spoken of, is the Lord Jesus Christ. Hence, Learn, 1. Our Lord Jesus Christ is very gracious to his people.

2. The graciousness of our Redeemer is best discovered by an experimental taste of it; which supposes our being united to Him by faith, and then we may taste his goodness in all his providences, in all our spiritual concerns, in all our fears and temptations, in his Word and worship every day.

3. The best of God's servants have, in this life, but a taste of the grace of Christ.

4. The Word of God is the great instrument whereby He discovers and communicates his grace to men. They who feed on the sincere milk of the Word, taste and experience most of his grace.

V. 4. The apostle here enters on a description of Jesus Christ, which he continues to v. 9. He calls Him a Stone, to denote his invincible strength and everlasting duration, and to teach his servants that He is their Protection and Security, the Foundation on which they are built, and a Rock of offence to all their enemies. He is the living Stone, having eternal life in Himself, and being the Prince of life to all his people.

The reputation and respect He has with God and man are very different. He is disallowed of men, reprobated or rejected; but chosen of God, separated and foreordained to be the Foundation of the church, as ch. 1:20. and precious, a most honorable, choice, worthy Person, in Himself, in the esteem of God, and in the judgment of all who believe on Him.

To this Person so described we are obliged to come; to whom coming, not by a local motion, but by faith, whereby we are united to Him at first, and draw nigh to Him ever after.

Learn, 1. Jesus Christ is the very foundation-stone of all our hopes and happiness.

2. Men in general disallow and reject Jesus Christ; they slight Him, dislike Him, oppose and refuse Him, as Scripture and experience declare, Isa. 53:3.

3. However, He is chosen of God, and precious in his account; chosen to be the Lord of the universe, the Head of the church, the Savior of his people, and the Judge of the world; precious in the excellency of his nature, the dignity of his office, and the gloriousness of his services.

4. Those who expect mercy from this gracious Redeemer, must come to Him, which is our act, though done by God's grace; an act of the soul, not of the body; a real endeavor, not a fruitless wish.

V. 5. The foundation was laid, v. 4. Here is the superstructure built upon it; Ye also, as lively stones, are built up. The apostle is recommending the Christian church and constitution to these dispersed Jews. It was natural for them to object, that the Christian church had no such glorious temple, nor such a numerous priesthood; but its dispensation was mean, having nothing of the pomp and grandeur the Jewish dispensation had. To which the apostle answers, that the Christian church is a much nobler fabric than the Jewish temple, a temple consisting not of dead materials, but of living parts. Christ, the Foundation, a living Stone, Christians lively stones,—these make a spiritual house, and a holy priesthood; and though they have no bloody sacrifices of beasts to offer, yet they have much better and more acceptable; and they have an Altar, too, on which to present their offerings; for they offer spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

Learn, 1. All-sincere Christians have in them a principle of spiritual life, derived from Christ their Head; hence, living stones. 2. The church of God is a spiritual house, Eph. 2:20. 1 Cor. 3:10. Eph. 2:22. its foundation, Christ Jesus; the materials of it, spiritual persons; its furniture, the graces of the Spirit;—in connexion, held together by the Spirit of God, and by one common faith; and in use, to offer up spiritual sacrifices. This house is daily built up, every part of it improving, and the whole supplied, in every age, by the addition of new particular members. 3. All good Christians are a holy priesthood. The apostle speaks here of the generality of Christians; they are all select persons, sacred to God, serviceable to others, well endowed with heavenly gifts and graces, and well employed. 4. This holy priesthood must and will offer up spiritual sacrifices to God. The spiritual sacrifices Christians are to offer, are, their bodies, souls, affections, prayers, praises, alms, and other duties. 5. The most spiritual sacrifices of the best men are not acceptable to God, but through Jesus Christ; He is the only great High Priest, through whom we and our services can be accepted; therefore bring all your oblations to Him, and by Him present them to God.

V. 6. What was asserted before of Christ, his being a living Stone, &c. is here proved from Isa. 28:16. rather the sense than the words, from either the Heb. or LXX. The true sense of Scripture may be justly and fully expressed in other than in scripture-words. It is contained. The verb is active, but our translators render it passively, to earnest of their future felicity, even 'the witness in themselves' of his mercy and truth. Ps. 4:6—8. 51:12,13. 63:5—8. Prov. 14:10. 24:13,14. Cant. 1:3, 4. 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9, 10.—1. Malice, &c. 'The apostles sometimes name some of these evils, and sometimes others of them, but they are all inseparable as one garment, and all comprehended under that one word, "the old man," which the apostle there exhorts to put off. (Eph. 4:22.)—"The Word" . . . is both the incorruptible seed, and the incorruptible food, of that new life of grace, which must therefore be an incorruptible life.—Though it seem a poor, despicable business, that a frail, sinful man, like yourselves, speak a few words in your hearing, yet, look upon it as the means, wherein God communicates happiness to them that believe, and works that believing into happiness; . . . consider this, which is a true notion, and then what can be so precious?' Abp. Leighton.—The word sincere shows with what diligent care, the true doctrines and principles of the sacred Word should be distinguished from all corrupted and mutilated systems; even as a parent would guard his beloved child, from infectious or poisonous nutriment, though it assumed the name, form, and color of milk.—(3) Tasted.] This is a reference, rather than a quotation, and alike near to the Sept. and to the Heb. Ps. 34:8.

The kindling of gracious affection is like a flame, the higher it is raised, the more ardent it is. It is as natural for one who is spiritually born to thirst after holiness, as it is for a child to desire its mother's breast. Their highest enjoyment in this world, is but a taste and prelibation of their future glory, and has no tendency to satisfy or abate their desires for more.'

avoid the difficulty of finding a nominative case for it, which had puzzled so many interpreters before them.

Learn, 1. In the weighty matters of religion, we must depend entirely on scripture-proof; Christ and his apostles appealed to Moses, David, and the ancient prophets. 2. The accounts God hath given us in Scripture concerning his Son Jesus Christ, are what require our strictest attention; Behold, I lay—John calls for the like attention, John 1:29. 3. The constituting of Christ Jesus Head of the church, is an eminent work of God; I lay in Zion. 4. Jesus Christ is the chief Corner-stone that God hath laid in his spiritual building. 5. Jesus Christ is the Corner-stone for the support and salvation of none but such as are his sincere people: none but Zion, and such as are of Zion; not for Babylon, not for his enemies. 6. True faith in Jesus Christ is the only way to prevent a man's utter confusion. Three things put a man into great confusion, and faith prevents them all,—disappointment, sin, and judgment. Faith has a remedy for each.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—8. The apostles, with one consent, declare the necessity of 'laying aside all malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and slanders,' in order to 'receive with meekness' the instructions of Christ. We need not then wonder, that there are so many hearers of the Word wholly unfruitful; and that others are so little edified, when we observe how much these apostolical injunctions are neglected.—But let no man rest in unexperienced notions; for even 'habet in Christ taste that He is gracious;' and their experience of his love and mercy draws them to seek Him, in all their subsequent distresses, fears, wants, and temptations, and to rest on Him as 'the Foundation' of all their hopes.—But whilst our Emmanuel, and his salvation, are glorious in the eyes and quotes Ros., as saying, 'that, according to the primary sense, there is promised that defence and security, which Jerusalem would afford to its inhabitants, and all who took refuge there from Sennacherib. Thus Sion signifies Jerusalem; and the stone is a symbol of security. But in a sublimed sense, the words hold good of Christ, in whom all should take refuge who desire eternal salvation. Then Sion is the Jewish nation, from which Christ descended; and the Corner-stone is Christ.' Ed.

V. 7, 8. 'Unto them that disbelieve, the Stone which the builders disallowed, the same is become the Head of the corner, and a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence. They disbelieving the Word, that is, the Word of the Gospel, which contains this testimony, stumble at this Corner-stone, "whereunto they were appointed." The meaning is, that God, the righteous Judge of all the earth, had appointed, or decreed, that destruction, or eternal perdition, should be the punishment of those disbelieving persons, who wilfully rejected all the evidences that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, the Savior of the world.'

T. H. HORNE.

V. 9, 10. 'A chosen generation,' referring to the choice of Abraham and his posterity; 'a royal priesthood,' referring to the covenants with Aaron as to the priesthood, and with David as to the kingdom; and 'a holy nation, a peculiar people,' referring to the national covenant with Israel, at the giving of the law. (Ex. 19:6. Sept.)—To explain all this, as some do, to mean that nominal Christians are, exactly in the same sense, 'a chosen generation, &c.' as Israel was of old; is a most unreasonable confusion of the typical prophecies contained in the Old Test., sary consequence deduced from Scripture, may be depended on with as much certainty as if it were contained in express words of Scripture. The prophet did not expressly say so, yet he said that from which the consequence was unavoidable. Our Savior bids them search the Scriptures, because they testified of Him; yet no place in those Scriptures to which He there refers them, said Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah. Yet those Scriptures do say, He should be born of a virgin, before the sceptre departed from Judah, during the second temple, and after Daniel's seventy weeks; but such was Jesus Christ. To collect which conclusion, one must make use of reason, history, eyesight, experience; and yet it is an infallible scripture-conclusion for all that.

2. The business of faithful ministers is, to apply general truths to the particular condition and state of their hearers, v. 6. This requires wisdom, courage, and fidelity; but is very profitable to the hearers.

3. Jesus Christ is exceeding precious to all the faithful. The majesty and grandeur of his Person, the dignity of his office, his near relation, his wonderful works, his immense love,—everything, engages them to the highest esteem and respect for Him.

4. Disobedient people have no true faith. By disobedient, understand the unpersuadable, incredulous, and impenitent.

5. They that ought to build the church of Christ, are often the worst enemies of Christ in the world. In the Old Test. the false prophets, and in the New, the scribes, pharisees, chief priests, and still the hierarchy of Rome.

6. God will carry on his own work, and support the interest of Jesus Christ in the world, notwithstanding the falseness of pretended friends, and the opposition of his worst enemies.

V. 8. The words are taken from Isa. 8:13, 14. From whence it is plain, that Jesus Christ is the Lord of hosts, and consequently the most high God.

The builders, the chief priests, refused Him, and the people followed their leaders; so Christ became to them a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, at which they stumbled, and hurt themselves; and, in return, He fell on them as a mighty stone or rock, and punished them with destruction, Mat. 21:44.

Learn, 1. All the disobedient take offence at the Word of God; are offended with Christ Himself, with his doctrine and the purity of his precepts; the Jewish doctors more especially stumbled at the meanness of his appearance, and the proposal of trusting only to Him for their justification before God, Rom. 9:32.

2. The same blessed Jesus, who is the Author of salvation to some, is to others the occasion of their sin and destruction. He is set for the rising and fall of many in Israel.

3. God Himself hath appointed everlasting destruction to all those who stumble at the Word, being disobedient. All those who go on resolutely in their infidelity and contempt of the Gospel, are appointed to eternal destruction; and God, from eternity, knows who they are.

4. To see the Jews generally rejecting Christ, and multitudes in all ages (slighting Him, ought not to discourage us in our love and duty to Him; for this had been foretold by the prophets long ago, and is a confirmation of our faith, both in the Scriptures and in the Messiah.

V. 9. The Jews were exceedingly tender of their ancient privileges, of being the only people of God. 'Now,' say they, 'if we submit to the gospel-constitution, we shall lose all this, and stand on the same level with the Gentiles.' To this objection the apostle answers, That, if they did not submit, they were ruined, v. 7, 8. That, if they did submit, they should lose no real advantage, but continue still what they desired to be,—a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, &c.

Learn, 1. All true Christians make one family, one holy nation, a species of people distinct from the common world; of another spirit, principle, and practice; which they could never be, if they were not chosen in Christ to be such, and sanctified by his Spirit.

2. All the true servants of Christ are royal in their relation to God and Christ; in their power with God, and over themselves and all their spiritual enemies; in the improvements and excellency of their own spirits, and in their hopes and expectations; they are a royal priesthood, separated from sin and sinners, consecrated to God, and offering to God spiritual services and oblations, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ.

3. It is the honor of the servants of Christ, that they are God's peculiar people, the people of his acquisition, choice, care, and delight. These four dignities of all genuine Christians are not natural to them; for their first state is a state of horrid darkness, but

'precious' to the hearts of all the regenerate; men in general, continuing proud, carnal, and alienated from God, can see no comeliness or glory in them. Is. 53:2, 3. Jn. 1:14, 15, 22—25. He is, indeed, made 'the Head-Stone of the corner;' but modern builders in general make no account of Him; and many carry on their work, either in open opposition to Him, or in manifest neglect of Him.—But let us inquire, whether we have the obedient faith of those to whom 'Christ is precious;' for many profess his truths, who stumble at his precepts; and so, in another way, He becomes to them 'a Rock of offence,' and an occasion of deeper condemnation. Scott.

with the accomplishment of them in the 'true Israel,' or the whole body of true believers, as addressed in the New Test.; and to admit it, would subvert the whole system of interpretation, adopted throughout this work, and which, on mature reflection, even on the objections of opponents, the author is daily more and more assured is the only true one. Rom. 9:6—13, 11:1—6. Gal. 3:6—14, 26—29. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:13—21. He would not indeed notice these interpretations, but from a fear, lest it should be thought, that he had not only considered what men, eminent for learning, had said against that exposition, which he decidedly adheres to.—Israel, as typically 'a chosen generation,' was cast off from being the peculiar people of God; but Christians, as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and as born again in consequence of their election in Christ, and 'accounted to Him for a generation,' are indeed 'a chosen generation.' Ps. 22:30, 31. Is. 53:9, 10. Eph. 1:3—12. A small company of Israel, compared with the whole nation, officiated as priests, and they were not of the same tribe to which the kingdom was allotted; but in Christ the kingly and priestly offices are united. Zech. 6:12, 13. Heb. 7. and through Him believers become 'a royal priesthood,' both 'kings and priests,' being every way dignified and made honorable; called to exercise a spiritual dominion over those passions to which others are enslaved, and to obtain victories over Satan, the world, and sin; and appointed heirs of the kingdom of heaven. They also constituted 'a holy nation,' incorporated under the government of Christ, subject to his holy laws, sanctified by his Spirit, conformed to his image, and safe under his protection; and 'a peculiar people,' purchased with they are effectually called out of darkness, into a state of marvellous light, joy, pleasure, and prosperity; with this intent and view, that they should show forth, by words and actions, the virtues and praises of Him who hath called them.

V. 10. To make this people content, and thankful for the great mercies and dig-the blood of Christ, redeemed from worse than Egyptian bondage, favored with peculiar privileges, and formed to a peculiar character and conduct. Tit. 2:14.—In all these respects, Christians are appointed to show forth the praises of the Lord, by their spiritual worship, their open profession of his Gospel, their holy conversation, and exemplary conduct. To this, therefore, the apostle earnestly exhorted his brethren. The Lord had called many of them out of the total darkness of Pagan idolatry, and the rest, from the comparative darkness of the Mosiac dispensation and Jewish formality, into the clear light of the Gospel, to behold the 'marvellous' displays thus given of the divine glory, and to partake of his astonishing love to sinners. This He had done, in order that they might be his witnesses and worshippers; to render Him the glory due to his name, and to 'show forth his praises,' or to declare his virtues, or energies, even the efficacy of his grace, in their holy tempers and actions. They had formerly been a people of no name, or excellency; but they were now become 'the people of God,' and had 'obtained that mercy,' for the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, to which they once were strangers. The prophecy, thus referred to, being quoted by Paul, as expressly predicting the calling of the Gentiles, evidently shows, that the Jewish converts were not here exclusively addressed. Hos. 1:8—10. 2:21—23. Rom. 9:24—29. Praises. Phil. 4:8. 2 Pet. 1:3—5. SCOTT.

(9—12.) Comp. 3:16. 'We have to complain of the public injustice that is done to Christianity, when one of its ostentatious professors has acted the hypocrite, and stands in disgraceful exposure before the eyes of the world. We advert to the readiness with which this is turned into a matter of general impeachment, against every appearance of seriousness; and how loud the exclamation is against the religion of all who signalize themselves; and that, if the aspect of godliness be so very decided as to become an aspect of peculiarity, then is this peculiarity converted into a ground of distrust and suspicion against the bearer of it. Now, it so happens, that, in the midst of this world lying in wickedness, a man, to be a Christian at all, must signalize himself. Neither is he in a way of salvation, unless he be one of a very peculiar people; nor would we precipitately consign him to discredit, even though the peculiarity be so glaring as to provoke the charge of methodism. But, instead of making one man's hypocrisy act as a draw-back upon the reputation of a thousand, we submit, if it would not be a fairer and more philosophical procedure, just to betake one's self to the method of induction,—to make a walking survey over the town, and record an inventory of all the men in it, who are so very far gone, as to have the voice of psalms in their family; or as to attend the meetings of fellowship for prayer; or as scrupulously to abstain from all that is questionable in the amusements of the world; or as, by any other marked and visible symptom whatever, to stand out to general observation as the members of a saintly and separated society. We know, that even of such there are a few, who, if Paul were alive, would move him to weep for the reproach they bring upon his Master. But we also know, that the blind and impetuous world exaggerates the few into the many; lays the sins of one upon the multitude; looks at their general aspect of sanctity, and is so engrossed with this single expression of character, as to be insensible to the noble uprightness, and the tender humanity with which this sanctity is associated. And therefore it is that we offer the assertion, and challenge all to its most thorough and searching investigation, that the Christianity of these people, which many think does nothing but cant, and profess, and run after ordinances, has augmented their honesties and their liberalities, and that, tenfold beyond the average character of society; that these are the men we oftenest meet with in the mansions of poverty, and who look with the most wakeful eye over all the sufferings and necessities of our species, and who open their hand most widely in behalf of the imploring and the friendless: and to whom, in spite of all their mockery, the men of the world are sure, in the negotiations of business, to award the readiest confidence, and who sustain the most splendid part in all those great movements of philanthropy, which bear on the general interests of mankind; and who, with their eye full upon eternity, scatter the most abundant blessings over the fleeing pilgrimage of time,—and who, while they hold their conversation in heaven, do most enrich the earth we tread upon, with all those virtues which secure enjoyment to families, and uphold the order and prosperity of the commonwealth.' On the Influence of Christianity in augmenting Mercantile Virtues. Disc. 2. vol. 2. CHALMERS.—'We were created and redeemed for the sole purpose of praising and glorifying our Creator;

unities brought unto them by the Gospel, the apostle advises them to compare their former and their present state.

Learn, 1. The best people ought frequently to look back on what they were in time past. 2. The people of God are the most valuable people in the world; all the rest are not a people; good for little. 3. To be brought into the number of the people of God is a very great mercy, and may be obtained.

V. 11. Even the best of men need exhortation to abstain from the worst sins. Many of them proceed from the corruption of nature, which, in their exercise, depend on the body, gratifying some sensual appetite, or inordinate inclination of the flesh. These, Christians ought to avoid, considering,

1. The respect they have with God and good men; they are dearly beloved. 2. Their condition in the world; they are strangers and pilgrims, and should not impede their passage by giving into the wickedness and lusts of the country through which they pass. 3. The mischief and danger these sins produce; 'they war against the soul'; therefore your souls ought to war against them.'

Learn, 1. The grand mischief sin does to man, is, it wars against the soul; destroys its moral liberty, robs it of its comfort and peace, hinders its present prosperity, and plunges it into everlasting misery.

2. Of all sorts of sin, none are more hurtful to the soul than fleshly lusts. Carnal appetites, lewdness, and sensuality, are most odious to God, and destructive to man's soul. It is a sore judgment to be given up to them.

V. 12. These Christian people are here exhorted to adorn their profession by an honest conversation; that is, good, lovely, decent, amiable, and without blame, and that because they lived among the Gentiles, people of another religion, and who were inveterate enemies to them, who did already slander them, and constantly spake evil of them as of evil-doers. But there is a day of visitation coming, wherein God may call them by his Word and his grace to repentance; and then they will glorify God, and applaud Christians, Luke 1: 68.

Note, 1. A Christian profession should be attended with an honest conversation, Phil. 4:8. 2. It is the common lot of the best Christians to be evil spoken of by wicked men. 3. Those that are under God's gracious visitation, immediately change their [note, Mal. 4:4—6. Comp. 1 S. 15:22, 23.] if we refuse or neglect to do this, we transgress the great law of creation, frustrate the end of existence, leave unperformed the work for which we were made, and do all in our power to prove we were created in vain. Should the sun refuse to shine; the showers to descend; the earth to bring forth food; or trees in a fruitful soil be barren; it would be manifestly contrary to nature, and the design of their creation; and thus, since they no longer fulfilled this design, they might be properly reduced to nothing again. So if man refuses to praise and glorify God, his conduct is equally unnatural, and he might justly be made the monument of his everlasting displeasure. What would be unnatural in inanimate creatures, is the height of folly and wickedness in us; for we are capable of knowing our duty and are under [infinite and] innumerable obligations to practise it. Let the sun then refuse to shine, the showers to descend, and the earth to be fruitful, but let not rational creatures refuse to praise and glorify their Creator!

V. 11. Covetousness, pride, envy, and other aspiring and malignant passions, as much militate against the salvation of men's souls, and oppose the believer's growth in grace, as sensual propensities can do; 'they war against the soul,' and are numbered by the apostle Paul among 'the works of the flesh.' Gal. 5:19—21. It cannot therefore be proper to explain the words of Peter restrictively of the animal appetites, as warring against the rational powers of the soul. The whole 'natural man' is depraved, the seat of sin is in the soul, and the body is only 'the instrument of unrighteousness.' Gen. 6:5. 8:20—22. Jer. 17:9, 10. Mat. 15:15—20. Mark 7:22. Rom. 6:12, 13, 16—19. And, in the regenerate, the conflict is not between the body and the soul, but between the new and the old nature, called 'the flesh and the spirit;' Rom. 7:15—25. Gal. 5:16—18. 'Warring against the soul,' relates to the destructive tendency of fleshly lusts, the indulgence of which, in any way, is hostile to the soul, and wars against its salvation, or its peace, purity, and vigor.

We must never transgress, nor, if we can help it, seem to do so. We must be honest in the sight of the world (Rom. 12:17.) as well as in fact. It is not enough for a professed follower of Christ, that he can vindicate himself in a court of justice, or sit down and convince any candid mind, that every suspicion against him is unfounded. No; this may do for a man of strict worldly honesty, but it is not enough for a Christian. His integrity ought to stand out in such bold relief, everywhere, that it may be distinctly recognized at a glance. He should on no account fail to let his light so shine before men, that they may glorify his Father in heaven. Cases will often happen, especially with men in active and extensive business, where, owing to circumstances beyond their foresight, or control, there will be the appearance of overreaching, or hard dealing, though everything is honest in fact. And in such cases, where the sacrifice of property is not too great, it ought to be cheerfully made, rather than bring reproach on the Christian name, and thereby prejudice sinners against religion, to their eternal undoing.' V. 13, 14. The general rule of a Christian conversation is, it must be honest ; which it cannot be, if there be not a conscientious discharge of all relative duties : the apostle here, therefore, settles the rules and measures of obedience to the civil magistrate. The duty required is submission, i. e. loyalty and reverence to their persons, obedience to their just laws and commands, and subjection to legal penalties. The persons or objects to whom submission is due, are,

1. More generally ; every ordinance of man. The form is human, but the authority divine ; and though each particular country may have its own laws and constitutions, PRACT. OBS. V. 9-17. Happy are they, of whom it may truly be said, 'Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people !' If we aspire at these distinctions, let us be 'followers of God as dear children ;' . . . thus we shall best evince that these blessings belong to us, and shall make the most suitable returns for them. — But we should consider, not only our own comfort and advantages ; the honor of the Gospel, and the conversion of our neighbors, likewise demand our attention. For if we, who 'had not obtained mercy, have at length obtained mercy,' why may not they, who still remain strange rate, till they have ruined a whole country. You will hardly find one of a thousand who does half so much to serve God and his own soul, as you may see done by thousands to serve the world and the devil. Oh, my soul, how little is it that thou dost for thy Maker and thy Savior, so worthy of thy love ! See, in the circle of your observation, some monster of wickedness, who, to his uttermost, will serve a master that will prove a destroyer to him, and whose wages will be death ; he studies how to serve the devil ; he is never weary of his drudgery ; he racks his invention to go through with it. Ah ! he shames me ; he shames me wonderfully. Now, why should not we be as active, as frequent, as forward in devising good ; why not as wise to do good, as he to do evil ? We have a better cause. Reader, perhaps thou art one who makest but little figure in the world, a "brother of low degree," yet, behold a vast encouragement. A little man may do a great deal of harm ; and pray, why may not a little man do a great deal of good. "The wisdom of a poor man" may start a proposal which may "save a city," serve a nation ! The strength of a single hair, applied to a wheel that has other wheels depending on it, may pull up an oak, or pull down a house.

V. 13-17. Rom. 13:1-7. Tit. 3:1, 2. The words, rendered 'every ordinance of man,' may signify every human constitution or form of government. . . . So that Christians are required to submit to that government, which is established in the countries where they severally reside, without attempting any alteration, except in a peaceable and legal manner, according to their rank in the community. The apostle wrote when Nero was the Roman emperor ; but he was led to use the more general name of 'king,' as his epistle was intended, for the use of future ages and every country. This savage tyrant, who was at length put to death as the enemy of mankind, but not till he had slain multitudes of Christians by his persecuting cruelty, and among the rest the apostles Peter and Paul, as it is generally supposed, was the 'supreme,' whom Christians must submit to and honor ! And the governors of provinces, deputed by him and the Roman senate, together with other subordinate magistrates, must also be obeyed. The intention of civil government is 'to punish evil-doers,' and to protect and 'honor those who do well ;' and, in general, the administration, even at that time, would be productive of immense good, compared with lawless anarchy ; though in very many things the end of government was doubtless counteracted ; for which the yet these, in all nations, are binding according to a general rule, be the established form of government what it may. 2. Particularly ; to the king, as supreme ; first in dignity, and most eminent in degree ; or unto governors, deputies, proconsuls, rulers of provinces, who are sent by him, that is, commissioned by him to govern.

The reasons to enforce this duty, are,

1. For the Lord's sake, Rom. 13 : whose honor is concerned in the dutiful behavior of subjects to their sovereigns. 2. From the end and use of the magistrate's office, which is, to punish evil-doers, and to praise and encourage all them that do well.

Learn hence,

True religion is the best support of civil government ; it requires submission for the Lord's sake, and for conscience' sake. All the punishments, and all the magistrates in the world, cannot hinder, but there will be evil-doers in it. The best way the magistrate can take to discharge his own office, and to amend the world, is, to punish well and reward well.

V. 15. Here is another reason why Christians should submit to the civil magistrate ; it is the will of God, and the way to put to silence the malicious slanders of ignorant and foolish men.

Learn, 1. The will of God is, to a good man, the strongest reason for any duty. 2. Obedience to magistrates is a considerable branch of a Christian's duty ; so is the will of God. 3. A Christian must endeavor, in all relations, to believe himself so as to put to silence the unreasonable reproaches of the most ignorant and foolish men. 4. Those who speak against religion and religious people, are ignorant and foolish.

V. 16. The Jews, from Deut. 17:15. concluded they were bound to obey no sovereign, but one taken from among their own brethren ; and the converted Jews thought they were free from subjection, by their relation to Christ. To prevent these mistakes, the apostle tells the Christians they were free, spiritually, from the bondage of sin and Satan, and the ceremonial law ; but they ignorant and prejudiced, he made partakers of the same salvation ?— With this intent, and from other evangelical motives, we should 'submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake,' praying for all in authority, that they may have wisdom and grace to be faithful to their important trust, 1 Tim. 2:1-4. and endeavoring, by 'well doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men ; as free,' with that liberty which the Son of God bestows through the Holy Spirit, Jn. 8:30-36. Rom. 8:16-23. but remembering, that we are the 'servants of God,' and must, in no degree, use our liberty to cloak any malicious or ambitious designs. Sc.

rulers would be accountable to the Judge of the world. In this way the duty of kings and rulers also was pointed out to them. But in respect of Christians, it was expressly 'the will of God,' that, by their good behavior, 'in all godliness and honesty,' as peaceable subjects, notwithstanding the oppressions which they suffered, they might 'put to silence the ignorant' slanders 'of foolish' and wicked men, who reviled them as seditious persons and enemies to the state, because they would worship 'the one living and true God,' alone, and not join in any idolatry. — It is almost impossible, that there can be a worse supreme governor, than he who ruled the vast Roman empire, when this was written by divine inspiration.—The comprehensive brevity of the closing verse, has been greatly and justly admired by competent judges. Scott.

(15.) 'Providence has placed us in a situation very peculiar, in a country where, as far as the mighty influences of religion are concerned, nothing has authority or power but the Bible. This is more and more seen every year. And when it shall be fully understood, that among the teeming millions of our country there is nothing to regulate the awful energies of the religious principle, but the authority of the Word of God, the Bible will be studied with an intensity of interest, and used with a fidelity of application, as yet unknown in these latter days. And it will carry its authority more entirely through every department of the church, than has ever been witnessed since the days of the apostles. The truth will then go with lightning glance, and electric force, from heart to heart, and from land to land,—and the earth be soon filled with the knowledge and glory of God.' Rev. Dr. JOHN H. RICE.

submit patiently to hardships and inconveniences: this subjection they owe to their masters, who have a right to their service; and that not only to the good and gentle, such as use them well, and abate somewhat of their right, but even to the crooked and perverse, who are scarcely to be pleased at all.

Learn, 1. Servants ought to conduct themselves to their masters with submission, and fear of displeasing them. 2. The sinful misconduct of one relation does not justify the sinful behavior of the other; the servant is bound to do his duty, though the master be sinfully froward and perverse. 3. Good people are to be meeke and gentle to their servants, and inferiors.

V. 19, 20. Having charged servants to be subject, he condescends to reason with them about it; if they were patient under their hardships, and continued doing their duty to their unbelieving and untoward masters, this would be acceptable to God, and He would reward all they suffered for conscience

PRACT. OBS. V. 18-25. The view given by the apostle, of the behavior of many masters to their unoffending slaves, may serve to convince us, how incompatible slavery is with the 'love of our neighbors,' and animate us to protest, in all proper ways, against so grievous an oppression of our fellow-creatures; yet Christianity, among its other unparalleled excellences, teaches men to behave honorably, and live comfortably, even in these circumstances of degradation and suffering. But if slaves, when thus unjustly and cruelly used, were directed to submit to their masters and respect them; how inexcusable are those hired servants, who, professing the Gospel, do not 'obey good and gentle masters' who can endure no degree of 'frowardness' in others, through the indulgence of it in themselves; and who will not bear a reproof, when they are most evidently culpable! Indeed, we cannot go through with our duty, as Christians, in any station, if we do not persevere in endeavoring to 'overcome evil with good,' copying the conduct of Him who 'suffered for us, and left us an example that we should follow his steps.' . . . let us learn to copy his example, when reviled and abused; as well as to rely on his merits, and keep close under his gracious protection and guidance to the end of our pilgrimage. SCOTT.

toward Him; but to be patient when justly chastised, deserves no commendation at all; it is only doing well and suffering patiently for that, which is acceptable with God.

Learn, 1. No condition is so mean, but a man may live conscientiously in it, and glorify God in it; the meanest servant may do so. 2. The most conscientious persons are very often the greatest sufferers; for conscience toward God they suffer wrongfully; they do well and suffer for it; but those who thus suffer are praiseworthy, they honor God and religion, and are accepted of Him; and this is their highest support and satisfaction. 3. Deserved sufferings must be endured with patience. Sufferings in this world are not always pledges of our future happiness; if children, or servants, are rude and undutiful, and suffer for it, this will neither be acceptable with God, nor procure the praise of men.

V. 21. More reasons are given to encourage Christian servants to patience under unjust sufferings, from their Christian calling and profession, and from the example of Christ, who suffered for us, and so became our Example, that we should follow his steps. From whence learn,

1. Good Christians are a sort of people called to be sufferers, and therefore they must expect it. 2. Jesus Christ suffered for you, or for us; it was not the Father that suffered, but He whom the Father sanctified, and sent into the world, for that end; it was both the body and soul of Christ that suffered, and He suffered for us, in our stead, and for our good, v. 24. 3. The sufferings of Christ should quiet us under the most unjust and cruel sufferings we meet with in the world; He suffered voluntarily, not for Himself, but for us, with the utmost readiness, with perfect patience, and all this, though He was God-man; shall not we sinners, who deserve the worst, submit to the light afflictions of this life, which work for us unspeakable advantages afterward?

V. 22, 23. The example of Christ's subjection and patience is here explained and amplified; Christ suffered,

1. Wrongfully, and without cause, Isa. 53:9. his words, as well as actions, were all sincere, just and right.

2. Patiently; when they blasphemed Him, mocked Him, called Him foul names, He was dumb, and opened not his mouth; when they went further, to real injuries, beating, buffeting, and crowning Him with thorns, He threatened not; but committed both Himself and his cause to God that judgeth righteously, who would in time clear his innocency, and avenge Him on his enemies.

Learn, 1. Our blessed Redeemer was perfectly holy; no temptation, no provocation whatsoever, could extort from Him so much as the least sinful or indecent word.

2. Provocations to sin can never justify the commission of it; the reasons for sin can never be so great, but we have always stronger reasons to avoid it.

3. The judgment of God will determine justly on every man, and every cause; and thither we ought, with patience and resignation, to refer ourselves.

V. 24. Lest any should think, from what is said, v. 21-23. that Christ's death was designed only for an example of patience under sufferings, the apostle here adds a more glorious design and effect of it; Who his own Self, &c. where,

Note, 1. The person suffering, Jesus Christ; the expression, his own Self, is emphatical, and necessary to show that He verified all the ancient prophecies, and to exclude all others from participation with Him in the work of man's redemption; it is added, in his body; not but that He suffered in his soul, Mat. 26:38. but the sufferings of the body were visible, and more obvious to the consideration of these suffering servants, for whose sake this example is produced.

2. The sufferings He underwent; stripes, wounds, death, the death of the cross; servile and ignominious punishments!

3. The reason of his sufferings; He bare our sins; which teaches, that, in his suffering, He stood charged with our sins, as one who had undertaken to put them away by the sacrifice of Himself, Isa. 53:6. that He bare the punishment of them, and thereby satisfied divine justice, and so that He takes away our sins, and removes them away from us, Lev. 16:21. John 1:29.

4. The fruits of Christ's sufferings are, (1.) Our sanctification, consisting of the death, the mortification of sin, and a new holy life of righteousness; for both which we have an example, and powerful motives and abilities also, from the death and resurrection of Christ. (2.) Our justification; Christ was bruised and crucified as an expiatory Sacrifice, and by his stripes we are healed.

Learn, 1. Jesus Christ bore the sins of all his people, and expiated them by his death on the cross. 2. No man can depend safely on Christ, as having borne his sin, and expiated his guilt, till he dies unto sin, and lives unto righteousness.

V. 25. The apostle concludes his advice to Christian servants, putting them in mind of the difference between their former and present condition. They were as sheep going astray; but now by their conversion are returned. There lurks within the feeling, that it is impossible for them to be conformed to the image of the Son of God, and therefore they are not to aim at a point so elevated. Such an impression is fatal to the growth of piety. The example of Christ is a practicable example for universal imitation. Its excellences are those of which all men are capable, and which they are commanded to possess and cultivate (1 John 2:6). They are moral and human excellences. They consist not in the power, majesty, and wisdom of the Deity, but in the voluntary actions of the Man Christ Jesus. The example of Christ has nothing to do with the peculiar constitution of his Person, or the faculties of his divine nature. It consisted not in his oneness with the Father, but in his prayers, fastings, strivings with human trials, and communications with God. Christ took part of flesh and blood, and was made

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The apostle, having treated of the duties of subjects to their sovereigns, and of servants to their masters, comes now to explain the duty of wives to their husbands.

1. In subjection, or an affectionate submission to the will, and obedience to the just authority, of their own husbands; which obliging conduct would be most likely to win disobedient and unbelieving husbands.

like unto his brethren. He was tempted,—touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and tried in all points like as we are, yet without sin. By denying that the excellences of Christ's example are those of which all men are capable, the impenitent are armed with an unanswerable excuse for all their unbelief,—suppose you should live one whole day exactly as Christ lived; how would it compare with the ordinary days of your life?

(25.) From Isa. 53:6. 'The sense is: "For ye were as stray sheep, without pasture, exposed to peril, and without protection." A fine image of complete misery, and utter destruction.'

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—4. This [being subject in all things lawful] must be attended to in a conscientious manner, with an especial aim at the conversion of their husbands, 1 Cor. 7:13, 16, which was not so much to be expected from a disputatious attempt to teach them the Gospel, as from the silent, persuasive eloquence of a becoming deportment. In this endeavor, they must not deem outward things, such as 'plaiting the hair, wearing' golden rings and bracelets, or 'putting on' elegant or becoming garments, to be 'their adorning,' in any degree; but they must value and seek for an inward beauty, residing in the heart, as 'a hidden man,' visible in its essence, only unto God, consisting of a renewal and sanctification of the whole soul to the divine image, through 'the incorruptible seed of the Word,' made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit; for this alone would continue for ever, without decaying, or being tarnished. 1 Tim. 2:9, 10. This inward beauty and ornament of a sanctified heart, would especially be manifested by 'a meek and quiet spirit,' which was 'in the sight of God' very valuable; and He would certainly honor it, though men might undervalue it.—Outward ornaments, according to every one's rank in life, are not absolutely prohibited by these Scriptures, as it has been generally observed; but the frivolous affectation and vanity, which constitute the love of finery; the time, attention, and expense wasted by those, who are attached to such decorations; and the proportionable neglect of the 'inward adorning,' which is uniformly connected with it, sufficiently prove, that the more moderate and indifferent about these embellishments Christians are, from proper principles, and without preciseness and censoriousness, the more respectable and amiable they must appear in the eyes of all competent judges.—The works of charity, performed

2. In a chaste conversation, which their unbelieving husbands would accurately observe and attend to.

3. In fear, or reverence to their husbands, Eph. 5:33.

Learn, 1. Every distinct relation has its particular duties, which ministers ought to preach, and people to understand.

2. A cheerful subjection, and a loving, reverential respect, are duties which Christian women owe their husbands, whether good or bad; these were due from Eve to Adam before the Fall, and are still required, though much more difficult now than before, Gen. 3:16. 1 Tim. 2:11.

3. Nothing is more powerful, next to the Word of God, to win people, than a good conversation, and the careful discharge of relative duties.

4. Irreligion and infidelity do not dissolve the bonds, nor dispense with the duties, of civil relations; the wife must discharge her duty to her own husband, though he obey not the Word.

5. Evil men are strict observers of the conversation of professors of religion; their curiosity, envy, and jealousy, make them watch narrowly the ways and lives of good people.

6. A chaste conversation, attended with due and proper respect to every one, is an excellent mean to win them to the faith of the Gospel, and obedience to the Word.

V. 3. This rule relates to the dress of religious women: plaiting of hair was commonly used in those times by lewd women; wearing of gold, or ornaments made of gold, was practised by Rebecca, and Esther, and other religious women, but afterwards became the attire chiefly of harlots and wicked people; putting on of apparel is not absolutely forbidden, but only too much curiosity and costliness in apparel.

Learn, 1. Religious people should take care, that all their external behavior be answerable to their profession of Christianity; they must be holy in all manner of conversation.

2. The outward adorning of the body is very often sensual and excessive; for instance, when it is immoderate, and above your degree and station in the world; when you are proud of it, and puffed up with it; when you dress, designing to allure and tempt others; when your apparel is too rich, curious, or superfluous; when your fashions are fantastical, imitating the levity and vanity of the worst people; and when they are immodest and wanton. The attire of a harlot can never become a chaste Christian matron.

V. 4. Instead of the outward adorning of the body, the apostle directs Christian wives to put on much more excellent and beautiful ornaments; where,

Note, 1. The part to be adorned; the hidden man of the heart; that is, the soul. 2. The ornament prescribed; in general, something not corruptible, that is, the graces and virtues of God's Holy Spirit: more especially, the finest ornament of Christian women, a meek and quiet spirit; a tractable, easy temper of mind, void of passion, pride, and immoderate anger; discovering itself in a quiet, obliging behavior toward their husbands and families: a quiet spirit will make a good woman easy to herself, which, being visible to others, becomes an amiable ornament to a person in the eyes of the world. 3. The excellency of it; meekness and calmness of spirit are, in the sight of God, of great price; amiable in the sight of men, and precious in the sight of God.

Learn, 1. A true Christian's chief care lies in the right ordering and commanding of his own spirit; where the hypocrite's work ends, there the true Christian's work begins.

2. The endowments of the inner man are the chief ornaments of a Christian; but especially a composed, calm, and quiet spirit, renders either man or woman beautiful and lovely.

V. 5, 6. The duties of Christian wives being in their nature difficult, the apostle enforces them by the example,

1. Of the holy women of old, who lived in old time, and had less knowledge to inform them, and fewer examples to encourage them; yet practised this duty; they were holy women, and therefore their example is obligatory; they trusted in God, yet did not neglect their duty to man. 2. Of Sara, who obeyed her husband, followed him when he went from Ur of the Chaldeans, not knowing whither he went, and called him lord, thereby showing him reverence, and acknowledging his superiority over her; and all this, though she was declared a princess, by God from heaven, by the change of her name.

Learn, 1. God takes exact notice, and keeps an exact record, of the actions of all men and women in the world.

2. The subjection of wives to their husbands, is a duty which has been practiced universally by holy women in all ages.

to the distressed, with the money necessary for purchasing ornaments of gold and costly attire, will render women much more beautiful in the eyes of God and man, than if they were decked with all the vain ornaments, in which the lighter part of the sex delight.' Mackn. Scott.

(1.) 'Hence, to v. 7. follow the reciprocal duties of wives and husbands.' Bloomf.—'The wives of impenitent husbands, are too apt to suffer themselves to be drawn away from their own standard of duty, instead of seeking continually to draw their husbands to that standard. You either see a softening influence working upon the man's character, at least in the way of restraint, from the pious example and consistency of the wife, or else the wife, however exemplary before marriage, sinks down into a state of stupidity, or conformity to the world. A Christian, in such a union, needs to mark that passage, 2 Pet. 1:10. "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure," for daily meditation and prayer;—not for her own sake only, but for the sake of the offspring, whose eternal destiny is, in a peculiar manner, and in the midst of peculiar danger, committed to her care. It should be the mother's constant endeavor, to have her children baptized, so as to surround them with every possible religious influence, as well as for the influence which her vows may exert upon her own conduct in the family.' Rev. N. Adams.

(1—7.) 'With my married friends, I will leave this excellent remark: "Family passions cloud faith, disturb duty, darken comfort." You will do the more good to one another, the more this sentence is considered. When the husband and wife are always contriving to be blessings to each other, I will say, with Tertullian, "where shall I find words to describe the happiness of that state?" Oh, happy marriage!—Why should we not at least, once or twice a week, make relative duties the subject of our inquiries, and of our purposes?' Mather.

(3.) 'Ancient medals, and works of sculpture, show the plaited tresses condemned by the apostles, with all the expensive and fanciful head decorations of ancient females. Dr. A. Clarke remarks: "No female head ever looks so well, as when it is adorned with its own hair alone."' Henry, abr.

V. 5, 6. Many of the Christian women, whom Peter addressed, were descended from Abraham and Sarah; and the others would be accounted as her daughters, heirs of her faith, and imitators of her example, so long as they behaved well in their relative duties, and as it became the disciples

6 Even as Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him <sup>e</sup> lord: whose <sup>f</sup> daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

7 Likewise, ye <sup>g</sup> husbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honor unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

8 Finally, be ye all of one <sup>h</sup> mind, having compassion one of another; <sup>i</sup> love <sup>j</sup> as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous :

9 Not <sup>k</sup> rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.

10 For <sup>l</sup> he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile :

3. The greatest honor, of any man or woman, lies in a humble and faithful deportment of themselves in the relation or condition in which Providence has placed them.

4. God takes notice of the good that is in his servants, to their honor and benefit, but covers a multitude of failings; Sara's [unbelief] and derision are overlooked, when her virtues are celebrated.

5. Christians ought to do their duty to one another, not out of fear, nor from force, but from a willing mind, and in obedience to the command of God; wives should be in subjection to their churlish husbands, not from

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—7. The truths, precepts, and grace of the Gospel teach men a becoming and beneficial behavior, in all the relations of life, by a happy union of piety, purity, meekness, fidelity, and holy love; and form them to it. The inward and incorruptible adorning of wisdom and grace, constitutes the most durable beauty and amiableness, and will ensure esteem and affection, when all outward ornaments, with of Christ; and were not so afraid of the anger of their husbands, or of others, as to deny Him, or act contrary to his commandments, through unbelief and consternation of spirit. For this would be rather an imitation of Sarah, when, through surprise, she denied that she laughed; than of her faith and holiness, or her becoming subjection to her husband. SC.

(6.) Calling him lord. [As to the names by which husbands are to be addressed by their wives, the apostle's words are not to be supposed authoritative. Reverence and obedience are the bounden duty of wives; and the expression of this, as being made in terms purely conventional, may very well vary with manners and customs of different ages.] BLOOMF.—Not afraid. [I prefer, with Est. and Calvin, to understand it of a firmness and intrepidity of character, which would be necessary to support their religious independence, when united to heathen husbands. The amazement is well explained by Calvin, of that weak timidity which fosters senseless fear, and is too often found in the female sex.] BLOOMF.—The structure of the Greek sentence makes it evident, that he speaks of the condition, on which they were to preserve the characters of daughters of Sarah.

V. 7. On the other hand, the apostle exhorted 'husbands,' professing the Gospel, to 'dwell with' their wives, in a rational and intelligent manner, which might evince the propriety of the authority being conferred on them. They ought to behave towards them, as became those who had the knowledge of God and of true religion; who understood the ends for which marriage was appointed, and the manner in which pious persons ought to behave in that holy estate; and this would keep them from everything unbecoming, unkind, unfaithful, or injurious to their temporal comfort, or spiritual improvement. As their wives were of the same nature, and conjoined in the most endeared and indissoluble union, which blended all their interests with those of their husbands; so the consideration of their inferiority in this relation, and the comparative weakness of their sex, which rendered them incapable of so great hardship and fatigue as men could endure; together with their manifold infirmities, as connected with child-bearing, should induce their husbands to treat them with the greatest respect, and more tender regard, instead of exciting them to tyrannize over them. They ought, therefore, to show a peculiar esteem and affection for them; to take much satisfaction in their company; to honor them before servants and strangers, to support their credit in the family; to make a becoming provision for their wants, to lay no unreasonable injunctions on them, and to show a great concern in everything relative to their health, comfort, and reputation. And, if they would be thought superior in knowledge or wisdom, they ought to show it, by not taking offence at trifles, and by giving up their own humors and inclinations, to oblige their wives, and for their welfare. These things should be attended to, from the consideration that they were 'fellow-heirs of the grace of life,' or of the free favor and gift of God, which is eternal life; and, therefore, as companions in their pilgrimage, they ought to do all, which they possibly could, to solace, counsel, and assist each other by the way. They should also more attentively guard against all disagreements and domestic uneasiness; that nothing might occur to indispose them for prayer, in secret, and in the family, but especially with each other. This being essential to the Christian's prosperity, was a matter of so great importance, that all things, in his whole conduct, ought to be regulated with reference to it.—Perhaps it might also be intimated, that in case a Christian had an unconverted wife, he ought to study by kind behavior to conciliate her mind, that so she might do nothing to interrupt the social worship of the family, but might be induced amicably to join in it.

dread and amazement, but from a desire to do well, and to please God.

V. 7. The husband's duty to the wife comes next to be considered; the particulars whereof are,

1. Cohabitation; which forbids unnecessary separation, and implies a mutual communication of goods and persons one to another, with delight and concord.

2. Dwelling with the wife according to knowledge; not according to lust, as brutes; nor according to passion, as devils; but according to knowledge, as wise and sober men, who know the Word of God, and their own duty.

3. Giving honor to the wife; giving due respect unto her, and maintaining her authority, protecting her person, supporting her credit, delighting in her conversation, affording her a handsome maintenance, and placing a due trust and confidence in her.

The reasons are, Because she is the weaker vessel by nature and constitution, and so ought to be defended: but then the wife is, in other and higher respects, equal to her husband; they are heirs together of the grace of life, of all the blessings of this life and another, and therefore should live peaceably and quietly one with another, which if they do not, their prayers will, and for one another will be hindered, so that often you will not pray at all, or if you do, you will pray with a discomposed, ruffled mind, and so without success.

Learn, All married people should take care to behave themselves so lovingly and peaceably one to another, that they may not by their broils hinder the success of their prayers.

V. 8. The apostle here passes from special to more general exhortations; he advises Christians to be all of one mind, to be unanimous in the belief of the same faith, and practice of the same duties of religion; and whereas the Christians at that time were many of them in a suffering condition, therefore he charges them to have compassion one of another, to love as brethren, to pity those who were in distress, and to be courteous to all. Hence,

Learn, Christians should endeavor to be likeminded one to another, Rom. 15:5. not according to man's pleasure, but God's Word. Though they cannot be exactly of the same mind, yet they ought to love one another with more than common affection; they should love as brethren. Christianity requires pity to the distressed, and civility to all. He must be a flagrant sinner, or a vile apostate, who is not a proper object of civil courtesy, 1 Cor. 5:11. 2 John 10:11.

V. 9. The former direction teaches us, how Christians and friends should treat one another; this instructs us how to behave towards enemies. To bear evils patiently, and to bless your enemies, is the way to obtain the blessing of God.

Learn, 1. To render evil for evil, or railing for railing, is a sinful, unchristian practice; but for ministers to rebuke sharply, and to preach earnestly against the sins of the times, is not railing; all the prophets and apostles practised it, Isa. 56:10. Zeph. 3:3. Acts 20:29. 2. The laws of Christ oblige us to return blessing for railing, Mat. 5:44. We must pity, pray for, and love them who rail at us. 3. A Christian's calling, as it invests him with glorious privileges, so it obliges him to difficult duties. 4. All the true servants of God shall infallibly inherit a blessing; they have it already in a great degree, but the full possession of it is reserved to another state and world.

V. 10, 11. We have here an excellent prescription for a comfortable, happy life, in this quarrelsome, ill-natured world, taken from Ps. 34:12—14.

Learn, 1. Good people under the Old and New Test. were obliged to the same moral duties; to refrain the tongue from evil, and the lips from guile, was a duty in David's time, as well as now. 2. It is lawful to all that beauty which they are so vainly meant to embellish, will not secure any one from contempt and aversion, whose conduct in life is disgraceful: and they will soon leave the poor body to the confinement and corruption of the tomb; and the soul, which is 'without holiness,' to be for ever loathsome and abhorred of God. SCOTT.

(7.) Giving honor, &c. [Alloting an honorable subsistence. This sense of the word [here rendered honor] is confirmed by 1 Tim. 5:17.—Many Christians were of low rank in life, which might make the precept of maintaining their wives decently, and not subjecting them to too hard labor, exceeding proper.] DODDR.—It is pleasing to see a man who is not a member of the church, willing to assist his wife in presenting their child for baptism. It is an evidence, that shame does not triumph over his respect and affection for his wife, and the mother of his children, and that the fear of man that bringeth a snare has not wholly entwined itself about his conscience. The man who truly promises to respect and honor his wife, will remember that he is to respect her conscience, and honor her fear of the Lord, and he will do this when she wishes to offer her child in baptism, though he knows that he will be condemned by it, for not being able to offer the child in his own name.]

Rev. NEB. ADAMS. V. 8—12. 2:13—25. Rom. 12:9—21. 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 13:4—7. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—4. These exhortations entirely coincide with those, which have been considered in Paul's epistles. (10) He that will love. The quotation is from the Sept. which well translates the Heb., except as the apostle uses the third person, instead of the second. SCOTT.

(8.) Hence, to v. 13. the apostle gives some general directions, which concerned all Christians. BLOOMF.—Let our pity to the distressed, be expressed by our prayer for them. It would be a very lovely practice for you, in the daily prayer of your closet, every evening, to think, "What miserable object have I seen to-day, for whom I may do well now to entreat the mercies of the Lord?"—Render the afflicted all the assistance which their necessities may require. Assist them by advice; by obtaining the help of other persons on their behalf; and, if needful, bestow your alms; at least, exercise Nazianzen's charity: "If you have nothing else to bestow upon the miserable, bestow a tear or two upon their miseries." MATHER.

11 Let him eschew evil, and do good; let him seek peace, and ensue it.

12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers; but the face of the Lord is <sup>m</sup> against them that do evil.

13 And <sup>n</sup> who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

14 But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and <sup>o</sup> be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled;

15 But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; and <sup>p</sup> be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and <sup>q</sup> fear:

16 Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evil-doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ.

17 For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing than for evil doing.

18 For <sup>r</sup> Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just <sup>s</sup> for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put <sup>t</sup> to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit;

consider temporal advantages as motives and encouragements to religion. 3. The practice of religion, particularly the right government of the tongue, is the best way to make this life comfortable and prosperous; a sincere, inoffensive, discreet tongue, is a singular mean to pass us peaceably and comfortably through the world. 4. The avoiding of evil, and doing of good, is the way to contentment and happiness both here and hereafter. 5. It is the duty of Christians not only to embrace peace when it is offered, but to seek and pursue it when it is denied: peace with societies, and peace with particular persons, in opposition to division and contention, is what is here intended.

V. 12. The allegation is continued from Ps. 34. Christians need not fear that such patient, inoffensive behavior as is prescribed, v. 10, 11. will invite and encourage the cruelty of their enemies, for God will thereby be engaged on their side; so that if any injuries be offered to them, their heavenly Father will certainly aid them against their unrighteous enemies; for He is more an enemy to wicked persecutors than men are.

Learn, 1. We must not in all cases adhere to the express words of Scripture, but PRACT. OBS. V. 8—18. As peace and love are necessary to domestic comfort, so are they to the prosperity of the church. But 'how astonishing and lamentable is it, that when the way to happiness is so plainly delineated, so few should find it! What man is there who does not desire life, and to live many days, that he may see good? Yet how few tongues are kept from evil! How few lips from speaking guile! How few decline from evil, and do good! How few seek peace and pursue it! On the contrary, how much low cunning and artifice, and what discords and contentions, reign among mankind! And how detestable and miserable do these perverse and ungovernable passions render us!' Doddr.—Yet, in pleading the cause of truth, in public or in

V. 13. 'The apostle now enjoins some further inducements to a holy and virtuous life.'

V. 15. 'J. P. Smith considers that the reading, "Christ," instead of God, is established by sufficient evidence; therefore we have here a precept, to pay Christ that reverential homage which is due to the most Holy One alone. The connexion shows the sentiment to be, revere and trust in Christ, as your Refuge from the malice and injuries of men.' HENRY, abr.—"The Lord Christ." So the Alexandr. Vatic., Codex study the sense and meaning of them; we must not imagine, that God hath eyes, and ears, and face, though these are the express words of the Scripture. 2. God hath a special care and paternal affection toward all his righteous people. 3. God doth always hear the prayers of the faithful, John 9: 31. 1 John 5: 14. Heb. 4: 16. 4. Though God is infinitely good, yet He abhors impenitent sinners, and will pour out his wrath on them that do evil; He will do Himself right, and do all the world justice; and his goodness is no obstruction to his doing so.

V. 13, 14. The patient, humble behavior of Christians, recommended above, is here urged again from two considerations: 1. It will be the best and surest way to prevent suffering; for who is he that will harm you? 2. It is the way to improve sufferings; and will entitle to the blessing promised by Christ, Mat. 5: 10.

Learn, 1. To follow always that which is good, is the best course we can take to keep out of harm's way. 2. To suffer for righteousness' sake is the honor and happiness of a Christian; to suffer for the cause of truth, a good conscience, or any part of a Christian's duty, is a great honor; the delight of it is greater than the torment, the honor more than the disgrace, and the gain much greater than the loss. 3. Christians have no reason to be afraid of the threats or rage of any of their enemies; 'Your enemies are God's enemies, his face is against them, his power is above them, they are the objects of his curse, and can do nothing to you but by his permission; therefore, trouble not yourselves about them.'

V. 15. Instead of terrifying yourselves with the fear of men, be sure to sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; let Him be your Fear, and let Him be your Dread, Isa. 8: 12, 13. Luke 12: 4.

We sanctify the Lord God in our hearts, when we with sincerity and fervency adore Him; and when our deportment is such, as invites and encourages others to glorify and honor Him; both are required, Lev. 10: 3.

Learn, 1. An awful sense of the divine perfections is the best antidote against the fear of sufferings; did we fear God more, we should certainly fear men less. 2. The hope and faith of a Christian are defensible against all the world; there may be a good reason given for religion; it is not a fancy, but a rational scheme revealed from heaven, suited to all the necessities of miserable sinners, and centering entirely in the glory of God through Jesus Christ. 3. Christians should have a reason ready for their Christianity, that it may appear they are not actuated either by folly or fancy; this defence may be necessary more than once or twice, so that Christians should be always prepared to make it, either to the magistrate, if he demand it, or to any inquisitive, serious Christian, who desires to know it for his information or improvement. 4. Apologies for our religion ought to be made with modesty and meekness, in the fear of God, with jealousy over ourselves, and reverence to our superiors.

V. 16, 17. The confession of a Christian's faith cannot credibly be supported, but by the two means here specified,—a good conscience, and a good conversation. Conscience is good, when it does its office well, when it is kept pure and uncorrupt, and clear from guilt; then it will justify you, though men accuse you. A good conversation in Christ is a holy life, according to the doctrine and example of Christ.

Learn, 1. The most conscientious persons cannot escape the censures and slanders of evil men; they will speak evil of them, as of evil doers, and charge them with crimes which their very souls abhor; Christ and his apostles were so used. 2. False accusation generally turns to the accuser's shame, by discovering at last the accuser's indiscretion, injustice, falsehood, and uncharitableness. 3. As well-doing sometimes exposes a good man to suffering, so evil-doing will not exempt an evil man from it. The apostle supposes here that a man may suffer for both. It is a sad condition that that person is in, on whom sin and suffering meet together at the same time; sin makes sufferings to be extreme, unprofitable, comfortless, and destructive.

V. 18. The example of Christ is here proposed as an argument for patience under sufferings, the strength of which will be discerned, if we consider the several points contained in the words; observe, therefore,

1. Jesus Christ Himself was not exempted from sufferings in this life, though He had no guilt of his own, and could have declined all suffering if He had pleased. 2. The reason, or meritorious cause, of Christ's suffering was the sins of men; Christ suffered for sins: He suffered to expiate and to make an atonement for sin; and it extends to all sins. 3. In the case of our Lord's suffering, it was the Just that suffered for the unjust; He that knew no sin, suffered instead of them that knew no righteousness. 4. The merit and perfection of Christ's sacrifice were such, that for Him to suffer once was enough; the legal sacrifices were repeated from day to day, and from year to year; but the sacrifice of Christ, once offered, purgeth away sin, Heb. 7: 27. 9: 26, 28. 10: 10, 12, 14. 5. The blessed end and design of our Lord's sufferings, were, to bring us to God, to reconcile us to God, to give us access to the Father, to render us and our services acceptable, and to bring us to eternal glory, Eph. 2: 13, 18. 3: 12. Heb. 10: 21, 22. 6. The issue and event of Christ's suffering, as to Himself, were these, He was put to death in his human nature, but He was quickened and raised again by the Spirit.

Now if Christ was not exempted from sufferings, why should Christians expect it? If He suffered, to expiate sins, why should not we be content when our sufferings are only for trial and correction, but not for expiation? If He, though perfectly just, why should not we, who are all criminals? If He once suffered, and then entered into glory, shall not we be patient under trouble, since it will be but a little time and we shall follow Him to glory? If He suffered, to bring private, we should be prepared, not only with conclusive arguments, but 'with meekness and fear;' that a humble, benevolent, peaceable conduct towards men, may evidently unite with a reverential awe of the majesty of God: for wrath, pride, bitterness, and irreverence, will prejudice men's minds against the truth, whatever ability is shown in defending it. Nor can this service be successfully performed, except by those, who 'exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man;' for nothing can be so well opposed to the enmity of the human heart against the truth, as the holy lives of its professors, which tend to make those 'ashamed, who falsely accuse their good conversation in Christ.'

V. 17, 18. The resurrection of Christ is sometimes ascribed to God or the Father, sometimes to Christ Himself, and sometimes to the Holy Spirit. This is very easy and natural, if Father, Son, and Spirit are one God; but how can it be explained on any other principle?—The case is the same in many other things. SCOTT.

us to God, shall not we submit to difficulties, since they are of so much use to quicken us in our return to God, and in the performance of our duty to Him ?

V. 19, 20. Here the apostle passes from the example of Christ, to that of the old world, and sets before the Jews, to whom he wrote, the different event of those who believed and obeyed Christ preaching by Noah, from them that continued disobedient and unbelieving; intimating to the Jews, that they were under a like sentence. God would not wait much longer on them; they had now an offer of mercy, those that accepted of it should be saved, but those who rejected Christ and the Gospel, should be as certainly destroyed as ever the disobedient in the times of Noah were.

Observe, here, 1. The preacher; Christ Jesus, who interested Himself in the affairs of the church and of the world, ever since He was first promised to Adam, Gen. 3:15. He went, not by a local motion, but by special operation, as God is frequently said to move, Gen. 11:5. Mic. 1:3. Hos. 5:15. He went and preached, by his Spirit striving PRACT. OBS. V. 19—22. While we recollect the end proposed in the sufferings of the divine Savior, let us inquire, whether we be really brought unto God, as his worshippers, and in the temper of our hearts, and conduct of our lives. Let us enter the Ark, which God has provided, as the only security from the deluge of impending vengeance, which will destroy a guilty world: let us beware that we rest not in outward forms; as if that baptism could save us, or anything but 'the answer of a good conscience towards God.' While we profess ourselves the dis-

V. 19, 20. Various other interpretations [other than that in Henry, with which Scott agrees] have been given of this passage; but none of them appears to me in the least degree satisfactory. Scott.

(19, 20.) 'It was by some an early opinion, that when Christ died, He descended into the place of punishment, and preached to the infidel inhabitants of the old world, there imprisoned: in consequence of which some, or, as others think, all of them were converted and delivered. But neither this, nor any other text that we are aware of, speaks of conversion after death: but the Scriptures universally represent the dead as awaiting the event of the final advent, when all must "appear before the judgment-seat of Christ:" nor does there seem either reason or scriptural authority, for believing, that a whole generation of sinners of the most abandoned character, should be privileged with a second opportunity of mercy,—another day of grace. "To-day, if ye will hear his voice! Now is the accepted time! How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation!" The general current of protestant expositors are therefore of opinion, that the preaching here referred to, took place in the days of Noah, by the instrumentality of himself and some of his family, who were inspired teachers.—The following is the substance of their interpretation:—"For Christ also once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, (that He might bring us to God,) being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit [of God]. By which Spirit also He formerly went and preached unto the spirits [now] in prison: which were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah [120 years] while the ark was preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved by, or through the water." Williams;—who prefers, in the last clause, by, because, as he says, it was by water, probably, that Noah and his family were, in the first instance, saved from the rage of the wicked; and more certainly, at length, from the overwhelming effects of the deluge from above; while the sense of being saved by water, further, best agrees with the v. following. "The like figure, &c. since baptism was unquestionably the ordinance by which the first Christians were separated from the world, even as Noah and his family [were] from their infidel neighbors."—Yet BL holds the foregoing interpretation in great disrespect, nay, almost contempt, apparently,—and says, in his Syn., 'no interpretation seems at all natural, or to carry with it the stamp of truth, but [what he calls] 'the common' 'one, namely, that Christ went and preached (or rather proclaimed his kingdom) to the

with them, and inspiring and enabling Noah to plead with them, and preach righteousness to them, as 2 Pet. 2:5.

2. The hearers; because they were dead and disembodied when the apostle speaks of them, therefore he properly calls them spirits now in prison; not that they were in prison when Christ preached to them, as the vulgar Latin translation and the popish expositors pretend.

3. The sin of these people; they were disobedient, that is, rebellious, unpersuadable, and unbelieving, as the word signifies; and their sin is aggravated from the patience and long-suffering of God, which once waited on them 120 years together, while Noah was preparing the ark, and by that, as well as by his preaching, giving them fair warning of what was coming on them.

4. The event of all; their bodies were drowned, and their spirits cast into hell, which is called a prison, Mat. 5:25. 2 Pet. 2:4, 5. but Noah and his family, who believed and were obedient, were saved in the ark.

Learn, 1. God takes exact notice of all the means and advantages people in all ages have had for the salvation of their souls; it is put to the account of the old world, that Christ offered them his help, sent his Spirit, gave them fair warning by Noah, and waited a long time for their amendment. 2. Though the patience of God wait long upon sinners, yet it will expire at last; it is beneath the majesty of the great God always to wait upon man in vain. 3. The spirits of disobedient sinners, as soon as they are out of their bodies, are committed to the prison of hell, from whence there is no redemption. 4. The way of the most is neither the best, the wisest, nor the safest way to follow: better to follow the eight in the ark, than the eight millions [or more] drowned by the flood and damned to hell.

V. 21. Noah's salvation in the ark on the water, prefigured the salvation of all Christians in the church by baptism; that temporal salvation by the ark was a type, the antitype whereunto is the eternal salvation of believers by baptism; to prevent mistakes of Christ, and partakers of his grace, let us seek the true baptism of the regenerating and sanctifying Spirit of God, in behalf of our children and friends: and thus let us trust in his merits, power, love, and truth, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification; and 'who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, angels, principalities, and powers being made subject to Him.' antediluvians in Hades; [which, i. e. interpretation] he says, moreover, 'is supported by the united authority of the ancients and the soundest of our modern commentators.—He adds: 'The words certainly involve no difficulty; and the plain and natural sense is not to be rejected because it contains matter of wonder, or what is little accountable, to us, with our present faculties. Man, (he continues from Slade.) on this point is not an adequate judge; the subject lies entirely beyond the reach of his knowledge; and we may apply to this case the remarkable words of Paul, 1 Cor. 1:25.' Ed.—[Papists], indeed, here find a purgatory, which we can nowhere find in the Bible: but, 1. Purgatory is, according to their doctrine, for venial offences only, and these were evidently guilty of mortal sin, and must therefore be consigned to hell, from whence they hold no deliverance, and, 2. These were so far from being delivered, that the apostle describes them as in prison when he wrote.' Greenfield.—'These were the spirits of men in Noah's day. They were disobedient during God's forbearance, and while the ark was building. Noah was a preacher of righteousness. He had the Spirit of Christ; and Christ by his Spirit, in him, preached to them, or their spirits. They did not repent, but were cut off, and their spirits cast into prison. Peter speaks of them as in prison when he wrote. Here then is no proof that the spirits of the disobedient repent in prison, or that any means are there used with them for this purpose.' Dr. COTTON.

V. 21, 22. Christ is the true Ark. His church is within the ark, and is therefore safe; but all without will be swept by the deluge of divine vengeance into destruction. Into this ark men enter by faith; this faith Jews and Gentiles professed, when by baptism they were admitted into the Christian church; and thus the baptismal water formed, as it were, the sign of their safety. When Jews and Gentiles professed Christianity, they were thus received into the church, exactly in the same manner as Gentiles had been into the Jewish church by circumcision: but the argument, concerning the baptism of infants, born of Christian parents, is not at all affected by it. The apostle spoke of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity: but he took care to remind men, that the inward grace of baptism, even regeneration, from which all holy affections and actions spring, alone could introduce them into the true church, the ark, or real security; and that no outward administration of baptism could effect this blessed translation into the kingdom of the Son of God. Scott.

CHAP. IV.

1 He exhorteth them to cease from sin, by the example of Christ, and the consideration of the general end that now approacheth: 12 and comforteth them against persecution.

FORASMUCH then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin;

2 That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

3 For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries:

4 Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you:

5 Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

his people; to demonstrate the fulness of his satisfaction; to take possession of heaven for his people, to prepare mansions for them, and to send down the Comforter, who was to be the First-fruits of his intercession, John 16:7.

2. On his ascension into heaven, Christ is enthroned at the right hand of the Father. His being said to sit there, imports absolute rest and cessation from all further troubles and sufferings, and an advancement to the highest personal dignity and sovereign power.

3. Angels, authorities, and powers, are all made subject to Christ Jesus; all power in heaven and earth, to command, to give law, issue orders, and pronounce a final sentence, is committed to Jesus, God-man, which his enemies will find to their everlasting sorrow and confusion, but his servants to their eternal joy and satisfaction.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. The work of a Christian is twofold,—doing the will of God, and suffering his pleasure. This ch. directs us in both. In this verse, the apostle draws a new inference from the consideration of Christ's sufferings. As he had before used it to persuade to patience in suffering, so here to mortification of sin. The antecedent or supposition is, that Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, or in his human nature. The consequent or inference is, 'Arm and fortify yourselves likewise with the same mind, courage, and resolution.' The word flesh, in the former part of the verse, signifies, Christ's human nature, but in the latter part, man's corrupt nature. So the sense is, 'As Christ suffered in his human nature, do you make your corrupt nature suffer, by putting to death the body of sin by self-denial and mortification; for if you do thus suffer in the flesh, or make the flesh suffer, you will be conformable to Christ in his death and resurrection, and will cease from sin.'

Learn, 1. Some of the strongest and best arguments against all sorts of sin are taken from the sufferings of Christ.

2. The beginning of all true mortification lies in the mind; not in penances and hardships on the body. Man is not a sincere creature, but partial, blind, and wicked, till he be renewed and sanctified by the regenerating grace of God.

V. 2. Here the apostle explains what he means by being dead to sin, and ceasing from sin. Negatively, a Christian ought no longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh, to the sinful lusts and corrupt desires of carnal wicked men; but positively, he ought to conform himself to the revealed will of the holy God.

Learn, 1. The lusts of men are the springs of all their wickedness, Jam. 1:13, 14. occasional temptations could not prevail, were it not for men's own corruptions.

2. All good Christians make the will of God, not their own lusts or desires, the rule of their lives and actions.

3. True conversion makes a marvellous change in the heart and life of every one who partakes of it. It alters the mind, judgment, affections, way, and conversation of every one who has experienced it.

V. 3. Here the apostle argues from equity. Though these were Jews to whom he writes, yet, living among the Gentiles, they had learned their way.

Learn, 1. When a man is truly converted, it is very grievous to him to think how the time past of his life has been spent, the hazard he has run so many years, the mischief he has done to others, the dishonor done to God, and the loss he has sustained.

2. While the will of man is unsanctified and corrupt, he walks continually in wicked ways, makes them his choice, delight, work, and business, and makes a bad condition daily worse and worse.

3. One sin, allowed, draws on another. Here are six named, and they have a connexion and dependence one on another. Lasciviousness, or wantonness, expressed in looks, gesture, or behavior, Rom. 13:13. Lusts, acts of lewdness, such as whoredom and adultery. Excess of wine, though short of drunkenness, an immoderate use of it, to the prejudice of health or business. Revelings, or luxurious feasting, too frequent, too full, or too expensive. Banquetings, by which is meant gluttony, or excess in eating. Abominable idolatry; the idol-worship of the Gentiles was attended with lewdness, drunkenness, gluttony, and all sorts of brutality and cruelty; and these Jews, living long among them, were, some of them at least, debauched and corrupted by such practices.

4. It is a Christian's duty, not only to abstain from what is grossly wicked, but also from those things that are generally the occasions of sin, or carry the appearance of evil. Excess of wine and immoderate feasting is forbidden, as well as lust and idolatry.

V. 4. Here you have the visible change wrought in those, who, in the foregoing verse, were represented as having been in the former part of their life very wicked. Hereupon, observe, the conduct of their wicked acquaintance toward them.

1. They are surprised, as at something new and unusual, that their old friends should be so much altered, and not run with as much violence as they used to do to the same sottish excesses and luxury which before they had greedily and madly followed.

2. They speak evil of them, of their persons, way, religion, and God.

Learn, 1. They that are once really converted, will not return to their former course of life, though ever so much tempted by the frowns or flatteries of others to do so.

2. The temper and behavior of true Christians seem very strange to ungodly men,—that they should despise that which every one else is fond of; believe many things which to others seem incredible; delight in what is irksome and tedious, be zealous where they have no visible interest to serve, and depend so much on hope.

3. The best actions of religious people cannot escape the censures and slanders of those who are irreligious. Those actions which cost a good man the most pains, hazard, and self-denial, shall be most censured by the uncharitable and ill-natured world.

V. 5. For the comfort of the servants of God, it is here added, that all wicked people shall be put to give a reason of their behavior, to Him who is both able and duly authorized to judge, and who will ere long pass sentence on all who shall then be found alive, and all such as being dead shall then be raised again, Jam. 5:8, 9. 2 Pet. 3:9.

Learn, The malignant world shall in a little time give an account to the great God of all their evil speeches against his people, NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The word flesh, in these vs., seems to be used in three different senses. It means, 1st. The holy, human nature of Christ; 2dly. The depraved nature of man, the body of sin and death; and, 3dly. The mortal body, in which the soul tabernacles during its continuance in this world.—The contrast between 'the lusts of man,' and 'the will of God,' should be noticed.

(1.) This ch. consists of two parts; 1. Vs. 1—12, contains an exhortation to a holy life; 2. Fortifies Christians against persecution. ROSEN. — [He that hath suffered] 'I. e. the crucifixion of sin in the flesh, in conformity to Christ.'—[Hath ceased from sin.] 'I. e. the habitual practice of all sin whatsoever.' DODD. — 'For he who suffers in the flesh usually ceases to sin.'

V. 3—5. The Jews, at that time, were exceedingly exact and scrupulous, in avoiding all approaches to gross idolatry; it is not, therefore, at all probable, that the apostle meant this of converts from among them, which confirms the opinion, that the epistle was not written exclusively to the Jewish converts.—The apostle uses the first person, thus joining himself with his Christian brethren, probably, as a less offensive manner of stating the subject, and as conscious, that though free from many of the gross crimes here mentioned, he had yet spent too many years of his past life, 'according to the course of the world,' and 'to the lusts of men, and not according to the will of God.' Eph. 2:1—3. Tit. 3:4—7.—Some learned men indeed venture to change the text, without any authority, and to read 'may suffice you'; but the same principle might lead us to explain the words, as addressed exclusively to the Gentile converts; because the Jews had never lived in 'abominable idolatries.'—(4) Think it strange.] 12. Acts 17:20. 'The Greeks used the word to express that . . . wonder, with which a stranger is struck, who beholds anything uncommon or new.' Mackn. He seems to himself, as in a strange country, where everything is new or unusual, and wonderful to him; or, to use an expressive, but inelegant word, outlandish.

(3.) Abominable idolatries.] 'Unnatural lusts indulged in pagan worship,—both unlawful and detestable.'

(3, 4.) 'Drunkenness excludes from heaven, Gal. 5:21. It is, therefore, a subject of church discipline. A vigilant discipline is doubtless demanded in the case of members of lax and doubtful morality in respect to intemperance. It is not enough to cut off those who are past reformation, and to keep those, who by close watching can be preserved in the use of their feet and tongue. Men who are mighty to consume strong drink, are unfit members of that kingdom which consisteth not in "meat and drink," but in "righteousness and peace." The time is not distant, we trust, when the use of ardent spirit will be proscribed by a vote of all the churches in our land, and when the commerce in that article shall equally with the slave-trade, be regarded as inconsistent with a credible profession of Christianity. [Nor is it enough to fix the mark of reprobation on the poor, miserable victim of intemperance, and yet express no disapprobation of the course of the guilty man who furnishes the temptation, and the means of his self-destruction.] Churches of our Lord Jesus Christ! will you not watch over one another with keener vigilance,—lift an earlier note of admonition,—draw tighter the band of brotherly discipline,—and, with a more determined fidelity, cut off those whom admonition cannot restrain? Separate, brethren, between the precious and the vile, the living and the dead, and burn incense between them, that the plague may be stayed.'

(5.) The quick and the dead.] I. e. 'all men without exception.' ROSEN. — Benson interprets the dead figuratively, i. e. 'dead in trespasses and sins.' Wets. explains, 'those who have died for the Gospel.' Mackn., 'Jews and Gentiles.' Bloomf. says of both, 'those then alive,' and 'those already dead.'

6 For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

[Practical Observations.]

7 But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.

V. 6. Some understand this difficult place thus; For this cause was the Gospel preached to all the faithful now dead in Christ, that thereby they might be taught and encouraged to bear the unrighteous judgments and persecutions which the rage of men put on them in the flesh, but might live in the Spirit unto God. Others take the expression, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, in a spiritual sense, thus; The Gospel was preached to them, to judge them, condemn them, and reprove them, for the corruption of their natures, and the viciousness

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—6. The Christian soldier, in preparing for the battle, must peculiarly remember to 'arm himself with the same mind' which was in Christ, the Captain of our salvation; that love, zeal, spirituality, hatred of sin, contempt of the world, fortitude, patience, meekness, and hope, may concur in determining him to venture and suffer all things for the glory of God, the good of men, and 'the joy set before him.' Phil. 2:5—11. P. O. 1—11. Note, Heb. 12:1—3. Vast numbers, now dead, have suffered the same revilings before us: the Gospel called them to separate from the wickedness of their former companions in

V. 6. The Gospel had before this been preached to those, who were 'dead' when the apostle wrote, for this very reason, viz. 'that they might,' by the proud and carnal judgment of wicked men, be condemned as evil-doers, and some even suffer death at their hands; but that, at the same time, being 'quickened' to a divine life by the Holy Spirit, they might 'live to God' as his devoted servants, and his witnesses among their persecutors, and so be prepared for living with Him for ever in heaven. Rom. 8:10, 11. Thus their transient afflictions, disgrace, and sufferings, soon terminated in perfect felicity. In the mean time, they glorified God in life and death, and were supported and comforted by Him; and the Gospel had been the means of preparing them for these things, as it still continued to prepare others to glorify God; and then, after some fleeting sorrows, to be admitted to everlasting, uninterrupted joy, and unalloyed felicity. 3: 19, 20. 1 Cor. 15:29, 30. This seems the meaning of the verse, which is generally allowed to be obscure.—Several other interpretations are given; but that above stated seems the most satisfactory, and it best connects the verse with the words which immediately precede. 'The dead,' there, means such as had already died, 'the quick,' or living, those who were then alive on earth; both of these Christ will judge. The Gospel was preached, in order to the salvation of the hearers; those who embraced it were condemned according to men, or by any man's judgment, but they were accepted by God. The same had been the case with those, to whom the Gospel had formerly been preached, who were since dead, even those from the beginning who had been favored with the Word of God. Believers had been persecuted and condemned by men; but 'they lived according to God in the Spirit,' or 'by the Spirit;' while their persecutors, if impenitent, would be judged and condemned by the Lord. SCOTT.

(6.) Some, as Doddr. and Mackn., understand dead, here, of the Gentiles, as 'dead in trespasses and sins;' the chief objection to which, Doddr. says, is, that it changes the signification of the word dead, so soon. Saurin understands it of the sinners of the old world, and compares ch. 3:19. Slade compares the same, and understands 'the apostle to assert, that the Gospel had been preached, even to the dead,—that they will be judged by the law of nature for the things done in the body, and be rewarded in proportion to their deserts, by a spiritual life, according to the will and power of God.' Bloomf., on the whole, thinks, dead, here, must be interpreted as in v. 5. and it involves the least difficulty, he says, to suppose, (which he seems to, after Jensius, Carpz., and Ros., as also Wets. and Jaspis.) that it is meant of 'those who, being Christians, have died for their profession of the faith.' Ros. gives the sense of the whole v. thus: 'Even to those who in these times have suffered death was the joyful annunciation made, that, although they had suffered death in the flesh, they should yet, by the divine Omnipotence, be alive.' Leighton understands dead, of the generations now literally made dead, and says, 'to be judged according to men in the flesh, is to die to sin, or to have sin die to us, vs. 1, 2. and to live to God in the Spirit is to live to his glory: not unto themselves, as Paul expresses it, but unto Him who died for them and rose again, 2 Cor. 5:16. And to enforce this on those to whom he wrote, he adds, "the end of all things is at hand;" which, though it may refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, yet refers also farther to a greater event, with which that is generally connected, namely, the second coming of our Lord.' Ed.

of their lives; while they lived after the manner of the heathen, or the mere natural man; and that, having thus mortified their sins, they might live according to God, a new and spiritual life. Take it thus; and thence,

Learn, The mortifying of our sins, and living to God, are the expected effects of the Gospel preached unto us.

V. 7. We have here an awful doctrine, and an inference from it. The position is, the end of all things is at hand. 'The miserable destruction of the Jewish church and nation foretold by our Savior, is now very near; consequently, the time of their persecution and your sufferings is but very short. Nay, the world itself will not continue very long, and all things will soon be swallowed up in eternity. The inference is, Be ye therefore sober. Let the frame and temper of your minds be grave, staid, and solid; and observe strict temperance and sobriety in the use of all worldly enjoyments. Do not suffer yourselves to be caught with your former sins and temptations, v. 3. And watch unto prayer. Take care that you be continually in a calm, sober disposition, fit for prayer; and that you be frequent in prayers, lest this end come upon you unawares.' Luke 21: 34. Mat. 26: 40, 41.

Learn, 1. The consideration of our approaching end is a powerful argument, to make us sober in all worldly matters, and earnest in religion.

2. They who would pray to purpose, sin, and to bear testimony against it; they were therefore 'judged according to men in the flesh,' as deserving reproach and persecution; but 'they lived according to God in the Spirit;' and when removed out of the world, they were found 'meet to be partakers of the heavenly inheritance.' Ours is indeed a favored day in this respect: yet, if 'the Spirit of life' dwell in us, the world will judge us deserving of scorn and reproach, whilst God will graciously account us 'worthy of that glorious kingdom for which we suffer.' SCOTT.

V. 7. Christians must expect tribulations in the world, but these would soon terminate.—Many expositors explain 'the end of all things,' to signify the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the whole constitution of the Jewish nation in church and state. But the Christians in Asia Minor were far distant from Jerusalem, and not immediately concerned in those events; as they and all others were and are in the speedy approach of death and judgment, to which the words most naturally lead our minds, and which alone answer to the full import of them. Mat. 24:29—51. SCOTT.

V. 8. 1:22. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 5:19, 20. The apostle here again enforced the exhortation to charity, or love of each other; and in doing this he referred to the proverb, that 'love covereth all sins,' or 'the multitude of sins.' Prov. 10:12. As the love of God in Christ 'covereth the multitude of the sins' of believers, from his sight, Ps. 32:1, 2. so they ought to cast the mantle of love over the number of faults, into which their brethren would fall, in their conduct towards them, and thus hide them from their eyes, by forbearing and forgiving one another, as Christ had forgiven them. Eph. 4:30—32. 5:1, 2. Col. 3:13, 14. Thus the peace of the church, and the communion of the saints, might be preserved, which otherwise must be interrupted; for there were so many things amiss in all, that unless love covered, excused, and forgave, in others, such mistakes and faults, as every one would have need to be borne with in himself, Satan would prevail to excite perpetual divisions and discords among them.—To suppose, that charity, or love, will so cover, or make mends for, the multitude of the man's sins who exercises it, as to induce God to forgive them, is totally subversive of the whole Gospel; for 'if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain;' and the perversion of these words, which are very obvious and important in their true meaning, has encouraged such numbers to neglect Christ, and continue impenitent in their sins, from a vain hope of being pardoned for the sake of a proud, partial benevolence, and some selfish almsdeeds, which by no means constitute the love of which the apostle spoke, 1 Cor. 13:4—7. that a particular and repeated protest against it seems absolutely necessary.—'Those who love one another, easily forgive each other's offences.' Beza.—Self-love veils and covers our own faults, and its effect, in rendering men blind to their own characters, however quick-sighted in other things, is notorious, and allowed on all sides; now if we truly loved others, as we do ourselves, love would veil and cover their faults also, and render us less keen in noticing and animadverting on them, and more disposed to forbearance and long-suffering towards them. Id.

(8.) 'Some, and the Romanists especially, explain: "Charity shall procure us pardon for a multitude of sins." But, as Doddr. observes, "it would be monstrous to imagine, that acts of liberality to the poor can procure the pardon of sin, while men continue in a course of impenitence and unbelief; for by this the whole Gospel would be subverted." The sense is plainly this: "For this affectionate feeling will cover, and cause us to forgive, a multitude of offences in others." As to James 5:20. to which most commentators here refer, it is not of the same nature. Though, however, the above must be considered as the only correct interpretation, yet it cannot be denied that the exercise of this virtue will (in the words of Doddr.) "entitle us, by divine mercy, to expect forgiveness for numberless slips and failings. For (as he adds) where acts of charity spring from an inward principle of love to God,

10 As every man hath received <sup>m</sup> the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards <sup>n</sup> of the manifold grace of God.

11 If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all <sup>o</sup> things may be glorified through Jesus Christ; to <sup>p</sup> whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

[Practical Observations.]

12 Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery <sup>q</sup> trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you :

13 But <sup>r</sup> rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when <sup>s</sup> his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

3. It is the property of true charity to cover a multitude of sins. It inclines people to forgive and forget offences against themselves; to cover and conceal the sins of others, rather than aggravate them, and spread them abroad. It teaches us to love those who are but weak, and who have been guilty of many evil things before their conversion; and it prepares for mercy at the hand of God, who hath promised to forgive them that forgive others, Mat. 6:14.

V. 9. The hospitality here required, is, a free and kind entertainment of strangers and travellers. Sometimes Christians were spoiled of all they had, and driven to distant countries for safety. Therefore it was a wise and necessary rule the apostle here laid down. It is elsewhere commanded, Heb. 13:1. Rom. 12:13. The duty must be done in an easy, kind, handsome manner, without grudging, or grumbling at the expense or trouble.

Learn, 1. Christians ought not only to be charitable, but hospitable, one to another.

2. Whatever a Christian does by way of charity or of hospitality, he ought to do it cheerfully, and without grudging. Freely you have received, freely give.

V. 10. Here the apostle directs about the improvement of talents. The rule is, that whatever gift, ordinary or extraordinary, is given to us, we should minister, or do service, with the same one to another; accounting ourselves not masters, but only stewards of the manifold grace, or the various gifts of God.

Learn, We must not assume our gifts to ourselves, or hide them in a napkin, but do service with them one to another in the best manner we are able; looking upon ourselves as stewards only, and acting accordingly. The talents we are intrusted with, are our Lord's goods, and must be employed as He directs. And it is required in a steward, that he be found faithful.

V. 11. The apostle exemplifies his direction about gifts in two particulars,—speaking and ministering; concerning which he gives these rules. 1. If any man speak, whether a minister or a private Christian, the oracles of God must direct as to the matter of his speech; and as to manner, it must be with the seriousness, reverence, and solemnity, that become those holy and divine oracles. 2. If any man minister, either as a deacon, distributing the alms of the church, and taking care of the poor, or as a private person, by charitable gifts and contributions, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth. He who has received plenty and ability from God, ought to minister plentifully, and according to his ability. These rules ought to be followed and practised for this end, that God in all things, in all your gifts, ministrations, and services, may be glorified, Mat. 5:16. through Jesus Christ, who has procured and given these gifts to men, Eph. 4:8. and through whom alone we and our services are accepted of God, Heb. 13:15. to whom, Jesus Christ, be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

Learn, 1. It is the duty of Christians in private, as well as ministers in public, to speak to one another of the things of God, Mal. 3:16. Eph. 4:29. Ps. 145:10—12.

2. It highly concerns all preachers of the Gospel to keep close to the Word of God, and to treat that Word as becomes the oracles of God.

3. Christians must not only do the duties of their place, but do them with vigor, and according to the best of their abilities.

4. In all the duties and services of life, we should aim at the glory of God as our chief end; which would sanctify our common actions and affairs, 1 Cor. 10:31.

5. God is not glorified by anything we do, if we do not offer it to Him through the mediation and merits of Jesus Christ. God in all things must be glorified through Jesus Christ, who is the only Way to the Father.

6. The apostle's adoration of Jesus Christ, and ascribing unlimited and everlasting praise and dominion to Him, prove that Jesus Christ is the most high God over all, blessed for evermore. Amen.

V. 12, 13. The frequent repetition of counsel and comfort to Christians, considered as sufferers, in every ch. of this epistle, shows, that the greatest danger these new converts were in, arose from the persecutions to which their embracing of Christianity exposed them. The good behavior of Christians under sufferings, is the most difficult part of their duty, but yet necessary both for the honor of Christ and their own comfort; therefore the apostle, having exhorted them in the former part of this ch. to the great duty of mortification, comes here to direct them in the necessary duty of patience under suffering. An unmortified spirit is very unfit to bear trials.

Observe, 1. The apostle's kind manner of address to these poor despised Christians; they were his beloved.

2. His advice to them, relating to their sufferings, which is, that they should not think them strange, nor be surprised at them, as if some unexpected event befell them; for though sharp and fiery, yet they are designed only to try, not to ruin them; to try their sincerity, strength, patience, and trust in God.

On the contrary, they ought rather to rejoice under their sufferings, because theirs may properly be called Christ's sufferings. They are of the same kind, and for the same cause, that Christ suffered; they make us conformable to Him; He suffers in them, and feels our infirmities; and if we be partakers of his sufferings, we shall also be made partakers of his glory, and shall meet Him with exceeding joy at his great appearing to judge his enemies, and crown his faithful servants, 2 Thes. 1:7. &c.

Learn, 1. True Christians love and own the children of God in their lowest and most distressing circumstances.

2. There is no reason for Christians to think strange, or to wonder, at the unkindness and persecutions of the world.

3. Christians ought not only to be patient,

PRACT. OBS. V. 7—11. 'The end of all things is at hand;' all our worldly pursuits, possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments; all our temporal trials, sorrows, and conflicts; our season of probation and preparation: it behooves us then 'to be sober, and to watch unto prayer.' Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.—The more ungodly men hate and revile believers, the greater care should they use to have 'fervent love among themselves;' that, by mutual candor, long-suffering, and forgiveness, 'the multitude of offences may be covered;' and so nothing interrupt their peace and harmony. This blessed grace of love dethrones our natural selfishness, dictates or regulates our words, and disposes every one, in his proper calling, to minister or communicate to others 'as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ;' to whom 'be praise and dominion for ever and ever.' Amen.<sup>2</sup> and faith in Christ, with that humble regard to his atonement and righteousness, which every true Christian will have, it cheerfully encourages our hopes of finding [acceptance with God at last]. Bl.—Cover, &c.] 'Love is skilful in putting the fairest construction on things doubtful. When the thing is plainly a sin, then will love consider what will lessen it most; whether it was by surprise, through ignorance, or human frailty. All reproach will be sweetened by that compassion which flows from love. What is wrong will be forgiven. Those are grossly mistaken, who think it greatness of spirit to resent wrongs, and baseness to forgive them: on the contrary, it is the only excellent spirit, scarcely to feel a wrong, or feeling, straightly to forgive it.' LEIGHTON, in Will.

V. 9—11. Rom. 12:6—13. 1 Tim. 3:2. Heb. 13:1—3. 3 John 5—8.—This especially, though by no means exclusively, concerned ministers, and those employed in managing the affairs of the church.—To restrict this merely to spiritual gifts, because the original word is used, when these are spoken of, (though not used of them exclusively,) may be considered as one of the various ways, by which learned commentators endeavor to convince us, that a vast proportion of the Scripture was written, not for our instruction, but for that of others, long since dead; and that we need concern ourselves but little about it. Now this is precisely what a vast majority of professed Christians wish to believe.—(9) Use hospitality.] 1 Tim. 3:2. Tit. 1:3. Be lovers of strangers. 'The primitive Christians were hospitable to all strangers, but chiefly to those who were of the same faith and communion. Believers scarce ever went without letters of recommendation, which testified the purity of their faith. This was sufficient to procure them reception in all those places where the name of Jesus Christ was known.' Cruden.—(10) Gift.] Rom. 5:15, 16. 6:23. 12:6. 1 Cor. 12:4. 2 Tim. 1:6. 'It is never used in Scripture, but for a free gift. . . This word is not in any heathen au-

(10.) The gift.] 'The original word, here, as in many other places, the ancients and most moderns explain of the spiritual and supernatural gifts vouchsafed to many of the primitive Christians. Others, as Grot., Est., Rosenun., and most recent commentators, take it of any faculty or endowment of mind. But though this may be included, yet the other sense, I doubt not, is principally intended. The term itself has usually that force, as in 1 Tim. 4:14. and 1 Cor. 12:13, 14. At the same time I suspect the apostle intended temporal gifts, for which we are equally stewards, and have to administer for the good of others.' BLOOMF.

(11.) The doxology in the close of this verse is understood of Christ, by Grot., Doddr., and Bloomf., and others.

V. 12—16. If they exposed themselves to sufferings by their crimes, this would be most dishonorable to God, and injurious to themselves. It behooved them, therefore, to be careful, that none of them were brought before the magistrates, cast into prison, or condemned, for any violation of wholesome laws; nay, that they did not incur reproach by intermeddling in the affairs of other men, whether they were of a private or a public nature, especially on political subjects; or by passing their judgment and censures, or intruding into the management of those concerns, which did not belong to them: as if they had been appointed, or were authorized and qualified, to oversee and give orders to those employed. These were common reasons for men's suffering public punishment or private reproach; and professors of Christianity might be drawn into such misconduct, and yet vainly imagine that they were persecuted for their religion! But if they avoided such imputations, and suffered as Christians for acting consistently with that honorable character; they ought by no means to be ashamed of the reproach, connected with their punishment; though it were imprisonment, scourging, or even a violent

14 If 'ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you: on their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified.

15 But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, or as a busy-body in other men's matters.

16 Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

17 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

19 Wherefore, let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

but to rejoice, in their sharpest and sorest sufferings for Christ, because they are tokens of divine favor; they promote the Gospel, and prepare for glory.

V. 14. From the fiery trial, the apostle descends to a lower degree of persecution,—that of the tongue by slander and reproach. He supposes they would be reviled for the name or sake of Christ. In such case he asserts, Happy are ye; the reason of which is, 'Because ye have the Spirit of God with you, to fortify and comfort you; and the Spirit of God is also the Spirit of glory, that will carry you through all, bring you off gloriously, and prepare and seal you up for eternal glory. This glorious Spirit resteth upon you, resideth with you, in you, and is pleased with you; and is not this an unspeakable privilege? By your patience and PRACT. OBS. V. 12—19. When we consider the upright, harmless, benevolent, and useful conduct of true Christians, we are apt to 'think it strange, that they must pass through 'fiery trials,' from the enmity of wicked men, and that God should permit them to be injured and afflicted.' We must not, however, indulge such thoughts, but prepare for tribulation; as 'the excellent of the earth' have always been thus treated, and God has purified all his gold in this furnace. We may indeed deem ourselves 'happy,' when wicked men discern 'the seal of God in our forehead,' and 'reproach us for the name of Christ;' because 'the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us;' and they revile us, because we bear his image, belong to Him, and glorify Him.—But we cannot be too careful, not to give the enemies of the Gospel any just cause to revile or hate us. It is not indeed common for professors of evangelical truths, to suffer as murderers, thieves, or malefactors; yet they often and ignominious death: nay, they ought rather to praise and glorify God for 'counting them worthy to suffer shame for his sake.' Acts 5:40, 41. Heb. 12:2, 3. (15) Busy-body, &c.] 'As a bishop in another man's diocese.' Leigh. Some understand it of those who look with concupiscence on what belongs to others, with intention of seizing on it by guile: but this, however criminal, was not an overt act, to be punished by the magistrate. Scott.

(12.) 'Afflictions are blessings when we can bless God for them; suffering has kept many from sinning, and if the furnace were seven times hotter, it would make the saint seven times better. Fiery trials make golden Christians, sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions, and it is better to be preserved in brine than perish in honey.' Dyer.

(13.) To be partakers of Christ's sufferings, is not only to bear similar sufferings, but to bear them for a similar cause, even religion. So Ros. and Bloomf.; and Ros. comp. James 1:2. Ed.

(14.) 'To what special service of piety should I be awakened by the reproach which is cast upon me? One thus expresses it: "The back-biter's tongue, like a mill clack, will be still in motion, that he may grind thy good name to powder. Learn, therefore, to make such use of his clack as to make thy head by it; I mean so to live that no credit shall be given to slander." Thus all the abuses you meet with may prove to you, in the hand of a faithful God, no other than as the strokes which a statuary employs on his ill-shaped marble, only to make you fitter to adorn the heavenly temple.' Cotton Mather.

(15.) Busy-body.] 'One who busily pries into other people's affairs, and, as is almost always the case, exaggerates what may be true, and fabricates falsities to their great injury. This is confirmed by 1 Tim. 5: 13. where Paul had in view this same vice of tittle-tattling and backbiting.' Bloomf. But Lardner, Doddr., and Williams understand it fortitude in suffering, by your dependence on the promises of God, and adhering to the Word which the Holy Spirit hath revealed, He is on your part glorified; but by the contempt and reproaches cast on you the Spirit itself is evil spoken of and blasphemed.'

Learn, 1. The best men and the best things usually meet with reproaches in the world. 2. The happiness of good people not only consists with, but even flows from, their afflictions; Happy are ye. 3. That man who hath the Spirit of God resting on him, cannot be miserable, be his afflictions ever so great. 4. The blasphemies and reproaches evil men cast on good people, are taken by the Spirit of God as cast on Himself. 5. When good people are vilified for the name of Christ, his Holy Spirit is glorified in them.

V. 15, 16. One would think such a caution as this needless to such an excellent set of Christians as these were. But their enemies charged them with these and other foul crimes; therefore the apostle, when he was setting the rules of the Christian religion, thought these cautions necessary, forbidding every one of them to hurt the life, or the estate and property, of any one, or to do any sort of evil; or, without call and necessity, to play the bishop in another man's charge, or busy himself in other men's matters. To this caution he adds a direction, that if any man suffer for the cause of Christianity, and with a patient Christian spirit, he ought not to account it a shame, but an honor to him; and ought to glorify God who hath thus dignified him.

Learn, 1. The best of men need to be warned against the worst of sins.

2. There is very little comfort in sufferings, when we bring them on ourselves by our own sin and folly. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr.

3. We have reason to thank God for the honor, if He calls us to suffer for any of the doctrines or duties of Christianity.

V. 17. The usual method of Providence has been this: When God brings great calamities and sore judgments on whole nations, He generally begins with his own people, Is. 10:12. Jer. 25:29. Ezek. 9: 6. 'Such a time of universal calamity is now at hand, as was foretold by our Savior, Mat. 24:9, 10. This renders all the foregoing exhortations to patience necessary for you. And you have two considerations to support you.' 1. 'That these judgments will but begin with you, and will soon be over with you.' 2. 'Your troubles will be but light and short, in comparison of what shall befall the wicked world; your own countrymen, the Jews; and the infidels and idolatrous people among whom you live, them that obey not the Gospel of God.'

Learn, 1. The best of God's servants, his own household, have so much amiss in them, as renders it fit and necessary that God should sometimes correct and punish them with his judgments.

2. The family of God have their worst things in this life. Their worst condition is tolerable, and will soon be over.

3. Such persons or societies of men as disobey the Gospel of God, are not of his church and household; though possibly they may make the loudest pretensions to it. The apostle distinguishes the disobedient from the house of God.

4. The sufferings of good people in this life are demonstrations of the unspeakable torments that are coming on the disobedient and unbelieving. Who can express or say how dreadful their end will be?

V. 18. This whole verse is taken from Prov. 11:31. The LXX translate it exactly as the apostle here quotes them. If we take the salvation here in the highest sense, we may learn, 1. It is as much as the best can do, to secure the salvation of their souls; there are so many sufferings, temptations, and difficulties to be overcome; so many sins to be mortified; the gate is so straight, and the way so narrow. 2. The ungodly and the sinner are unquestionably in a state of damnation. Where shall they appear? How will they stand before their Judge? Where can they show their heads? If the righteous scarcely be saved, the wicked must certainly perish.

V. 19. Here the apostle finishes his discourse concerning sufferings, and gives this general advice; Let them that suffer, look chiefly to the safety of their souls, which cannot be kept secure otherwise than by bring odium on themselves by various evident and palpable faults: and then many of them unjustly impute the reproach cast on them to the persecuting malice of their enemies! This we should watch against; and carefully distinguish between those things, which we suffer 'for the sake of Christ and of righteousness,' and those that we bring on ourselves by imprudence and misconduct. And if such diligence and watchfulness only just suffice to ensure the believer's salvation; what will be the event of the slothful and heedless conduct of professed Christians in general? Let us then see to it, that we 'obey the Gospel,' by a penitent 'faith working by love;' and, if called to 'suffer, according to the will of God;' 'let us commit the keeping of our souls to Him, in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator,' and as in Christ become our Omnipotent Savior. Scott.

V. 17—19. The persecutions, by which the church was tried, were introductory to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the tremendous ruin of the Jews; and preparatory to 'the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.' Ez. 9:5—7. Mat. 24:9—14. John 16:1—3. 2 Pet. 3:5—7. 'The apostle cannot intend deliverance from the Roman invasion, in which so few of these Christians were concerned; nor merely deliverance from any of their persecutors; because he takes it for granted, that 'the righteous would be saved,' though with difficulty; whereas multitudes fell by persecution, even of these Christians, in Bithynia, as appears by Pliny's letter. It is necessary therefore to understand it, more generally, of the difficulty with which good men get to heaven, through this dangerous and ensnaring world.' Doddr. Scott.

(17.) The time is come.] 'Time is coming, &c., the time foretold by Christ, John 16:2. &c.' Doddr.—who thinks there is allusion here to Ez. 9:6. Benson, in Bloomf. says, 'it designates the particular distress that was to take place before Jerusalem should be destroyed. The Christians were to expect to feel some of the first effects of that general calamity. It was to begin with them, as our Savior had plainly promised. It was God's way of old to begin with sending calamities on his own people.' Ed.

(18.) 'This whole v. is taken from Prov. 11:31. according to the Sept. The salvation here spoken of seems to be mostly of a temporal nature. The principal design of the passage is, to prepare believers against the committing them to God, who will undertake the charge, if we commit them to Him in well-doing ; for He is their Creator, and has, out of mere grace, made many kind promises to them of eternal salvation, in which He will show Himself faithful and true.

Learn, 1. All the sufferings that befall good people, come on them according to the will of God.

2. Christians, in all their distresses, should look more to the keeping of their souls, than to the preserving of their bodies.

3. The only way to keep the soul well, is, to commit it to God, in well-doing, by solemn dedication, prayer, and patient perseverance in well-doing, Rom. 2:7.

4. Good people, when in affliction, have great encouragement to commit their souls to God, because He is their Creator, and faithful in all his promises.

CHAP. V. V. 1. Here observe, 1. The persons to whom this exhortation is given ; presbyters, pastors, and spiritual guides of the church ; elders by office, rather than by age, ministers of those churches to whom he wrote this epistle. 2. The person who gives this exhortation ; Peter, their brother-presbyter or fellow-elder ; and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, being with Him in the garden, attending Him to the palace of the high priest, and, very likely, a spectator of his suffering on the cross, at a distance among the crowd, Acts 3:15. He adds, that he was also a partaker of the glory that was in some degree revealed at the transfiguration, Mat. 17:1-3. and shall be completely enjoyed at the second coming of Jesus Christ.

Learn, 1. They whose office it is to teach others, ought carefully to study their own duty, as well as teach the people theirs.

2. How different the spirit and behavior of Peter were from that of his pretended successors ! He does not command and domineer, but exhort. All the apostles were elders, though every elder was not an apostle.

3. It was the peculiar honor of Peter, and a few more, to be the witnesses of Christ's sufferings ; but it is the privilege of all true Christians to be partakers of the glory that shall be revealed.

V. 2. 3. Here you have the pastor's duty described, and how it ought to be performed. The duty is threefold : 1. To feed the flock ; by preaching to them the sincere

Word of God, and ruling them according to such directions and discipline as the Word of God prescribes ; both implied in this expression, Feed the flock. 2. To take the oversight thereof. The elders are exhorted to do the office of bishops, (as the word signifies,) by personal care and vigilance over all the flock committed to their charge. 3. To be examples to the flock ; to practice the holiness, self-denial, mortification, and all other Christian duties, which they preach and recommend to their people.

These duties must be performed, not by constraint, not from compulsion of the civil power, or fear of shame, but from a willing mind, that takes pleasure in the work : not for filthy lucre, any emoluments and profits, or any perquisite, but of a ready mind ; regarding the flock more than the fleece, sincerely and cheerfully endeavoring to serve the church of God ; neither as being lords over God's heritage, tyrannizing over them, or imposing unscriptural and human inventions on them, instead of necessary duty, Mat. 20:25, 26. 2 Cor. 1:24.

Learn, 1. The eminent dignity of the church of God, and all the true members of it. They are God's heritage, or clergy ; his own peculiar people, chosen to enjoy his special favor, and to do Him special service. The word is never restrained in the New Test. to the ministers of religion only.

2. The pastors of the church ought to consider their people as the flock of God, as God's heritage, and treat them accordingly.

3. Ministers who are either driven to the work by necessity, or drawn to it by filthy lucre, can never perform their duty as they ought, because they do not do it willingly, and with a ready mind.

severest sufferings for Christ, and the calamities then coming on the Jewish state. But, if it is referred to a spiritual and eternal salvation, it is to be understood only of the extreme difficulty, trouble, suffering, and apparent danger, through which the righteous were to pass in their way to heaven, and not of any real hazard, as to the event, with respect to the purpose, promise, and power of God for accomplishing it. Guyse, in Henry, abr.—'If the condition of the faithful be so hard, the condition of the unbelievers must be altogether intolerable.' Ames.—Ros. says, the wicked 'will most certainly perish ;' and Bloomf. says, the interrogation here involves a strong negation of their salvation. Ep. (19.) Faithful Creator.] 'Who will preserve their separate spirits, and restore them to their bodies at the resurrection.' WILLIAMS.

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1-4. 'The elders' were, in general, the rulers and teachers of the churches ; (Notes, Acts 11:27-30. 14:21-23. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1.) and Peter, waiving the mention of his apostolical office, addressed them as being himself one of the company, and as acquainted with the nature and difficulties of the service assigned to them. They ought to consider the congregations, over which they severally presided, and among whom they labored, as a part of the 'purchased' and beloved 'flock of God ;' and so 'take the oversight of them,' not merely because 'necessity was laid on them,' and they could not safely do otherwise ; but 'willingly,' from zeal to the glory of God, and love to the souls of his people, and as men who were ready to encounter difficulties, face dangers, and endure losses, reproaches, and persecutions in so good a work. 1 Cor. 9:13-18. And when the counsel of inspired persons, or other pious ministers, concurring with the wants and desires of the people, called on any one to engage in the pastoral office, he ought not to feel reluctant to it, as some were found to be ; partly from modesty and diffidence, yet not without a measure of unbelief, and undue regard to the ease, quiet, and safety of a private situation, the want of zeal and love, or the preference of more profitable employments ; whence it became necessary, almost to constrain them to engage in this arduous, laborious, and perilous work. This is generally supposed to be implied ; yet the charge is made to those who were already elders. At the same time, some improper persons, of inferior stations, might be induced to undertake the office of the ministry, from the expectation and desire of a better maintenance than they could otherwise obtain, Jam. 3:1, 2. and such as had been ordained, might be tempted to go through with their services rather to secure their incomes, than from better motives, and to modify their instructions in subserviency to their own interests ; but such things must scrupulously be avoided, as the lucre thus sought would be most filthy and base, and the wages of the vilest prostitution. John 10:10-13. 1 Tim. 3:3, 8-15. Tit. 1:5-13. (1) Am also an elder.] Here only. (2) Taking the oversight.] Heb. 12:15. Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 3:2. Acts 20:17:28. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22. This must be allowed a decisive testimony, that no express distinction between presbyters and bishops was at the time, when the apostle wrote, established in the church. It would however be well, if, desisting from such controversies about precedence, all, whether called bishops, or archbishops, presbyters, or elders, of every church, would more study, and endeavor to practise, the admirable lessons here inculcated.—Alas ! how small a proportion of nominal ministers of Christianity, either in the more exalted orders, or among their often too much depressed inferiors, so preach, labor, and live, as to give an impartial student of the Bible reason to conclude, that 'when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they will receive the crown of unfading glory.' (3) Being lords.] Mat. 20:25. Mark 10:42. Acts 19:16. Such a dominion and authority, as the apostles, when expecting a temporal kingdom, under the Messiah, were ambitious of according to the

SCOTT.
(1-3.) 'The presbyters or elders (ministers or pastors) were destined to be not unlimited monarchs, but rulers and guides in an ecclesiastical republic, and to conduct everything in conjunction with the church assembled together, as the servants and not the masters of which they were to act. The apostles saw these relations in this manner, because they addressed their epistles, which treated of things pertaining to the ecclesiastical life and discipline, not to the rulers of the churches only, but to the whole of the church. Where Paul pronounces an exclusion from the communion of the church, he represents himself as united in the Spirit with the whole church, (1 Cor. 5:4.) supposing that, for an affair of such general concernment, the assembling of the church would be regularly requisite.' Church Hist.

NEANDER.
(2.) Episcopountes.] Thus far the excellent Scott has been permitted to speak his own language on the much controverted subject of episcopacy,—with great candor, indeed, often ; but still with some results, of course, which are not admitted by presbyterian, or congregationalist (independent) brethren. It is but just therefore to state, as follows, in the language of Rev. Dr. MILLER : '1. That Christ gave but one commission for the office of the gospel-ministry, and that this office, of course, is one. 2. That the words bishop and elder, or presbyter, [or, it may be added, minister,] are uniformly used in the New Test. as convertible titles for the same office. 3. That the same character and powers which are ascribed, in the sacred writings, to bishops, are also ascribed to presbyters : thus plainly establishing the identity of order, as well as of name. 4. That the Christian church was organized by the apostles, after the model of the Jewish Synagogue, which was unquestionably,' says Dr. M. 'Presbyterian in its form.' To establish the first position, he quotes Mat. 28:18, 19, 20. and John 20:21, 22, 23. and adds : 'These passages form the grand commission under which all lawful ministers have acted, from the moment in which it was delivered, to the present time ; and under which they must and will act to the end of the world.' After dilating on this position, Dr. M. proceeds to the next head, as above, showing from Acts 20:17, 28. from the address of Paul to the Philippians ; from Titus 1:5-7. &c. and lastly, from the text, (1 Pet. 5:2.) 'that presbyter and bishop are the same office,'—the presbyter here being exhorted solemnly 'to exercise the powers, and perform the duties' of a bishop, or overseer,—as is asserted under the 3d head, establishing the identity of the two. For proof of the last position, Dr. M. appeals, after a course of reasoning and representation well worthy perusal, to Selden, De Synedriis, Lightfoot's Horæ Heb., the Comm. of Grotius, Bp. Stillingfleet's Irenicum, and Vitringa, De Synagoga Vetere, as uniting their testimony with Neander, Kuinoel, and Rosenmüller at the present day : concluding that the 'establishment of these positions decides the controversy,' so far, at least, as the sole authority of the SS. is concerned, and the inquiry respects 'the system adopted in the apostle's days. With respect to the question, how far the apostolic model of church order is unalterably binding in all ages, in all nations, and under all states of society, it is wholly a different inquiry.'

4. The best way a minister can take to engage the respect of a people, is, to discharge his own duty among them in the best manner he can, and to be a constant example to them of all that is good.

V. 4. In opposition to that filthy lucre which many proposed to themselves, as their principal motive in their undertaking and discharge of the pastoral office, the apostle sets before them the crown of glory designed by the great Shepherd, Jesus Christ, for all his faithful ministers.

Learn, 1. Jesus Christ is the chief Shepherd of the whole flock and heritage of God.

2. The chief Shepherd will appear, to judge all ministers and under-shepherds, to call them to account, whether they have faithfully discharged their work, according to the foregoing directions.

3. They that are found to have done their duty, shall have what is infinitely better than temporal gain; they shall receive from the grand Shepherd a high degree of everlasting glory, a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

V. 5. Having settled and explained the duty of the pastors of the church, he comes now to instruct the flock; he calls them the younger, as being generally younger than

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—7. Those who most know the nature, difficulties, snares, and temptations of the pastoral office, are best qualified to exhort their brethren, and they will speak with the most impressive authority on such topics. Mat. 7:23, 29.—Ministers should have skill, vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, love, zeal, patience, disinterestedness, and self-abasement, in their characters and conduct; both in order 'to feed the flock of God,' and to be 'examples unto them.' They ought to perform the most laborious services, and endure the greatest hardships, for 'the Lord's heritage,' not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, and without assuming any 'dominion over their faith.'—This is not, indeed, the road to high preferments in the outward church, nay, it leads far from it; but 'when the chief Shepherd shall appear,' such pastors 'shall receive' of Him 'a crown of glory that will never fade away.' And what, compared with this, are all those riches, eminent stations, or lordly dignities, which so many nominal pastors eagerly pursue? Or where will the avaricious, the slothful, the sensual, or the tyrannical men, who have borne the name of ministers, appear, when the great Judge shall come, and call them to give an account of their stewardship?—But every station and age has its peculiar duties; subordination is the universal plan and appointment of God, and all, in their several relations, should be subject to those placed over them. This will be the case, as far as men 'are clothed with humility,' and God never shows favor to a proud man, except when He brings him down into the dust of self-abasement; Dan. 4:34—37. nor will any humble soul come short of his grace, or of eternal life. When we become humbly subject to our reconciled God, and simply dependent on Him; we are allowed and commanded to 'cast all our care on Him,' and assured 'that He careth for us,' as a Father for his own children; and thus will bring far sweeter peace and greater comfort into the soul, than could arise from the most complete gratification of pride, ambition, avarice, or any worldly affections. Thus also we shall be safe; and thus we may unreservedly and cheerfully leave all events to the God to whom alone they belong.

persons.' BLOOMF.—Examples, &c.] 'Or, models, that the flock may be stamped aright, taking the impression of the pastor's life. Sound doctrine alone will not serve. Though the water you give your flocks be pure, yet, if you lay spotted rods before them, it will bring forth spotted lives in them. Either teach not at all, or teach by the rhetoric of your lives.' LEIGHTON.

(4.) Chief Shepherd.] 'In Spain, flocks often contain 10,000 sheep, divided into ten tribes, with 50 under-shepherds, and as many dogs.' Orient. Cust., No. 577, in WILLIAMS.

V. 5—7. The word 'younger,' Luke 22:26. does not seem here to relate to any particular station in the church; but in general denotes juniors, whether in the pastoral office or not. And as pride, in juniors and inferiors, militates against due subordination, even as in superiors it prompts to tyranny; so they all were admonished to be clothed with humility, as their chief ornament, or rather their outward garment; that whatever abilities, endowments, or spiritual gifts they possessed, their modesty and humility might be conspicuous to all beholders, more than any other distinction.

SCOTT.

(5.) 'In obeying the precept, "he clothed with humility," the Christian finds a deep source of pure enjoyment. Self-abasement he perceives to be appropriate to his character and prospects. No sooner their grave pastors, and to put them in mind of their inferiority, the term younger being used by our Savior to signify an inferior, Luke 22:26. he exhorts them to respect and reverence their persons, and to yield to their admonitions, reproof, and authority, enjoining and commanding what the Word of God requires, Heb. 13:17. They should also all receive the reproofs and counsels one of another, and be ready to perform all the offices of friendship and charity; and particular persons should submit to the directions of the whole society, Eph. 5:21. Jam. 5:16. These duties being contrary to the proud nature and selfish interests of men, he advises them to be clothed with humility; 'Let your minds, behavior, garb, and whole frame, be adorned with humility, as the most beautiful habit you can wear; but if you be disobedient and proud, God will set Himself to oppose and crush you; for He resisteth the proud, when He giveth grace to the humble.'

Learn, 1. Humility is the great preserver of peace and order in all Christian churches and societies; consequently, pride is the great disturber of them, and the cause of most dissensions and breaches in the church.

2. There is a mutual opposition between God and the proud, so the word signifies; they war against Him, and He scorns them, Prov. 3:34.

3. Where God giveth grace to the humble, He will give more grace, more wisdom, faith, holiness, and humility.

V. 6. Since God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble, therefore humble yourselves, not only one to another, but to God, whose judgments are coming on the world, and must begin at the house of God, ch. 4:17. his hand is almighty to pull you down, if you be proud, or to exalt you, if you be humble; and it will certainly do it, either in this life, if He sees it best for you, or at the day of general retribution. The consideration of the omnipotent hand of God, should make us humble and submissive to Him in all He brings upon us. Humbling ourselves to God under his hand, is the next way to deliverance and exaltation; patience under his chastisements, submission to his pleasure, repentance, prayer, and hope in his mercy, will engage his help and release in due time, Jam. 4:7, 10.

V. 7. The apostle, knowing these Christians were already under very hard circumstances, rightly supposes that what he had foretold, of greater hardships yet coming, might excite in them abundance of care and fear about the event; and, foreseeing this, he gives them the best advice, and supports it with a strong argument; his advice is, to cast all their care, or all care of themselves, upon God; 'Trust in Him with a firm, composed mind; He will release you of your care, and take the care of you on Himself; avert what you fear, or support you under it; order all events to you, so as shall convince you of his paternal love and tenderness toward you; and so that no hurt, but good, shall come unto you.' Mat. 6:25. Ps. 84:11. Rom. 8:28.

Learn, 1. The best of Christians are apt to labor under anxious and excessive care; the apostle calls it, all your care, intimating, that the cares of Christians are various; personal cares, family cares, cares for the present, and for the future; for themselves, for others, for the church.

2. The cares even of good people are too often very sinful; as when they arise from unbelief and [distrust of God], when they torture and distract the mind, unfit us for the duties of our place, and hinder our delightful service of God.

3. The best remedy against immoderate care, is, to resign every event to God's wise and gracious determination. A firm belief of the rectitude of the divine will and counsels, calms the spirit of man; We ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done, Acts 21:14.

V. 8, 9. Here the apostle,

1. Shows them their danger from an enemy more cruel and restless than even the worst of men, whom he describes, (1.) By his characters and names; he is an adversary, that adversary of yours; not a common adversary, but an enemy that impleads you, and litigates against you in your grand depending cause, and aims at your very souls. The devil, the grand accuser of all the brethren; a title derived from a word which signifies to strike through, or to stab; he would strike malignity into our natures, and poison into our souls; if he could have struck these people with passion and murmuring in their sufferings, perhaps he might have drawn them to apostasy and ruin. He is a roaring lion, hungry, fierce, strong, and cruel; the fierce and greedy pursuer of souls. (2.) By his business; he walks about, seeking whom he may devour; his whole design is to devour does he take the place assigned by the wisdom of God, than a calm delight spreads itself upon his soul. He acquiesces in the dispensations of Providence. He is no more tormented with the aspirations of pride, the fires of envy, the goadings of discontent. In whatever state he is, he occupies his station of usefulness with cheerfulness and content. What Christian cannot modestly appropriate to himself, the apt, delicate, and striking description which Bunyan gives, of one in the valley of humiliation.—"There was a kind of sympathy betwixt that valley and him. He would now be up every morning by break of day, tracing and walking to and fro in the valley; he would even lie down, embrace the ground, and kiss the very flowers which grew around him."

V. 8, 9. The terrible persecutions which were instigated by this enemy of God and man, as 'working in the children of disobedience,' seem to be peculiarly intended.—These repeated exhortations to 'watchfulness,' and the especial motive assigned for it, ought to have peculiar weight, as coming from that apostle, who, through self-confidence, carnal security, and inwatchfulness, when 'Satan desired to sift him' and his brethren 'as wheat,' was induced to deny his Lord with solemn oaths and dire imprecations. and destroy souls; always, night and day, he is going about, studying and contriving whom he may ensnare to their eternal ruin.

2. Infers hence our duty, (1.) To be sober, and to govern both the outward and the inward man by the rules of temperance, modesty, and mortification. (2.) To be vigilant; not secure or careless, but rather suspicious of constant danger from this spiritual enemy, and, under that apprehension, to be watchful and diligent to prevent his designs, and save our souls. (3.) To resist him, steadfast in the faith; it was the faith of these people that Satan aimed at; if he could overturn their faith, and draw them into apostasy, then he knew he should gain his point, and ruin their souls; therefore, to destroy their faith, he raises bitter persecutions, and sets the grand potentates of the world against them; this strong trial and temptation they must resist, by being well-grounded, resolute, and steadfast in the faith: to encourage them to this.

3. Tells them their care was not singular, for they knew that the like afflictions befall their brethren in all parts of the world, and that all the people of God were their fellow-soldiers in this warfare.

Learn 1. All the great persecutions ever raised in the world, are raised by the devil, Gen. 3:15. Rev. 12:12, in which his design is, to bring the faithful to apostatize, by reason of their sufferings, and so to destroy their souls.

2. Sobriety and watchfulness are necessary virtues at all times, but especially in times of suffering and persecution; 'You must moderate your affection to worldly things, else Satan will soon overcome you.'

3. 'If you would overcome Satan, either as a tempter, accuser, or persecutor, you must resist him, steadfast in the faith; if your faith give way, you are gone; therefore, above all, take the shield of faith,' Eph. 6:16.

4. The consideration of what others suffer, is proper to encourage us to bear our own share in any affliction; the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren.

V. 10. We come now to the conclusion of this epistle, which the apostle begins with a most weighty prayer, acknowledging, on their behalf, that God had already called them to be partakers of that eternal glory, which, being his own, He had promised and settled on them, through the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ. You may observe what he prays for on their account; not that they might be excused from sufferings, but that their sufferings might be moderate and short, and that, after a while, God would restore them to a settled, peaceable condition; and perfect his work in them; that He would stablish them against wavering, either in faith, or duty; that He would strengthen those who are weak, and settle them on Christ, the Foundation, so firmly, that their union with Him might be indissoluble and everlasting.

Learn, 1. All grace is from God; it is He who restrains, converts, comforts, and saves men by his grace.

2. All who are called into a state of grace, are called to partake of eternal glory and happiness.

3. Those who are called to be heirs of eternal life through Jesus Christ, must, nevertheless, suffer in this world, but their sufferings will be but for a little while.

4. The perfecting, establishing, strengthening, and settling, of good people in grace, and their perseverance therein, is so difficult a work, that only the God of all grace can accomplish it; therefore, He is earnestly to be sought unto by continual prayer and dependence on his promises.

V. 11. From this doxology we may learn, that they who have obtained grace from the God of all grace, should, and will, ascribe glory, dominion, and power, to Him, for ever and ever.

V. 12. Here the apostle recapitulates the design of his writing this epistle to them, ch. 1:13—15. and recommends Silvanus, the person by whom he sent them this brief epistle.

Learn, 1. An honorable esteem of the ministers of religion, tends much to the success of their labors; the prejudices that some of these Jews might have against Silvanus, as a minister of the Gentiles, would soon wear off when they were once convinced that he was a faithful brother.

2. The main thing ministers ought to aim at in their labors, is, to convince their people of the certainty and excellency of the Christian religion; this the apostles did exhort and testify with all their might.

3. A firm persuasion that we are in the true way to heaven, will be the best motive to stand fast, and persevere therein.

V. 13. Peter, being at Babylon in Assyria, when he wrote this epistle, sends the salutation of that church to the other churches to whom he wrote, telling them, that God had elected or chosen the Christians at Babylon out of the world, to be his church, and to partake of eternal salvation through Christ Jesus, together with them and all other faithful Christians, ch. 1:2. In this salutation he particularly joins Mark the evangelist, who was then with him, and who was his son in a spiritual sense, being begotten by him to Christianity.

All the churches of Jesus Christ ought to have a most affectionate concern one for another; they should love and pray for one another, and be as helpful one to another as they possibly can.

V. 14. He exhorts them to fervent love and charity one towards another, and to express this by giving the kiss of peace, according to the common custom of those times and countries; and so concludes with a benediction, which he confines to those, only, that are in Christ Jesus, united to Him by faith, and sound members of his mystical body.

PRACT. OBS. V. 3—14. Did a roaring lion at any time traverse our streets, devouring numbers of the careless and inattentive; and we were informed of it, by indisputable testimony; we should proceed with great caution and circumspection, if obliged to go out in such perilous circumstances; yet a far more formidable enemy continually watches his opportunity of destroying our souls; God Himself gives us the information and alarm, and we cannot have any safety except we 'watch and are sober.' But, alas! how little do we take the warning, and act as if we really believed this to be the case! Yet in this way alone can we reasonably hope to be kept from falling into temptation, and being oversary.] Mat. 5:25. Luke 12:53, 13:3. An adversary at law; one who brings an accusation.—Diabolos, means a false accuser; Satan, an adversary, or enemy. The persecuted Christians were first calumniated, and then condemned to tortures or death. Instigated by the devil, the original liar and murderer, John 8:41—47. the persecutors murdered their characters first, and then their persons.

(8.) Devour.] 'The word expresses more, even swallowing up; and so represents the insatiable rage of the enemy of our salvation.'

(9.) 'Truly it is a pity to be at the trouble of suffering afflictions, and not get good by them. We get good by them when they awaken us to do good; and I may say, never till then. When God is distributing sorrows to you, the sorrows still come upon some errands; therefore the best way for you to find that they do not come in his anger, is, to consider what the errands may be. When any affliction comes, immediately reflect, "To what special act of repentance does this call me?" and while it is yet upon you, seriously inquire, "To what improvement in holiness and usefulness does this call me?" Be more solicitous to gain this point, than to escape the affliction. Oh the peace that will compose, possess, and ravish your mind, when your afflictions shall be found yielding these "fruits of righteousness!" Luther did well to call afflictions "the theology of Christians." MATHER.

V. 12. It is highly probable, that Silvanus was the same person, who generally attended Paul; and who was frequently called Silas. M. R. x.—Acts 15:22—41.—This confirms the supposition, that Peter wrote, to establish in the faith the same churches, which had been plucked by Paul and his companions, against all the insinuations of those, who endeavored to persuade the Gentile converts, that he preached a different doctrine than the other apostles did: and indeed the attentive reader will mark a great similarity in the sentiments of those two great apostles; especially in the manner in which they connect doctrine and practice together. Testifying.] Here only. Heb. 2:4—Neh. 9:29, 30. 13:15. Sept.—May not this word imply, that the apostle added his testimony to that of those, who had first preached the Gospel to them? Sc.

V. 13. There is no sufficient ground to suppose, that by Babylon, the apostle mystically meant Rome; for no reason can be assigned, why he should withhold the name of that city, when he wrote this epistle. Yet if any choose to avail themselves of this only scriptural proof, that Peter ever resided at this great antichristian metropolis; protestants are not concerned to controvert it. It is, however, generally allowed, that Peter went to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom.—It is not certain, whether Marcus is, or is not, the same with John Mark, mentioned frequently by Paul, and in the Acts of the Apostles. Pref. to the Gospel according to Mark.

(13.) Babylon.] 'There were two Babylons; one in Egypt, the other in Syria: but Lardner says, there is no mention of either church or bishop at the former place, by any of the writers of the first four centuries. Many, therefore, refer to the great Babylon of Assyria: Lardner, however, objects, that "this city was almost deserted in the apostle's days;" and further argues, from ch. 2:13, 14, 17. that Peter wrote from some part of the Roman empire, which at that time did not include Babylon, then under the dominion of the Parthians. These difficulties have led to a third opinion, which we adopt from Mr. Horne, that by Babylon, Peter meant Rome, as John did in the Apocalypse, on account of its being the metropolis of idolatry. This opinion has the general testimony.'

SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. J. Hill.)

THE penman of this epistle appears plainly to be the same who wrote the foregoing; and not Simon, who succeeded the apostle James in the church at Jerusalem, inasmuch as he who wrote this epistle, calls himself Simon Peter, and an apostle, v. 1. and says, he was one of the three apostles present at Christ's transfiguration, v. 18. and expressly, that he had written a former epistle to them, ch. 3:1. Moreover, the design of this second epistle is the same with that of the former, as is evident from ch. 3:1. whence observe, that, in the things of God, we have need of precept upon precept, and line upon line, and all little enough to keep [them] in remembrance; yet these are the things which should be most faithfully recorded, and frequently remembered by us.

The writer of this epistle alludes to circumstances and facts, which agree to none but Peter, 1:14—16. John 21:19. and he speaks of his 'beloved brother, Paul,' 3:15. It must, therefore, either be the work of the apostle Peter, or of one who personated him; but 'it is a thing of the worst example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not.' Le Clerc. It may be added, 'especially to forge the name of an apostle, and to personate him, in order to sanction a man's private opinions by so high an authority.' Yet the epistle is remarkable for the energy, with which the writer inculcates holiness, and the solemn, yet affectionate manner, in which he testifies against the delusions of those who neglect it. It has indeed been urged, that the style remarkably differs from that of Peter's first epistle; but this is by no means true, except in respect to a part of the second ch., which in fact seems to have been taken, in a measure, at least, from some writing, which described in very strong language, the false prophets of that age, or of earlier ages, which was then extant, and well known, but is now lost. Jude seems also to have taken some things from it; for part of his epistle greatly coincides with the second chap. of this. In all other respects, the internal characters of authenticity are very strong.—Some doubts, however, in this respect, were entertained in the primitive church, which Jerome ascribes to the supposed dissimilarity of style. But it is probable, that it was written only a short time before the apostle's martyrdom; and, not having been so publicly avowed by him, and clearly known to be his, during his lifetime, the scrupulous caution of the church hesitated about admitting it into the sacred canon, till internal evidence fully convinced the most competent judges, that it was entitled to that high distinction. It is generally supposed to have been written at least three or four years after the former epistle, and it is evident, that primarily it was intended for the same persons, though not expressly addressed to them.—It appears, that the apostle, by this epistle, especially designed to put Christians on their guard, against the false apostles and teachers, who perverted the Gospel; and the profane scoffers, who started objections to the truth of it; but it is replete with the most important instructions on a variety of subjects.

1 Confirming them in hope of the increase of God's graces, 5 he exhorteth them, by faith, and good works, to make their calling sure: 12 whereof he is careful to remember them, knowing that his death is at hand: 16 and warneth them to be constant in the faith of Christ, who is the true Son of God, by the eyewitness of the apostles beholding his majesty, and by the testimony of the Father, and the prophets.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. The apostle begins this second epistle with an introduction, wherein the same persons are described, and the same blessings desired, that are in the preface to his former letter; but there are some additions or alterations, which ought to be noticed in all the three parts of the introduction.

I. The person who wrote the epistle, Simon Peter. Peter, being in both epistles, seems to be the name most frequently used, and most acceptable to him, being given him by our Lord, on his confessing Jesus to be Christ the Son of the living God; signifying, also, and sealing that truth to be the fundamental article, the rock on which all must build; but Simon, though omitted in the former epistle, is mentioned in this, lest the total omission of that name, which was given him when he was circumcised, should make the Jewish believers, who were all zealous of the law, to become jealous of him, as if he disclaimed and despised circumcision; he here styles himself a servant, as well as an apostle, of Jesus Christ; in this he may be allowed to glory, as David does, Ps. 116: 16. The service of Christ is the way to the highest honor, John 12:26. He makes all his servants kings and priests unto God, Rev. 1:6. To triumph in being Christ's servant, is very proper for those who are engaging others to enter into, or abide in, the service of Christ.

II. The people to whom the epistle is written; described in the former epistle as elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father; and here, as having obtained precious faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; a grace precious, not only as very scarce, even in the visible church, Mat. 22:14. but as very excellent, and alike precious in the private Christian and in the apostle, producing the same precious effects in the one and in the other; uniting both to Christ, purifying the heart of one as truly as of another, and justifying each in the sight of God, Acts 13: 39. taking hold, in whomsoever it is, of the same precious Savior, and applying the same precious promises. This precious faith is obtained of God, is his gift, wrought by the Spirit, who raised up Jesus Christ from the dead. The preciousness of faith, as well as our obtaining it, is through the righteousness of Christ. The satisfactory, meritorious righteousness and obedience of Christ gives faith all its value and preciousness; and the righteousness of such a Person cannot but be of infinite value to those who by faith receive it.

III. The apostolical benediction, the same with that in the former epistle; but here he adds, 1. An account of the way and means whereby grace and peace are multiplied; it is through the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ; and, 2. The ground of the apostle's faith in asking, and of the Christian's hope in expecting, the increase of grace. Observe, (1.) The fountain of all spiritual blessings is, the divine power of Jesus Christ, who could not discharge all the office of Mediator, unless He was God as well as man. (2.) All things that have any relation to, and influence on, the true spiritual life, are from Jesus Christ; in Him all fulness dwells, and from Him we receive, grace for grace, John 1:16. even all that is necessary

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Perhaps Peter deemed it proper to style himself 'an apostle,' as well as 'a servant of Christ;' because he meant in this epistle to oppose certain false teachers, who did great mischief in the church.—Thus [i. e. by speaking of like precious faith] he tacitly distinguished 'the faith of God's elect,' from that dead and worthless faith, by which many were deluded. Tit. 1:1—4. Jam. 2:14—26. This faith, which, as the original intimates, they received by the special favor and allotment of God, rested on the 'righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ,' as the words may be literally rendered. (Marg.) Thus they were taught to believe and trust in the obedience unto death of the Lord Jesus, as their incarnate God and Savior, for their justification, and for all the blessings connected with it, and resulting from it. This is the most obvious meaning of the words; but if any contend, that the expression, 'our God,' refers to the Father, they should also remember, that the meritorious obedience of the incarnate Son is often called, 'the righteousness of God.' Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Phil. 3: 8—11. Nor can we form any idea, in what sense a Christian's faith could be said to be either in, or 'through,' the righteousness, or justice of God, considered merely as a divine attribute, when it rests mainly on the mercy and truth of God, and only views his justice as satisfied, and, as it were, consenting to the sinner's salvation, through the meritorious work of Christ.—Our translation, 'through the righteousness,' though it seems not to be the exact sense of the passage, yet conveys a very important meaning; as the faith, by which we receive Christ for salvation, is given to us 'through the righteousness,' which He finished as our Surety, for it springs from the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, as given to us through his mediation. John 1:10—12.—Through] En. In, with, by, for, from, for the sake of; rarely, through. The apostle Paul having used en for several verses, when the idea of through occurred to him, changes en for dia with the genitive, 2 Cor. 6:4—8. which is not observed in our version. Comp. 3 with 3:18. Gr.

(1.) Through the righteousness, &c.] 'In the righteousness of our God, &c.' Scholefield. — 'In it is the object of faith.' Henry, abr. — 'Of God and our Savior, &c.' 'Of our God and Savior, &c.' So Doddr. and Bloomf.; and Greenfield, referring to Granville Sharp, Wordsworth, Middleton, and Pye Smith, in confirmation, says, 'this is certainly the literal and proper rendering of the original, and should have been received in the text: it is an absolute proof,' he adds, 'that Peter calls Jesus Christ God, in the most proper sense of the term.' Ed.

3 According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue:

4 Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

5 And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; for the preserving, improving, and perfecting of grace and peace, which, so some, are called here, godliness and life. (3.) Knowledge of God, and faith in Him, are the channel whereby all spiritual supports and comforts are conveyed to us; God is the Author of our effectual calling, for so He is here described; Him that hath called us to glory and virtue. Observe, here, The design of God in calling or converting men, is, to bring them to glory and virtue, that is, peace and grace, so some; but many prefer the marginal rendering, by glory and virtue, and so make effectual calling the work of the glory and virtue, or the glorious power, of God, described Eph. 1:19. and Ps. 63:2. this power or virtue is to be extolled by all that are called out of darkness into marvellous light, 1 Pet. 2:9.

In v. 4. the apostle goes on to encourage their faith and hope in looking for an increase of grace and peace, because the same glory and virtue are employed and evidenced in giving the promises of the Gospel, that are exercised in our effectual calling. Observe, The good things the promises make over, are exceeding great: the pardon of sin, of sins numerous and heinous, is a wonderful thing, and so called, Ps. 119:18. the promised blessings of the Gospel are very precious: they who receive the promises of the Gospel, partake of the divine nature, are renewed in the spirit of their mind, after the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness; their hearts are set for God and his service; they have a divine temper and disposition of soul: those in whom the Spirit works the divine nature, are freed from the bondage of corruption, and translated into the liberty of the children of God; for it is the world in which corruption reigns; they who are not of the Father, but of the world, are under the power of sin; the world lies in wickedness, 1 John 5:19. And the dominion that sin has in the men of the world is through lust; their desires are to it, therefore it rules over them. The dominion sin has over us, is according to the delight we have in it.

V. 5—7. Here the apostle comes to the chief thing intended in this epistle,—to excite and engage them to advance in grace and holiness; a good beginning is not to be rested in; he had prayed that grace and peace might be multiplied to them, and now he exhorts them to press forward for the obtaining of more grace; and they who will make progress in religion, must be very diligent in their endeavors; without giving all diligence, there is no gaining any ground in the work of holiness; we must strive, if we will enter in at the strait gate, Luke 13:24.

Here we cannot but observe how the believer's way is marked out, step by step.

1. He must get virtue, by which some understand justice; and then knowledge, temperance, and patience, being joined with it, the apostle may be supposed to put them on pressing after the four cardinal virtues, or the four elements that go to the making up of every virtue or virtuous action; but seeing it is a faithful saying, and constantly to be asserted, that they who have faith, be careful to maintain good works, Tit. 3:8. by virtue here we may understand strength and courage, without which the believer cannot stand up for good works, by abounding and excelling in them. We have need of virtue while we live, and it will be of excellent use when we come to die.

2. The believer must add knowledge to his virtue, prudence to his courage; there is a knowledge of God's name, which must go before our faith, Ps. 9:10. but there are proper circumstances for duty, which must be known and observed; every believer must labor after the knowledge and wisdom that are profitable to direct, both as to the proper method and order wherein all Christian duties are to be performed, and as to the way and manner of performing them.

3. We must add temperance to our knowledge; the Gospel teaches sobriety as well as honesty, Tit. 2:12. we must be moderate in desiring and using the good things of nat-

V. 3, 4. It might be expected by Christians, that the progressive work of illumination, sanctification, and consolation, would be carried on in them, according to what 'the divine power' of the Lord Jesus had already conferred. Eph. 3:20, 21. In consequence of his exaltation, and mediatorial authority, 'his divine power' had given to his people 'all things pertaining to life and godliness;' whatever was requisite for their spiritual and eternal life and final felicity, and for their acting suitably to their relations and obligations to God, during their passage through this evil world to heaven. All these things had been freely bestowed on them, 'through the knowledge of God, who had called them,' by his glorious grace and mercy, and the 'virtue,' or energy, of his quickening Spirit; or, He had called on them to partake of 'his eternal glory,' and to a constant and courageous profession of the Gospel, and obedience to Christ, amidst all the trials and sufferings of their present state. For the words 'glory and virtue,' may either refer to God, who called them, or that to which they were called; the former seems the more literal construction; but the unusual use of the word rendered virtue, in applying it to God, has induced most expositors to adopt the latter interpretation. Yet the same word is used, in this application of it, by Peter, in another place. 1 Peter 2:9. Gr.—The promises of Scripture relate to things most needful to sinners, suitable to their case, answerable to all their wants, and abundantly sufficient, when fulfilled to them, as believers, to render them most blessed for evermore. These are set before men, by the Gospel, who are invited to come and partake of the promised blessings; but they are given to believers alone, who may consider them as so many valuable securities; for, being united to Christ, and partakers of Him, all the promises belong to them through Him and by his covenant. 2 Cor. 1:17—20. —They were, moreover, bestowed on them, to the end that they 'might be partakers of the divine nature,' that so a new nature might be formed within them, and a new direction given to their understandings, wills, and affections, conformably to the holy nature of God, and capable of loving and delighting in Him, and finding happiness in his service. Gen. 1:26, 27. Rom. 12:2. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11. When this change of heart and nature was begun in regeneration, it influenced those who experienced it, to separate from all those outward vices and enormities, into which men are drawn, by their excessive and idolatrous cravings after the pleasures, possessions, or distinctions of the world. — When sinners profess to repent, and to embrace the Gospel, they outwardly relinquish these iniquities; (Notes, 2:20—22. Mat. 12:43—45.) and all regenerate persons actually and finally escape them, i. e. the allowed or habitual practice of any of them.—Virtue.] 5. Phil. 4:8. 1 Pet. 2:9.—This word, used so frequently in heathen writers, seldom occurs in the New Test.; and when it does, it does not always signify the whole of a right principle, but generally courage. Doddr.—It never occurs, but in the texts referred to; and it never signifies general holiness, or a right state of the heart and conduct. Courage is the heathen meaning of it in general; being derived from Arēs, Mars. Or it signifies, military fortitude; as virtus, manly valor, from vir, a man. 5—7.—(1) The divine nature.] A divine nature; without the article: a nature like that of God, bearing his holy image; not the essence of the divine nature. Gal. 4:8. Eph. 2:3. Some for a time 'escape the corruption of the world,' who are not partakers of a 'divine nature;' and these 'in time of temptation fall away.' 2:20—22. Mat. 13:20, 21.

(3.) To.] Margin, "By" glory and virtue. If we take the textual rendering, it means, that we are called to practise the one, and enjoy the other; if the margin, it may import, that by a display of these in the Gospel, we are called to embrace it. WILLIAMS.—It may very properly be understood, of that strengthening energy which God exerts on the human mind, which appeared in so extraordinary a manner in the apostolic age. DODDR.—Whitby, in Doddr. understands it of the glorious effusion of the Holy Spirit. Ed.—Giving all diligence.] 'There is an end to the earnestness of some persons when they have obtained what they call their conversion. While they consider themselves in a state of nature, they seek after God, and cry earnestly in the use of means; but afterwards they act as if their work was done. The SS. everywhere represent striving and labor as subsequent to regeneration. Almost all that is said in the N. T. about watching, running, wrestling, pressing forward, crying to God day and night, is said to SAINTS. But there are many professors who have adopted the strange, antisciptural notion of having all this before they are converted; so as to have an easy time of it afterwards, in sloth and indolence.'

(4.) Divine nature.] 'The best commentators agree, that it denotes disposition: so that to be partakers of the divine nature will be, to imitate God's perfections, aim at a similitude to his moral properties and attributes.'

V. 5—7. These holy dispositions, and the effects of them on their conduct, must be diligently and carefully added together, as different voices in harmony form a chorus; that so, the exercise of each other might regulate, and bound, and unite with that of the rest, and prevent their exceeding or degenerating. Thus, the Christian character would appear well proportioned, and beautiful: whereas, if any of these graces were remarkably defective, the others would appear to be redundant, being joined with those natural dispositions, which most resembled them; and the character would appear deformed and destitute of symmetry; whilst one man would be bold without knowledge or love; another, gentle and kind, without firmness or fortitude. The same disproportion would appear in various other particulars.—It is evident, that none of the genuine graces of the Christian character can exist alone; all combine in forming it, but symmetry is the source of beauty. Mat. 5:3. Gal. 5:22—26.

(5.) Add to your faith virtue.] Many commentators, as Doddr., Mackn., Ros., &c. take virtue here, in the sense of courage; but Bloomf., after Schleus., prefers 'Christian virtue.' Ed.—Knowledge.] 'The young Christian should aim at the highest intellectual improvement within his reach. An ignorant man may be truly a Christian, devout, safe, happy, and in a measure useful;—not however because of his ignorance, but in spite of it. His Christian character, instead of resting on his ignorance, will rest on what he knows. He will love God, not because he knows Him not, but because he knows Him. The devotion of ignorance is superstition; but Christian devotion arises from knowing God, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. Pour upon the ignorant Christian's mind, a flood of light and knowledge; expand and strengthen his mind, till he has that reach of thought, and those powers of discrimination, which belong to a mind fully instructed in the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven [the will of God, as displayed in the laws of his universe]: let his conceptions of God, and of Christ, and of all eternal things, become clear, wide, and powerful;—will not the change from ignorance to knowledge, heighten and beautify all the graces of his character? [See vs. 8 and 9. also Note, Mat. 4:4—6.] The ignorant Christian may be useful; but his ignorance will always impede his usefulness. If he can make himself useful with the little knowledge which he has, how much more useful would he be, if the sphere of his intelligence were widened. His usefulness will be proportioned to his influence; and one of the greatest means of usefulness, is knowledge. Wealth may give him power to bless the destitute with the Gospel, or ease the widow's heart to sing for joy;—or he may be in circumstances where his mere example of industrious and unremitting toil, or calm submission to the will of God, shall bring persuasion and conviction to a ural life, such as meat, drink, clothes, sleep, recreations, and credit; an inordinate desire after these is inconsistent with an earnest desire after God and Christ; and they who take more of these than is due, can render to neither God nor man what is due to them.

4. Add to temperance patience; which must have its perfect work, or we cannot be perfect and entire, wanting nothing, Jam. 1:4. for we are born to trouble, and must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heaven; and it is this tribulation, Rom. 5:3. which worketh patience, that is, requires the exercise, and occasions the increase, of this grace.

5. To patience we must add godliness, and this is the very thing produced by patience,

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-11. We should carefully examine, whether our faith be of a 'like precious' nature and efficacy, with that of the primitive servants of Jesus Christ: for if we have 'obtained' this inestimable benefit, we are certainly interested in 'the righteousness of our God and Savior;' and 'grace and peace will be multiplied unto us,' in proportion to 'our knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord,' till the whole is perfected in the felicity of heaven. But 'the light which is in' numbers, even of those who profess the Gospel, 'is darkness;' Notes, Mat. 6:22, 23. Tit. 1:14-16. and, while they boast themselves to be more clear-sighted than practical Christians and teachers, their own deficiency, in the graces and good works of true religion, proves them to be 'blind,' or at least very dim-sighted; men who can see nothing, but a few things belonging to their own narrow system, without perceiving the enlarged nature and beneficent tendency of the Gospel; who have thousand hearts. But if, in addition, he had that power which springs from superior intelligence, how much wider would be his usefulness? [These remarks are of equal force in favor of a thoroughly educated ministry.]

REV. LEONARD BACON.

V. 5-7. 'Having reminded, that God had given them all things pertaining to a godly life, the apostle here mentions those virtues which were required of them: withal intimating that, if professed Christians did not bring forth such fruit, they neither duly attended to the nature of Christianity, nor would they have any benefit thereby.' BENSON, in Bloomf.—'Aim at consistency in your Christian character. There is a beauty in moral consistency, which resembles the symmetry of a well proportioned building, when nothing is deficient, or redundant. Consistency can only be acquired and maintained, by cultivating every part of the Christian character. The circle of virtues must be complete, without chasms or obliquities. A character well proportioned, and nicely balanced in all its parts, we are not frequently permitted to witness; for while in one branch there is vigor, and even exuberance, in another there may be the appearance of feebleness and sterility. The man who is distinguished for virtues of a particular class, is apt to be deficient in those which belong to a different class. This is so commonly the fact, that many entertain the opinion that the same person cannot excel in every virtue. Thus, it is not expected that the man of remarkable firmness and intrepidity, should be at the same time distinguished for meekness and gentleness. But, after making due allowances for a difference of constitutional temperament, we must maintain, that there is not, nor can there be, any incompatibility between the several virtues of the Christian life. They are all branches of the same root, and the principle which affords nourishment to one, communicates its virtue to all. As all truth is harmonious, however it may, on a superficial and partial view, seem to be contradictory; so all the exercises of moral goodness [614]

for that works experience, Rom. 5:4. When Christians bear afflictions patiently, they get an experimental knowledge of the loving-kindness of their heavenly Father, which He will not take from his children, even when He visits their iniquity with the rod, and their transgressions with stripes, Ps. 89:32, 33. and hereby they are brought to the childlike fear and reverential love wherein true godliness consists; to which,

6. We must add brotherly-kindness, a tender affection to all our fellow-Christians, who are children of the same Father, servants of the same Master, members of the same family, travellers to the same country, heirs of the same inheritance.

7. Charity, or a love of good-will to all mankind, must be added to the love of delight which we have for those who are the children of God. God has made of one blood all nations; all are of the same human nature, capable of the same mercies, and liable to the same afflictions; therefore, though on a spiritual account Christians are distinguished and dignified above those who are without Christ, yet are they to sympathize with others in their calamities, relieve their necessities, and promote their welfare, both in body and soul, as they have opportunity.

All the forementioned graces must be had, or we shall not be thoroughly furnished for all good works,—for the duties of the first and second table, for active and passive obedience, and for those services wherein we are to imitate God, as well as for those wherein we only obey Him.

V. 8-11. To engage us to an industrious and unwearied pursuit of all the forementioned graces, the apostle sets forth the advantages that redound to all who successfully labor, so as to get these things to be and abound in them. This is proposed,

1. More generally, v. 8. The having these things makes not barren, (or slothful,) or unfruitful; where, according to the style of the Holy Ghost, understand a great deal more than is expressed; as that it will make us very zealous and lively, vigorous and active, in all practical Christianity, and eminently fruitful in the works of righteousness; these will bring much glory to God, by bringing forth much fruit among men; this is the necessary consequence of adding one grace to another; for, as the apostle intimates in the beginning of v. 8. wherever grace abounds, there will be an abounding in good works.

How desirable it is to be in such a case, the apostle evidences, v. 9. There he sets forth how miserable it is to be without those quickening, fructifying graces; for he who has not, or though he pretends or seems to have, the forementioned graces, does not exercise and improve them, dotes upon this present evil world, but has no discerning at all of the world to come, so as to be affected with the spiritual privileges and heavenly blessings thereof; and how wretched their condition, who cannot see anything of the reality and certainty, the greatness and nearness, of the glorious rewards God will bestow on the righteous, and the dreadful punishment He will inflict on the ungodly!

But this is not all: they are as unable to look backward as forward; they forget that they have been laid under obligations to holiness of heart and life, and are solemnly bound to fight against the flesh, the world, and the devil. Often call to mind, and seriously meditate on, your solemn engagement to be the Lord's, and your peculiar advantages and encouragements to lay aside all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

2. The apostle proposes two particular advantages that will attend or follow on diligence in the work of a Christian: stability in grace, and a triumphant entrance into glory. These he brings in by reassuming his former exhortation, and laying it down in other words; for what, v. 5. is expressed by giving diligence to add to faith virtue, &c. is here expressed by giving diligence to make our calling and election sure; to do which, observe, It requires great diligence and labor; there must be a very close examination of ourselves, a very narrow search and strict inquiry, whether we are thoroughly converted, our minds enlightened, our wills renewed, and our whole souls changed as to the bent and inclination thereof; to come to a fixed certainty in this, requires the utmost diligence, and cannot be attained forgot, that even baptism signifies 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and that Christians, by their very profession, are bound 'to mortify all evil and corrupt affections, and daily to proceed in all virtue and godliness of living.' As, therefore, so many 'are pure in their own eyes, who are not washed from their filthiness;' (Notes, Prov. 14:12. 16:2. 30:11-14.) and as every one of Christ's apostles bears most decided testimony against such a worthless form of knowledge, such a dead and solitary faith; (Notes, Gal. 5:1-6, 13-18. 6:6-10. Jam. 2:19-26. 1 John 3:7-10. Jude 3, 8.) 'we ought the rather to give diligence to make our calling and election sure.' It is not said, that if we hold certain doctrines, we shall never fall; but 'if we do these things, we shall never fall;' and, in the diligent and persevering practice of every good work, we should wait for 'an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.' SCOTT.

are not only consistent, but assist and adorn each other. . . . Men are frequently found, whose zeal blazes out ardently and conspicuously, so as to leave others far back in the shade, while they are totally destitute of that humility, meekness, and brotherly kindness [charity], which form an essential part of the Christian character. Man, at his best estate in this world, is an inconsistent creature. The only persons in whom this defect is not observed, are the men, who, by grace, live near to God, and exercise a constant jealousy and vigilance over themselves. But when faith is weak and inconstant, great inconsistencies will mar the beauty of the Christian character. Young persons ought to begin early to exercise this vigilance, and to keep their hearts with diligence, lest they be ensnared by their own passions, and overcome by temptation. I counsel you, then, my young friends, to aim at consistency,—cultivate, assiduously every part of the Christian character: that there may appear a beautiful proportion in your virtue.' and kept without divine assistance, as we may learn from Ps. 139: 23. Rom. 8: 16.

But the advantage you gain by it is great; you will be kept from falling, even in those hours of temptation that shall be on the earth. When others and many shall fall, these shall be preserved sound in the faith, and stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. They shall have also a triumphant entrance into glory; while of those few who get to heaven, some are scarcely saved, 1 Pet. 4: 18. 1 Cor. 3: 15. these, who are growing in grace, and abounding in the work of the Lord, shall have an abundant entrance into the joy of their Lord, even that everlasting kingdom where Christ reigns, and they shall reign with Him for ever and ever.

V. 12—15. If ministers be negligent in their work, it can hardly be expected that the people will be diligent in theirs; therefore Peter will not be negligent, that is, at no time or place, in no part of his work, to no part of his charge, but will be exemplary and universally diligent, and that in the work of a remembrancer; this is the office of the best ministers, even the apostles themselves; they are the Lord's remembrancers, Is. 62: 6. they are especially bound to make mention of the promises, and put God in effects; the more these abound, the fuller the testimony of our conscience to our integrity, and of God's Spirit with our spirit. Rom. 3: 14—17. 2 Cor. 1: 12—14. This must be sought by diligence; and thus that becomes sure to us, in our consciences, which was indeed sure before, in the secret purpose of God.

V. 12—15. The composure with which Peter, on this occasion, spoke of the excruciating death which awaited him, as if it had been no more than putting off his garment, or removing his tent, may very properly be contrasted with his terror, and denial of his Lord, when he had been left to himself in order to his humiliation. Notes, Mat. 26: 30—35, 69—75—Though he wrote to the churches in Asia, yet he evidently intended his exhortations for the benefit of Christians in other ages and nations; and we still have his words 'in our remembrance.' John 15: 12—16. P. O. 9—16.

(12.) Present truth.] 'I. e. that of which he was now treating; namely, that diligence in religion was the way to perseverance.' WILLIAMS.—Bloomf. thinks the clause may be rendered, 'though ye are at present established in the truth.'

(14.) 'He plainly adverts to our Lord's words, John 21: 18, 19. It is plain Christ foretold to Peter his martyrdom, as he also did to Paul. 2 Tim. 4: 6. But whether these words of the apostle, were founded on any fresh revelation as to the speedy approach of that event, admits of no certain determination.'

V. 16—18. Cunningly devised fables. This [to follow these] had been the nature, intention, and effect of many of the Pagan fictions, and the inventions of Jewish rabbies; and indeed this, in one way or other, is the object of all those, who invent and propagate false or perverted mind of his engagements to do good to his people; and they are the people's remembrancers, making mention of God's precepts, and putting them in mind of the doctrines and duties of Christianity, that they may remember God's commandments to do them.

And this the apostle does, though some might think it needless, inasmuch as they already knew these things that he writes about, and were established in the very truth that he insists on. Observe, 1. We need to be put in mind of what we do already know, to prevent our forgetting it, and to improve our knowledge, and reduce all to practice. 2. We must be established in the belief of the truth, that we may not be shaken by every wind of doctrine, and especially in the present truth,—the truth more peculiarly necessary for us to know in our day, what belongs to our peace, and what is more especially opposed in our time. The great doctrines of the Gospel,—that Jesus is the Christ; that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; that those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved, and all that believe in God must be careful to maintain good works. These are truths the apostles insisted on in their day; these are faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptance in every age of the Christian church. And as these must be constantly affirmed by ministers, Tit. 3: 8. so the people are to be well instructed and established therein; and yet must, after all their attainments in knowledge, be put in mind of such things as cannot be too clearly known, or too firmly believed.

The apostle, being set on the work, tells us, v. 14. what makes him earnest in this matter, even the knowledge he had, not only that he must certainly, but also that he must shortly, put off this tabernacle. Our Lord Jesus had shown him, that the time of his departure was at hand, therefore he bestirs himself with greater zeal and diligence, because the time is short; he must soon be removed from those to whom he wrote; and his ambition being that they should remember the doctrine he had delivered to them, after he himself was taken away from them, he commits his exhortation to writing. The apostle had not any great opinion of oral tradition; that was not so proper a mean to reach the end he was in pursuit of. He would have them always to remember these things, and not only to keep them in mind, but also to make mention of them, as the original words import. This is the way to spread the knowledge of the Lord; and this the apostle had at heart; and they who have the written Word of God, are thereby put into a capacity to do this.

V. 16—18. Here we have the reason of giving the foregoing exhortation, and that with so-much diligence and seriousness. These things are not idle tales, or a vain thing, but of undoubted truth and vast concern. The way of salvation by Jesus Christ is eminently the counsel of God; the most excellent contrivance of the infinitely wise Jehovah; it was He that invented this way of saving sinners by Jesus Christ, whose power and coming are set forth in the Gospel, and the apostle's preaching was a making these things known. This coming of Christ, his coming in the flesh, to die for sinners, the Gospel is very plain and circumstantial in setting forth; but there is a second coming, which it likewise mentions, which the ministers of the Gospel ought also to make known, when He shall come in the glory of his Father with all his holy angels, for He is appointed to be Judge both of quick and dead. He will come to judge the world in righteousness, by the everlasting Gospel, and call us all to give account of all things done in the body, whether good or evil.

And though this Gospel of Christ has been blasphemously called a fable by one of those wretches who call themselves 'the successors of St. Peter'; yet our apostle proves that it is of the greatest certainty and reality, inasmuch as during our blessed Savior's abode here on earth, when He took on Him the form of a servant, and was found in fashion as a man, He sometimes manifested Himself to be God, and particularly to our apostle and the two sons of Zebedee, who were eyewitnesses of his divine majesty, when He was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light, exceeding white, as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them. This, Peter, James, and John, were eyewitnesses of, and therefore might and ought to attest it; and surely their testimony is true, when they witness what they have seen with their eyes, yea, and heard with their ears; for beside the visible glory that Christ was invested with here on earth, there was an audible voice from heaven. Where observe,

What a gracious declaration was made; made by God the Father, who thus publicly owns his Son, even in his state of humiliation; made to do our Savior a singular honor while here below, by declaring Him to be his Son. This voice is from heaven, called here the excellent glory, which still reflects a greater glory on our blessed Savior. This declaration is from God the Fountain of honor, and from heaven the seat of glory, where God is most gloriously present. This voice was heard, so as to be understood by Peter, James, and John. They not only heard a sound, as the people did, John 12: 28, 29. but understood the sense. Blessed are those who not only hear, but understand; who believe the truth, and feel the power of the voice from heaven, as he did, who testifieth these things;—and we have all the reason in the world to receive his testimony of religion. But there was nothing of this nature in the doctrine taught by the apostles, concerning the power and authority to which Christ had been advanced, in consequence of his crucifixion and resurrection, and the ends for which He reigned; or in what related to his 'second coming to judge the world,' to perfect the salvation of his disciples, and to execute vengeance on his enemies. These doctrines were not suited to please carnal men, or to procure secular advantages to those who taught them; indeed such instructions would certainly offend those who were not brought to repentance, faith, and holiness; but they were authenticated in the most satisfactory manner. SCOTT.

(16.) 'Surely, if Christianity be a delusion, it is a blessed delusion indeed; and he who attempts to destroy it is an enemy to mankind. It is a delusion which teaches us to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God; a delusion which teaches us to love our Maker supremely, and our neighbor as ourselves; which bids us love, forgive, and pray for our enemies, render good for evil, and promote the glory of God, and the happiness of our fellow-creatures; which, wherever it is received, produces a humble, meek, charitable, and peaceful temper, and which, did it universally prevail, would banish wars, vice, and misery from the world. It is a delusion which not only supports and comforts its believers in their wearisome progress through this vale of tears, but attends them in death, when all other consolations fail, and enables them to triumph over sorrows, sickness, and the grave. If delusion can do this, in delusion let me live and die; for what could the most blessed reality do more? PAXSON.—'If we should err in supposing the Christian religion to be true, we can be no great losers by the mistake. But how dreadful must it be to err in supposing it false!'

18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

[Practical Observations.]

19 We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light<sup>a</sup> that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star<sup>b</sup> arise in your hearts:

20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation.

mony; for who would refuse to credit what is so circumstantially laid down as this account of the voice from heaven, of which the apostle tells us? It was heard by them in the holy mount, when they were with Jesus. The place wherein God affords any peculiarly gracious manifestation of Himself, is thereby made holy, not with an inherent holiness, but relatively, as the ground was holy, where God appeared to Moses, Exod. 3:5. and the mountain holy, on which the temple was built, Ps. 87:1.

V. 19—21. In these words the apostle lays down another argument to prove the truth and reality of the Gospel, and intimates that this second proof is more convincing than the former, that the doctrine of the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ is not a mere fable or cunning contrivance of men, but the wise and wonderful counsel of the holy and gracious God. For this is foretold by the prophets and penmen of the Old Test. who spake and wrote under the influence, and according to the direction, of the Spirit of God. Here note, of the Old Test.; they are called a more sure word of prophecy. 1. It is a prophetic declaration of the power and coming, the Godhead and incarnation of our Savior, which we have in the Old Test. His power to destroy the devil and his works, and his being made of a woman, are there foretold. But the New Test. is a history of that whereof the Old Test. is a prophecy, Mat. 11:13. Now the accomplishment of the Old Test. by the New, and the agreeableness of the New to the Old, are a full demonstration of the truth of both. 2. The Old Testament is a more sure word of prophecy. It is so to the Jews, who received it as the oracles of God. Following prophets confirmed what had been delivered to those who went before, and these prophecies had been written by the express command, and preserved by the special care, and many of them fulfilled by the wonderful providence, of God, and therefore were more certain to them who had all along received and read the Scriptures, than the apostle's account of this voice from heaven. Moses and the prophets more powerfully persuade than even miracles themselves, Luke 16:31. How firm and sure should our faith be, who have such a firm and sure word to rest upon!

I. The description given of the Scriptures

II. The encouragement the apostle gives us to search the Scriptures. He tells us, We do well if we take heed to them; that is, apply our minds to understand the sense, and our hearts to believe the truth, of this sure Word. The Word is that form of doctrine into which we must be cast, Rom. 6:17. that formulary of knowledge, Rom. 2:20. by which we are to regulate our thoughts and sentiments, our words and confessions, our whole life and conversation; and this indeed is but a paying that regard which is due to the oracles of God. But in order to this, the apostle suggests some things of singular use to those who would attend to the Scriptures to any good purpose. 1. They must account and use the Scripture as a light which God hath sent into the world, to dispel that darkness which is upon the face of the whole earth. 2. They must acknowledge their own darkness; every man in the world is naturally without that knowledge which is necessary in order to attain eternal life. 3. If ever men are made wise to salvation, it is by the shining of the Word of God into their hearts; natural notions of God are not sufficient. 4. When the light of the Scripture is darted into the blind mind and dark understanding, by the Holy Spirit of God, then the spiritual day dawns, and the day-star arises in that soul. To give heed to this light must needs be the interest and duty of all; and all who do truth, come to this light, while evil-doers keep at a distance from it.

III. The apostle lays down one thing as previously necessary in order to our giving heed to, and getting good by, the Scriptures, and that is, the knowing that all prophecy is of divine original; this important truth he not only asserts, but proves. 1. Observe, No Scripture prophecy is of private interpretation, (or a man's own proper opinion, an explication of his own mind,) but the revelation of the mind of God. This was the difference between the prophets of the Lord, and the false prophets. The prophets of the Lord did not speak or do anything of their own mind, as Moses, the chief of them, says expressly, Numb. 16:28. But false prophets speak a vision of their own heart, not out of the mouth of the Lord, Jer. 23:16. The prophets and penmen of the Scripture spake and wrote what was the mind of God. But though the Scripture be the revelation of the mind and will of God, yet every private man ought to search it,

PRACT. OBS. V. 12—18. It behooves all ministers, after the example of Peter, diligently and at all times to put their readers 'in remembrance of the things' above mentioned, in connexion with evangelical truth: otherwise they cannot 'take them to record, that they are pure from their blood, having declared unto them all the counsel of God,' however exactly they have preached the doctrines of grace. Acts 20:18—27. Yet nothing can tend so much to produce composure in the prospect or in the pangs of death, and in expectation of our great account, as consciousness that we have not sought to please men, or to obtain wealth, reputation, ease, or indulgence to ourselves; but that we have faithfully and simply, and perseveringly, served the Lord Jesus Christ, and sought his glory, and the salvation of souls, as the great aim of all our labors. Indeed the speedy approach of death should excite

V. 19. The recollection of the transfiguration of Christ, gave great confidence personally to the apostle, which was indeed especially intended; and his testimony concerning it might be a great confirmation of the faith of other Christians: yet, they had also 'a more sure word of prophecy.' The appearance and voice on the mount were transient, and only three persons witnessed the interesting scene; one of whom had long before been martyred. (Note, Acts 12:1—4.) Whatever assurance, therefore, it might bring to the individuals concerned, it was not so well suited fully to satisfy the minds of men in general, as the prophecies of Scripture were. These, from the beginning, at least from Adam's fall, Gen. 3:14, 15. had foretold and described one extraordinary Person; and given intimations of his birth, character, miracles, doctrines, sufferings, death, resurrection, and exaltation; together with the establishment, extent, prosperity, and duration of his kingdom, and his final coming to judgment. And when they were compared with the accomplishment of them in Jesus of Nazareth, they constituted a permanent and general proof, unanswerably conclusive, that He was 'the Messiah,' 'the Son of God,' and 'the Savior of the world.' Thus the prophecies more powerfully corroborated the doctrine of the apostles, concerning his exaltation and second coming, than anything Peter had seen on the mount could do; not indeed to him personally, or to James and John, who witnessed the transfiguration; but to men in general. So that the more 'this word of prophecy' should be considered, the fuller conviction would it communicate. Christians ought therefore to attend to the prophecies of Scripture, for their direction and conviction, concerning the truth of the Christian religion; till the Holy Spirit should discover to their souls the glory and excellency of the Gospel, and, by his sanctifying and comfortable influences, give them 'the dawning' of heaven in their hearts; and till the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his power, truth, and love, had formed, within them, an assurance and anticipation of the light, holiness, and felicity of the saints, in the presence of their glorified Savior; even as the morning star preceded and ushered in the rising Sun and 'the perfect day.' Prov. 4:18, 19. Hos. 6:1—3. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. 4:5, 6. Nothing can be more manifest, than that the 'day-dawn and day-star arise in the hearts' of true Christians; and that no external, or, what is not improperly called, internal evidence of the divine original of Christianity, is meant. The internal evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, signifies the evidence of divinity which they contain in themselves: but 'the day-dawn, and day-star in our hearts' must mean what is internal in our own experience; 'the secret of the Lord, which is with them that fear Him.' [616] us, not only to prepare to meet it with comfort, but to use every proper mean, that all around us may have the substance of our instructions in remembrance after our decease. Nor are ministers alone concerned in this: parents, tutors, school-masters, even to the teachers of charity-schools and Sunday-schools, have an important opportunity of usefulness in these respects; and an awful responsibility attached to their several employments. For, whatever elators may be raised about bigotry and uncharitableness, it is most certain, that they only, who preach salvation for sinners through Jesus Christ, and who make 'known his power and coming to judge the world,' are free from the charge of following cunningly devised fables; and therefore they ought to be the most earnest in their labors, without regarding what the consequence may be respecting their temporal interests. SCOTT.

Ps. 25:14. 68:5—8. John 14:18—24. Rev. 2:17. The unnatural and far-fetched interpretations of those, who oppose this conclusion, serve only to confirm the author in his judgment.—This inward demonstration of the truth of Christianity would render the external evidences less necessary to those who enjoyed it: as they could no longer doubt of it, when they saw the glory, and tasted the comfort of it, and experienced the truth and power of it in their hearts, and manifested it in their conduct. 1 John 5:9, 10. SCOTT.

(19.) More sure word of prophecy. [Some think the comparative is used here for the positive, so that it only means a very sure prophetic word. Others, that the series of prophecies, when explained in the light of the New Test., is a much clearer proof of Christ's being the Messiah, than any single miraculous fact, as this was.] So Doddr., and he acquiesces in the latter opinion, as does also Bloomf. and others, especially Knapp.—Ros. explains: 'The prophecies always had a great authority with us, but now they have much greater, since we see events so aptly corresponding to the predictions.'—Take heed.] Or attend. So Ros., who says, that 'to attend to prophecies is to inquire after and think upon, the sense and fulfilment of them; to which Bloomf. adds, that 'it must also imply a prompt faith in the Word of God.' Ev.

V. 20, 21. No prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation.—This clause has been variously explained. Some render it, 'of any private impulse,' as if it related rather to the giving, than the interpreting of prophecy: but the word cannot properly be so rendered, as it implies the loosing of a knot: and it would also render the next verse a mere repetition of the same thought; and that in the form of a reason assigned for what went before, which is very unnatural.—Many have opposed the text to the right of private judgment, in order to support a supposed authority inherent, somewhere, in the church and its ministers; and to make them the ultimate object of faith, by fixing the sense of the Scriptures for the people: yet, at last, this is as much private interpretation as any other can be; for every church and its ministers put their own meaning on the Word of God, and that often contrary to the truth. Some have referred the words to the general application of scriptural promises by believers to their own case; as being a common property of the church, and not the appropriate, exclusive right of the individuals to whom they were at first given. But the apostle was not discouraging of promises; as his argument relates entirely to predictions: and this indeed seems to point out the true meaning. The lively imaginations and inventive genius of men often lead them to suppose events to be accomplishments of scriptural prophecies, which in fact and understand the sense and meaning thereof. 2. This important truth of the divine original of the Scriptures, (that what is contained in them is the mind of God, and not of man,) is to be known and owned by all who will give heed to the sure word of prophecy. 3. The divinity of the Scriptures must be known and acknowledged in the

PRACT. OBS. V. 19—21. We have not seen or heard such things as the apostles did : but 'we have a more sure Word of prophecy,' which will fully satisfy the diligent investigator, even more than any transient miracle could do ; as it lies open to every man's examination, and continually becomes more conclusive, by the further accomplishment of its predictions.—But, 'in searching the Scriptures,' and especially in considering the prophecies and their accomplishment, we should beware of self-confidence, party prejudices, ungoverned fancy, and the influence of selfish passions. We have indeed a right to judge for ourselves, and should call no man master on earth ; but it is requisite we should exercise our judgment with sobriety, modesty, and docility : nor is it generally safe to indulge a fondness for novelty, or to deviate from the approved judgment of eminent servants of God, in other ages of the church, without evident necessity. Above all, we should examine these subjects have no direct relation to them : and this way of misapplying them, as fancy, inclination, system, or external, transient appearances may dictate, has always tended to render prophecies suspected or disregarded. Instead then of employing a lively imagination, or superior genius, to discover some agreement between our own private concerns, or those of our party, or the events of the day, and the predictions of Scripture ; and so attempting to foretell future events from them ; we should remember, and be assured, that every prophecy has its precise and determinate meaning, which no human ingenuity can alter. We ought therefore to exercise our judgment, with proper help, and in dependence on divine teaching, to discover, as far as we can, the real meaning of the predictions, and the accomplishment of them in the public concerns of Christ and his church, and in those of the world as connected with the church ; and to rest satisfied with understanding such as have evidently been fulfilled ; without too curiously prying into those which appear to be hitherto unaccomplished. Thus the perversion of prophecy would be prevented, and the objections against the argument brought from it, in proof of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, would be fully obviated. The prophecies, which have been already most evidently fulfilled, in the Person and salvation of Christ, and in the grand concerns of the church and of the world, form a most unanswerable demonstration of the truth of Christianity ; and the accumulating evidence, arising from the fulfilment of further prophecies, from age to age, must at last rouse the attention of the most heedless, and silence the cavils of the most sceptical. But the misapplication of prophecy, as if it were 'of private interpretation ;' and as if every man were at liberty to put his own fanciful meaning on it, only serves to furnish objections, gives the whole an air of uncertainty, and so exceedingly perplexes the subject.—The author has lately been led to consider Bishop Horsley's view of this subject : but he can only say, that it has not in the least made him doubt of the truth of the interpretation above given.—The apostle intended the prophecies of the Old Test. ; but his arguments are equally conclusive respecting those of the New Test. also : and the close is a most decisive attestation to the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. Sc.

(20.) Private interpretation. 'Private impulse, invention, or origin ; amounting to what Paul says, 2 Tim. 3:16. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God.' Williams, after Doddr.—Ros. and Jaspis (in Bl.) explain : 'no prophecy can be expounded of itself, or by itself, nor understood without comparing together the prophecy and its event or completion, by the aid of history.' Which, Bloomf. remarks, is very true, but not, he thinks, the truth intended by the apostle ; and he prefers greatly the common rendering,—'private explanation or interpretation,' in expressing which he quotes Slade, thus : 'Prophecy gave no light to the age in which it was delivered, and therefore was a lamp shining in a dark place ; and let this be impressed upon you, that prophecy was so entirely and exclusively designed for the benefit of future ages, that its import was not always fully understood even by the prophet himself, who was aware that his words were often inapplicable to the people first place, before men can profitably use them, before they can give good heed to them.

Now seeing it is so absolutely necessary that persons be fully persuaded of the Scripture's divine original, the apostle, v. 21. tells us how the Old Test. came to be compiled ; It came not by the will of man ; but Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Observe, They were holy men of God. If Balaam and Caiaphas, and others who were destitute of holiness, had anything of the spirit of prophecy, on occasion, yet such sort of persons were not employed to write any part of it ; all the penmen of the Scriptures were holy men of God. These holy men were moved by the Holy Ghost, in what they delivered as the mind and will of God. The Holy Ghost is the Supreme Agent, the holy men are but instruments. (1.) The Holy Ghost inspires and dictates to them what they were to deliver of the mind of God. (2.) He powerfully excites and effectually engages them to speak (and write) what He had put into their mouths. (3.) He so wisely and carefully assists and directs them in the delivery of what they had received from Him, that they [are] effectually secured from any the least mistake in expressing what they revealed. So that the very words of Scripture are to be accounted the words of the Holy Ghost, and all the plainness and simplicity, all the power and virtue, and all the elegance and propriety, of the very words and expressions are to be regarded by us as proceeding from God, Mix faith therefore with what you find in the Scriptures ; esteem and reverence your Bible as a book written by holy men, inspired, influenced, and assisted by the Holy Ghost.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. In the end of the former ch. mention is made of holy men of God, who lived in the times of the Old Test. and were used as the amanuenses of the Holy Ghost, in writing the sacred oracles ; but, in the beginning of this, he tells us they had, even in that time, false prophets in the church, as well as true. Concerning these, in all ages, observe, Their business is, to bring in destructive errors ; as the business of teachers sent of God is, to show the way of truth, even the true way to everlasting life. This is commonly done privily, under the cloak and color of truth ; but yet in rejection of the great Teacher sent from God, though He is the only Savior and Redeemer of men. They who bring in errors destructive to others, bring swift (and therefore sure) destruction on themselves.

He proceeds, v. 2. to tell us the consequence with respect to others ; and here we may learn, 1. Corrupt leaders seldom fail of many to follow them ; the way of error is a pernicious way, yet many walk therein. 2. The spreading of error will bring up an evil report on the way of truth ; that is, the way of salvation by Jesus Christ. The Christian religion is from the God of truth as its Author, and leads to true happiness, in the enjoyment of the true God, as its end ; yet it is with earnest prayer for the teaching of the same Spirit, by whom 'holy men of God spake' their prophecies ; that we may be enabled to discover what was his meaning in them, as far as that is good for us. Under his guidance, we shall be kept from interpreting Scripture according to our private fancy, humor, or inclination ; we shall discover the relation, nearer or more remote, of all the prophecies to Christ and his church. We shall also perceive that so many of them have already been fulfilled, that we are fully authorized to expect the accomplishment of all the rest ; till his second coming to judge the world, to perfect his people's salvation, and to shut up the wicked in hell, shall fulfil the last of these predictions, to the glory of his truth, power, love, wisdom, and righteousness, and the joy and admiration of all his redeemed people, in the sight of the whole assembled world of angels and men. SCOTT.

immediately addressed, (1 Pet. 1:11, 12.) and uttered them not from the suggestions or persuasions of his own mind, but from the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—3. It is not requisite to understand the apostle, as declaring, that the Lord Jesus had died, with an express intention of redeeming these very persons ; it sufficed for his argument, that they denied Him, as their Lord, in whom they professed to hope as a Redeemer, as all avowed antinomians do. Thus Christ sometimes addressed the Pharisees according to their own mistaken notions, and argued with them from their own principles. Luke 15:3—7, 25—32.—The inconsistency and base conduct of these false teachers was evident from their own profession, and it was not the manner of the sacred writers to express themselves with that systematic exactness, which many now affect. Rom. 14:15—23. 1 Cor. 3:7—13.—It appears very unnatural to explain the words, 'the Lord that bought them,' of Israel's redemption from Egypt, which would never have been thought of, in this connexion, had not controversy led men to exercise their utmost ingenuity, to evade the arguments, and answer the objections, of their opponents. Thus attachment to a system leads men to do violence to the Scriptures, and this deeply injures the cause, which they are so anxious to defend. Doubtless Christ intended to redeem those, and those only, who, He foresaw, would eventually be saved by faith in Him ; yet his ransom was of infinite sufficiency, the proposal of it in Scripture is general, and men are continually addressed, according to their profession, even when it is intimated that they are not upright in it. 1:9.—Learned men have maintained discordant opinions, concerning the heretics whom the apostle especially intended : but probably he used general language designedly, that the description might suit various kinds of false teachers, in that and in all future ages.—*Privily shall bring in.] Fraudulently introduce. They were brought in privily by false teachers, 'who denied the Lord, &c.'—(3) Feigned.] Here only. Words skillfully fashioned and framed. SCOTT.

(1.) This connects well with the preceding, showing that not all are prophets that call themselves such ; many falsely assume the name. The apostle, therefore, now turns from true prophets to false teachers. Respecting who are meant, the common opinion is, that they were Nicolaitans, or Gnostics. But this has been convincingly refuted by Tillman. Ros. however observes, that though the name Gnostics was not known in those times, yet the dogmas of those who, in the second century, were called Gnostics, might be known and disseminated. Others take them to be Judaizers, who, abandoning the true doctrine, feigned oracles against the Roman government, and promised a new theatre of pleasure to their votaries. They seem to have commenced with being fanatics, and ended with being hypocrites and knaves : and many opinions of the Mohammedan system seem to have been partly derived from that impure source.—Some explain Lord here of God ; but this is very harsh. It is traduced and blasphemed by those who embrace and advance destructive errors. This the apostle has foretold, as what should certainly come to pass. Let us not be offended at anything of this in our day, but take care that we give no occasion to the enemy to blaspheme the holy name whereby we are called, or speak evil of that way whereby we hope to be saved.

Observe, in the next place, the method seducers take to draw disciples after them. They flatter, deceive, and make a gain of them whom they make their proselytes: faithful ministers of Christ, who show men the way of truth, desire the profit and advantage of their followers, that they may be

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-3. The unbelief, selfishness, and impiety of man's carnal heart, always give an opening to 'false teachers,' who 'speak smooth things,' 'to draw away disciples after them,' for their own credit or lucre's sake; and alas! how many thus 'turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables,' and liberally reward ingenious men for helping them to deceive themselves! But in vain do far more natural to take it of Christ; as indeed the term, bought, requires.—On what is meant by denying Christ as their Lord, we are left somewhat in the dark, owing to a want of historical testimony. There seems to be a provincial brevity of diction; and the sense is probably this: "denying Him who purchased them (i. e. their Redeemer) to be their Lord." It should seem, that, from a misrepresentation of the words of the apostle, they stumbled at the description of the majesty of Jesus Christ, and the ineffable glory of his second advent; and regarded the account of the apostles on that subject, as a fable, devised to hold the disciples in subjection. If so, they must have denied the proper deity of Jesus Christ; and probably held opinions not very different, from those which generated Arianism and Socinianism: therefore this text may, with great propriety, be adduced in controversy with persons professing such tenets. Bl.—Denying Him that redeemed them to be the Sovereign. The act of redeeming mankind is in the New Test. exclusively predicted of Christ. The scope of the passage shows, that dominion over minds and consciences is intended, which is involved in religious obedience, here required to Christ as our only Sovereign and Lord. J. P. SMITH. Damnable heresies.] 'It can by no means be a matter of small moment (whatever some may insinuate to the contrary) what your doctrinal belief on the great subject of religion may be. If these heresies are damnable, then those who embrace them cannot be the cordial friends of the Author of truth. Every degree of doctrinal error is not an evidence of enmity to God; for no man, it is probable, is absolutely perfect in his creed, any more than in his practice. Yet when we have ascertained what the fundamental, the absolutely essential doctrines of the Gospel are,—and there will be no great difficulty in this to those who have the Bible in their hands,—we are perfectly warranted in pronouncing, that those who reject them, are not on the Lord's side. They reject that, without which no man can be said to receive the Gospel.'

(3.) Whose judgment, &c.] 'The apostle looks forward, not so much to any particular persons, as to those perversions and abuses of the Gospel, of which, from the corruption of human nature, its teachers in every age would furnish lamentable examples?' BLOOMF.

V. 4-9. The angels, who sinned against God, were bound as criminals, and reserved to take their trial at the day of judgment, when sentence will be openly passed, and finally executed upon them. Rev. 20: 1-3, 7-10. In the mean time, their incurable enmity and wickedness, and the omnipresent and omnipotent justice of God, hold them fast, as 'in chains of darkness,' misery, and despair, from which there can saved; but these seducing teachers desire and design only their own temporal advantage and worldly grandeur.

V. 3-6. Men are apt to think that a reprieve is the forerunner of a pardon, and that if judgment be not speedily executed, it is, or will be, certainly reversed. But the righteous Judge will speedily take vengeance; the day of calamity for the wicked is at hand, and the things that shall come on them make haste. To prove this assertion, here are several examples of the righteous judgment of God, in taking vengeance on sinners; proposed to our serious consideration.

1. The angels who sinned. Observe, No excellency will exempt a sinner from punishment. If angels violate the law of God, the sentence, which that law awards, shall be executed on them without mercy or mitigation. Whence observe, By how much the more excellent the offender, by so much the more severe the punishment; these angels are immediately punished; there is no sparing them for a few days, no favor at all shown them. Sin debases and degrades the persons who commit it; angels are cast down from the height of their excellency, and divested of all their glory and dignity, on their disobedience. They who rebel against the God of heaven, shall all be sent down to hell. There is no place or state between the height of glory and the depth of misery, in which they shall be allowed to rest. Sin is the work of darkness, and darkness is the wages of sin,—the darkness of misery and torment. They who will not walk according to the light and direction of God's law, shall be deprived of the light of God's countenance and the comforts of his presence. As sin binds men over to punishment, so misery and torment hold men under punishment. The last degree of torment is not till the day of judgment. The sinning angels, though in hell already, are yet reserved to the judgment of the great day.

2. The old world. Here observe, The number of offenders signifies no more to procure any favor, than the quality; if the sin be universal, the punishment shall be so likewise. But, if there be but a few righteous, they shall be preserved. God does not destroy the good with the bad. In wrath He remembers mercy. God can make use of those creatures as the instruments of his vengeance, in punishing sinners, which He at first made and appointed for their service and benefit. But observe, The procuring cause; it was a world of ungodly men. Ungodliness puts men out of the divine protection, and exposes them to utter destruction.

3. Sodom and Gomorrah. Observe, No felicity of situation, or of country, or political union or confederacy, can keep off judgments from a sinful people; then these cities might have stood. God can use contrary creatures to punish incorrigible sinners. He destroys the old world by water, and Sodom by fire. Most heinous sins bring most grievous judgments. They who were abominable in their vices, were remarkable for their plagues. The punishment of sinners in former ages, is designed for the example of those who come after. Let us take warning by all the instances of God's taking vengeance, which are recorded for our admonition, and to prevent our promising ourselves impunity, though we go on in a course of sin.

V. 7-9. When God sends destruction on the ungodly, He commands deliverance for the righteous. This we have in his preserving Lot. Where, observe, 1. The character of Lot; a just man; this he was, to the generally prevailing bent of his heart, and through the main of his conversation. God does not account men just or unjust from one single act, but from their general course. 2. The impression the sins of others have on this righteous man; they grieve and vex him. In bad company we cannot escape either guilt or grief. Let the sins of others be a trouble to us, otherwise it will not be possible for us to keep ourselves pure. 3. A particular mention of the continuance of this good man's grief plausible and soothing preachers hope to escape with impunity; the judgment so long since foretold, and 'the damnation' menaced, will speedily arrive; though unbelief may suppose that the justice of God 'lingereth and slumbereth,' because He 'endures with much long suffering the vessels of wrath which are fitted for destruction.' Rom. 10:22, 23. SCOTT.

be no possible escape. Their doom is therefore irreversible; though the Lord, for wise reasons, lengthens their chains, enlarges the bounds of their prison, and defers the extremity of their punishment; which respite and relaxation they employ, in opposing to the uttermost his purposes of love to mankind, and in attempting their destruction. Gen. 3:1-6, 14, 15. Job 1:6-11. 2:1-5. Zech. 3:1-4. John 8:41-47. 2 Cor. 4:3, 4. Rev. 12:7-12. But this will all be overruled for the fuller display of the glory of God, the accomplishment of his eternal counsels, and the more conspicuous exercise of his awful justice, in the everlasting misery of these implacable enemies.—Thus He would also bear with the false teachers above mentioned, till their impiety and enmity were sufficiently evinced; and when his wise and holy purposes were accomplished, He would execute deserved vengeance on them and their adherents, and so terminate the temptation, to which his people were exposed through their artifices. 2 Tim. 3:6-9.—The same instructions might be deduced from the Lord's dealings with the old world, and with Sodom—Cast them down to hell.] The original word is not used in any other part of the New Test., or in the Greek translation of the Old; yet the meaning of it must not be sought from the fables of heathen poets, but from the general tenor of the sacred Scriptures. SCOTT.

(4.) Hell.] Greek, Tartarus. 'The word is used only in two places in the New Test., here and Jude 6.' Williams. 'Every one will bring to mind the sublime description of Milton Tartarus is a word found in Homer and Hesiod, and signifies the lowest and darkest pit in the universe. Of its origin the etymologists seem perfectly ignorant. I suspect it to be an intensive reduplication of the very old word tar, which in the earliest dialects seems to have signified dark; and indeed our term tar appears derived from a common source.' Bl.—In chains.] 'A general confinement may be reconcilable with some degree of liberty, yet liable to restraint as God shall see fit.' Doorn. 'It is needless to enter into a description of what the ancients figured to themselves under this notion. Suffice it to say, the apostle employs it as a most forcible adumbration of misery the most deplorable and hopeless.' BLOOMF.

(5.) Eighth.] Bps. Pearson and Cumberland refer this to preacher, making Noah the eighth preacher, &c., which is possible; but Noah was the tenth from Adam, who, Doddr. thinks, must have been in a wonderful manner fitted to perform the office of preacher in the first world, as Noah was in the second. Bloomf. connects eighth with Noah, meaning 'Noah, and seven others,' which, he says, is an idiom found in the best writers from Herodotus and Thucydides downwards, and is the only explanation that can well be admitted. and vexation; it was from day to day. Being accustomed to hear and see their wickedness did not reconcile him to it, nor abate the horror occasioned by it. Now, from this case of Lot, we are taught to argue, that God knows how to deliver his people, and punish his enemies. It is here presupposed, that the righteous must have their temptations and trials; it is therefore our duty to reckon upon, and prepare for them. Observe, here, The Lord knows them that are his; if but one in five cities, He knows him; and where there is a greater number, He cannot be ignorant of or overlook any of them. The wisdom of God is never at a loss about ways and means to deliver his people. The deliverance of the godly is the work of God; both his wisdom to contrive, and his power to work out, to prevent their falling, and being ruined: and surely if he can deliver out of temptation, He can keep from falling into it, if He did not see such trials to be necessary. God makes a very great difference in his dealings with the godly and the wicked. The wicked are reserved to the day of judgment. Here, we see, There is a day of judgment; God has appointed a day, wherein He will judge the world. The preservation of impenitent sinners is only a reserving of them to the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

V. 10—22. But why will God thus deal with these false teachers? This he shows in what follows.

1. These walk after the flesh; they follow the devices and desires of their own hearts, of their own fleshly mind, refusing to make their reason stoop to divine revelation; they, in their lives, act directly contrary to God's righteous precepts, and comply with the demands of corrupt nature: the measure of iniquity to which they have attained will not content them; but they go on in their sinful course, and increase unto more ungodliness; they also pour contempt on those whom God has set in authority over them, and requires them to honor; these, therefore, despise the ordinance of God.

2. This he aggravates, by setting forth the very different conduct of more excellent creatures, even the angels. They are greater even than those who are clothed with authority and power among men, and much more than those false teachers, who are scandalous revilers of magistrates and governors; the good angels vastly exceed us in all natural and moral excellences, in strength, understanding, and holiness too. Good angels are accusers of sinful creatures, of their own kind, or ours, or both; allowed to behold the face of God, and stand before his throne, they cannot but have a zeal for his honor, and accuse and blame those who dishonor Him. They bring their accusations of sinful creatures before the Lord; not publish them to their fellow-creatures, in a way of calumny and slander; the Lord is the Judge, and will be the Avenger, of all impiety and injustice. Good angels mingle no bitter revilings, or base reproaches, with any of the accusations or charges they bring against the wickedest and worst of criminals. Let us who pray that God's will may be done on earth, as it is in heaven, imitate the angels in this particular; if we complain of wicked men, let it be to God, and that not with rage and reviling, but with compassion and composedness of mind, that may evidence that we belong to Him who is meek and merciful.

3. The apostle, having shown, v. 11. how unlike seducing teachers are, to the most excellent creatures, proceeds, v. 12. to show how like they are to the most inferior. Men, under the power of sin, are so far from observing divine revelation, that they do not exercise reason; but as brute creatures, they follow the instinct of their sensitive appetite, and the inclination of their carnal mind; so they are ignorant of what they might and ought to know; therefore, observe, Ignorance is the cause of evil-speaking; and destruction will be the effect of it; these persons shall be utterly destroyed in their own corruption; their vices not only expose them to the wrath of God in another world, but often bring them to misery and ruin in this life; whatever they meet with, is the just reward of their unrighteousness. Such sinners as sport themselves in mischief, deceive themselves, and disgrace all they belong to; by one sort of sins they prepare themselves for another; and their extravagant feasting, and drinking, bring them to commit all manner of lewdness, so that their

PRACT. OBS. V. 4—9. The manifold 'goodness of God,' if it do not lead men to repentance, and engage them to obedience, will no more secure them from condemnation, than the creating kindness of God to angels induced Him to 'spare' such of them as sinned in heaven itself; but, 'as He cast them down to hell, to be reserved in chains of darkness to the day of judgment to be punished;' so will He, in due season, execute 'the vengeance that is written' on all impenitent sinners. Rom. 2:4—11. But, if indeed we do fear, trust, love, and obey the Lord, we should recollect in all our conflicts and trials, that 'He knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation,' that He has ten thousand ways of rescuing us, of which we never thought, and that his wisdom and power will surely effect the purposes of his love, and the engagements of his truth; whilst wicked men often escape suffering here, because 'they are reserved to the day of judgment to be punished,' with 'the devil and his angels,' in that eternal state of hopeless misery, to which they are doomed. SCOTT.

PRACT. OBS. V. 10—14. Whilst we take encouragement from the tender mercies of our God, let us also stand in awe of his holiness and justice. None have more cause to tremble, than they who are emboldened to gratify their sinful passions by presuming on his grace and mercy; nor can anything more fitly illustrate the desperate wickedness of the human heart, than the abominations, in which men have wallowed, whilst professing to be religious, and while contending for the holy doctrines of Christianity! Many, both in ancient and modern times, have deemed themselves at liberty to 'walk after the flesh in the lust of un-

V. 10, 11. The preceding observations were applicable to all wicked men; but especially to hypocritical and heretical professors and teachers of Christianity; yet they were, and would be, peculiarly verified in the licentious heresiarchs, of whom the apostle treated, and in that of their abandoned followers. They denied Christ, in respect of his kingly office, and would not obey Him as their Lord and Master, 1—3. and we may suppose, they contemptuously disregarded the spiritual authority of the apostles, and other pastors and rulers of the church. 1 John 4:4—6. 3 John 9—12. cleanliness,' and have 'despised government' of all kinds; as if licentiousness and anarchy were the only desirable freedom, presumption and self-will equivalent to holy confidence and holiness in the Lord, and calumnies, or revilings, against 'the powers that be,' the proper way of rendering to Cesar the things which are Cesar's, and to God the things that are God's! Such liberty of conscience, and license of speech and conduct, holy 'angels, who are greater in power and might,' never thought of. But let Christians stand at a distance from such contests; for alas! many, running into these excesses, bring their characters into suspicion, and open the mouths of those who speak evil of us, as of evil-doers; nay, many 'utterly perish in their own corruption.'—Especially let us fear a licentious profession of the Gospel: doubtless they 'will receive the reward of unrighteousness, who count it pleasure to riot in the day-time;'... who join with Christians in sacred ordinances, and with the world in their licentiousness and dissipated revels; and who attempt to reconcile these things, by perverting the doctrines of the Gospel, and boasting of their liberty and privileges! But could it have been conceived, if Scripture and facts had not evinced it, that teachers and professors of the holy doctrine of Christ, could preserve their confidence, credit, and influence, whilst 'their eyes are full of adultery,' and while 'they cannot cease from sin?' that 'unstable souls' could be beguiled by such men? and that success should attend the 'covetous practices' in which their hearts are exercised? or that they should be considered as blessed, who are indeed the children of the curse, and evidently described as such in the Word of God? wanton looks show their own impure lusts, and are designed to kindle the like in others; and in this, the heart is insatiate, and the eye incessant in looking after what may gratify their unclean desires; and they who are themselves impudent and incessant in sin, are very diligent and often successful in deceiving others, and drawing them into the same excess of riot. But here, observe, who are in the greatest danger, even those whose hearts are not established with grace; these are easily turned into the way of sin, or else such sensual wretches would not be able to prevail on them; for these are not only riotous and lascivious, but covetous, also; they pant after riches, and it is a considerable part of their work to contrive to get wealth; in this their hearts are exercised, and then they execute their projects; and if men abandon themselves to all sorts of lusts, we cannot wonder the apostle should call them cursed children; for they are liable to the curse of God denounced against such ungodly, unrighteous men, and they bring a curse on all who hearken and adhere to them.

4. The apostle, v. 15, 16. proves they are cursed children, even such covetous persons as the Lord abhors, by showing, that They have forsaken the right way; and are gone into a wrong way, which leads to death; and this he makes out by showing it to be the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor. That is a way of unrighteousness, into which men are led by the wages of unrighteousness. Outward temporal good things are the wages sinners promise themselves, though they are often disappointed. The inordinate love of the good things of this world, turns men on of the way which leads to the unspeakably better things of another life. They, who, from the same principle, are guilty of the same practices with notorious sinners, are, in the judgment of God, the followers of such vile offenders, and, therefore, must reckon on being at last where they are. Heinous and hardened sinners sometimes meet with rebukes for their iniquity. Though extraordinary rebukes may for a little while cool men's courage, and hinder their violent progress in the way of sin, it will not make them forsake the way of iniquity, and go over into the way of holiness; for here was a surprising miracle wrought, and yet all in vain; they who will not yield to usual methods of reproof, will be but little influenced by miraculous appearances, to turn them from their sinful courses.

5. The apostle proceeds, v. 17. to a further description of seducing teachers, whom he sets forth as wells, or fountains, without water. Observe, Ministers should be as wells or fountains, where the people may find instruction, direction, and comfort: But false teachers have nothing of this to impart to those who consult them: and therefore are set forth as empty, because there is no truth in them. They are also clouds carried with a tempest; not of the Spirit, but the stormy wind or tempest of their own ambition and covetousness; and as clouds obstruct the light of the sun, and darken the air, so do these darken counsel by words without knowledge, and wherein there is no truth; and, seeing these men are for promoting darkness in this world, it is very just that the mist of darkness should be their portion in the next; utter darkness, and that for ever.

And it is just with God to deal thus with them, for they allure those they deal with, and draw them into a net, or catch them with great swelling words of vanity; lofty expressions, which have a great sound, but little sense. They work upon the corrupt affections and carnal, fleshly lusts of men, proposing what is grateful to them. Thus, they seduce persons, who, in reality, avoided and kept at a distance from hurtful and destructive errors. Observe, By application and industry men attain a skillfulness and dexterity in promoting error; they are as artful and as successful as the fisher, who makes angling his daily employment. Erroneous teachers have a peculiar advantage to win men over to them, because they have sensual pleasures to take them with; whereas the ministers of Christ put men on self-denial, and the mortifying of those lusts that others gratify and please: wonder not, therefore, that errors spread so much. Persons who have for a while adhered to the truth, may, by the subtlety and industry of seducers be so far deceived, as to fall into those errors they had for a while clean escaped; Be therefore always on your guard, maintain a godly jealousy of yourselves, pray for the Spirit to instruct and establish you in the truth, walk humbly with God, and watch against everything that may provoke Him to give you up, to be taken with the fair and specious pretences of these false teachers. To prevent these men's gaining proselytes, he tells us, that in the midst of all their talk of liberty, they themselves are the vilest slaves; their minds and hearts are so far corrupted and depraved, that they are completely conquered and captivated by their spiritual enemies; and what a shame to be overcome and commanded by those who are themselves the servants of corruption, and slaves to their own lusts! This consideration should prevent our being led away by these seducers; and to this he adds another, v. 20. hereby, i. e. by being led away, their latter end is made worse than their beginning. Here, we see, It is an advantage to escape the pollutions of the world; hereby we are kept from grieving those who are truly serious, and emboldening those who are openly profane. Some men are, for a time, kept from the pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of Christ, who are not savingly renewed in the spirit of their mind. False teachers at first insnare and entangle; they first perplex with some plausible and specious objections; and the more ignorant and unstable are hereby made to stagger, and brought to question the truth, because they cannot solve all the difficulties, nor answer all the objections, urged by these seducers. When men are once entangled, they are easily overcome; therefore should Christians keep close to the Word of God, and watch against those who seek to perplex and bewilder them; and that, because, if men who have once escaped, are again entangled, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

The apostle, in the last two verses of the ch. sets himself to prove that a state of apostasy is worse than a state of ignorance; for this is a condemning the way of righteousness, after they have had some knowledge of it, and expressed some liking to it;

V. 15. Bosor.] 'Either Balaam's father had two names, Beor and Bosor, or the latter (as Ainsworth and Lightfoot suppose) was the Chaldean pronunciation of the former.' WILLIAMS.—The force of the comparison rests in this, that as Balaam counselled the Moabites, to entice the Israelites to illicit connexion with their women, and thus lead them into idolatry, and draw on them the heavy punishment of God; so these false teachers, by giving Christians a license to commit immorality, namely, for the purpose of gratifying their own avarice, in like manner called forth the severe castigation of God. Such is the view taken by most commentators. Perhaps, however, Peter had regard only to the avarice of Balaam, like whom these false teachers, for the purpose of gratifying that base passion, make a gain of the Gospel in the way above-mentioned. V. 20—22. They [the dog returning to his vomit, and the sow to her wallowing in the mire] are the two most disgusting and loathsome emblems, which the whole animal race can suggest, and are adduced to illustrate the filthiness of those, who, after convitious, professed repentance, and outward reformation, return back to wickedness, because their carnal hearts loved it. But if the power of God should change the swine into a 'sheep,' (the emblem of the regenerate,) though it might be thrown into the mire, yet it could no longer 'wallow in it' with delight, but must be most uncomfortable till cleansed from it.—They who 'had escaped the pollutions of the world,' had not been 'made partakers of a divine nature;' nor had the nature of the dog, or swine been changed; the swine was washed, but not made 'a new creature.'—The true Christian is born again, 'new created to good works;' Christ dwells in him by his Spirit, and 'makes all things new.' Mat. 12:29—32. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—39. 1 John 2:18, 19. 5:14—18.—The difference between this ch. and the other parts of Peter's epistles, in the style and manner, and its coincidence with that of Jude, have made several expositors suppose, that both of them borrowed their language from some ancient book which is now lost; but of this every reader must judge for himself.

CHAP. III.

THIS second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

2 That <sup>a</sup> ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before <sup>b</sup> by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Savior:

3 Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days <sup>c</sup> scoffers, walking after their own lusts, this carries in it a declaring that they have found some iniquity in the way of righteousness, and some falsehood in the Word of truth; now, to bring up such an evil report on the good way of God, and such a false charge against the way of truth, must necessarily expose to the heaviest condemnation; the misery of such deserters of Christ and his Gospel, is more unavoidable, and more intolerable, than that of other offenders. Well, if the Scripture gives such an account of Christianity on the one hand, and of sin on the other, as we have here in these two verses, we certainly ought highly to approve of the former, and persevere therein, because it is a way of righteousness, and a holy commandment; and to loathe and keep at the greatest distance from the latter, because it is set forth as most offensive and abominable.

4 And saying, Where <sup>d</sup> is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

PRACT. OBS. V. 15-22. Those who would escape deceivers should consider, that they abound in 'high swelling words' of vain boasting and ostentation; and speak of themselves, as if wisdom and knowledge belonged exclusively to them, at the same time that they give great indulgence to the lusts of the flesh. Thus they allure, with the hope of sensual gratification, worldly advantages, and impunity in them, such 'stony-ground hearers,' as, under convictions and transient affections, had 'escaped from those that live in error.' Persons of this description, not valuing the liberty of obeying the commandments of God, are disposed to listen to those, who promise them liberty of another sort, and assure them that their practical instructors have held them in bondage; and thus antinomian tenets are embraced, as a covert way of returning to the world and sin, and as a more specious and quiet kind of apostasy; . . . nor is such a departure from practical Christianity to antinomian principles and behavior, less fatal, than open apostasy; as it serves to keep the conscience entirely asleep, perhaps more effectually flourishing awhile, yet never brings forth any good fruit, but always briars and thorns, because the ground was never purged; and how benign soever the showers that descend upon it, yet they only nourish the thorns (see v. 8.), which certainly implies that the ground was never so changed, as to prepare it to bring forth good fruit. In Christ's parable, they that are represented by the thorny ground, are manifestly different from the good ground, those that have "good and honest hearts." The fault of the stony ground and thorny ground was the nature of the ground, and the good fruit is ascribed to the better nature of the good ground. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-4. 'This second epistle' appears, by the opening of this chapter, to have been primarily addressed to the same churches as the former; though this is not mentioned at the beginning of it. 1:1, 2.

(1.) 'The apostle here gives them to understand, that he wrote this and the former epistle, to put them in mind of Christ's final advent to judgment, and to excite them to prepare for it. But he withal informs them, they must expect to hear the notion ridiculed by foolish and wicked men. To show how ill-founded is this ridicule, he intimates that the first constitution of the earth was such as to occasion the flood, and the CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. That the apostle might the better reach his end in writing this epistle, which is, to make them steady and constant in a fiducial and practical remembrance of the doctrine of the Gospel, he expresses his special affection and tenderness of them, his sincere love to them, and his hearty concern for them. The better to recommend the matter, he tells them, that what he would have them to remember, is, what came from God by the holy prophets, and the commandments of the apostles of the Lord and Savior; what cannot, therefore, but demand and deserve to be frequently remembered; and they who meditate on these things, will feel the quickening virtues thereof; it is by these things the pure minds of Christians are to be stirred up, that they may be active and lively in the work of holiness, and zealous and unwearied in the way to heaven.

V. 3-7. To quicken and excite us to a serious minding, and firm adhering to, what God has revealed to us by the prophets and apostles, we are told that his way of saving sinners by Jesus Christ, is what men will scoff at, and that in the last days, under the Gospel. It may seem strange, that the New Test. dispensation of the covenant of grace, which is spiritual, and therefore more agreeable to the nature of God than the Old, should be ridiculed and reproached; but the spirituality and simplicity of the New Test. worship are directly contrary to the carnal mind of man; and this accounts for what the apostle seems here to hint at, namely, that scoffers shall be more numerous and more bold in the last days than ever before.

Now to prevent the true Christian's being overcome, when attacked by these scoffers, we are told,

1. What sort of persons they are; they walk after their own lusts, follow the devices and desires of their own hearts, and carnal, corrupt affections, not the dictates of right reason, and an enlightened, well-informed judgment; they live as they list; not only their inward minds are evil and opposite to God, Rom. 8: 7. but they are grown to such a height of wickedness, that they proclaim openly that their tongues are their own, their strength, time, and all; and 'Who is lord over us?' Who shall contradict or control us, or ever call us to an account for what we say or do? And as they seem to be confined by any laws of God in their life, so neither will they bear that the revelations of God should dictate and prescribe to them what they are to believe; here, also, their own lusts alone shall be consulted by them.

2. We also are foretold how far they will proceed; they will attempt to shake and unsettle us, even as to our belief of Christ's second coming, v. 4. Without this, all other articles of the Christian faith will signify very little; this gives the finishing stroke to all the rest; the promised Messiah is come; He is altogether such an one as is stated before, and has done all that has been before noticed; these principles the enemies of Christianity have all along endeavored to overturn; but, as these all rest on facts already past, of which this and the other apostles have given us the most satisfying evidence, probably they will at last grow weary of opposition to these; and yet, while one very principal article of our faith refers to what is still behind, and only has a promise to rest on, here they will still attack us, even till our Lord is come; nay, laugh at the very mention of his second coming, and do what in them lies, to put all out of countenance who seriously believe and wait for it. Now, therefore, let us see how this point stands, between the believer and these seducers: the believer not only desires He may come, but having a promise that He will come, a promise Himself made and often repeated, a promise received and reported by faithful witnesses, and left on sure record, he is also fully persuaded He will come: on the other hand, these seducers, because they wish He never may, therefore do all that in them lies, to cheat themselves and others into a persuasion that He never will come; if they cannot deny that there is a promise, yet they will laugh at it; which argues much higher degrees of infidelity and contempt; Where is the promise, say they, of his coming?

3. We are also forewarned of the method of their reasoning; for while they laugh, they will pretend to argue too; to this purpose, they add, that, since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation, v. 4. This is subtle, but not solid; it is apt to make impressions on weak minds, and especially on wicked hearts; say they, 'The fathers are all dead, to whom the promise was made; therefore, as it never was made good in their time, so there is no likelihood it ever will be; why should we trouble ourselves about it? If there had been any truth or certainty in the promise, we should surely have seen, before this, some signs of his coming; but ally than any other opiate yet devised by the grand deceiver of mankind. It is evident, therefore, that 'it would have been better' for such men, if they had continued ignorant of the Gospel, than thus to pervert it to their own deeper condemnation, and the ruin of others along with them. Yet, alas, how many are there, who thus verify 'the true proverb,' by 'turning as the dog to his own vomit again, and as a sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire! But this shall never happen to any, who are 'in Christ new creatures,' and made partakers of a divine nature. Let us then pray continually, 'Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right Spirit within me;' let us remember, that a 'holy commandment' is given to us, as well as 'exceedingly great and precious promises;' let us beware of turning from the precepts, as much as of rejecting the truths, of Christianity; and let us equally avoid antinomian corrupters, and pharisaical opposers of the Gospel, as alike the enemies of 'our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.'

we find, to this very day, all things continue as they were, even from the beginning; why, therefore, should we affright ourselves, as if the world were to have an end? Thus do these scoffers argue! Ps. 55:19. They neither fear Him, nor his judgments; what He never has done, they would conclude He never can do, or never will.

4. Here is the falsehood of their argument detected; the apostle puts us in remembrance of a change already past, which, in a manner, equals that which we are called to expect and look for,—the drowning of the world in the days of Noah: this these scoffers took no notice of; they might have known it, v. 5. but chose to pass it over as if they had never heard of it. Note, It is hard to persuade men to believe what they are not willing to find true; in many cases, they are ignorant, because they do not care to know. But let not sinners think, that such ignorance will be admitted as an excuse for the sin it may betray them into; they who crucified Christ, did not know who He was; for, had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. 2:8. but they were not therefore innocent; their ignorance itself was a sin, willing, wilful ignorance; and one sin can be no excuse for another. So it is here. Now, therefore, consider the representation the apostle here lays down, both of the destruction of the old world by water, and that which awaits this present world at the final conflagration. He mentions the one as what God had done, to convince and persuade us the rather to believe, that the other both may be and will be. First, we begin with the apostle's account of the destruction which has once already come on the world, v. 5, 6. Originally, the world was otherwise situated; the waters were most wisely divided at the creation, and most beneficially for us; some had proper repositories above the firmament, here called the heavens, as also Gen. 1:8. and others under the firmament, gathered together unto one place; there were then both sea and dry land, a commodious habitation for man; but now, at the time of the universal deluge, the case is strangely altered; the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished, v. 5. Is not here a change, a most awful change? And then it is to be observed, that all this was done by the word of God; by that the world was made at first, Heb. 11:3. Gen. 1:5, 7. v. 9, 10. Thus, He spake, and it was done, Ps. 33:9. Thus, says our apostle, by the word of the Lord the heavens were, as they were of old, that is, at the first creation, and the earth (as it was at first a terraqueous globe) standing out of the water and in the water. Nor was it only the first frame and order of the world that is here said to be by the word of God, but the after confusion and ruin of the world, as well as the utter destruction of its inhabitants, were also by the same word; it was also done according to the word of his promise; God had said He would destroy man, even all flesh, and that He would do it by bringing a flood of waters on the earth, Gen. 6:7, 13, 17. This was the change God had before brought on the world, and which these scoffers had overlooked; and now we are to consider, in the second place, what the apostle says of the destructive change which is yet to come on it, v. 7. Here we have an awful account of the final dissolution of the world, and which we are yet more nearly concerned in: the judgment is yet to come, but will surely come, and we know not when, nor on what particular age or generation of men; therefore we cannot be sure it may not happen in our own times; and this makes a very great difference, though it should be admitted that they were equal in every other respect; which yet must not be allowed, for there were some, though very few, who escaped that deluge, but not one can escape in this conflagration; besides, we were not in reach of the one, but are not sure we shall not be included in the other calamity. Now, therefore, to see the world to which we belong destroyed at once,—not a single person only, not a particular family only, nor yet a nation, but the whole world, I say, sinking at once, and no ark provided, no possible way left, for any one, of escaping from the common ruin; this makes a difference between the desolation that has been and what we yet are to expect. The one is already past, and never to return, Gen. 9:11—15. the other is still behind, and as certain to come as the truth and the power of God can make it: the one came gradually on the world, and was growing on its inhabitants forty days, before it made an utter end of them, Gen. 7:12, 17. this other will come on them swiftly, and all at once, 2 Pet. 2:1. Thus, whatever differences may be assigned, between that destruction of the world and this here spoken of, [they] do indeed represent the approaching as the most terrible judgment; yet, that the world has once been destroyed by a universal deluge, renders it the more credible that it may be ruined by a universal conflagration; let, therefore, the scoffers at least consider that it may be; and though they still should laugh, they shall not put us out of countenance; we are well assured it will be, because He has said it, and we can depend on his promise; they err, not knowing (at least not believing) the Scriptures, nor the power of God; but we know, and we do, or ought to, depend on both. What He has said, and will certainly make good, is, that the heavens and the earth we are now related to, are not to be, what earthly minds would wish to have them, treasures for us, but to be what God will have them, in his treasury, securely kept for his purposes; it follows, they are reserved unto fire. Observe, God's following judgments are more terrible than those which went before; the old world was destroyed by water, this is reserved unto fire; and though this seems to be delayed, yet as it is upheld by the word of God, so it is only reserved for the vengeance of Him to whom vengeance belongs, who will, at the day of judgment, deal with an ungodly world according to their deserts; for the day of judgment is the day of the perdition of ungodly men. They who now scoff at a future judg-

(5—7.) He means to refute the scoffers, who said that the whole system of nature remained, and would always remain in the state it had been in from the creation, nor would the world ever be destroyed. (v. 4.) Against these he shows, that all things have not remained in the state in which they were created by God; for that the world (i. e. our earth with its atmosphere) had once been destroyed by water (v. 5, 6.) and would again be destroyed in like manner even by fire. This those scoffers were ignorant of, or did not choose to understand. ROS.

(5) By the word of God, &c.] 'The heavens were of old, and the earth, which is framed, by the word of God, from the waters, and between the waters.' Kypke. 'It was the opinion of the remotest antiquity, that the earth was formed out of water, or primitive moisture, which they termed ulē, first matter; and Thales taught, that "all things derive their existence from water." This also appears to be the doctrine of Moses, Gen. 1:1, 2. and that the earth was at first in a fluid state, is evident from its form; for it has been demonstrated by measuring, some degrees near the pole, that the earth is not round, but an oblate spheroid, a figure nearly resembling an orange, and one which any soft or elastic body would assume if whirled rapidly round a centre, as the earth is round its axis. When the waters retired into one place, and when "God divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament," then the earth was placed "between the waters." Greenf.—The earth standing out of the water and in the water.] 'I. e. part rising above the water, and part submerged; or, perhaps above the waters "under the earth," and beneath those treasured in the clouds, by the meeting of which in the deluge, "the world that then was," being overflowed, was drowned. See Gen. 1:6—10. 7:11—20.' Williams.—'If we translate "between the waters," it will bear some resemblance to Gen. 1:6, 7. and it may refer to the whole of the atmosphere with which the earth is surrounded, and which contains the vapors without which we could neither have animal or vegetable life. Thus the earth which was originally formed out of water, subsists by water, and by means of that very water, the water compacted with the earth, the fountains of the great deep and the waters of the atmosphere, Gen. 7:11, the antediluvian world was destroyed. But though the same means still exist, for there is water enough to draw the earth, and there is iniquity enough to induce God to destroy it, and its inhabitants, it is nevertheless treasured up, reserved to be destroyed, not by water, but by fire at the day of judgment.' A. Clarke, in Henry, abr.—'The tradition of the heathen, doubtless in accordance with the divine declaration, was, that the world would be destroyed by fire.' Henry, abr.—Bloomf. says, the apostle seems not to have spoken with reference to cosmogony, but meant to have standing, &c. taken in the sense of exist or subsist. EP.

(6) The world that then was.] 'This is by almost all explained, the world and its inhabitants, as they existed at the deluge recorded by Moses. But since the opposition is not the world that now is, but the heavens and the earth which are now, (v. 7.) Ros. thinks the apostle distinguishes these heavens and this earth from others. And he would understand, not the deluge in the time of Noah, but some former one; adopting the opinion of Burnet, in his Theory of the Earth, that there was quite a different appearance of earth and heaven before the deluge in the time of Noah. He then adds: "Very probable to me is the opinion of those, who affirm that the world, long after that first creation of this universe, was utterly laid waste by some universal inundation, much more terrible and of longer continuance than the deluge recorded by Noah; after which God fitted it up for a residence for man and animals, and that this metamorphosis is what is described [as creation, or in Gen. 1.] by Moses." A conjecture indeed highly ingenious, and which is thought by natural philosophers to be somewhat confirmed by the recent discoveries in geology. But it is vain to seek for any support to it in the words of the apostle, which, if taken in a popular sense, are quite consistent with the deluge in the time of Noah; and as that is especially adduced as an example and warning in a similar passage, Mat. 24:37—39. so it seems to be meant here.' BLOOMF.

(7.) 'To obviate the direct bearings of this passage, Universalist writers say, that this earth is to be the hell of wicked men; and that as the burning of it will not be eternal, so the perdition of the ungodly will be but temporary. There are however three serious difficulties to this gloss. 1. The Scriptures speak of a hell already existing, wherein the angels who kept not their first estate are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day; and in which the departed spirits of wicked men now lift up their eyes, being in torment. 2. The Scriptures declare this hell now existing will be the hell of all ungodly men; for they are doomed to depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. 3. If the earth, as being dissolved by fire, is to be the hell of ungodly men, then punishment must precede the day of judgment; for the conflagration is uniformly represented as prior to that event. See 2 Thess. 1:7—10.' WILLIAMS.

8 But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

V. 8—10. The apostle comes, in these words, to instruct and establish Christians in the truth of the coming of the Lord, where we may clearly discern the tenderness and affection wherewith he speaks to them, calling them beloved; he has a peculiar respect for the true believers, and the remaining ignorance and weakness that he apprehends to be in them make him jealous, and put him on giving them a caution. Here we may observe,

1. The truth he asserts; that with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. In the account of men, there is a great difference between a day and a year, and a vast deal more between one day and a thousand years, yet, in the account of God, there is no difference; for all things, past, present, and future, are ever before Him; and the delay of a thousand years cannot be so much to Him as the

(8.) Be not ignorant of this one thing.] 'This is a most solemn formula of soliciting serious attention; and the scope of the following passage is, to show why the Lord defers the last judgment from day to day; namely, out of his singular patience and clemency.' Bloomf.—One day, &c.] 'This was a proverbial expression among the Jews, to signify that no finite duration bears any proportion to the eternity of God.' DODDR.

V. 9. Men's impenitence arises from their unwillingness to return to God, not from his unwillingness to receive them; and therefore He is doubtless 'willing that all should come to repentance' and be saved; but no one can conceive, that He absolutely willeth the salvation of the wicked, in the same sense as He willeth that of the righteous. ('I will, be thou clean;') and yet is unable to effect it! These are two distinct, but consistent views, which may be taken of the subject; the one accords to the condition of sinners, when first taught to attend to the Word of salvation; to them, 'the long-suffering' of God, the provisions of the Gospel, the general invitations, the 'command to all men to repent,' and the promises that Christ will cast out none who come to Him, are so many assurances, that 'the Lord is not willing that any,' who seek salvation, 'should perish;' but that sinners of all descriptions should come to repentance; and that they who repent, do that which pleases Him, and shall be accepted. Ez. 18:23. 33:11. John 6:36—40. 1 Tim. 2:3, 4. Rev. 2:20—23. But the other refers to God: 'known unto whom are all his works from the beginning of the world;' and according to it, the established believer ascribes his willingness to repent, to special deferring of anything for a day or hour is to us.

2. The importance of this truth; this is the one thing the apostle would not have us ignorant of; a holy awe and reverential fear of God are necessary in order to our worshipping and glorifying Him; and a belief of the inconceivable distance between Him and us is very proper to beget and maintain that religious fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom. This is a truth that belongs to our peace, therefore he endeavors it may not be hid from our eyes; as it is in the original, Let not this one thing be hid from you.

In v. 9. we are told, The Lord is not slack; He does not delay beyond the appointed time; as God kept the time He had appointed to deliver Israel out of Egypt, to a day, Exod. 12:41. so He will keep to the time appointed, in coming to judge the world. What a difference is there between the account God makes, and that men make! Ungodly men dare charge a culpable slackness on God, as if He had slipt the time, and laid aside the thoughts of coming. But the apostle assures us, that what men count slackness, is truly long-suffering, and that to us-ward: it is giving more time to his own people, whom He has chosen before the foundation of the world, many of whom are not as yet converted; and those who are in a state of grace and favor with God, are to advance in knowledge and holiness, and in the exercise of faith and patience, to abound in good works, doing and suffering what they are called to, that they may bring glory to God, and improve in a meetness for heaven; for God is not willing that any of these should perish, but that all of them should come to repentance. Here observe, Repentance is absolutely necessary in order to salvation, Luke 13:3, 5. God has no delight in the death of sinners; and though the principal design of God, in his long-suffering, is, the blessedness of those whom He has chosen to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, yet his goodness and forbearance do, in their own nature, invite and call to repentance all those to whom they are exercised. 'Abuse not, therefore, the patience and long-suffering of God, by abandoning yourselves to a course of ungodliness; presume not to go on boldly in the way of sinners, nor to sit down securely in an un-converted, impenitent state, as he who said, Mat. 24:48. My lord delayeth his coming, lest He come and surprise you; for, as we read, v. 10. The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night.' Here we may observe,

(1.) The certainty of the day of the Lord: though it is now above 1800 years since this epistle was written, and the day is not yet come, it assuredly will come; and God will keep his appointment, Heb. 9:27. (2.) The suddenness of this day; it will come at a time when men are sleeping and secure, and have no manner of apprehension or expectation of the day of the Lord, any more than men have of a thief when in a deep sleep, in the dark and silent night, Mat. 25:6. Let us, then, beware how we, in our thoughts and imaginations, put that day far away from us; but rather suppose it to be so much nearer in reality, by how much further off it is in the opinion of the ungodly world. (3.) The solemnity of this coming; The visible heavens, unable to abide when the Lord shall come in his glory, shall undergo a mighty alteration, and this very suddenly, and with such a noise, as the breaking and tumbling down of so great a fabric must necessarily occasion. The elements of which the creatures are composed, shall melt with fervent heat, at this coming of the Lord. The earth, also, and its inhabitants, and all the works, whether of nature or art, shall be destroyed; all sorts of creatures which God has made, and all the works of men, must submit, all must pass through the fire, which shall be a consuming fire to all that sin has brought into the world, though it may be but a refining fire to the works of God's hand, that the glass of the creation being made much brighter, the saints may much better discern the glory of the Lord therein.

And now who can but observe what a difference there will be between the first coming of Christ and the second! Yet that is called the great and dreadful day of the Lord, Mal. 4:5. How much more dreadful must this coming to judgment be! May we be so wise as to prepare for it, that it may not be a day of vengeance and destruction unto us. Oh! what will become of us, if we set our affections on this earth, and make it our portion, seeing all these things shall be burnt up? Look out, therefore, and make sure of a happiness beyond this visible world, which must all be melted down.

tures and of the power of God? yet their very ignorance is the consequence of their ungodliness, and wilful opposition to those parts of divine truth, which condemn their darling iniquities. But none, who read and believe the sacred oracles, can be ignorant, that the Omnipotent Creator of the heavens and the earth, who upholds, preserves, changes, or destroys his own work, as He sees good, has his whole plan before Him; and is alone competent to determine times and seasons; and that with Him, one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' grace; and acknowledges that if he had been left to himself, he should have perished in obstinate love of sin, and enmity to God, as numbers of his fellow-sinners do.—Let it be particularly noticed, that God 'willeth all men to repent,' exactly in the same manner, as He 'willeth all men to be saved,' so that none who do not repent can have any benefit from his willingness that all should be saved. SCOTT.

(9.) The Lord is not slack, &c.] 'Procrastinating and slow as to fulfilling his promises,—the Lord is not so.' BLOOMF.

V. 10—13. Though delays seemed to be made, whilst the Lord waited to complete the counsels of his wisdom and mercy, and to render the implacable enmity of impenitent sinners manifest to the whole creation; yet his great and terrible day would certainly come, suddenly, when not expected, and with most surprising consternation, and inevitable destruction, to all who were found unprepared. (Marg. Ref. b—Notes, Mat. 24:42—44. 1 Thes. 5:1—3.) At that important catastrophe, 'the heavens' and all the host of them, (as far, at least, as connected with this earth and its inhabitants,) 'will pass away,' and rush into confusion and destruction; with a tremendous 'noise,' of which thunders, earthquakes, and all other convulsions of nature, are wholly inadequate to give the least conception. Then all 'the elements,' of which the earth and its atmosphere, and all the luminaries connected with it, are composed, shall melt 'with intense heat;' and not only one vast city, or one whole nation, but the earth, with all its cities, forests, mountains, yea, the contents of its bowels to the very centre, as well as all the works of men, however admired or magnificent, which cover the surface of it, shall constitute one vast conflagration, and be reduced to as confused a chaos, as that from which it was first created; and indeed shall 'wholly pass away.' Ps. 102:23—25. Mat. 24:32—35. Heb. 1:10—12. Rev. 20:11—15. Ought not Christians therefore to be continually 'looking for,' and preparing to welcome that solemn season, called emphatically 'the

V. 11—18. The apostle, having instructed them in the doctrine of Christ's second coming, takes occasion thence to exhort them to purity and godliness in their whole conversation, v. 11. Seeing all these things must be dissolved, how holy should we be, that are assured of it, departing from and dying to sin, that has so corrupted and defiled all the visible creation, that there is an absolute need of its dissolution! And inasmuch as this dissolution is in order to their being restored to their primitive beauty and excellency, how pure and holy should we be, in order to our being fit for the new heaven and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness! It is a very exact and universal holiness that he exhorts to, not resting in any lower measure or degree, but laboring to be eminent beyond what is commonly attained; holy in God's house and in our own; in all our conversation, whether with high or low, rich or poor, good or bad, friends or enemies; we must exercise ourselves unto godliness of all sorts, in all its parts, trusting in God, and delighting in God only, who continues the same when the whole visible creation shall be dissolved; whereas, what worldly men delight in, and follow after, must all be dissolved; these things which we now see, must, in a little while, pass away, and be no more as they now are: let us look, therefore, at what shall abide and continue, which, though not present, is certain, and not far off. This looking for the day of God, is one of the directions the apostle gives us, in order to our being eminently holy and godly in all manner of conversation, v. 12. The coming of the day of God is what every Christian must hope for and earnestly expect; for it is a day when Christ shall appear in the glory of the Father, and evidence his Divinity and Godhead even to those who counted Him a mere man. The first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, when He appeared in the form of a servant, was what the people of God earnestly waited and looked for; that coming was for the consolation of Israel, Luke 2:25. How much more should they wait with expectation and earnestness for his second coming, which will be the day of their complete redemption, and of his most glorious manifestation! Here we must notice,

1. What true Christians look for,—new heavens and a new earth, in which a great deal more of the wisdom, power, and goodness of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ, will be clearly discerned, than we are able to discover in what we now see; for in these new heavens and earth are to be the habitation of such righteous persons only as do righteousness, and are free from the power and pollution of sin; all the wicked shall be turned into hell; those only who are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, and sanctified by the Holy Ghost, shall be admitted to dwell in this holy place.

II. The ground and foundation of this expectation and hope,—the promise of God. To look for anything God has not promised, is presumption; but if our expectations are according to the promise, both as to the things we look for, and the time and way of their being brought about, we cannot meet with a disappointment; for He is faithful, who has promised. See, therefore, that you raise and regulate your expectations of all the great things that are to come, according to the Word of God; and as to the new heaven and new earth, look for them as God has allowed and directed, by the passages we have in this portion of Scripture now before you, and in Isa. 65:17. 66:22. to which the apostle may be thought to allude.

As in v. 11. he exhorts to holiness, from the consideration that the heavens and the earth shall be dissolved, so in v. 14. he resumes his exhortation, from the consideration that they shall be again renewed; 'and see to it,' says he, 1. 'That you be found of Him in peace, in a state of peace and reconciliation with God through Christ, in whom alone God is reconciling the world to Himself. They whose sins are pardoned, and their peace made with God, are the only safe and happy people. 2. That ye be found of Christ without spot, and blameless; we must not only take heed of all spots which are not the spots of God's children, but we must be pressing toward spotless purity, absolute perfection. Christians must be perfecting holiness, that they may be not only blameless before men, but also in the sight of God; and all this deserves and needs the greatest diligence; he who does this work negligently, can never do it successfully. And, Remember there is a curse denounced against him who does the work of the Lord negligently, Marg. Jer. 48:10.

PRACT. OBS. V. 9—13. The Lord, in reality, makes no delays; however his dispensations may appear to our unbelief and scanty knowledge; yet 'his counsel shall stand,' and that 'great day of the Lord shall come,' even as surely as the deluge came, and equally unexpected by unbelievers. Mat. 24:36—41.—What will then be the surprise, the terror and anguish of proud scoffers, infidels, and all ungodly and worldly men! Here imagination itself is baffled; description would be vain, and we can only apply the inconceivable subject to practical purposes.

day of God; 'hastening' to have all ready to meet Him with comfort, and even longing for the solemn catastrophe which would perfect their felicity? Luke 21:25—28. Though it was in itself so terrible to think of, 'the heavens being on fire and dissolved, and the elements melting with heat;' (Marg. Ref. c—p.) yet the Gospel suggested such consolation, and inspired such hopes, that believers had no reason for terror or uneasiness.—In some scriptures, 'new heavens and a new earth,' seem figuratively to describe the most prosperous and peaceful days of the church on earth; Is. 65:17—19. 66:19—23. Heb. 12:26—29. yet here the state of the righteous, after the judgment, and dissolution of this world, are evidently intended; but what is meant, in various particulars, the fulfilment alone can fully explain. (10.) 'Day of the Lord, here, is undoubtedly the day of judgment, which will come on men as unexpectedly as a thief in the night.' Bloomf.—And truly, compare v. 7. and what an idea does it give of the introduction of that day! Even to the pious, whose perfect love shall cast out fear, yet with what sublimity and grandeur not only, but with what solemnity also, and awe, and moral glory, will that day come, when, with the same word of power by which the world was at first created, even with the same, and as suddenly, God shall change the relation of the elements, and cause the earth and the works that are therein to be hurried up!—That the earth contains the elements of its own dissolution, or transformation, is exceedingly evident. What but evidence of this do we see in its often returning earthquakes, and in its numerous now active and now sleeping volcanoes? Many of the islands of the sea are with good reason supposed to be of volcanic origin. And who can contemplate the great crater of Kirauea on the island of Hawaii, as described by our missionaries, in their Journal of their tour round that island, and not be deeply impressed with the conviction, that there is within the bowels of the earth a latent power, which, when God shall give it commission, shall be abundantly adequate to the production of all the effects which are here spoken of by the apostle? How well it becomes us to make the practical application of the thought which we find in the following verse: *Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness! Rev. 6:15—17. 20:11—15. 'Seeing all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness!' Surely our chief business is to prepare for this great catastrophe, by daily expecting and 'hastening to' the coming of the day of God, that we may possess a triumphant hope of lifting up our heads with joy, when the heavens and the earth shall form one immense conflagration, and when no refuge will remain to the wicked from the intolerable wrath, the everlasting fire, of their offended Judge. V. 14—16. The fourth and fifth verses of the second ch. of the Epistle to the Romans, are generally supposed here (15) to be intended, Note, Rom. 2:4—6. but it is not obvious, in what sense these could be said to be written to those whom Peter addressed. They, therefore, who maintain, that he wrote to the Jewish converts exclusively, point out some passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to which they think he alluded. Heb. 9:27, 28. 10:36, 37. Yet that epistle was directly addressed to the churches in Judea, and not to the Jewish converts in Asia; so that this does not much aid their supposition. But, indeed, the apostolical epistles, though written to some particular churches, or description of Christians, were evidently intended for general instruction; and as Peter had read the epistles of Paul when he wrote this; so they, to whom he wrote, had probably done the same, even in respect of those which were addressed to other churches.—The false teachers, whom Peter opposed, seem to have grounded their 'damnable heresies,' 2:1—3. on a misinterpretation of some passages in Paul's epistles, which might appear to some persons contrary to Peter's exhortations; so that the general tenor of the epistles to some of the Asiatic churches, or of that to the Hebrews, rather than detached expressions, seems to have been meant; for certainly, when properly understood, they are as exhortatory and practical as Peter's. Indeed, the apostle next observed, that this was the case in all the epistles of his beloved brother Paul; (as those to the Romans, the Corinthians, the churches of Macedonia, and to Timothy and Titus, as well as those to Ephesus, and Colosse, and the Hebrews;) for, in them all, he spoke of the coming of Christ, and the pre-

16 As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness.

w Ro. 8:19. 1 Co. 15. 2 Th. 1:5-10. y 2 Ti. 4:13.

Now, that you may be diligent, account the long-suffering of our Lord to be salvation. Think not this is to give more time to make provision for your lusts, to gratify them; no, it is so much space to repent, and work out your salvation. Learn, then, to make a right use of the patience of our Lord, who does, as yet, delay his coming. Follow after peace and holiness, or else his coming will be dreadful to you. And inasmuch as it is difficult to prevent men's abuse of God's patience, and engage them in the right improvement thereof, our apostle quotes Paul as directing men to make the same good use of the divine forbearance, that in the mouth, or from the pen, of two apostles the truth might be confirmed. And we may here observe with what esteem and affection he speaks of him! What an honorable mention does this apostle of the circumcision make of that very man who had openly, before all, reproved him, as not walking uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel! Though many seducing teachers denied Paul's apostleship, yet Peter owns him to be an apostle.

PRACT. OBS. V. 14-18. In the firm belief of the great and eternal realities, set before us in this ch., let us 'give diligence to be found of Christ at his coming, in peace, without spot and blameless.' Let sinners 'seek Him while He may be found, and call on Him while He is near;' that they may have the privilege of blessing Him to eternity, for sparing them when others were cut off in their sins.—We should also avail ourselves of the apostle's caution, whilst we read the epistles of Paul, and other difficult parts of the Holy Scriptures. Most evident comparison to be made for it, with warnings and admonitions to different descriptions of persons. But this perversion of Paul's writings (which Peter evidently here speaks of as a part of the sacred Scriptures), must not be charged on the epistles themselves, but on those who thus perverted them, contrary to their real meaning and tendency; for they thus 'wrested the other Scriptures also,' both the books of the Old Test., and as many of the New Test. as were then extant, and allowed to be of Divine authority. Proud, carnal, ambitious, covetous, or licentious men could wrest some things, in any of them, to a seeming agreement with their pernicious doctrines, and so pervert them to their own destruction, in the same manner, as they made a fatal use of the mysterious subjects on which Paul discoursed. It was, therefore, proper to warn and instruct men to read them with humility, and a teachable spirit; and not to perplex themselves with 'hard things,' till they were established in such as were more plain. 1 Cor. 3:1-3. Heb. 5:11-14.—This, however, is no reason why either Paul's epistles, or any part of the other scriptures, should be laid aside, or put out of sight; for men, left to themselves, pervert every good gift of God, and the corruption of the best things becomes the worst.—The persons, to whom Peter's epistles were written, were for the most part Paul's converts.—'Of this vice,' (wresting the Scriptures,) 'they are most commonly guilty, who, from the pride of understanding, will receive nothing but what they can explain. Whereas the humble and teachable receive the declarations of revelation, according to their plain, grammatical, unconstrained meaning, which it is their only care to attain, by reading the Scriptures frequently, and with attention.' Mackn. He should have added, and with constant, fervent prayer, for the promised teaching and guidance of the Holy Spirit.—Wrest.] Here only. To torture, put on the rack. From streblē, an instrument of torture. Demosth.—Men, when put to torture, speak things contrary to their real meaning. Sc.

(15.) Written unto you.] Probably all the epistles, though addressed to particular churches, were meant for general circulation. Ed.

(16.) Wrest.] 'The expression plainly implies violence done by these bad men to passages of Scripture, to make them speak an unnatural sense to answer their own ends, as often in theological controversies.' Doddr.

He calls him beloved; and they being both alike commissioned, and both united in the same service of the same Lord, it would have been very unseemly if they had not been united in affection to one another. He mentions Paul as one who had an uncommon measure of wisdom given unto him. He was a person of eminent knowledge in the mysteries of the Gospel, and did neither in that nor any other qualification come behind any of all the other apostles. How desirable, that those who preach the same Gospel, should treat one another according to the pattern Peter here sets them! Here observe, also, (1.) The excellent wisdom that was in Paul, is said to be given him. The understanding and knowledge that qualify men to preach the Gospel, are the gift of God. (2.) The apostle imparts to men according as he had received from God. Acts 20:27. (3.) The epistles which were written by the apostle of the Gentiles, and directed to those Gentiles who believed in Christ, are designed for the instruction and edification of those who from among the Jews were brought to believe in Christ; for it is generally thought, that what is here alluded to, is contained in the epistle to the Romans, ch. 2:4. though in all his epistles there are some things that refer to one or other of the subjects treated of in this and the foregoing ch.; and it cannot seem strange, that those who were pursuing the same general design, should, in their epistles, insist on the same things. But Peter proceeds to tell us, that in these things which are to be met with in Paul's epistles, there are some things hard to be understood; such are prophecies, mysterious doctrines, and the things of the Spirit of God, mentioned 1 Cor. 2:14. And here the unlearned and unstable make wretched work; for those who are not well instructed and well established in the truth, are in great danger of perverting the Word of God; but where there is a divine power to establish as well as to instruct men in divine truth, persons are effectually secured from falling into errors; and how great a blessing this is, we learn by observing what is the pernicious consequence of the errors that ignorant and unstable men fall into,—even their own destruction. Errors, in particular concerning the holiness and justice of God, are the utter ruin of multitudes of men. Let us therefore earnestly pray for the Spirit of God to instruct us in the truth, that we may know it as it is in Jesus, and have our hearts established with grace, that we may stand firm and unshaken, even in the most stormy times, when others are tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine.

In v. 17. the apostle gives them a word of caution, where he intimates, that the knowledge we have of these things should make us very wary and watchful, inasmuch as there is a twofold danger: 1. Of being turned away from the truth. The unlearned and unstable, and they are very numerous, do generally wrest the Scripture. Few attain to the knowledge and acknowledgment of doctrinal Christianity; and fewer find, so as to keep in the way of, practical godliness, which is the narrow way, that alone leadeth unto life. There must be a great deal of self-denial, and suspicion of ourselves, and submitting to the authority of Christ Jesus our great Prophet, before we can heartily receive all the truths of the Gospel, and therefore we are in great danger of rejecting the truth. 2. Of being turned into the path of destruction.

Now that we may the better avoid being led away, the apostle, v. 18. directs us what to do. We must grow in grace. He had, in the beginning of the epistle, exhorted us to add one grace to another; here he advises us to grow in all grace, in faith, virtue, knowledge. By how much the stronger grace is in us, by so much the more steadfast shall we be in the truth. We must grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the knowledge of Christ the apostle Paul reached after, and desired to attain to, Phil. 3:10. Such a knowledge of Christ as conforms us more to Him, and endears Him more to us, must needs be of great use to us, to preserve us from falling off in times of general apostasy; and they who experience this effect of the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, will, on receiving such grace from Him, give thanks and praise to Him, and join with our apostle in saying, To Him be glory, both now and for ever. Amen.

it is, that untaught, unteachable, self-sufficient, 'unstable,' and unconverted men, 'wrest many things' of this kind 'to their own destruction.' Yet these parts of the sacred Word have a most important use, in the system of divine truth, and if men will pervert them, they do it at their peril. Taking things in their proper order, and proceeding with humility, caution, prayer, and practice, we shall be prepared to derive benefit from the deepest and most mysterious truths, and to perceive their consistency with the rest of divine revelation. SCOTT.

V. 17, 18. The wicked.] 2:7.—'One who can be restrained by no law, but determines, that all things are lawful to him.' Leigh.—(18) For ever.] To the day of eternity; one endless day, without night.—'The difficulty' (16) 'is said to affect, chiefly, unteachable, and unsteady men, whose prejudices dispose them for admitting the truth, or whose levity prevents their due solicitude to retain it; but not persons of humble and teachable minds, resolute in pursuing and maintaining the truth. And the remedy prescribed, is, not to lay aside the Scriptures' (or the parts specially meant), on account of their obscurity, as some would persuade us to do, but a concern to "grow in grace." Doddr. SCOTT.

(18.) Grace.] This word is of frequent occurrence. In the great concern of man's salvation no word has a richer meaning. But while the general idea of the term is everywhere retained, there are several shades of difference in the signification, as used in different passages. Its primary and more usual sense is, the favor of God to sinners. "By grace ye are saved."—But as the Gospel is the channel through which this fountain pours forth its exuberant streams, it is called not only the Gospel of the grace of God, but grace itself.—And as the Gospel is rendered effectual only by the aids of the Holy Spirit, therefore his influences have received the name of grace.—But in this text "grace" has a still different meaning. Christians are exhorted "to grow in grace," which would not be practicable in any of the senses of the word already given. By "grace," here, we must understand, the principle of new life, implanted in regeneration, a sense of the word much in use among us, but rather unusual in the Scriptures. When the apostle exhorts Christians to grow in grace, it is the same as if he had said, increase in holiness, or advance in piety. And it would not be easy to select a subject of greater importance to all professors of religion. If comfort and usefulness here, and the degree of our felicity and glory in heaven, will be proportioned to our growth in grace, then the subject possesses an intrinsic importance, which should command the attention and deeply interest the feelings of all. ALEXANDER.—'This doxology belongs with undeniable clearness to the Lord Jesus Christ. It is an act of devotion, ascribing to the Savior that honor, which reason and scripture-example show to be properly attributed only to the Divine Majesty.' J. P. SURRA.

OF THE
FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. T. Reynolds.)

THOUGH the continued tradition of the church attests, that this epistle came from the apostle John, yet other evidence will confirm the certainty of that tradition. It should seem, the penman was one of the apostolical college, by the sensible, palpable assurance he had of the truth of the Mediator's Person in his human nature, v. 1. He here notices the evidence the Lord gave Thomas of his resurrection, recorded by John. And he must have been one of the disciples present, when the Lord came, on the same day in which He arose from the dead, and showed them his hands and his side, John 20:20. But, that we may be assured which apostle this was, there is scarcely a critic or competent judge of diction, or style of argument and spirit, but will adjudge this epistle to the writer of that gospel that bears the name of the apostle John. They wonderfully agree in the titles and characters of the Redeemer; (the Word, the Life, the Light; his name was the Word of God. Compare 1 John 1:1. and ch. 5:7. with John 1:1. and Rev. 19:13.) in the commendation of God's love to us, (1 John 3:1. and ch. 4:9. John 3:16.) in speaking of our regeneration, or being born of God; (1 Epist. 3:9. ch. 4:7. and ch. 5:1. John 3:5, 6.) and in the allusion to, or application of, that passage in that gospel, which alone relates the issuing of water and blood out of the Redeemer's opened side, ch. 5:6. Thus the epistle plainly appears to flow from the same pen that gospel did. Now I know not that the text, or the intrinsic history of any of the gospels, gives us such assurance of its writer or penman, as that ascribed to John plainly does; for, who is this disciple, ch. 21:24. but he concerning whom Peter asked, What shall this man do? And concerning whom the Lord answered, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? v. 22. And who, in v. 20. is described by these three characters; 1. That he is the disciple whom Jesus loved; the Lord's peculiar friend. 2. That he also leaned on his breast at supper. 3. That he said unto him, Lord, who is he that betrayeth Thee? As sure, then, as that disciple was John, so sure is it that the gospel and epistle came from the beloved John.

It is styled general, as being not inscribed to any particular church; it is, as a circular letter, sent to divers churches, (some say of Parthia,) to confirm their steadfast adherence to the Lord Christ, and the sacred doctrine concerning his Person and office, against seducers; and to instigate them to adorn that doctrine by love to God and man; and particularly to each other, as being descended from God, united by the same Head, and travelling toward the same eternal life. HENRY.

On the similarity of sentiment and expression between this epistle and St. John's gospel,* and in full confirmation that he was the writer, though his name is not prefixed to it, see Notes, Mat. 4:18—22. 10:1—4. 17:1, 2. 20:20—23. 26:30—35. Mark 5:35—43, v. 37. 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—56. John 13:18—30. 19:25—27. 20:1—10. 21:18—23. Acts 3:1—11. 4:13—22. Gal. 2:6—10.—From two expressions in ch. 2; 'Because ye have known Him that is from the beginning;' and 'It is the last time;' several learned moderns have concluded, that it was written just before the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the Jewish converts exclusively; but it has been the more general opinion, that it was written much later than that event, and not long before the book of Revelation. (Note, Rev. 6:1, 2.) The texts on which the former opinion is grounded, do not seem to require, or even admit of that interpretation, which these learned men put upon them, (Note, 2:18, 19.) and there is not the least intimation of any distinction between Jewish and Gentile converts, in the whole epistle. So that the term, GENERAL, or CATHOLIC, strictly and properly belongs to it. For it appears, to me at least, the more probable opinion, that it was written towards the close of the apostle's life, after the death of all the other apostles; and that it was intended as a circular letter, or a general address, to all the Christian churches, which was known to come from the only surviving apostle. The authoritative yet affectionate manner, in which the writer addresses his dear children, favors this conclusion; (Note, 2:1, 2.) and the heretics, or antichrists, whom he evidently intended to oppose, came forward much more openly, at this time, than at an earlier period. It is generally allowed, that they who denied the real Deity of Christ; they who explained away his proper humanity, and the reality of his sufferings and death, as an atoning sacrifice, and those who taught their followers, that believers, being 'saved by grace,' were not required to obey the commandments of God, were the principal antichrists. These were branched out into a variety of sub-divisions called by different names, such as Ebionites, Cerinthians, Docetæ, or Phantasiastæ, Gnostics, Nicolaitans, &c. on which ecclesiastical writers have enlarged abundantly. The apostle, however, did not name any of them, and his language was suited to refute and expose many other heretical sentiments, both of ancient and modern times; and in that view the epistle is highly interesting to us. He expatiates also on the love of God to us, as shown in the salvation of his Son; and, again and again, most pathetically enforces on believers love to each other, as shown in its practical effects, by almost every motive imaginable. This, I suppose, has given occasion to the general opinion of his being himself of a most loving disposition, even more so than the other apostles. Our Lord, however, called him, and James his brother, Boanerges; (Note, Mark 3:13—19.) and the faithful, plain, and even sharp manner, in which he speaks of hypocrites and false teachers, sufficiently illustrates the reason for which that name was given.—He also lays down various marks and evidences, by which Christians might be distinguished, both by themselves and others, from self-deceivers and hypocrites.†

† His leading design is, "to demonstrate the vanity of faith, separate from morality, to soothe and refine the warm and over-zealous tempers of the Christians to whom he writes, into that amiable charity and love he himself was so eminent and illustrious for, and to guard and arm them against the snares and efforts of antichrist, the grand apostate, and seducer of the Christian church; and all endued with his spirit." DODDR.

'Sec. 1. Asserts the true Divinity and humanity of Christ, in opposition to the false teachers, and urges the union of faith and holiness of life, as necessary to enable Christians to enjoy communion with God, ch. 1:1—7. Sec. 2. Shows that all have sinned, and explains the doctrine of Christ's propitiation, ch. 1:3—2:2. whence the apostle illustrates the marks of true faith, obeying the commandments, and sincere love of the brethren, and shows that the love of the world is inconsistent with the love of God, ch. 2:3—17. Sec. 3. Asserts Jesus to be the same person with Christ, in opposition to the false teachers who denied it, 13—29. Sec. 4. On the privileges of true believers, their happiness and duties, and the marks by which they are known to be the sons of God, ch. 3. Sec. 5. A mark to know one sort of antichrist,—the not confessing that Christ has come in the flesh, ch. 4:1—3. Also marks for distinguishing false Christians, as, love of the world, v. 4—6. want of brotherly love, v. 7—12. denying Christ to be the Son of God, v. 13—15. and a recommendation of brotherly love, from the consideration of the love of God in giving his Son for sinners, v. 16—21. Sec. 6. Shows the connexion between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments, and victory over the world, and that Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God, able to save us, and to hear the prayers we make for ourselves and others, ch. 5:1—16. The conclusion, in a summary of the whole, shows that a sinful life is inconsistent with true Christianity; asserts the divinity of Christ; and cautions believers against idolatry, v. 17—21. This epistle, especially, contains marks by which Christians may soberly examine themselves, whether they be in the faith.' T. H. HORNE.

'J. P. Smith shows, that the commencing paragraph of this epistle, recognises the pre-existent state, and the divine nature of the Messiah, coinciding with the declarations of the gospel by the same apostle. He also points out other expressions in these epistles [John's], referring to a divine nature in the Person of the Messiah. 1. Obedience to his commands as those of the One Supreme Lawgiver, ch. 2:3—6. 3:22. 5:2, 3. 2. Expressions occur which strongly imply that the Savior's existence among men, was an act of condescension from a previous state, ch. 4:2. 3:8. 4:9, 10:14. ep. 7. 3. That Christ and the Father are ONE, in nature, perfections, and honor, 2:22, 23. 4. That our holy and happy union with the True One, is, in fact, our union, by the living principle of religion, with the Savior Himself, 5:19, 20.'

'The uniform tone of reverential awe, in which the Person of our blessed Redeemer is alluded to, throughout the apostolical epistles, is a circumstance which those who are disposed to object to the doctrine of his divine nature, should seriously consider. The intimacy of friendship to which the disciples of our Lord were admitted, appears not, for a moment, to have trenched upon their reverential adoration of Him. Above all, we find that sentiment most strongly marked in the writings of the beloved apostle John. The unequivocal assertions of our blessed Savior's divinity, contained in his epistles and his gospel, afford some of the strongest scriptural proofs of that important doctrine. But that such an impression should take complete hold of a mind, which had been permitted to trace the object of its reverence, through the humble detail of private life [to his crucifixion], can be accounted for only, from the evidence, confirmatory of that impression, having been of too decided a character to be shaken by even that critical and perilous act. Certain it is, no misgivings, or interventions of doubt on this subject, ever seem for one instant to be suggested to that apostle's mind.' SHUTTLEWORTH.

CHAP. I.

1 He describeth the Person of Christ, in whom we have eternal life, by a communion with God: 5 to which we must adjoin holiness of life, to testify the truth of that our communion and profession of faith, as also to assure us of the forgiveness of our sins by Christ's death.

THAT which was from the <sup>a</sup>beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen <sup>b</sup>with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have <sup>c</sup>handled, of the Word of life;

2 (For the Life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal <sup>d</sup>Life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;)

3 That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us:

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. The apostle omits his name and character, either out of humility, or as willing the Christian reader should be swayed by the light and weight of the things written, rather than by the name that might recommend them. And so he begins,

1. With an account or character of the Mediator's Person. He is the great Subject of the Gospel; the Foundation and Object of our faith and hope. He should be well known; and He is represented here, (1.) As the Word of Life, v. 1. It is intimate, He is the Word of some Person; that is, of God the Father. He is the Word of God, so He is intimated to issue from the Father, as truly (though not in the same manner) as a word from a speaker. But He is not a mere vocal word, but a vital one; the Word of Life; the living Word; and thereupon, (2.) As eternal Life. His duration shows his excellency. He was from eternity; and so is, in scripture-account, necessary, essential, uncreated life. That the apostle speaks of his eternity, as from everlasting, seems evident, in that he speaks of Him as He was in and from the beginning, when with the Father, before his manifestation to us, yea, before the making of all things that were made, as John 1:2, 3. So that He is the eternal, vital, intellectual Word of the eternal, living Father. (3.) As life manifested, v. 2. manifested in the flesh; manifested to us. Here were condescension and kindness indeed, that eternal Life (a Person of eternal, essential life) should come to visit mortals, and to procure eternal life for them, and then confer it on them!

2. With the evidence and convictive assurances the apostle and his brethren had of the Mediator's presence and converse in the world, there were sufficient demonstrations of the reality of his abode here, and of the excellency and dignity of his Person in the way of his manifestation. The Life was clothed with flesh; and, as such, gave sensible proof of its existence and transactions here. The Divine Life, or Word incarnate, presented and evinced itself to the very senses of the apostles. As, (1.) To their ears, v. 1, 3. The apostles not only heard of Him, but heard Him Himself. And it was meet, they who were to be his representatives and imitators to the world, should be personally acquainted with his ministrations. (2.) To their eyes, v. 1—3. The Word would become visible; not only be heard, but be seen; seen publicly, privately, at distance and at nearest approach; which may be intimated in the expression, with our eyes; with all the use and exercise we could make of our eyes. We saw Him in his life and ministry; in his transfiguration on the mount, hanging, bleeding, dying and dead, on the cross; and after his return from the grave and resurrection from the dead. His apostles must be eyewitnesses as well as earwitnesses of Him, Acts 1:21, 22. And we were eyewitnesses of his majesty, 2 Pet. 1:16. (3.) To their internal sense; to the eyes of their mind; for so (possibly) may the next clause be interpreted, which we have looked upon, the same with what the apostle says in his Gospel, ch. 1:14. And we beheld his glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father. The word is not applied to the immediate object of the eye, but that was rationally collected from what they saw. The senses are to be the informers of the mind. (4.) To their hands and sense of feeling; And our hands have handled, touched, and felt, of the Word of Life. This, surely, refers to the full conviction our Lord afforded his apostles of the truth, reality, solidity, and organization of his body, after his resurrection from the dead; alluding, probably, to the case of Thomas in particular. The invisible Life and Word was no despiser of the testimony of sense. Sense, in its place and sphere, is a mean God has appointed, and the Lord Christ has employed, for our information. That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, v. 3. The apostles could not be deceived in such long and various exercise of their sense. The rejection of the Christian revelation is at last resolved into the rejection of sense itself; He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed them not who had seen Him after He was risen, Mark 16:14.

3. With a solemn assertion and attestation of these grounds and evidences of the Christian truth and doctrine, the apostles publish these assurances for our satisfaction, v. 2. That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, v. 3. It became the apostles to open to the disciples the evidence by which they were led. Wisdom and integrity obliged them to demonstrate, that it was not either private fancy, or a cunningly devised fable, that they presented to the world. Evident truth would open their mouths, and force a public profession, Acts 4:20. It concerned the disciples to be well assured of the truth of the institution they had embraced. They should see the evidences of their holy religion. It fears not the light, nor the most judicious examination. It is able to afford rational conviction, and solid persuasion of mind and conscience, Col. 2:1, 2.

4. With the reason of the apostle's exhibiting and asserting this summary of sacred faith, and this breviate of evidence attending it. This reason is twofold:

(1.) That the believers of it may be advanced to the same happiness with them,

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Note, John 1:1—3.) The apostle began this epistle, in the same abrupt manner as he did his gospel, and without any particular address or salutation; and he wrote as a witness or a messenger, in a sententious, declaratory style, and not in an argumentative manner.—If we then understand him to mean Christ, as the Son of God, (and it does not appear what else could be meant,) 'from the beginning,' must denote from eternity; for if the creation and time were coeval, 'That which was from the beginning,' when 'God created the heavens and the earth,' must have been eternal. Gen. 1:1. Prov. 8:22—30. Indeed the same expression, in some places, may signify the first opening of the dispensation of the Gospel; (2:7, 8.) yet this sense does not appear at all consistent with the context in this place. 2 Thess. 2:13, 14. The obvious meaning, however, is this; that essential Good, which 'was from the beginning with God, and was God,' by whom all things were created, 'had become flesh,' to dwell on earth among men, and the apostle and his brethren, especially the other apostles, had heard Him deliver his doctrine, and publish his salvation; they had seen Him with their eyes, while they 'beheld his glory, as of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.' (Note, John 1:14.) They had not only viewed Him with a transient glance, but had accompanied Him, and contemplated Him, both in respect of the wisdom and holiness of his character, the power of his miracles, and his abundant love and mercy, during some years; till they saw Him expire on the cross, and afterwards risen from the dead; and 'their hands had handled Him,' while He condescended to give them this full proof of his resurrection, that they might witness it to others. Luke 24:35—43. John 20:19—29. This divine Person, 'the Word of life,' 'the Word of God,' became incarnate, that He might be 'the Life of men,' and this 'great mystery of godliness' the apostle declared to mankind. (Notes, 5:11, 12, 20, 21. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Indeed, he wrote to assure his Christian brethren throughout the world, yea, and all future ages, of the reality of Christ's human nature, which some in those days denied, and that of his divine nature, which his resurrection fully demonstrated. Rom. 1:1—4. For 'the Life,' the Source and Author of life, natural, spiritual, and eternal, who possessed 'life in Himself,' necessarily and unchangeably, and who might therefore be called 'the Life;' life being essential to Him, and derived from Him to all creatures; even He had been 'manifested in the flesh,' to be the Life of fallen men. (Notes, John 1:4—9. 8:12. 11:20—27. 14:4—6.) And when 'the Son of God,' the essential Life of all creatures, was thus manifested, the apostles were peculiarly favored, in being chosen to be his attendants, and to see Him, during his ministry, at his death, after his resurrection, and at his ascension; that they might bear witness to others of these things, and show unto them 'that eternal Life,' which had always subsisted with the Father, as 'One with Him,' and yet distinct from Him, One in the undivided essence of the Godhead, but possessing distinct personality, as 'the Only-begotten of the Father,' by an eternal and incomprehensible generation; John 1:14, 18. 3:16. and who 'in the fulness of time' was manifested, as the Author and Giver of eternal life to sinners, through the redemption of his blood, and by the communication of his new-creating Spirit. The apostles did not, therefore, proceed on report, or insufficient proof, when they went to the nations, and encountered all hardships, dangers, and persecutions, in preaching the Gospel to them. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:16—18.) But they declared the things concerning the Person, doctrine, and salvation of Christ, which they had seen and heard, and had the most abundant opportunity of learning from his own lips; and of which they had been assured by his miracles, resurrection, and ascension. (1) That which.] Ho.—The second Person in the sacred Trinity is intended. Thus He says, 'I and the Father are one;' Hen, not heis. (Note, John 10:26—31, v. 30.) And thus the Evangelist, 'That holy thing which shall be born of thee.' Luke 1:35. SCOTT.

(1—3.) J. P. Smith shows, that the expression, "from the beginning," can be attached only to the first term in the series, and submits the following as an attempt at a very close version: "With respect to the Word of Life, (for indeed the Life has been manifested, and we have seen [it] and bear witness [to it], and we announce to you that eternal Life which was with the Father, and has been manifested to us,) we announce to you Him who was from the beginning, whom we have heard, whom we have with our eyes beheld, whom we have gazed upon, and our hands have touched; in order that ye also may have a communion [of blessings] with us; and indeed ours [is] the communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." HENRY, abr.—From the beginning.] From the first pronouncement of the Gospel. Bp. Bull and Carpz. and others, understand it of the beginning of the world, as 3:8. but this though true in one sense, cannot, on account of the context, be considered the truth here meant. BL.—V. 2. 'The heresy most conspicuous in the age of the apostles, was that which denied, not the Divine, but the human nature of the Redeemer. And so far from being called upon to prove Him to be very God, a point universally acknowledged, the great difficulty seems to have been, to convince the first polluters of the Christian faith, that He was also, really and actually, very man. It was not until after the lapse of time had subdued, by distance, the astounding effect produced by his miraculous career on earth, that human audacity dared to speak of Him as a merely mortal preacher, or even as the most glorious of created beings.' SHUTTLEWORTH, in Henry, abr.—'One credible person steadily bearing testimony to the power of divine grace, in his own conversion, will have a greater effect in converting others, than the most learned and eloquent declaration of the same truth from a thousand unconverted preachers.' ADAMS.

V. 3, 4. They shared the special love and favor of God the Father; all his perfections ensured their happiness; they were made 'partakers of his holiness,' and even 'of a divine nature;' and they had the assured and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

4 And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full.

5 This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth:

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

v. 3. The apostle means not personal fellowship or consociation in the same church-administrations, but such as is consistent with personal distance from each other. It is communion with heaven, and in blessings that come from thence, and tend thither; there is a fellowship or communion that runs through the whole church of God. There may be some personal distinctions and peculiarities, but there is a communion belonging to all saints, from the highest apostle to the lowest believer. Now that believers may be ambitious of this communion, that they may be instigated to retain and hold fast the faith that is the mean of such communion, that the apostles also may manifest their love to the disciples in assisting them to the same communion with themselves, they indicate what it is, and where it is; And truly our fellowship is with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ. 2 Jn. v. 3. We have now such supernatural conversation with God and the Lord Christ, as is an earnest and foretaste of our everlasting abode with them, and enjoyment of them, in the heavenly glory. See whither the Gospel revelation tends,—to advance us far above sin and earth, and to carry us to blessed communion with the Father and the Son. See for what end the eternal Life was made flesh,—that He might advance us to eternal life, in communion with the Father and Himself. See how far they live beneath the dignity, use, and end of the Christian faith and institution, who have not spiritual, blessed communion with the Father and the Son Jesus Christ.

(2.) That believers may be enlarged and advanced in holy joy, v. 4. The gospel-dispensation is not properly a dispensation of fear, sorrow, and dread, but of peace and joy. It should be joy to us, that the eternal Son should come to seek and save us; that He has made a full atonement for our sins; that He has conquered sin and death and hell; that He lives, as our Intercessor and Advocate with the Father; and that He will come again, to perfect and glorify his persevering believers. Believers should rejoice in their happy relation to the Father, and to the Son, as being members of his beloved body, and co-heirs with Himself; in the pardon of their sins, in the sanctification of their natures, in the adoption of their persons, in the prospect of grace and glory that will be revealed at the return of their Lord and Head from heaven. Were they confirmed in their holy faith, how would they rejoice! The disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost, Acts 13:52.

V. 5—7. The apostle, having declared the truth and dignity of the Author of the Gospel, brings a message from Him; from which a just conclusion is to be drawn for the consideration and conviction of professors of religion.

1. The message, v. 5. Christ being the principal Person spoken of in the preceding context, is the next antecedent also to whom the article him can relate. The wisdom and present dispensation of the Lord Jesus is, to send his messages to us by persons like ourselves; and it was the ambition of the apostles, faithfully to deliver the messages they had received. The message relates to the nature of God, whom we are to serve, and with whom we should covet all indulged communion. That God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all, v. 5. It asserts the excellency of the divine nature. He is all that beauty and perfection that can be represented to us by light; self-active, uncompounded spirituality, purity, wisdom, holiness, and glory; there is no defect or imperfection, nothing contrary to absolute excellency, no mutability or capacity of any decay in Him; In Him is no darkness at all,

v. 5. Or it may more immediately relate to what is usually called the moral perfection of the divine nature; what we are to imitate, or what is more directly to influence us in our gospel-work. And so it will comprehend the holiness of God, the absolute purity of his nature and will; his penetrative knowledge, (particularly of hearts,) his jealousy and justice, which burn as a most bright and vehement flame. Thus it is the prerogative of the Christian revelation, to bring us the most noble, the most august, and agreeable account of the blessed God; such as is most suitable to the light of reason, and what is demonstrable thereby; most suitable to the magnificence of his works round about us, and to the nature and office of Him that is the Supreme. What more comprehensive or perfect conception of Him could be concluded in one word than in this, God is Light, and in Him is no darkness at all? Then,

2. A just conclusion to be drawn from this message; and that for the consideration and conviction of professors of religion. (1.) Of such professors as have no true fellowship with God; If we say we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. To walk, in Scripture, is to order and frame the course and actions of the moral life, that is, of the life so far as it is capable of subjection to the divine law. To walk in darkness, is to live and act according to such ignorance, error, and erroneous practice, as are contrary to the fundamental dictates of holy religion. Now, as to such, their practice gives their profession and pretences the lie. They belie God; for He holds no heavenly fellowship or intercourse with unholy souls. They belie themselves; for they have no such communications from God, nor accesses to Him. (2.) Of such as are near to God; But if we walk in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. As the blessed God is the eternal, boundless Light, and the Mediator is, from Him, the Light of the world; so the Christian institution is the great luminary that appears in our sphere, and shines here below. A conformity to this in spirit and practice, demonstrates fellowship or communion with God. They that so walk, show that they know God, that they have received of the Spirit of God, and hope and blessed earnestness of enjoying Him, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. Moreover, they had a free access to Him, as their Father, and, a sacred union having been formed between Him and their souls, through Jesus Christ, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, a most honorable and happy communion and intercourse was continually carried on between the glorious God and them; while they poured out their inmost souls before Him, made Him their Hope and Confidence, [centred their interests not in self,—but in Him,] aimed to do his will and manifest his glory, celebrated his praises, were his devoted worshippers, and sought their felicity in his favor and acceptance; while in return, He graciously heard their supplications, accepted their persons and services, communicated to them his holy consolations, showed them his will, supplied them with wisdom and strength suited to their wants, and took on Him the care of all their concerns.—This 'fellowship with the Father,' arose from their 'fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ.' This was no enthusiastic imagination, or hypocritical pretence, as many were disposed to represent it; nor was it an unsatisfactory or inefficacious transaction, as others might suppose, who did not deny its reality; but they had the happy experience of it in their souls; manifested the excellency of it in their lives, and shared with their brethren, in this sacred communion, such comforts and substantial satisfaction, as made them ample amends for all their losses, sufferings, and hardships. Being therefore assured, that this alone was sufficient to make men happy, and knowing the inexhaustible 'fulness of Christ,' and his inestimable salvation: they desired exceedingly, that their fellow-sinners would come and share their felicity; and, leaving the lying vanities of the world, or the empty forms and superstitions of false religion, would seek with them this 'fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.' The same principle induced the apostle John to write this epistle to the churches, that, rejecting the heretical doctrines of false teachers, 'having fellowship with Christ,' and with those who adhered to the apostle's doctrine, and avoiding whatever could interrupt their communion with God, their holy joy might be complete, and they might live in actual possession of those invaluable privileges, to which they were called by the Gospel.—The 'communion of the Holy Spirit' is not particularly mentioned, in this most interesting passage; because the communion of believers with the Father and the Son, and their loving communion with each other, are effected and maintained by the communication, and influences of the Holy Spirit, who is the immediate Author of their spiritual life, hope, love, joy, peace, and holy affections, the bond of union between Christ and his mystical body, and between every member of it and all the others; the great blessing communicated from the Father's love, and through the incarnation and mediation of the Son, and the Seal and pledge of all other blessings, in time and to eternity, and the preparation for them. As the Holy Spirit is, therefore, the great Agent in our 'communion with the Father and the Son,' it was not necessary, that communion with Him should be separately mentioned. 2 Cor. 13:11—14. (3) Fellowship.] Phil. 1:3—6.—The leading idea is participation; and communication, and reciprocal intercourse, and expressions of friendship, as resulting from it. Gen. 5:21—21.

V. 5—7. The substance of this declaration is, 'That God is Light,' pure, perfect intellect, an all-pervading, all-penetrating Spirit, essential knowledge, wisdom, holiness, love, and felicity; so that 'in Him is no darkness at all;' no ignorance, error, moral evil, or defect in felicity; and therefore none of these can be derived from Him. Jam. 1:13—18. As this is the nature of God, the doctrines and precepts, which come from Him, must be of the same kind; true religion may be distinguished from counterfeit by this criterion, and especially his spiritual worshippers, who really have communion with Him, may be known by their conformity to Him. (5) Light.] Notes, Ps. 36:5—9. 84:11, 12. Is. 60:15—22. Rev. 21:22—27. Light is the emblem of knowledge, holiness, and happiness,—darkness, of ignorance, error, wickedness, and misery. See Bates. DONDR.—'Darkness implies all imperfection, principally ignorance, sinfulness, and misery. Light is the purest, the most penetrating, the most useful, and the most diffusive of all God's creatures; it is therefore a very proper emblem of the purity, perfection, and goodness of the Divine nature. God is to human souls what the light is to the world.' DR. A. CLARKE.

CHAP. II.

1 He comforteth them against the sins of infirmity. 3 Rightly to know God is to keep his commandments, 9 to love our brethren, 15 and not to love the world. 18 We must beware of seducers: 20 from whose deceits the godly are safe, preserved by perseverance in faith, and holiness of life.

MY little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous:

that the divine impress or image is stamped on their souls. Then we have fellowship one with another; they with us, and we with them, and both with God, in his blessed or beatific communications to us. And this is one,—that his Son's blood, or death, is applied or imputed to us; The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. His blood applied to us discharges us from the guilt of all sin; and so far we stand righteous in his sight; and not only so, but his blood procures for us those sacred influences, by which sin is to be subdued more and more, till it is quite abolished, Gal. 3: 13, 14.

V. 8—10. The apostle, having supposed, that even they of this heavenly communion have yet their sin, proceeds here to justify that supposition; and this, by showing in two particulars the dreadful consequences

PRACT. OBS. Our most lively gratitude is due to God for that fully authenticated revelation, which He has given us concerning 'the Word of life.' But what words can express the praises of the love of God, in causing 'the life to be manifested,' even 'the eternal life, which was with the Father,' in order that we, justly condemned rebels, who were dead in sin, might live by Him! This appears the more admirable, when we consider the deep abasement, and the agonizing sufferings, to which this manifestation exposed the incarnate Word and 'Son of God;' nay, how his very humiliation has given occasion to the children of men to rob Him of his glory, to deny his Deity, and to speak of Him whom 'all angels worship,' as if He were altogether such an one as themselves!—Faithful and zealous ministers, though they have not 'seen and heard' 'the Lord of glory,' with their outward senses, may yet declare to men what they have known and experienced of his mercy, truth, and power; and as He became incarnate, that the chief of sinners, believing in Christ, 'might have fellowship with Him,' and share in the love of the Father through Him, for their everlasting felicity; so they are willing to labor and suffer, that their fellow-criminals may be brought to 'have fellowship with them,' in their most precious blessings. 2 Cor. 5:13—21. 6:1, 2.—This 'fellowship with the Father; and his Son Jesus Christ,' is 'the secret of the Lord,' which is peculiar to those who fear Him; and ungodly men must therefore treat it, as the

V. 8—10. While the apostle strenuously insisted on the necessity of an habitual holy walk, as the effect and evidence of the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of communion with Him; He guarded with as much care against self-righteous pride, as against an antinomian perversion of the Gospel. If any professed Christians, while they seemed to 'walk in the light,' should be so elated with a conceit of their own attainments, as to say, 'that they had no sin,' but were perfectly pure, and as holy in heart and life as the law of God required; they were certainly deceived in a most awful manner; nay, they virtually denied the truth of the whole Gospel, which everywhere speaks of men as sinners; so that the Word of God was not in them, by faith, or by the teaching of the Holy Spirit. 5:9, 10. Ps. 51:4. Rom. 3:3, 4.—In this latter verse, the apostle opposed such persons as totally denied their sinfulness, their need of mercy, or their desert of wrath, by whatever method they deceived themselves into a confidence that they had never sinned, or that they had, in some way, made amends for their offences, or could do it, and were not justly deserving of punishment. 'Have patience with me and I will pay thee all.' Mat. 18:26. But in the former, he showed the gross error of those who imagined, that, through the Gospel, they were so perfectly sanctified, as to have no spot or blemish of sin in them; the present tense, 'have no sin,' being used in the eighth verse, and the past, in the tenth, 'have not sinned.' Lev. 26:40—42. 1 Kings 8:33,34. Neh. 9:2, 3. Job 33:27—30. Ps. 51:3—6. P. O. Dan. 9. SCOTT.

of denying it. 1. If we say, We have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us, v. 8. We must beware of deceiving ourselves in denying or excusing our sins. The more we see them, the more we shall esteem and value the remedy. If we deny them, the truth is not in us; either the truth that is contrary to such denial; (we lie in denying our sin;) or, the truth of religion is not in us. The Christian religion is the religion of sinners; of such as have sinned, and in whom sin in some measure still dwells. 2. If we say, We have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and his Word is not in us, v. 10. The denial of our sin not only deceives ourselves, but reflects dishonor on God. It challenges his veracity. God has given his testimony to the continued sin and sinfulness of the world, by his providing a sufficient, effectual Sacrifice for sin, that will be needed in all ages; and to the continued sinfulness of believers themselves, by requiring them continually to confess their sins, and apply themselves by faith to the blood of that Sacrifice. Therefore, if we say either that we have not sinned, or do not yet sin, the Word of God is not in us, either in our minds, as to the acquaintance we should have with it, or in our hearts, as to the practical influence it should have upon us.

The apostle then instructs the believer in the way to the continued pardon of his sin. Here we have, 1. His duty in order thereto; If we confess our sins, v. 9. Penitent confession and acknowledgment of sin are the believer's business, and the means of his deliverance from his guilt. And 2. His encouragement thereto, and assurance of the happy issue. This is the veracity, righteousness, and clemency of God, to whom he makes such confession, v. 9. God is faithful to his covenant and Word, who has therein promised forgiveness to penitent, believing confessors. He is just to Himself and his glory, has provided such a Sacrifice, by which his righteousness is declared in the justification of sinners. He is just to his promise to his Son, that those who come through Him shall be forgiven on his account. Isa. 53:11. He is clement and gracious also, and so will forgive, to the contrite confessor, all his sins, cleanse him from the guilt of all unrighteousness, and in due time deliver him from the power and practice of it.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. These verses relate to the concluding subject of the foregoing ch., in which the apostle proceeds on the supposition of the real Christian's sin. And here he gives them both dissuasion and support.

1. Dissuasion. He would leave no room for sin, v. 1. See the familiar and affectionate compellation with which he introduces his admonition; My little children; children, as having perhaps been begotten by his Gospel; little children, as being much beneath him in age and experience. My little children; as being dear to him in the bonds of the Gospel. Certainly the Gospel most prevailed where and when such ministerial love most abounded.

2. Support and relief in case of sin. And (or but), if any man sin, any of us, or of our aforesaid communion, v. 1. Believers themselves have yet their sins. There is a great distinction between sinners in the world; some are converted, others unconverted. Believers, as they have had an atonement applied to them at their entrance into a state of pardon and justification, so they have an Advocate in heaven still to continue to them that state, and procure their continued pardon and forgiveness. The original name is sometimes given to the Holy Ghost; and then it is rendered, the Comforter; He acts within us, by teaching us to intercede for ourselves. But here is an Advocate without us, in heaven and with the Father. The proper office and business of an advocate is with the judge. The Judge with whom our Advocate pleads, is, the Father; his Father and ours. He who was our Judge in the legal court of the viodelusion of a heated imagination. 5:9, 10. Ps. 25:14. John 14:21—24. 2 Pet. 1:19. Rev. 2:17. No doubt there are both enthusiasts and hypocrites, who are deceived, or mean to deceive others; yet that is not worth counterfeiting, either by Satan or wicked men, which in itself is of no value or reality. There are then those, who are warranted to say, 'Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ,' and they all desire to bring others to partake of the same blessedness.—It is the grand interest, as well as the duty of all men, to regard 'the message' sent to us by those, who 'declare that God is Light, and that in Him is no darkness at all;' for as his perfect felicity is inseparable from his perfect holiness, so our happiness must be proportioned to our sanctification. . . . No encouragement is therefore given in Scripture to any of those, 'who say they have not sinned,' or that they have no longer any sin to repent of, to be pardoned, or to be cleansed away. Let us then learn to plead guilty before God, and be humbly willing to know the worst of our case; relying wholly on his mercy and truth, through the righteousness of Christ, for a full and free forgiveness, let us trust in Him as 'a just God and a Savior,' and wait on Him 'to cleanse us from all unrighteousness,' till no spot or blemish remain in us, even in the judgment of our holy and merciful Father. Eph. 5:25—27. Col. 1: 21—23. Jude 22—25. SCOTT.

(10.) 'This text plainly implies, that Christianity does in effect assert, that we are all in a degenerate state; and consequently is a clear proof of the corruption of human nature.' DODDR.—'The expressions used here [in this ch.], and in the Gospel of St. John, Word, Life, Light, and others, show that the apostle had in view the philosophy of the Gnostics (Note, end of Rev. 9:), who used, or rather abused, those expressions, as technical terms of their philosophy.' T. H. HORNE.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It is probable John was the only surviving apostle, when he wrote this epistle: and his old age, and long-continued usefulness, faithfulness, and love to Christians, must have given him a kind of parental authority, throughout the whole church, as far as it adhered to the pure Gospel of Christ. It was therefore peculiarly proper for him, to address them as his spiritual family, whose welfare he had greatly at heart: and as most of them were young in years, compared with this beloved and truly venerable disciple, who probably was the oldest Christian on earth at that time; none ever could with such propriety adopt the endearing language of his Lord, and call his fellow-Christians, 'My little,' or my dear 'children,' as he did. John 13:33. The diminutive is commonly used by way of endearment, and to express peculiar affection.—Superficial speculators might here have been ready to charge the apostle with inconsistency, as if the latter part of the v. (1) had contradicted the former: but the state of a Christian in this world, is such, that encouragements 'after having sinned,' are as necessary as warnings against sin: for, through the remaining power of sin in his heart, the manifold snares of the world, and the power of Satan, 'he cannot always stand upright:'. . . and despondency is as ruin

2 And he is the <sup>b</sup> propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep <sup>c</sup> his commandments.

4 He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him.

6 He that saith he abideth <sup>d</sup> in him, ought himself also so to <sup>e</sup> walk, even as he walked.

lated law, is our Father in the gospel-court of heaven and of grace. His throne or tribunal is the mercy-seat. And He that is our Father, is also our Judge; the Supreme Arbitrator of our state and circumstances, either for life or death, for time or eternity, Heb. 12:23. That believers may be encouraged to hope that their cause will go well, as their Judge is represented to them in the relation of a Father, so their Advocate is recommended to them on these considerations: (1.) By his Person and personal names; Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father; one anointed by the Father for the whole office of mediation, the whole work of salvation; and consequently for that of the Intercessor or Advocate. (2.) By his qualification for the office; Jesus Christ the Righteous; the Righteous One in the court and sight of the Judge. This is not so necessary in another advocate. But here the clients are guilty; and the Advocate must plead his own righteousness for the criminals. He has been righteous to the death, righteous for them; this the Judge will not deny. On this score He pleads, that the clients' sins may not be imputed to them. (3.) By the plea He has to make, v. 2. In vain do the professors of Rome distinguish between an advocate of redemption, and an advocate of intercession, or a mediator of such different service. The Mediator of intercession, the Advocate for us, is the Mediator of redemption, the Propitiation for our sins. It is his propitiation that He pleads. We might suppose his blood had lost its efficacy, were no mention made of it in heaven since it was shed. But now we see it is of esteem there, since it is continually represented in the intercession of the great Advocate for the church of God. He ever lives to make intercession for those that come to God through Him. (4.) By the extent of his plea; the latitude of his propitiation,—the whole world, v. 2. not only for the past, or us present believers, but for the sins of all who shall hereafter believe on Him, or come to God through Him. As He is the only, so He is the universal Atonement and Propitiation, for all that are saved and brought home to God, and to his favor and forgiveness.

V. 3—6. These verses may seem to relate to eh. 1:7. between which and these verses there occurred an incidental discourse concerning the believer's duty and relief in case of sin, occasioned by the mention of one of the believer's privileges,—his being cleansed from sin by the Mediator's blood. In that verse, the apostle asserts the beneficial consequence of walking in the light. Here now succeeds the trial or test of our light and love:

1. Of our light, v. 3. Young Christians are apt to magnify their new light, and applaud their knowledge, especially if suddenly or in a short time communicated; and old ones are apt to suspect the sufficiency and fulness of their knowledge; they lament that they know God and Christ, and the rich contents of his Gospel, no more; but here is the evidence of the soundness of our knowledge, if it constrains us to keep God's com- mands; a careful, conscientious obedience, shows the apprehension and knowledge of these things is graciously impressed on the soul; therefore it must follow, in the reverse, that he that saith I know Him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him, v. 4. A disobedient life is the confusion and shame of pretended religious knowledge; it gives the lie to such boasts and pretences, and shows that there is neither religion nor honesty in them.

2. Of our love, v. 5. To keep the Word of God, or of Christ, is sacredly to attend thereto in all the conduct and motion of life; in him that does so is the love of God perfected. Possibly, some may here understand God's love to us; and doubtless, his love to us cannot be perfected without our practical observance of his Word; no act of divine love, that terminates on us, obtains its proper tendency, issue, and effect, without our holy attendance to God's Word; but the phrase rather denotes here our love to God; so v. 15. The love of (to) the Father, is not in him; so ch. 3:17. How dwelleth the love of (to) God in him? Now light is to kindle love; and love must and will keep the Word of God; it inquires wherein the Beloved may be pleased and served, and finding He will be so by any observance of his declared will, there it employs and exerts itself; there love is demonstrated; there it has its perfect operation, and delight; and hereby (by this dutiful attendance to the will of God, or Christ) we know that we are in Him, v. 5. we know that we belong to Him, and that we are united to Him by that Spirit which elevates and assists us to this obedience; and if we acknowledge our relation to Him, and our union with Him, it must have this continued enforcement on us, v. 6. The Lord Christ was an Inhabitant of this world, and walked here below; here He gave a shining example of absolute obedience to God; they who profess to be on his side, and to abide with Him, must walk with Him, after his pattern and example. John 15:14.

ical to watchfulness, diligence, and holy obedience, as even carnal security itself. No man, on scriptural principles, can conclude himself to be any better than a hypocrite, who habitually commits sin because God is ready to forgive the penitent: but the fallen, who desire to arise and renew the combat, have abundant encouragement so to do. From the sinner's first conviction of guilt, to the end of the Christian's warfare by death, the general rule is applicable, that, 'if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father; one, who has undertaken, and is fully qualified and authorized, to plead in the presence of God the Father, in behalf of every one who seeks for pardon, salvation, and all things pertaining to them, in his name, and in dependence on his meritorious intercession. (2) Propitiation. 4:10. Rom. 3:25. Heb. 9:5. Luke 13:13. Heb. 2:17.—See Ex. 25:20—22. Lev. 4:31. 5:6, 10, 18. Sept. The propitiation, or appeasing sacrifice, being provided by God Himself, as the grand display of his love to us, (Note, 4:9—12.) cannot be intended to dispose Him to mercy, as before implacable; but to render his mercy, to which He is infinitely propense, consistent with his justice and holiness, that it may be honorably displayed. SCOTT.

(1.) These things. 'I. e. concerning the readiness of God to forgive sins.—If any man sin. 'I. e. through the surprise of a violent temptation, and remaining infirmity of human nature.—Advocate. 'Perhaps nothing illustrates the matter more, than the residence of some eminent persons from distant provinces in the courts of great princes or states, whose business it was constantly to negotiate with them the affairs of those whom they represented, to vindicate them from any unjust aspersions, and to advance their interest to the utmost of their power.' DODDR.

(2.) 'The apostle's reasoning stands thus: "He who must be an advocate must first of all be a reconciliation for us: now, no saints can be a reconciliation for us; therefore no saints can be advocates." Parkins, in Henry, abr.—The apostle is to be understood as speaking only of all those who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, over the whole world.' DODDR.—Propitiation. 'This word is nowhere found in the N. T. but in this passage, and in eh. 4:10. But it occurs often in the Sept.; it signifies a sacrifice of atonement. See Lev. 6:6, 7. Num. 5:3. Ex. 44:27.' Williams.—'The death of Christ, for aught we know, may exert an influence of some kind or other, wherever there are intelligent beings; but in respect to ourselves, and the world to which we belong, there is no room for doubt. It is agreeable to the uniform tenor of Scripture, that we are redeemed by the blood of Christ. Here is the hinge on which the whole system of Christianity turns. It is the death of Christ, as a propitiation for the sins of the world, which gives the Gospel its chief value, as a religion for sinners. By limiting the influence of Christ's death to his example, you not only set all our immortal hopes afloat, and blot out the glory of the Gospel, but you reflect upon the character of God, by imputing to Him the weakness of incurring so amazing an expense, without a sufficient end. Believe it, who will, that "He who was the Brightness of the Father's glory, and who made all things by the word of his power, condescended to assume our nature and die upon the cross, merely to exhibit to the world the constancy of a martyr!'

Rev. Dr. W. B. SPRAGUE.

V. 3—6. The 'knowledge' of God, or of Christ, evidently signifies a believing, spiritual, and experimental acquaintance with Him, and a cordial acceptance of his salvation, ensuring their participation of it. Professed Christians would desire to know, or be assured, that their faith and experience were genuine, and distinguishable from those of all hypocrites; and, as the apostle and his brethren 'knew that they thus knew,' or had known 'Christ,' not by exact notions, or transient high affections, or miraculous powers, but by a disposition of heart, habitually, unreservedly, and willingly to keep his commandments; so any other man might know his profession to be sincere, and his knowledge of Christ spiritual and saving, by the same evidence. It is evident, that the obedience, here spoken of, is the humble, sincere, unreserved, and loving obedience of a believer in Christ; which is not perfect, but attended with continual repentance, and application to his atoning blood for pardon and acceptance; as well as with a constant dependence on the Holy Spirit for grace, to enable him in any measure to perform it. John 14:15—24. 15:3, 11. Yet, even this observance of the holy commandments of Christ, in imitation of his example, though far from real perfection, constitutes a degree of holiness and excellency, of which none but true Christians have any adequate conception; and which, if universal, would render the earth in no small degree like heaven itself. Rev. 20:4—6.—(3) We do know, &c. How astonishing is it, that when apostles so clearly speak of our knowing that we know Christ, and are in Him, and in a state of acceptance and peace with God; and when they so carefully show, in what way this may be known; Christian divines should, without discrimination or hesitation, speak of assurance in terms of bitter abhorrence. 'The demon of assurance.' Dr. Whitaker.—As if the word and the thing were both unscriptural and anti-scriptural. 20—25. Heb. 6:11, 12.—In fact, no man, who duly considers the difference between eternal happiness and eternal misery; who is aware of his danger of eternal damnation, and who recollects that he may be in heaven or hell, in a day or an hour, can be quiet, without some degree of assurance, that he shall go to everlasting happiness, not to everlasting misery. SCOTT.

(3.) Know Him. 'Whether Christ, or God the Father, be meant by Him, here, is not agreed; generally it is referred to Christ, the nearer antecedent; but the latter is supported by v. 5. It is at v. 6. (as Carpov observes) that Christ, and faith in Him, is spoken of.' BLOOMF.

(6.) 'Here is the standard of Christian character. A man may have his frames, and talk much about his experiences, and yet be no Christian. He may be liberal in his contributions; his name may stand in capitals on the list of the benefactors of his country or the church, and yet he be no Christian. But the man who follows the steps of Jesus, whose character is modelled after his image [whose will is identified with his]; who leads a life of meekness, patience, self-denial, toil, benevolence, and prayer, such as were seen in the life of Christ,—that man, and that only, is a Christian.' Rev. L. BACON.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you; which thing is true in him and in you, because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth.

9 He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now.

10 He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him.

11 But he that hateth his brother, is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes.

V. 7—11. This v. 7. may be supposed either to look backward to what immediately preceded; or forward to that law of fraternal love the apostle is now going to recommend; this is the message heard from the beginning, ch. 3: 11. and the old commandment, 2 John, 5. he is ready to give an instance of it himself in his affectionate appellation, Brethren; and so the precept of fraternal love is recommended.

1. An old one, v. 7. The precept of love must be as old as human nature; in the state of innocence, had human nature then been propagated, men must have loved one another, as being of one blood, made to dwell on the earth, as being God's offspring, and bearing his image. In the state of sin and promised recovery, they must love one another, as related to God their Maker, as related to each other by blood, and as partners in the same hope. When the Hebrews were peculiarly incorporated, they must accordingly love each other, as being the privileged people, whose were the covenants and the adoption, and of whose race the Messiah and Head of the church must spring; and the law of love must be conveyed with new obligations to the new Israel of God, to the gospel-church; and so it is the old commandment, or the Word which the children of the gospel-Israel have heard from the beginning, v. 7.

2. As a new one, v. 8. Again, to constrain you to this duty the more, a new commandment I write unto you, the law of the new society, the Christian corporation, which thing is true in Him; the matter of which was first true in and concerning the Head of it; He loved the church, and gave Himself for it: and it is true in you; this law is, in some measure, written on your hearts; ye are taught of God to love one another, and that because (or since, or forasmuch as) 'the darkness is past, the darkness of your prejudiced, unconverted (whether Jewish or Gentile) minds; your deplorable ignorance of God and of his Christ is now past, and the true light now shineth; the light of evangelical revelation hath shone with life and efficacy into your hearts; hence you have seen the excellency of Christian love, and the fundamental obligation thereto.'

Here, v. 9—11. is another trial of our Christian light; before, it was to be approved by obedience to God; here by Christian love: 1. He who has not such love, in vain pretends his light, v. 9. There are often those who assume to themselves more than is true; who say, Divine Revelation has made its impression on their minds and spirits, and yet they walk in hatred and enmity; these cannot be swayed by the sense of the love of Christ, and therefore remain in their dark state, notwithstanding their pretended conversion. 2. He who is managed by such love, approves his light to be good and genuine, v. 10. He sees the reasonableness of Christian love; and there will be no occasion of stumbling in him; he will be no scandal, no stumbling-block to his brother. Christian love teaches us highly to value our brother's soul, and dread everything that will be injurious to his innocence and peace. 3. Hatred is a sign of spiritual darkness, v. 11. Spiritual light is instilled by the Spirit of grace, and one of the first-fruits of that Spirit is love; he who is possessed with malignity, must needs be destitute of spiritual light; consequently, he walks in darkness, his life is agreeable to a dark mind and conscience, and he knows not whither he goes; sees not whither this dark spirit carries him, and particularly that it will carry him to the world of outer darkness, because darkness hath blinded his eyes, v. 11. Here observe how effectually our apostle is now cured of his once hot and flaming spirit, calling for fire from heaven on poor ignorant Samaritans, Luke 9: 54. Now, having imbibed the spirit of Christ, he breathes out good-will to man, and love to all the brethren. The Lord Jesus is the great Master of love: his disciples are the disciples of love, his family the family of love.

V. 12—17. This new command of holy love, with the incentives thereto, may possibly be directed to the several ranks of disciples here accosted; or, there being an important dissuasion to follow, the apostle may justly seem to preface it with a solemn address to the several forms or orders in the school of Christ; let all in the Christian institution know, that they must not love this world; and so,

1. We have the address itself made to the various forms and ranks in the church of Christ. All Christians are not of the same standing and stature; but there are precepts and a correspondent obedience common to them all, as particularly mutual love and contempt of the world. The apostle addresses,

(1.) The lowest in the Christian school, little children, v. 12. These he may seem to encourage by applying to them first; and it may be useful to the greater proficient to hear what is said to their juniors; elements are to be repeated; first principles are the foundation of all. He addresses the children in Christianity, on two accounts: Because their sins were forgiven them for his name's sake, v. 12. either for God's name's sake, for the praise of his glory, his glorious perfections displayed in forgiveness; or for Christ's name sake, upon account of the redemption that is in Him; and they that are forgiven of God, are strongly obliged to relinquish this world which so interferes with the love of God. Because of their knowledge of God; I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father, v. 13. Children in Christianity must and do know God, Heb. 8: 11. Children in Christ should know,

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. The Gospel, when well understood and duly received, sets the heart against all sin, and effectually prevents the allowed practice of it, at the same time that it gives the most blessed relief to the wounded consciences of those who have sinned, by the hope of pardon, through our Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and his all-sufficient propitiation. Thus the divine original of the Scriptures is evinced, by the complete suitableness of the remedy, proposed in them, to the actual state of men in this evil world; while all other schemes are founded on false principles, and, therefore, are totally inapplicable to the case, and cannot effectually bring peace to the conscience, and lead the heart to abhor all iniquity.—While we seek for grace, to make a holy use of the intercession and atonement of our heavenly Advocate, and encourage our fellow-Christians to do the same; we should remember, that 'He is the propitiation, not for our sins only, but for those of the whole world,' and, therefore, if any sinner, in any part of the earth, be willing to accept of this salvation, he will surely be made partaker of it; and we should desire and endeavor, by all the scriptural means in our power, to be the instruments of bringing others to share with us in so precious a benefit; and of sending the Gospel to all nations.—But we should carefully guard against every sentiment, which tends to pervert the abundant provision of the Gospel, for the forgiveness of our sins, into an encouragement to disobedience.—Christianity, instead of rendering 'the love of God' and men, and good works, superfluous and unnecessary, furnishes us with new motives, and lays us under further obligations to abound in them; and it gives us new directions concerning the love of our neighbors, by requiring love to our brethren for Christ's sake, and to our enemies after the example of his love to us. The degree of our holy love is the proper criterion and standard of our illumination, as well as the best preservative from sin, and the most active principle of obedience. He who 'loveth his brother' most fervently, with a pure heart, abides in the clearest light, and will be best kept from stumbling, or from occasioning the falls of others; not he, who is of a violent, selfish, and malicious temper, however he may boast of his knowledge. These things demand our closest attention, and most serious self-examination; and should lead us earnestly to pray, that God would show us what we are, and whither we are going. Sc.

V. 7—11. In exhorting Christians to obey and imitate their Lord, as the proper evidence of their love to Him, and to the Father who sent Him, the apostle 'wrote no new command' to them; but that which they had received from the beginning, and which, from the first, had been repeatedly enforced by Christ Himself. Nay, in fact, it had been virtually in force from the beginning of the world; as it could not comprise more than was contained in the law, which required Israel 'to love the Lord with all their hearts,' and 'their neighbor as themselves,' and to 'be holy as God was holy.' (Notes, 3: 11—24. Ex. 20: 1—17. Lev. 19: 18. Deut. 6: 5. 2 John 5, 6.) Yet this old commandment, especially that precept which inculcated 'the love of their brethren,' might be called 'a new commandment,' as given to Christians. (Notes, John 13: 31—35. 15: 12—16.) This was true, in respect of Him, their Lord and Savior, in that He had newly shown them the immensity of his condescension, compassion, and self-denying love to sinners; and had laid them under new obligations to obey and imitate Him, especially in 'loving one another, as He had loved them.' The command likewise was now enforced by his mediatorial authority, to the full exercise of which He had been lately exalted. It was also 'true in them;' as their situation was new, and differed widely from that of the Gentiles around them, and even from that of the people of God under the Mosaic dispensation: and as they were now united by a new bond of union, as fellow-soldiers, fellow-travellers, brethren, and co-heirs of heavenly felicity. (Notes, 1 Cor. 12: 12—26. Eph. 4: 1—6.) So that the love of Christians to each other, as such, though virtually comprised in the love of their neighbors as themselves, and in some things like that of the Israelites to each other, was new in respect of its exercise, motives, rules, and obligations. This arose from the change which had taken place; as the comparative 'darkness' of the preparatory dispensation was past, and the 'true light' shone in full splendor; (Note, 2 Tim. 1: 10.) so that Christians might be expected to be more exact in their obedience, and more full of love to one another, and to all men, than even believers had been, under the darker dispensation of the law.

V. 12—14. The apostle had before addressed Christians in general, as 'his little children,' or, his dear children; but here he spoke of such as were young in years, or newly converted, and distinguished them from those who were further advanced in the life of faith and grace. It does not appear that the clause, 'have known Him that is from the beginning,' has any reference to the personal knowledge of Christ as Man; but is used as the other clause, 'have known the Father,' of knowing

13 I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him <sup>1</sup>that is from the beginning. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one. I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the <sup>m</sup>Father.

14 I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him <sup>that is</sup> from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are <sup>n</sup>strong, and the word of God abideth <sup>o</sup>in you, and ye have overcome <sup>p</sup>the wicked one.

15 Love <sup>q</sup>not the world, neither the things <sup>that are</sup> in the world. If <sup>r</sup>any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

17 And <sup>v</sup>the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that that God is their Father; they that know the Father, may well be withdrawn from the love of this world. Then the apostle proceeds,

(2.) To those of the highest station and stature; seniors in Christianity, fathers,

v. 13, 14. Acts 21: 16. They that are of longest standing in Christ's school, need further advice and instruction; none are too old to learn; he writes to them on the account of their knowledge, v. 13, 14. Old men have knowledge and experience, and expect deference. The apostle is ready to own the knowledge of old Christians, and to congratulate them thereupon. They know the Lord Christ, particularly Him that was from the beginning, ch. 1: 1. They who know Him that was from the beginning, before this world was made, may well be induced thereby to relinquish this world. Then,

(3.) To the middle age of Christians, those in their bloom and flower, young men, v. 13, 14. These are those that are arrived at the strength of spirit and sound sense, and can discern between good and evil. The apostle applies to them on account of their exploits, v. 13. their strength, discovered in their achievement, and their acquaintance with the Word of God, v. 14. It will be the glory of youthful persons to be strong in Christ and in his grace; and let vigorous Christians show their strength in conquering the world. And the Word of God abideth in you, v. 14. The Word of God must abide in the adult disciples; and they, in whom the Word of God dwells, are well furnished for the conquest of the world.

2. We have the dissuasion thus prefaced and introduced; a caution fundamental to vital, practical religion, v. 15. The several degrees of Christians should unite in being dead to the world; were they thus united, they would soon unite on other accounts; their love should be reserved for God; 'throw it not away on the world.' Here we see the reasons of this dissuasion and caution; they are several, and the first is taken from the inconsistency of this love of the world with the love of God, v. 15. The world draws down the heart from God; and so the more the love of the world prevails, the more the love of God dwindles and decays. The second is taken from the prohibition of worldly love or lust, v. 16. this love or lust is not appointed of God, but the world is a usurper of our affection. Now here we have the due consideration and notion of the world, according to which it is to be crucified and renounced. (1.) There is the lust of the flesh: the flesh, here, being distinguished from the eyes and the life, imports the body; the lust of the flesh is, subjectively, the humor and appetite of indulging fleshly pleasures; and objectively, all those things that excite and inflame the pleasures of the flesh; this lust is usually called luxury. (2.) There is the lust of the eyes; the eyes are delighted with treasures, riches, and rich possessions; this is the lust of covetousness. (3.) There is the pride of life; a vain mind craves all the grandeur, equipage, and pomp of a vainglorious life; this is ambition, and thirst after honor and applause; this is, in part, the disease of the ear; it must be flattered with admiration and praise. The objects of these appetites must be abandoned and renounced; as they engage and engross the affection and desire, they are not of the Father, but of the world, v. 16. The Father disallows them, and the world should keep them to itself. The third reason is taken from the vain and vanishing state of earthly things and the enjoyment of them, v. 17. The things of the world are fading and dying apace, and desire itself will ere long fail and cease, Eccl. 12: 5.

Him by faith and experience. For, on the earliest date assigned to the epistle, only a few aged Christians, and those principally the inhabitants of Galilee and Judea, could have personally known Jesus Christ; yet the apostle speaks of all the aged Christians whom he addressed, without any limitation. (13) Little children.] 18. Mat. 18:2. John 21:5. The word is changed, but the meaning seems the same. SCOTT.

(12—14.) Bloomf. thinks there is 'hardly anything to countenance the notion of a distribution of Christians into the different degrees of spiritual progress' being meant here; and Mackn. thinks, that the persons written to under the denomination of fathers, were 'of the number of eyewitnesses.'—What some, as Doddr., regards as tautology in the addresses, fathers, little children, and young men, Bloomf. takes in the light rather of intensive repetitions. The little children in v. 12. he considers, after Beza and Wolf, 'a general address, comprising all Christians, as at v. 1. and frequently elsewhere in John.' Ep.

(13.) 'The words, because ye have known Him from the beginning, are very remarkable: for the best commentators are agreed, that the expression cannot mean God, but Jesus Christ, (since, as Ros. observes, He is in this portion plainly distinguished from Him), and denotes his eternal being with God the Father. Ros. aptly compares John 1:1. The application is obvious: that they will not prefer to this eternal Being things temporal and speedily to perish, v. 17.' BLOOMF.

(14.) 'Would to God I could make young Christians know what results are depending on them; what interests of the church and of a dying world are involved in their future character and efforts. When I look on the young Christians of this age, and reflect that they are soon to sustain the ancient glories of the church of God,—when I look abroad on the earth, and see the crisis that is at hand,—when I listen to the cries that come from every quarter of the world, summoning the people of God to new efforts and more splendid exhibitions of piety;—I seem to see the hoary generations that are past, rising up from their repose to watch over the progress of the young followers of Christ; I seem to hear the voices of the blest spirits from above, cheering them on in the career of piety;—I seem to see a world in misery, turning its imploring hands to them, and beseeching them to be worthy of their name, their privilege, and their destiny;—I seem to hear, I do hear God Himself speaking from the heavens, "Ye have chosen the better part, be faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life."' Rev. L. BACON.

(14, 15.) Young men . . . love not the world.] 'If, before men undertake their plans and enterprises, they would submit them, with the calmness and seriousness of pure devotion, for the approbation of Him on whom they depend for success, how many of them would they relinquish, and with what moderation would they pursue the rest! Seest thou a man hurrying, scrambling, and scuffling for the pelf or the praise of the world? Assuredly, thou seest a prayerless soul. A praying man knows too much concerning the true riches, and the honor which come from God, to discover such miserable insatiation for the things of an hour. Riches cannot exalt nor poverty depress him. He dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, abiding under the shadow of the Almighty,—fearing neither the terror by night, nor the arrow that flieth by day.' Rev. Dr. SKINNER.

V. 15—17. The world, as God created it, is very good, and a proper object of a measure of love, as his work and for his sake; but as sin has marred it, our affections ought to be wholly alienated from it. The men of the world, as distinguished from believers, are enemies of God and subjects of Satan; we are, therefore, required to renounce their friendship, to avoid intimate society with them, and to abhor their ungodly principles and practices, while we pity their miseries, love their persons, and try to do them good. Jam. 4:4—6. The things of the world may be desired, possessed, and valued, for those uses and purposes, which were intended by God when He created them, and in subordination to his favor, authority, and glory; but for those purposes to which sin has perverted them, and sinners idolize them, we must not desire, seek, or value them, in any measure or manner; and if any man thus 'love the world, the love of the Father is not in him;' his idol has never been dethroned, his heart remains unchanged, he is not reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, and has no true, filial love of Him in his heart. Mat. 6:24. Luke 14:25—33. Gal. 1:3—5. 6:11—14. For a poor, vainglorious worm to be advanced to such dominion over his fellows, or to possess such honor among them, as to be tempted to forget his own mortality, as well as his Creator and Judge, and to be so surrounded with vassals, attendants, and flatterers, or so emblazoned with high-sounding titles, and encumbered with magnificence, as to have nothing on earth which he can behold above him, or equal to him, and thus to disregard Him that is 'higher than the highest;' this is the perfection of the 'pride of life.' And all pre-eminence and distinction above others partakes of the same nature, whether power, splendor, or renown, on any account, be the immediate source of it. . . . All these things, (to which every earthly object, which any man is 'tempted to put in competition with the will, favor, and glory of God, must be referred,) are 'not of the Father;' this idolatrous desire of created things did not attach to them, or to man, as God made them and Him; they do not consist with his prescribed use of them; they are not bestowed for these purposes; nor do the men, who are his children and influenced by his grace, desire, seek, or use them in this manner. But 'they are of the world,' as 'lying under the wicked one;' these desires after created things, and this use of them, are the effects of man's apostasy and subjection to Satan; they are thus made the baits, by which men are seduced into sin, and kept in rebellion against God, and the incentives to all their vile passions. (Note, and P. O. Mat. 4:3—11.) They suit the taste, and form the supreme good of worldly men, and are their only portion; and for the sake of them the whole earth is filled with violence, fraud, crimes, and misery. (Notes, Ex. 20:3. Rom. 8:5—9.—It is evident the apostle did not speak of the lawful, moderate, subordinate, and holy use, possession, or desire of God's good creatures, for the ends to which He has appointed them; but of the unlawful, inordinate, unholy, and idolatrous hankering after them, and valuation of them, to which in one form or other all men are totally addicted, so long as they remain in an unregenerate state.—Many vain efforts have been made, by limitations, distinctions, and exceptions, to evade the force of this passage; and some have written on it, as if they meant to show, how far we might safely be carnally minded, 'and lovers of the world;' but, in the apostle's evident meaning, we are no more allowed to love the world at all, than we are to worship Dagon; for we cannot 'serve God and Mammon;' or love the Lord, and 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life.' A man may carry on any business, fill any station, or possess any wealth, as the servant and steward of God, according to his commandments, for his glory, and for the good of mankind; and he may desire food and raiment, and things suitable to his rank in life, and use them with thankfulness, temperance, and humility; but he cannot love or desire them, to gratify his sensuality, pride, avarice, or ambition, or seek his happiness in them, without being an idolater. Every regenerate man is delivered from the dominion and allowed indulgence of 'the love of the world,' and strives and prays against the remains of it, as it rises in his heart, or breaks forth into his life; he desires to love doeth the will of God abideth for ever.

18 Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time.

19 They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

20 But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things.

• 1 Ti. 4:1.

The fourth reason is taken from the immortality of the divine lover, the lover of God; But he that doeth the will of God, which must be the character of the lover of God, in opposition to this lover of the world, abideth for ever, v. 17. The Object of his love, in opposition to the world that passeth away, abideth for ever; his sacred passion or affection, in opposition to the lust that passeth away, abideth for ever; love shall never fail; and he himself is an heir of immortality and endless life, and shall in time be translated thither. From the whole of these verses we should observe, the purity and spirituality of the apostolical doctrine; the animal life must be subjected to the divine; the body, with its affections, should be subjugated to the soul; the soul should be swayed by religion, or the victorious love of God.

V. 18, 19. Here is, 1. A moral prognostication of the time; the end is coming, v. 18. Some may suppose the apostle here addresses the first rank of Christians again; the juniors are most apt to be seduced. But it may be, as elsewhere, a universal appellation, introductive of an alarm to all Christians; It is the last time; our Jewish polity is hastening to an end; Daniel's weeks are now expiring, Dan. 9:26. It is meet disciples should be warned of the haste and end of time, and apprised as much as may be of the prophetic periods of time.

2. The sign of this last time, v. 18. many oppose the Person, doctrine, and kingdom of Christ. It is mysterious that antichrists should be permitted; but disciples should be informed of them; ministers should be watchmen to the house of Israel: and it should be no great offence or prejudice, that there are such antichrists: (1.) One great one has been foretold, v. 18. The generality of the church have been informed by divine revelation, that there must be a long and fatal adversary to Christ and his church, 2 Thess. 2:8-10. No wonder then there are many harbingers and forerunners; even now there are many; the mystery of iniquity already worketh. (2.) They were foretold, also, as the sign of this last time, Mat. 24:24. And these were the forerunners of the dissolution of the Jewish state, nation, and religion, whereby we know it is the last time, v. 18. Let the prediction of seducers arising in the Christian world, fortify us against their seduction.

3. Some account of these seducers or antichrists, (1.) More positively; they were once professors of apostolical doctrine, v. 19.

They went out from our company and communion; possibly from the church of Jerusalem, or some of the churches of Judea, as Acts 15:1. The purest churches may have their apostates. (2.) More privately; They were not inwardly such as we are; they were not of our union with Christ the Head. Then here is, [1.] The reason on which it is concluded they were not of us, and that is, their actual defection; for if they had been of us, they would, no doubt, have continued with us, v. 19. They that apostatize, sufficiently indicate that, before, they were hypocrites. [2.] The reason why they are permitted thus to depart, viz. that their insincerity may be detected; they went out, that they may be made manifest that they were not all of us, v. 19. The church knows not well who are its vital members, and who are not; some of the hypocritical must be manifested here, and that for their own shame and benefit, too, in their reduction to the truth, if they have not sinned unto death; and for the terror and caution of others, 2 Pet. 3:17, 18.

V. 20-27. Here,

1. The apostle encourages the disciples to whom he writes, in this hour of seducers, with the assurance of their stability in this day of apostasy, v. 20. We see, (1.) The blessing wherewith they were enriched,—an unguent from Heaven; Ye have an unction. True Christians are anointed ones, anointed with gifts and spiritual endowments, by the Spirit of grace, into a similitude of their Lord's offices, as subordinate prophets, priests, and kings, unto God. The Holy Spirit is compared unto oil, as well as to fire or water; and the communication of his salvific grace is our anointing. (2.) From whom this blessing comes,—from the Holy

God perfectly, and seek all his happiness from Him alone; and to love all other things in Him, for his sake, and as his bounty; and to use them in submission to his precepts and providence. In proportion as men get this victory over the world, the reality of their grace is evidenced, and they are prepared for laboring and suffering in the cause of Christ; but unless it is begun in the heart, a man 'has no root in himself,' and he will either fall away in time of temptation, or remain a mere unfruitful professor of Christianity. 5:4, 5. Mat. 13:18-23. Rom. 12:2.—Of life.] 3:17. Mark 12:44. Luke 8:14. 15:12, 30. 21:4. 1 Tim. 2:2. 2 Tim. 2:4. 1 Pet. 4:3. The means or style of living, rather than life itself, is signified. Notes, Luke 16:13-23.

(16.) Pride of life.] 'The phrase refers to that ambitious turn of mind, which prompts men to engage in all those pursuits which will supply materials for their vanity, [and self-esteem,] and enable them to make a figure in the world.'

(17.) 'How often has the remark of Cotton Mather been verified; "When the useful man comes to the hour of his departure, then he, who lived beloved, shall die lamented. It shall be witnessed and remembered of him that 'he was one who did good in Israel,'"—an epitaph, the glory of which is far beyond that of the most stately pyramid. Then the calumniators, who once endeavored to destroy his reputation, shall have nothing to reflect upon, but the impotence of their own defeated malice.'" MATHER.—'Ah! this is a changing world. Its history indeed is but a history of changes. But amidst these scenes of fluctuation is there no object, in heaven or earth, that is unchanging? Yes one: God is unchanging. Here is stability. "His hand the good man fastens on the skies, And bids earth roll, —nor heeds her idle whirl." God is his happiness, therefore his happiness is certain and everlasting. What though earthly comforts are transitory, earthly friends frail and changeable; God is a Friend, sincere, unfeeling, almighty.'

Rev. Dr. PORTER.

V. 18, 19. The love of the world, as unsubdued in professed Christians, gave Satan his greatest advantage, not only in tempting them to open apostasy, but also in seducing them by destructive heresies; through which they were enabled to reconcile a quiet conscience with a carnal mind, and the indulgence of their favorite passion, under the mask of a religious profession. Mat. 7:15-20. Acts 5:1-11. 8:13-24. 2 Pet. 2:1-3. So that the transition was natural, from warning Christians against the love of the 'world,' to putting them on their guard against false teachers. — Some explain 'the last time,' to mean the last age of the Jewish church; but, probably, that had been subverted some years, when John wrote this epistle. The deceivers, predicted by our Lord, Mat. 24:23-25. were men who falsely professed to be the promised Messiah, or to point Him out to others; they had never constituted a part of the Christian church, and had not, therefore, apostatized; they were 'false Christs' and 'false apostles,' not antichrists. — Indeed, it is very unreasonable to interpret antichrist, in the singular, to mean the same as the 'many antichrists' afterwards mentioned; and then to confine the whole, either to the Jewish opposers or Judaizing corrupters of Christianity, as some do, or to the Gnostics, as divided into different sects, as others do. 'Antichrist' signifies, one that opposes Christ, whether he oppose the doctrine of his Deity, or his humanity; or whether he set himself against Him, in respect of his priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin, and finding acceptance with God; his kingly office, by claiming authority to enact laws, in his church, contrary to his laws, or to dispense with his commandments; or his prophetic office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation which He has given in his holy Word.—'They oppose the Person of Christ, or this doctrine, or both together.' Beza. In this view, there were, at an early period of the church, 'many antichrists;' and the heads of any sect of heretics might be, in a subordinate sense, so called, but the direct and avowed opposers of Christianity could not be meant in this place. 'They went not out from them.'—The term is used in this epistle, and in John's second epistle, and in no other part of the Scripture, nor even in the Revelation; so that, all the controversies concerning 'ANTICHRIST,' as predicted by Daniel, and by John in the Revelation, are merely disputes about a word, and do not at all pertain to the main subject. Dan. 7:8: 11: Rev. 13:14. The 'antichrists' mentioned in these verses, evidently, were persons who had already appeared; but one distinguished antichrist was yet to be expected.—'They went out from us,' i. e. 'they went out from the apostles in Judea.' Whitby. 'But they were not of us;' this must mean, that they were not of us, the apostles. It does not, however, appear that they even professed to be apostles; nor does it appear, that they had previously been teachers in the church. And can it possibly be imagined, that all, either the 'false Christs,' or 'the antichrists,' spoken of by our Lord, and by John, had been personally joined in communion with the apostles, while they continued in Judea? — (19) From us.] The same preposition is afterwards rendered 'of us.'

They belonged to us, in one sense, as the unfruitful branches to the Vine, but not in another; 'they were not all clean.' Mat. 22:11-14. 25:1-13. John 13:6-11. 15:3-5. But they professed Christianity, and had been admitted to communion with true Christians; yet their subsequent apostasy proved, that, like Judas, they had from the first been hypocrites. Mat. 7:21-23. John 6:66-71.—They would, no doubt, have continued.] They had indeed continued. The words do not readily admit of a strictly literal translation. No doubt, added by the translators, shows how they understood them.

(18.) Last time.] 'Last age of the Jewish church and commonwealth, because then, Christ had foretold, many false Christs would arise.' So some. But Doddr. thinks, from comparing other scriptures, the expression seems to be more extensive. — Out of several different senses which Bl. gives from Ros., Bl. prefers the general one, 'perilous and evil times.' — Respecting the 'antichrist,' he says, 'the best founded opinion is that of most commentators, that it means "false teachers," and that the term is supposed to be synonymous with the, he that opposeth and exalteth himself, &c., of Paul, 2 Thes. 2:4.' — Doddr. prefers to understand it of 'apostates, who had once professed themselves Christians;' Whitby, of 'unbelieving Jews opposing Christianity,' and Dr. A. Clarke, of 'any person, thing, doctrine, system of religion, polity, &c. which is opposed to Christ, and to the spirit and spread of his Gospel.'

(19.) 'It is with professors of religion, especially with those who become such at a time of great outpouring of the Holy Spirit, as it is with blossoms in the spring; there are vast numbers of them on the trees, all which look fair and promising, but yet very many of them come to nothing. Many of them soon wither and drop off, while they looked as beautiful and smelled us sweetly as those that remain. We must judge not by the beautiful colors and the beautiful smell, but by the matured fruit.'

V. 20-25. The apostle wrote to his fellow-Christians, to caution, comfort, and establish them, though his observations were also calculated to put all, who professed the Gospel, on self-examination, and to preserve new converts from self-deception.—Some of these heresarchs denied the Deity of Christ; others explained away his incarnation, and so 21 I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.

22 Who is a liar, but he that <sup>c</sup>denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son.

23 Whosoever <sup>d</sup>denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: [but] he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also.

24 Let <sup>e</sup>that therefore abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father.

25 And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal <sup>f</sup>life.

26 These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you.

27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you: and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth <sup>g</sup>you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in <sup>h</sup>him.

28 And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear,

One; either from the Holy Ghost, or from the Lord Christ, as Rev. 3:7. (3.) The effect of this unction; it enlightens and strengthens the eyes of the understanding; 'and thereby ye know all things, v. 20, all these things concerning Christ and his religion; it was promised and given you for that end,' John 14:26.

2. The apostle indicates to them the mind and meaning with which he wrote to them. (1.) Not as suspecting their knowledge, or supposing their ignorance in the grand truths of the Gospel, v. 21. A just confidence in religious persons may both encourage and contribute to their fidelity. (2.) As relying on their judgment in these things. They who know the truth in any kind, are thereby prepared to discern what is contrary thereto, and inconsistent therewith. Truth and falsehood do not well mix together; and no lie belongs to religion, either natural or revealed. It is a commendation of the Christian religion, that it so well accords with natural religion, which is the foundation of it, that it so well accords with the Jewish religion, which contained the elements or rudiments of it. No lie is of the truth: frauds and impostures then are very unfit means to support and propagate the truth, and it had been better had they never been used; the result of them appears in the infidelity of our age; but the greatest actors and sufferers for the Christian revelation would assure us that no lie is of the truth.

3. The apostle further impleads and arraigns these seducers who were newly arisen: (1.) They are liars, egregious opposers of sacred truth. The great and pernicious lies that the father of lies, or of liars, spreads in the world, were of old, and usually are, falsehoods and errors, relating to the Person of Christ. There is no truth so sacred and fully attested, but some or other will contradict or deny it. It should seem that some, in the tremendous judgment of God, are given up to strong delusions. (2.) They are direct enemies to God, as well as to the Lord Christ, v. 22. He that opposes Christ, denies the witness and testimony of the Father, and the seal He hath given to his Son, John 6:27. And he that denies the witness and testimony of the Father concerning Jesus Christ, denies that God is the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ; and consequently abandons the knowledge of God in Christ, and, thereupon, the whole revelation of God in Christ, and particularly of God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself: therefore, the apostle may well infer, Whosoever denies the Son, the same has not the Father, v. 23. he has not the true knowledge of the Father; for the Son has most and best revealed Him; he has no interest in the Father, in his favor and grace, and salvation; for none cometh to the Father but by the Son. But, as some copies add, he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also, v. 23. As there is an intimate relation between the Father and the Son, so there is an inviolable union in the doctrine, knowledge, and interests of both; so that he who has the knowledge of, and right to, the Son, has the knowledge of, and right to, the Father, also. They that adhere to the Christian revelation, hold the light and benefit of natural religion withal.

4. Hereupon, the apostle advises and persuades the disciples to continue in the old doctrine, at first communicated to them, v. 24. So sure were the apostles of the truth of what they had delivered concerning Christ, and from Him, that after all their toils and sufferings they were not willing to relinquish it. This exhortation is enforced by these considerations: (1.) From the sacred advantage they will receive by adhering to the primitive truth and faith. They will continue thereby in holy union with God and Christ, v. 24. The truth of Christ, abiding in us, is the mean of severing us from sin, and uniting us to the Son of God, John 15:3, 4. The Son is the Medium, or Mediator, by whom we are united to the Father. What value, then, should we put on gospel-truth! They will thereby secure the promise of eternal life, v. 25. The blessed God puts great value on his Son, and the truth relating to Him, when He is pleased to promise to those who continue in that truth, eternal life. Then the exhortation aforesaid is enforced, (2.) From the design of the apostle's writing to them. This letter is to fortify them against the deceivers of the age, v. 26. We should beware, lest the apostolical letters, yea, lest the whole Scripture of God should be to us insignificant and fruitless. (3.) From the instructive blessing they had received from heaven, v. 27. True Christians have an inward confirmation of the divine truth they have imbibed: the Holy Spirit has imprinted it on their minds and hearts, 2 Cor. 1:21. This sacred chrism, or divine unction, is commended on these accounts: It is durable and lasting, v. 27. It is better than human instruction, v. 27. Not that this anointing will teach you without the appointed ministry; it could, if God so pleased; but it will not; but it will teach you better than we can; and ye need not that any man teach you, v. 27. It is a sure evidence of truth; and all that it teaches, is infallible truth; But as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, v. 27. the Holy Spirit must needs be the Spirit of truth, as He is called, John 14:17. And it is of a conservative influence; it will preserve those in whom it abides, against seducers and their seduction, v. 27. It teaches you to abide in Christ; and as it teaches you, it secures you: it lays a restraint on your minds and hearts, that you may not revolt from Him. And He that hath anointed us, is God; who also hath sealed us for Himself, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22.

V. 28, 29. From the blessing of the sacred unction, the apostle proceeds in his advice and exhortation to constancy in and with Christ, v. 28. The apostle repeats his kind appellation, little children; which, I suppose, does not so much denote their diminutiveness, as his affection; and therefore, I judge, may be rendered dear children. He would persuade by love, and prevail by endearment as well as by reason. Evangelical privileges are obligatory to evangelical duties; and they that are anointed by the Lord Jesus, are highly obliged to abide with Him, in opposition to all adversaries whatever. This duty of perseverance and constancy in trying times, is strongly urged by the two following considerations:

I. Of his return at the great day of account, v. 28. It is here taken for granted that the Lord Jesus will come again. This was part of that truth they had heard from the beginning. And when He comes again, He will publicly appear; be manifested to all. When He was here before, He came privately, in comparison; He proceeded from a womb, and was introduced into a denied his humanity, and the reality of his sufferings, and some opposed his kingly authority. Thus, whilst they retained the name of Christians, they virtually denied his Person, as 'the Christ, the Son of God,' and 'the Son of man; Emmanuel, God with us,' Is. 7:14. Mat. 1:22, 23. or his offices, as the anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of his church; they denied that 'God was manifest in the flesh,' to 'ransom the church with his own blood,' Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 3:16. that, in virtue of his one oblation, He might appear in the presence of God, as our great High Priest, and reign over his redeemed people, as his willing subjects, to the end of the world, and for ever. Now, whether they denied his divine or his human nature, his atonement or his authority, they virtually denied Him to be the Christ, as they who had 'the unction of the Holy Spirit' would readily perceive. Such a teacher was, therefore, in fact 'an antichrist,' who 'denied both the Father and the Son;' seeing the Father can only be known, approached, worshipped, and glorified by sinners, in and through his incarnate Son; and they who 'honor not the Son, honor not the Father that sent Him,' Mat. 11:25-27. John 5:20-23. The denial of the Son is, therefore, a denial of the Father; and the Supreme Being, the supposed Deity, which ancient or modern deniers of the personal or mediatorial honor of the Son, have professed to worship, is in fact the creature of their own imagination, and not the wise, just, holy, merciful, and faithful 'God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.' He, therefore, who 'denies the Son, has not the Father,' as his God, his Friend, and his Portion; but he, who, in true faith, 'acknowledges the Son, hath the Father also.'—This last clause is printed in Italics, because it is wanting in most copies of the Greek Test.; yet it is found in several manuscripts, so that Beza and many other able critics look on it as genuine.—(20) An unction.] All true Christians partake of the Spirit of sanctification, not all of the miraculous powers of the Holy Spirit.—From the Holy One.] Mark 1:24. Acts 3:14. Rev. 3:7.—The Lord Jesus seems especially intended; for through and by Him the Holy Spirit is given to us. Rev. 22:1.—(21) No lie is, &c.] Lie, here, means, a doctrine contrary to that taught by the apostles, which, being the true doctrine, its contrary must be false, or a lie. Mackn.—(22) Antichrist.] The article being used, 'the antichrist' is doubtless a more exact tr.; but the apostle was speaking, not so much prophetically, as of the time in which he wrote.—The character described was 'the antichrist' of his own age.—(24) Abide.] The same verb is rendered also remain and continue.

1 He declareth the singular love of God towards us, in making us his sons: 3 who therefore ought obediently to keep his commandments, 11 as also brotherly to love one another.

BEHOLD, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God! therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

2 Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is.

stable; but when He comes again, He will come from the opened heavens, and every eye shall see Him; and then they who have continued with Him throughout all their temptations, shall have confidence, assurance, and joy, in the sight of Him. On the contrary, they that have deserted Him shall be ashamed before Him; they shall be ashamed of themselves, ashamed of their unbelief, their cowardice, ingratitude, temerity, and folly, in forsaking so glorious a Redeemer. They shall be ashamed of their hopes, expectations, and pretences, and ashamed of all the wages of unrighteousness, by which they were induced to desert Him. That we may have confidence, and we may not be ashamed. The apostle includes himself in the number. Let not us be ashamed of you,

PRACT. OBS. V. 12—29. When there is real 'faith that worketh by love,' even 'little children' and weak believers may be assured, that 'their sins are forgiven them' for the sake of Christ; and though there are different degrees of growth, strength, knowledge, and grace, and some have obtained more victories over the wicked one, or are more fit for active service, or to give wise counsel, than others are; yet all are alike dear to their heavenly Father. But all must be careful 'not to love the world,' or any of its polluting vanities. This idolatry, remaining unsubdued in the hearts of many professors of the Gospel, occasions their apostasy or total unfruitfulness; and, through some remains of it, numbers are kept from comfort and assurance; their spiritual life continues low and feeble; they are mere babes, or dwarfs, to the end of their days, and enter eternity before they obtain any comfortable satisfaction, what their eternal state will be!—Those who have been delivered from that original and universal idolatry, 'the love of the world, and the things in the world,' will be less liable to be deceived by the seductions of those 'many antichrists,' who, in every age and place, endeavor to corrupt the Gospel, and to oppose the honor and cause of Christ. 'The unction from the Holy One' alone can teach that knowledge, which will surely preserve a man from all delusions; and when we are thus established in the great truths of the Gospel, we shall know 'that no lie is of the truth;' and shall, therefore, disregard the eloquence, learning, ingenuity, and confidence, of those who contradict the Bible; and be satisfied with opposing the express testimony of the truth itself,

V. 29. The expression, 'born of Him,' which is here most obviously interpreted of Christ, concerning whom the apostle was speaking, and thus becoming 'the sons of God,' (3:1.) clearly shows what John believed concerning his Lord; and also, that the same individual act is ascribed to God (5:1.), to Christ (29), and to the Holy Spirit. (John 3:5. Notes, Ps. 22:30, 31. Is. 8:18. 9:6, 7. 53:9, 10. Heb. 2:10, 13.)—The Quakers, and some others, have inferred, from v. 27. that a stated ministry is not necessary in the church; as true believers, being 'anointed by the Spirit,' need not such teaching; 'but it may be of moment to observe, that the Christian ministry was in the highest repute in the church, when the gifts of the Spirit were poured down upon it in the greatest abundance.' Doddr.—The papists, on the other hand, adhering to the outward form, and the opus operatum, (in which they have too many followers, among nominal protestants,) ground their chrism, or anointing with oil, upon it, which is applied in several ways; but is only an appointed shadow of the true 'unction from the Holy One;' yet, alas, it is too plain, that numbers, seizing on this shadow, come short of the substance.—(29) Born.] 3:9. 4:7. 5:1, 4, 18. John 1:13. 3:3—8. In all the passages in this epistle, and in several of the others, the passive perfect is used, which is properly, 'has been born,' or begotten.—And no allusion is at all made to baptism, in the whole epistle. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—3. (Note, John 1:10—13.) The apostle, having declared, that 'they who do righteousness are born of God,' (2:29.) here breaks out into a joyful and admiring view of the love of the

as well as you will not be ashamed of yourselves. Or,—that we be not ashamed, (made ashamed, or put to shame,) by Him at his coming. At his public appearance, He will shame all those who have abandoned Him, Mark 8:38.

2. Of the dignity of those who still adhere to Christ and his religion, v. 29. The particle here rendered if, seems to be not so much a conditional particle, as a suppositional one, if I may call it so; a note of allowance or confession; and so of the same import with our English inasmuch, or whereas, or since. So the sense runs more clear. Since ye know that He is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness, is born of Him. He that doeth righteousness, may here be justly enough assumed as another name for him that abideth in Christ. Such an one must be born of Him. He is renewed by the Spirit of Christ, after the image of Christ, Eph. 2:10. 'Since then ye know that the Lord Christ is righteous, as I Cor. 1:30. ye cannot but know thereupon,' (or know ye, it is for your consideration and regard,) 'that He who by the continued practice of Christianity abideth in Him, is born of Him.' The new spiritual nature is derived from the Lord Christ. The Lord Christ is an everlasting Father. It is a great privilege and dignity to be born of Him. They that are so, are the children of God. To as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, John 1:12. And this introduces the context of the following chapter.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. The apostle, having shown the dignity of Christ's faithful followers, now here, I. Breaks forth into the admiration of that grace that is the spring of such a wonderful vouchsafement. It is wonderful, condescending love of the eternal Father, that such as we should be made and called his sons; we who by nature are heirs of sin and guilt, and the curse of God; we who by practice are children of corruption, disobedience, and ingratitude! Strange, that the holy God is not ashamed to be called our Father, and to call us his sons! Thence the apostle, 2. Infers the honor of believers above the cognizance of the world. Little does the world perceive the advancement and happiness of the genuine followers of Christ; or think that these poor, humble, contemned ones are the favorites of heaven, and will be inhabitants there ere long. Little did the world think how great a Person was once sojourning here; He came to his own, and his own received Him not; but crucified Him; but, surely, had they known Him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. 2:8. Let the followers of Christ be content with hard fare here, since they are in a land of strangers, among those who little know them, and their Lord was so treated before them. Then the apostle, 3. Exalts these persevering disciples, in the prospect of the certain revelation of their state and dignity. Where, (1.) Their present honorable relation is asserted, v. 2. We have the nature of sons by regeneration; the title, spirit, and right to the inheritance of sons by adoption. (2.) The discovery of the bliss belonging and suitable to this relation is defined, v. 2. The glory pertaining to the sonship and adoption is reserved for another world. The discovery of it here would put a stop to the current of affairs that must now proceed. The sons of God must walk by faith, and live by hope. (3.) The time of the revelation of the sons of God in their proper state and glory, is determined; and that is, when their Elder Brother comes to call and collect them all together. But we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him. The particle usually translated if, is here well rendered when; as so it might more naturally and properly be rendered, John 14:3. When the Head of the church, the Only-begotten of the Father, shall appear, his members, the adopted of God, shall appear and be manifested together with Him. The sons of God will be known, and be made manifest by their likeness to their Head; they shall be like Him, like Him in

to their well varnished and ably defended falsehoods. We shall in this manner most clearly perceive, that every man is an antichrist, who denies the Person, or any of the offices of Christ; and that, in denying the Son, he denies the Father also, and has no part in his favor, while he rejects his great salvation. Candor and liberality of sentiment are good words; bigotry, fanaticism, and a contracted mind, sound very harsh; but let us not aspire to the reputation of liberality, or desire to escape reproach, more than the apostles did. While we judge favorably of all, who trust in Christ as a divine Savior, and obey his Word, let us pity and pray for those deluded men, who deny the Deity and atonement of Christ, and the work of his new-creating Spirit, protest against their antichristian doctrine, and refuse all needless intercourse with them. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) Let that abide in all, who have professed the Gospel, or would be deemed Christians, which was taught to the primitive disciples, that they may 'continue in the Son and in the Father,' and that the blessed promise of eternal life may belong to them also. The subjects above treated on, are peculiarly useful at this day, concerning 'those who seduce' the professed disciples of the Savior, and would persuade them, that it is of no consequence what they believe, concerning his Person or doctrine. This fashionable species of infidelity directly contradicts the whole Word of God, and in fact does its utmost to antiquate the Bible, as an useless book, in this age of wisdom and illumination. SCOTT.

eternal Father, in having bestowed on them the unspeakable honor and felicity of being 'called his sons,' or children. What manner of love was this! By what words could it be described? Whether his majesty, purity, and justice, or their guilt, meanness, pollution, and misery, were considered; whether the blessing conferred on them, or the method in which it was bestowed, were contemplated; the 'love of the Father' in it must be adored, as passing knowledge and comprehension. 4:9—12. John 3:16. Rom. 5:6—10. But, wherever the regenerating Spirit of God had produced this genuine hope in a man's heart, it would certainly induce him to desire and follow after holiness, as the preparation for this final happiness, and the anticipation of it; 1 Pet. 1:3—9. for he, who 'hoped,' or trusted, 'in God,' that He would render him perfectly happy, by fully renewing him to the holy image of the divine Savior, would also be fully convinced, that his present comfort must bear proportion to his sanctification; the assurance, that his labor in following after holiness would not be in vain, would also give energy to his endeavors. Nor would he ever rest satisfied with his attainments, so long as any sin remained in him; but he would use all means, and wait on God for the performance of his promises; till all his affections and powers were fully sanctified, all sinful passions destroyed, all holy dispositions perfected, and all his words and actions made conformable to those of his beloved Lord. As this can never be fully attained in the present life; the true Christian's diligence, in 'purifying himself as Christ is pure,' must be continued till death. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. 7:1. Then the

3 And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure.

4 Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law: for sin is the transgression of the law.

5 And ye know <sup>g</sup> that he was manifested to take away our sins; and in him is no sin.

6 Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever <sup>h</sup> sinneth, hath not seen him, neither known him.

[Practical Observations.]

7 Little children, let no man deceive you: he that <sup>i</sup> doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.

8 He <sup>j</sup> that committeth sin, is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that <sup>k</sup> he might destroy the works of the devil.

honor, and power, and glory, Col. 3:4. Then, (4.) Their likeness to Him is argued from the sight they shall have of Him. Their likeness will be the cause of that sight which they shall have of Him. Indeed, all shall see Him, but not as they do; others shall see Him in his avenging perfections, but they in the smiles and beauty of his face; in the correspondence and amiableness of his glory; in the harmony and agreeableness of his beatific perfections. Their likeness shall enable them to see Him as the blessed do in heaven. Or, the sight of Him shall be the cause of their likeness; it shall be a transformative sight. Then the apostle, 4. Urges the engagement of these sons of God to the prosecution of holiness, v. 3. The sons of God know that their Lord is holy and pure; of purer heart and eyes than to admit any pollution or impurity to dwell with Him. They then who hope to live with Him, must study the utmost purity from the world, and flesh, and sin; they must grow in grace and holiness. It is a contradiction to such hope, to indulge sin and impurity. And therefore as we are sanctified by faith, we must be sanctified by hope. That we may be saved by hope, we must be purified by hope. It is the hope of hypocrites, and not of the sons of God, that makes an allowance for the gratification of impure desires and lusts.

V. 4-10. The apostle, having alleged the believer's obligation to purity, from his hope of heaven, and of communion with Christ in glory, at the day of his appearance, now proceeds to multiply arguments against sin, and all communion with the impure, unfruitful works of darkness. And so he reasons and argues,

1. From the nature of sin, and the intrinsic evil of it. It is a contrariety to the divine law, v. 4. Sin is the destitution or privation of correspondence and agreement with the divine law; that law that is the transcript of the divine nature and purity, that contains his will for the government of the world, is suitable to the rational nature, and enacted for the good of the world, that shows man the way of felicity and peace, and conduces him to the Author of his nature and of the law.

2. From the design and errand of the Lord Jesus in and to this world, which was, to remove sin, v. 5. The Son of God appeared in our nature, to vindicate and exalt the divine law, and that, by obedience to the precept, and by subjection and suffering under the penal sanction, under the curse of it; to take away the guilt of sin by the sacrifice of Himself, the commission of it by implanting a new nature in us; and to disswade and save from it by his own example. They that expect communion with Christ above, should study communion with Him here in utmost purity.

3. From the opposition between sin and a real union with Christ, v. 6. To sin, here, is to commit sin, v. 8, 9. and to commit sin is to practise sin. He that abideth in Christ, continues not in the practice of sin. As vital union with the Lord Jesus broke the power of sin in the heart and nature; so continuance therein prevents the prevalence thereof in the life and conduct; or the negative expression is here put for the positive. They that abide in Christ, abide in their covenant with Him, and consequently watch against the sin that is contrary thereto. Practical renunciation of sin is the great evidence of spiritual union with, continuance in, and saving knowledge of, the Lord Christ.

4. From the connexion between the practice of righteousness and a state of righteousness; intimating withal, that the practice of sin and a justified state are inconsistent; and this is introduced with a supposition, that a surmise to the contrary is a gross deceit; 'Little children, beware of such self-deceit.' Or righteousness may in several places be justly rendered religion, as Mat. 5: 10. Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, that is, for religion's sake. So 1 Pet. 3: 14. and 2 Tim. 3: 16. To do righteousness, then, especially being set in opposition to the doing, committing, or practising, of sin, is to practise religion. Now he who practiseth religion, is righteous; he has that righteousness which consists in pardon of sin and right to life, founded on the imputation of the Mediator's righteousness. 2 Tim. 4: 8. He has communion with Christ, in conformity to the divine law, being in some measure practically righteous as He; and He has communion with Him in the justified state, being now relatively righteous together with Him.

5. From the relation between the sinner and the devil; and thereupon from the design and office of the Lord Christ against the devil. As elsewhere sinners and saints are distinguished, so to commit sin is, here, so

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-6. We can never sufficiently admire the love, which 'the Father hath bestowed upon us,' or rejoice enough in our own felicity, if indeed we are numbered among 'the children of God.' Who and what were we, or what had we done, that the infinite Lord should condescend thus to notice and distinguish us! 'What manner of love is this,' that He should so redeem, regenerate, adopt, and bless such worthless worms, such guilty, polluted rebels! Doubtless it is vast beyond conception, and incapable of being illustrated by any comparison. May we then be 'followers of Him as his dear children;' and thus show our sense of his unspeakable mercy, and express that obedient, grateful, and humble mind, which becomes those who are so highly favored and distinguished. Even in our lowest estate, and under our heaviest trials, 'we are the children of God,' if we indeed believe in Jesus Christ; and we shall experience such consolations, and possess such hopes, as will support us under our transient sorrows; but none on earth can conceive, in an adequate manner, the nature of 'that exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' into which we shall speedily enter. 2 Cor. 4: 13-18. Yet let none suppose, that they possess 'this hope in Him,' if they do not now desire, pursue, and practise holiness; for every man, without exception, in whose heart this hope is planted by the Holy Spirit, 'purifieth himself,' in dependence on the grace, and in contemplation of the glory, of Christ, unto increasing conformity to his perfect purity. SCOTT.

soil will be admitted into his presence, and perfected in his likeness; but the complete conformity of the Christian to his Lord, in body and soul, will not be possessed till the general resurrection.—'He does not say, "has purified," but "purifieth," that we may understand him to signify, following after holiness, not the perfect attainment of it.' Beza, (2) Appear.] 2 Cor. 5: 10. Notes, 2 Cor. 5: 9-12. Col. 3: 1-4. 'It is not manifested, what we shall be;' something is revealed, but not all fully and clearly; 'but when He shall be manifested, we shall see Him as He is.' (3) In Him.] That is, in Christ, who shall appear. Til. 2: 13. He who thus hopeth in Christ, &c. Eph. 1: 9-12. 1 Pet. 1: 17-21. Sc.

(1.) Sons of God.] 'Children of God.—When the Danish missionaries appointed some of their Malabarian converts to translate a catechism, in which it was mentioned as the privilege of Christians to become the Sons of God, one of the translators was startled at so bold a saying, as he thought it, and said, "It is too much; let me rather render it, They shall be permitted to kiss his feet." DONDR.

(2.) When He, &c.] 'The apostle evidently speaks of Christ, coming to judge the world; for nowhere in Scripture is God said to appear, so as to be the object of men's sight. John 4: 12.—'We shall be like Him.] 'Namely, both in body and mind. For, Phil. 3: 21. "He will re-fashion our humbled body, in order that it may become of like form with his glorious body." And with respect to our mind, we shall be made like Him in holiness, by seeing Him as He is.' MACKN.—'As He is.' 'I. e. not "darkly," but "face to face," as Paul, 1 Cor. 13: 12. and hence felicity the most complete. The commentators enlarge, but they seem to forget the words just before, doth not yet appear.' BLOOMF.

V. 4-6. The ceremonial law cannot here be intended. Thus it was taken for granted, that the holy law of God was the rule of conduct to all his true servants, and that none of them, wilfully and habitually, did anything contrary to it.—(4) Committeth sin.] 7-9. 1: 6. 2: 20. John 3: 21. 8: 34. No single righteous act constitutes 'a doer of righteousness,' but the habitual practice of it: thus a doer of sin, is one who practises it habitually. SCOTT.

(4.) Committeth sin.] 'Practiseth it.' DONDR.—'This sense of the word should be attended to, in order to perceive the justness of the apostle's reasoning in this and the following part of the ch. particularly v. 6. [636] and 9.' MACKN.—'The best commentators are agreed that habitual, wilful, flagitious sin is meant.' BLOOMF.

V. 7-10. John here warned his beloved children, as the other apostles had before done, 1 Cor. 6: 9-11. Gal. 6: 6-10. Eph. 5: 5-7. Jan. 1: 22-25. 2 Pet. 1: 8, 9. not to let any man deceive them by plausible pretences, into an opinion, that they might live in habitual sin and yet be true Christians.—'Was manifested, &c.]—Consequently, the end of his incarnation and humiliation had not been in any degree answered in respect of them; [such as, though they professed to be his disciples, yet lived in sin;] and therefore they could not be warranted to account themselves his disciples. (9) Cannot sin, &c.] This [viz. as in Henry] must be all the apostle's general words can mean; because, if strictly taken, so as to mean, that the regenerate could not sin in any instance, 4-6. 5: 16-18. Rom. 6: 1, 2. Gal. 5: 16-18. they would not only prove, that some men are perfect, but that all regenerate persons are incapable of sinning any more for ever; an inference, which no man, who either reads the Bible, or the history of mankind, will ever admit. 1: 8-10. General declarations of this kind, must always be explained, according to the argument of the sacred writer; otherwise, an antinomian may prove, that 'God justifies' those who are in every sense 'ungodly,' and who never do good works of any kind, or for any purpose, as long as they live, Rom. 4: 5. and a man who runs into the other extreme may prove, that all the children of God are perfectly sinless, and that no regenerate person can possibly fall into any sin. But Scripture must be explained by itself, and soberly; and the context evidently shows, that the apostle spoke of an allowed practice of some habitual sin; this he declared to be impossible to the regenerate, and a full proof of a man's being 'the child of the devil.' For in this especially 'the children of God, and the children of the devil,' were manifestly distinguished from one another; and he who did not 'practise righteousness was not of God;' whatever his creed, profession, gifts, or experience might be; nay, this was to be carried to so great a strictness, that he who did not 'love his brother,' but showed a selfish, envious, and malignant spirit in his general conduct, was not to be accounted a child of God, but of the devil.—(8) He that committeth sin is of the devil.] Note, John 8: 41-47. 'It is not he, who committeth one or more sins of infirmity, for 9 Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

10 In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness, is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother.

[Practical Observations.]

11 For this is the message that we heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.

12 Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous.

13 Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

And he who does so, is of the devil; his sinful nature is inspired by, and agreeable and pleasing to, the devil; and he belongs to the party and interest and kingdom of the devil, the author and patron of sin, a tempter and instigator to it, even from the beginning of the world. And thereupon see how he argues from the design and office of the Lord Christ against the devil, v. 8. The devil has designed and endeavored to ruin the work of God in this world. The Son of God has undertaken the holy war against him. He came into our world, and was manifested in our flesh, that He might conquer him, and dissolve his works. Let not us serve or indulge what the Son of God came to destroy.

PRACT. OBS. V. 7-10. In the vast concern of eternal happiness or misery, how careful should we be not to deceive ourselves! and the argument of the apostle, in these verses, points out a way, in which many, it is to be feared, are self-deceived: for, however we interpret some expressions, they must prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that they only are 'righteous before God,' as justified believers, who are taught and inclined, and enabled, by 'the renewal of the Holy Spirit,' to practise universal righteousness, in the general tenor of their conduct; and, that a man's conformity to the example of Christ, is the only adequate evidence of his being interested in his redemption. May all pro-

did Christ's disciples while they were with Him; nor he who committeth one great sin, through the power of a strong temptation, of which he bitterly repents, and from which he returns to his obedience, for thus did David and Peter, who yet were not then the children of the devil; but they who comply with the lusts of Satan, and will do them. The other interpretations of these words, including the preceding verses, seem either vain and impertinent, or false and dangerous.' Whitby.—Discordant ways of obviating the difficulty, arising from attempting to establish the strictest literal meaning of the apostle's words, all being evidently unscriptural, serve to show, that this was not intended.—1. The regenerate ought not to sin. Ought then others to sin? 2. When the regenerate sin, they cease to be 'children of God.' Yet apostles say, 'In many things we offend all.' 1:8-10. 3. They cannot sin, as their 'sins are not imputed to them.' This deserves no answer.—'He that is born of God proposeth to himself a life as free from sin as possible, nor does he ever of his own accord employ himself in sin; if at any time, contrary to the purpose of his mind, he has offended, he does not persist in the same; but, acknowledging his fault, he speedily returns to his former plan of life, as soon and as much as he can.' Cataker.—(7) He that doeth righteousness.] 10. 2:29.—(8) He that committeth.] Note, 4-6.—Sinneth.] Is not the devil's sinning habitual? He that sins, after his example, is one of his children, and he who does righteousness habitually after Christ's example, is one of the children of God.—(9) Seed.] The apostle could not mean, that this seed which remained in the regenerate, perished. If baptism be regeneration, or always attended by it; then it may be rendered 'he cannot sin, because he hath been baptized!'

(6.) Whosoever sinneth.] 'Every one who habitually and allowedly sinneth. It seems absolutely necessary to interpret the expression thus, to make one scripture consistent with another, (comp. James 3:2.) and even to reconcile this assertion to other passages in this epistle. See ch. 1:8-10.' DODDR.—'This passage is not contradictory to ch. 1:8-10. The one refers to particular deeds, the other to general practice.'

T. H. HORNE.

(7.) He that doeth righteousness.] 'He that practiseth it, not performs some one righteous act: no man can be entitled to the character of being righteous, who does not practise universal righteousness.' DODDR.—Righteous.] 'The apostle does not mean that to be righteous in the sight of God, it is necessary that one be perfectly righteous; but that to be accounted righteous by God, we must endeavor [through penation and the relinquishment of sin, v. 9. To be born of God, is to be inwardly renewed, and restored to a holy integrity or rectitude of nature, by the power of the Spirit of God. Such an one committeth not sin, does not work iniquity and practise disobedience; that is contrary to his new nature, and the regenerate complexion of his spirit. For, as the apostle adds, his seed, either the Word of God, in its light and power, remaineth in him, as 1 Pet. 1:23. or, that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit, the spiritual, seminal principle of holiness remaineth in him. Renewing grace is an abiding principle. And thereupon the consequence is, the regenerate person cannot sin; that he cannot commit an act of sin, I suppose no judicious interpreter understands. That would be contrary to ch. 1:9. where it is made our duty to confess our sins, and supposed, that our privilege thereupon, is, to have our sins forgiven. He therefore cannot sin, in the sense in which the apostle says, he cannot commit sin. He cannot continue in the course and practice of sin. He cannot so sin, as to denominate him a sinner in opposition to a saint, or servant of God. Again, he cannot sin comparatively, as he did before he was born of God, and as others do that are not so. And the reason is, because he is born of God; which will amount to all this inhibition and impediment: (1.) There is that light in his mind, that shows him the evil and malignity of sin. (2.) There is that bias on his heart, that disposes him to loathe and hate sin. (3.) There is the spiritual, seminal principle or disposition, that breaks the force and fulness of the sinful acts. Then, (4.) There is a disposition for humiliation and repentance for sin, when it has been committed. He that is born of God, cannot sin. Here we may call to mind the usual distinction of natural and moral impotency. The unregenerate person is morally unable for what is religiously good. The regenerate person is happily disabled for sin. We usually say of a person of known integrity, 'He cannot lie, he cannot cheat, and commit other enormities.' Gen. 39:9. And so they who persist in a sinful life, sufficiently demonstrate that they are not born of God.

7. From the discrimination between children of God and children of the devil. They have their distinct characters, v. 10. The seed of the serpent is known by these two signatures: their neglect of religion; whosoever doeth not righteousness; and their hatred of fellow-Christians; neither he that loveth not his brother, v. 10. True Christians are to be loved for God's and Christ's sake. They who so love them not, but despise, and hate, and persecute them, have the serpentine nature still abiding in them.

V. 11-13. The apostle, having intimated that one note of the devil's children, is, hatred of the brethren, takes occasion, thence,

1. To recommend fraternal Christian love, and that from the excellence, or antiquity, or primariness of the injunction relating thereto; And this is the message, the errand or charge, which ye heard from the beginning, (this came among the principal parts of practical Christianity,) that we should love one another, v. 11.

2. To dissuade from what is contrary thereto, all ill-will toward the brethren, and that by the example of Cain. He slew his brother, v. 12. Sin, indulged, knows no bound. He was vexed with the superiority of Abel's service, and envied him the favor and acceptance he had with God. And for these he martyred his brother. Ill-will will teach us to hate and revenge what we should admire and imitate. And then,

3. To infer, that it is no wonder good men are so served now, v. 13. The serpentine nature still continues in the world. The great serpent himself reigns as the god of this world. Wonder not, then, that the serpentine world hates and hisses at you who fessors of the Gospel lay these truths to heart, and examine themselves by them: and let all ministers be sure, as they will answer it before the Lord Jesus, at the day of judgment, to insist fully on these topics, and make them plain to their hearers. For numbers are most certainly 'deceived by vain words;' 'sin on, that grace may abound;' make the lamented fact, of a believer's liability to be overcome by temptation, a palliation of their habitual wickedness; and hope for heaven, whilst living in the secret, nay, perhaps, the open commission of those things, 'for which the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience.' Eph. 5:5-7.

(3.) For this purpose, &c.] 'The argument here requires a kaitoi, and yet. [And yet for, &c.] Indeed, the omission or peculiar use of the particles, is one of the causes of difficulty in John's writings.' BL.

V. 9. See on v. 4. Doth not commit sin.—doth not habitually practise it. So the best commentators. And 'by translating the phrase thus according to the true import of the original, the argument drawn from this text, to prove the sinless perfection of the saints in the present life, is precluded.' So Mackn.; who, further, in relation to his seed, &c., refers to 1 Pet. 1:23. and Ps. 119:11. and says, what is meant by that is, 'that principle of faith which is wrought by God in the hearts of believers, and by which they are said, ch. 4. to obtain the victory over the world.' BL., in relation to 'he cannot sin,' takes it, after 'the most eminent commentators from Grot. to Ros., of moral impossibility, implying, that the born of God cannot bring himself to commit such sin [i. e. habitual sin]; it is foreign from his disposition.' EN.

V. 13-15. Humble, disinterested, active, liberal, and forgiving love of men in general, for the Lord's sake, is indeed a good evidence of regeneration; but it is manifest the apostle spoke here especially of the love of believers towards their brethren in Christ, as such. No murderer hath eternal life, &c.] No doubt David, when in one dreadful instance he was guilty of complicated murder, had 'eternal life abiding in him,' 2 Sam. 11:14-17. nor is there any single sin, into which it is impossible for a regenerate man to fall. But the apostle was showing, that no true believer could live in habitual sin; and he stated, that he who loved not his brother did in effect hate him; and he, who habitually hated his brother, was constantly of the temper of a murderer; that is, he bore the image, and was of the disposition, of the devil, and therefore was one of his children, and not one of the children of a God of love.—What an awful view do the concluding words give of the state of those numbers, who habitually determine, by duelling, to attempt the commission of murder, whenever an occasion seems to call for it!—'The apostle does not say, that by loving our brethren, we are translated from death to life; . . . but that we may "know that we have passed." Beza. It is the evidence and effect, and not the cause. The state of death in sin and condemnation, in which all men are by nature, is here taken for granted, as an undeniable fact; 2 Cor. 5:13-15. Eph. 2:1-3. and also, that those who are 'born of God,' have 'eternal life

14 We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother, abideth in death.

15 Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.

16 Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

17 But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

V. 14—19. The beloved apostle can scarcely touch on the mention of sacred love, but he must enlarge on the enforcement of it; as here he does by divers arguments and incentives thereto; us,

1. That it is a note of our evangelical justification, of our transition into a state of life, v. 14. We are by nature children of wrath and heirs of death. By the Gospel our state towards another world is altered and changed. We pass from death to life; from the guilt of death to the right of life. And this transition is made on our believing in the Lord Jesus, John 3:36. Now this happy change of state we may come to be assured of; We know, &c. we may know it by the evidences of our faith in Christ, of which this love to our brethren is one. But this love, (1.) supposes a general love to mankind; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Mankind are to be loved principally on these two accounts; as the excellent work of God, and as being beloved in Christ. The reason God assigns for the certain punishment of a murderer, is a reason against our hatred of any of the brethren of mankind, and consequently a reason for our love to them; for in the image of God made He man, Gen. 9:6. And the whole human race should be considered in distinction from fallen angels, as having a divine Redeemer designed, prepared, and given for them, John 3:16. A world so beloved of God, should accordingly be loved by us. And then this love will include all due love to enemies themselves. (2.) It includes a peculiar love to the Christian church, and that for the sake of her Head, as being his body, as being redeemed, justified, and sanctified, in and by Him; and this love particularly acts and operates toward those we have opportunity of being personally acquainted with, or credibly informed of. They are not so much loved for their own sakes, as for the sake of God and Christ, who have loved them. And so this is the issue of faith in Christ; and is thereupon a note of our passage from death to life.

2. The hatred of our brethren is, on the contrary, a sign of our deadly state, of our continuance under the legal sentence of death, v. 14. He yet stands under the curse and condemnation of the law. This the apostle argues by a clear syllogism; 'Ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him; but he who hates his brother is a murderer; therefore ye cannot but know, that he who hates his brother hath not eternal life abiding in him,' v. 15. Or, he abideth in death, as it is expressed v. 14. No wonder he who has a considerable acquaintance with the heart of man, or is taught by Him who fully knows it, who knows the natural tendency and issue of vile and violent passions, and knows, withal, the fulness of the divine law, declares him who hates his brother to be a murderer, Rom. 8:6. The apostle, by the expression of having eternal life abiding in us, may seem to mean the possession of an internal principle of endless life,—according to that of the Savior, Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst, shall never be totally destitute thereof; but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life, John 4:14. And thereupon some may be apt to surmise, that the passing from death to life, v. 14. does not signify the relative change made in our justification of life, but the real change made in the regeneration to life; and, accordingly, that the abiding in death, mentioned v. 14. is continuance in spiritual death, as it is usually called, or abiding in the corrupt, deadly temper of nature. But as these passages more naturally denote the state of the person, whether adjudged to life or death; so the relative transition from death to life may well be proved or disproved by the possession or non-possession of the inward principle of eternal life; since washing from the guilt of sin is inseparably united with washing from the filth and power of sin, 1 Cor. 6:11.

3. The example of God and Christ should inflame our hearts with this holy love, v. 16. The great God has given his Son to the death for us. But since this apostle has declared that the Word was God, and that He became flesh for us; I see not why we may not interpret this of God the Word. Here is the love of God Himself, of Him who in his own Person is God, though not the Father, that He assumed a life, that He might lay it down for us! Here is the condescension, the miracle, the mystery of divine love, that God would redeem the church with his own blood! Surely, we should love those whom God hath loved, and so loved: we shall certainly do so, if we have any love for God.

The apostle, having proposed this flaming, constraining example of love, and motive to it, proceeds to show us what should be the temper and effect of this our Christian love. And so, 1. It must be, in the highest degree, so fervent as to make us willing to suffer even to death for the good of the church, for the safety and salvation of the dear brethren, v. 16. either in our ministrations and services to them, Phil. 2:17. or in exposing ourselves to hazards, when called thereto, Rom. 16:4. How mortified should the Christian be to this life! How prepared to part with it! And how well assured of a better! 2. It must be, in the next degree, compassionate, liberal, and communicative to the necessities

PRACT. OBS. V. 11—17. In ascertaining our state and character, as well as inquiring after our duty, it behooves us to advert especially to 'the message,' delivered to Christians, 'from the beginning, to love one another.' For the children of God are distinguished by humble, harmless, and self-denying love; as those of the devil are, by proud, selfish, and mischievous hatred: or disregard to the welfare of others, except as connected with their own comfort or enjoyment.—If indeed we 'love the brethren,' we may know, that we have passed from our natural state of enmity and spiritual death and condemnation; and are brought into the company of those, who are 'alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord.' But if this radical grace be wholly wanting, the most plausible professor of the Gospel 'abideth in death': yea, he is a murderer in his abiding in them; and may 'know that they are passed from death unto life.' 2:3—6.—The true Christian, as such, is the brother, and the object of special affection to all believers; but men in general are our brethren, in Adam. So that hatred of any man, a brother by nature, proves the professed Christian unregenerate; but love of Christians especially, is, in this respect, the most indisputable proof of regeneration. (14) Passed, &c.] John 5:24. The words are the same; 'from the death to the life.'—This is said even of the best of men. . . . They are, as it were, born in the land . . . of death; . . . the Gospel finds them in such a condition, as to be liable to condemnation and destruction, to the execution of a capital sentence. . . . Such oblique expressions speak such truths as these, in a manner peculiarly convincing and affecting.' DODD.—Abideth, &c.] Not is brought into that state; but continues in his original ruined condition, as unregenerate.—A murderer. SCOTT.

(14.) 'The love which one Christian has for another, is not a blind, enthusiastic passion; it is a rational affection [and sympathy], arising from a previous opinion of him as a Christian. Love to the brethren is the same thing as a love of truth and holiness. It is not our loving another, but our loving that virtue which appears in another, that may be called love to the brethren, as such, and proves our having passed from death to life.'

V. 16, 17. The effects of genuine love toward the brethren required to be ascertained; and this might be understood, by considering 'the love of God' to sinners. Many copies read 'love,' and not 'the love of God;' so that the same weight cannot be laid on this passage, as on a similar one, Acts 20:28.—Every instance and degree of this selfishness, [withholding charity when it might be given to worthy objects,] must weaken the evidence of a man's conversion: and when it is habitual and allowed, it must decide that he does not belong to God, but resembles Cain far more than Jesus Christ; seeing he would rather leave the heart; he bears the image of Satan, and 'hath not eternal life abiding in him.' If it may, in some cases, be our duty to lay down our lives for our brethren, what shall we say to those persons, professing the Gospel of Christ, who are rich in this world; and either hoard the greatest part of their wealth, or spend it in gratifying 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of life,' 2:15—17. whilst they behold their poor brethren in distress, and refuse to pity them, or to part with any due proportion of their abundance, for their relief? How can it be thought that 'the love of God dwelleth in them?' Or how can 'they suppose themselves followers of Christ,' when 'this world's good' is more valued by them, than his example, commandment, glory, and favor, or the comfort and even lives of their brethren? Lu. 16:19—31. 2 Cor. 8:6—9. S.

children of God to suffer or die, than part with his money, or abridge his own indulgences, to alleviate their sorrows, or save their lives. This might also be deemed constructive murder; as such a man refused to preserve life, when it was in his power, and when it was his bounden duty to do it; and if the Lord had acted thus towards sinners and enemies, we must all have perished. Prov. 24:11, 12. Rom. 14:13—18. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.—As no higher expression of love is mentioned, than a willingness to 'lay down our lives for our brethren;' it is manifest, that the apostle did not maintain the extravagant notion, that true grace will make us willing to be eternally miserable, for the glory of God and the good of the universe! (17) This world's good.] 2:16. Luke 21:4.—Not riches, but things needful, with a little to spare, are meant. Sc.

(16.) Hereby perceive we the love of God.] 'The words "of God," being omitted in many MSS. and most printed editions, are put in italics: but Mackn. supplies from v. 8. "the Son of God." Doddr. reads, "Hereby perceive we love," comparo v. 1.' WILLIAMS—Bl. renders the v. thus: 'By this we may know (what) love (is), namely, that He laid down his life for us, and thus ought we to lay down our lives for the brethren.' Ros. renders: 'The true nature of love.' But 'it must surely,' Bloomf. adds, 'be mentioned with reference to Christ.' Ep. V. 18—24. According to the law, and the covenant of works, every man's heart must 'condemn him,' in proportion as he knows the rule of duty, and examines himself by it. Even according to the Gospel, his own heart must condemn of hypocrisy every man, who lives in allowed, habitual sin: unless his conscience be seared, and God have given him up to be judicially blinded and hardened. Nay, when true believers are betrayed into any known sin, of omission or commission, they are arraigned at the tribunal of their own hearts, and condemned for it: and 19 And hereby <sup>x</sup> we know that we are of the truth, and shall <sup>y</sup> assure our hearts before him.

20 For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 Beloved, if our heart <sup>z</sup> condemn us not, then have we confidence <sup>a</sup> toward God.

22 And whatsoever <sup>b</sup> we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight.

23 And this <sup>c</sup> is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.

24 And he <sup>d</sup> that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby <sup>e</sup> we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

of the brethren, v. 17. It pleases God, that some of the Christian brethren should be poor, for the exercise of the charity and love of those that are rich. And it pleases the same God, to give to some of the Christian brethren this world's good, that they may exercise their grace in communicating to the poor saints. It appears here, that this love to the brethren is founded on love to God, in that it is here called so by the apostle; How dwelleth the love of God in him? This love to the brethren is love to God in them, and where there is none of this love to them, there is no true love to God at all. 3. I was going to intimate the third and lowest degree in the next verse; but the apostle has prevented me, by intimating that this last charitable, communicative love, in persons of ability, is the lowest that can consist with the love of God. But there may be other fruits of this love; and therefore the apostle desires that in all it should be unfeigned and operative, as circumstances will allow, v. 18. Compliments and flatteries become not Christians; but the sincere expressions of sacred affection, and the services or labors of love, do. Then,

4. This love will evince our sincerity in religion, and give us hope toward God,

PRACT. OBS. V. 18—24. All Christians, whether rich or poor, should be careful to love one another, 'not in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth;' leaving cheap and hollow compliments to the 'children of the wicked one;' as the necessary varnish and polishing of selfishness. But when 'our hearts condemn us,' of acting contrary to our duty, and inconsistently with our profession; the consideration of the greatness, holiness, and omniscience of God, must weaken our confidence, and give us apprehensions of being dealt with after our own measure of penuriousness and severity: while the Spirit of God, being grieved by our selfishness, will leave us disconsolate and full of darkness and terror. Thus we feel, when called by the hour or season to approach the throne of grace, as children, who, being conscious of having acted contrary to the will of their parents, are ashamed and afraid to meet them; seek excuses for shunning them; or appear dejected in their presence, as afraid of rebukes, frowns, and corrections, and not expecting endearments and caresses. Hence, much interruption and neglect of prayer; to our unspeakable detriment! But when our hearts do not condemn us, of allowed deviations from our duty; then, like children who are conscious of having done aright, and, being assured of their loving parents' approbation, rejoice in their approach, we have confidence with God; and 'whatsoever we ask we receive of Him,' because we show that we repent and believe, by 'keeping his commandments, and doing those things which are well-pleasing in his sight.' Thus a gratuitous salvation, and the holy obedience of love, are inseparably connected; as the substance of the command of God to sinners 'is faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and love to one another' for his sake. This obedience, though utterly insufficient for our justification, (for 'we are made the righteousness of God in Christ,') proves that 'we dwell in Him and He in us;' the sanctifying Spirit, which He has given us, forns and maintains the sacred union, and 'seals us the children of God;' and his consolations are the foretastes of our eternal felicity.

v. 19. It is a great happiness to be assured of our integrity in religion. The way to arrive at the knowledge of our own truth and uprightness in Christianity, and to secure our inward peace, is, to abound in love, and in the works of love toward the Christian brethren.

V. 20—22. The apostle, having intimated that there may be, even among us, such a privilege as an assurance or sound persuasion of heart toward God, proceeds here,

1. To establish the court of conscience, and to assert the authority of it, v. 20. Our heart, here, is our self-reflecting, judicial power, whereby we can take cognizance of our spirits, dispositions, and actions; and accordingly pass a judgment on our state toward God; and so it is the same with conscience, or the power of moral self-consciousness: this power can act both as witness, judge, and executioner of judgment; it is set and placed in this office by God Himself, Prov. 20:27. Conscience acts for God, 1 Pet. 3:21. God is chief Judge of the court; is superior in power and judgment; hence the act and judgment of the court are the act and judgment of God; as, (1.) If conscience condemn us, God does so too, v. 20. God is a greater Witness, and knoweth more against us than conscience does; He knoweth all things; and, as He is supreme, so his judgment shall stand, and shall be fully and finally executed. This seems to be the design of another apostle, 1 Cor. 4:4. Or, (2.) If conscience acquit us, God does so too, v. 21. But, possibly, some presumptuous soul may here say, 'I am glad of this; my heart does not condemn me, and therefore I may conclude God does not.' As, on the contrary, on the foregoing verse, some pious, trembling soul will be ready to cry out, 'God forbid! My heart or conscience condemns me, and must I then infallibly expect the condemnation of God?' But let such know, that the errors of the witness are not here reckoned as the acts of the court; the court of conscience is here described in its process, according to the original constitution of it by God Himself; according to which process, what is bound in conscience, is bound in heaven; let conscience therefore be heard, be well-informed, and diligently attended to.

2. To indicate the privilege of those who have a good conscience toward God; they have interest in heaven, and in the court above; their suits are heard there, v. 22. It is supposed that the petitioners do not desire, or do not intend to desire, anything contrary to the honor or glory of the court, or to their own intended spiritual good; and then they may depend on receiving the good things they ask for; and this supposition may well be made concerning the petitioners, or they may well be supposed to receive the good things they ask for, considering their qualification and practice, v. 22. Obedient souls are prepared for blessings, and they have promise of audience; they who commit things displeasing to God, cannot expect He should please them in hearing and answering their prayers, Ps. 66:18. Prov. 28:9.

V. 23, 24. The apostle, having mentioned keeping the commandments, and [the] pleasing of God, as the qualification of effectual petitioners in and with heaven, here proceeds,

1. To represent to us what those commandments primarily and summarily are, in this double one, v. 23. To believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, is, (1.) To discern what He is, according to his name; to have an intellectual view of his Person and office, as the Son of God, and the anointed Saviour of the world; that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life, John 6:40. (2.) To approve Him in judgment and conscience, in conviction and consciousness of our case, as one wisely and wonderfully prepared and adapted for the whole work of the eternal salvation. (3.) To consent to Him, and acquiesce in Him, as our Redeemer and Recoverer unto God. (4.) To trust to Him, and rely on Him, for the full and final discharge of his saving office, Ps. 9:10. 2 Tim. 1:12. This is the first part of the commandment that must be observed by acceptable worshippers; the second is, that we love one another, as He gave us commandment, v. 23. The command of Christ should be continually before our eyes; Christian love must possess our souls when we go to God in prayer; to this end we must remember, that our Lord obliges us to forgive those who offend us, Mat. 6:14. and to reconcile ourselves to those whom we have offended, Mat. 5:23, 24.

2. To represent to us the blessedness of obedience to these commands; the obedient enjoy communion with God, v. 24. We dwell in God by a happy relation to Him, and spiritual union with Him, through his Son, and by a holy converse with Him; and God dwells in us by his Word, and our faith fixed on Him, and by the operations of his Spirit: then there occurs the trial of his divine inhabitation, by the sacred disposition and frame of soul He hath conferred on us; which, being a spirit of faith in God and Christ, and of love to God and man, appears to be of God.

affections not only necessarily belong to true religion, but constitute a principal part of it. And, as true religion is of a practical nature, and God has so constituted the human frame, that the affections are the chief spring of men's actions, this also shows that true religion must consist very much in the affections. Faith, hope, charity, or love, are represented as the three great things of which religion consists.

(19—24.) 'Though self-examination is a duty of great importance, yet it is not the principal mean, by which the saints obtain satisfaction as to their interest in the favor of God. [It is rather a mean of growing in grace, by finding wherein we offend and come short in duty.] Assurance is not to be obtained so much by self-examination, as by ACTIVE PIETY. Paul sought it thus. So Peter directs, 2 Pet. 1:5—11.'

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The apostle, having said that God's dwelling in and with us may be known by the Spirit He hath given us, intimates that that Spirit may be discerned and distinguished from other spirits that appear in the world; and so here,

1. He calls the disciples, to whom he writes, to caution and scrutiny about the spirits, and spiritual professors now risen. (1.) To caution, v. 1. follow not every pretender. Truth is the foundation of simulation and counterfeits; there had been real communications from the divine Spirit, therefore others pretended thereto. But every pretender to the divine Spirit, or to inspiration, and extraordinary illumination thereby, is not to be believed. Time was, when the spiritual man (the man of the Spirit), who made a great boast of the Spirit) was mad, Hos. 9:7. (2.) To scrutiny; examine the claims laid to the Spirit, v. 1. a judgment of discretion is allowed in reference to the spirits that would be believed and trusted in the affairs of religion; and a reason is given for this trial. Much about the Savior's time there was a general expectation, among the Jews, of a Redeemer to Israel; and the humiliation, spiritual reformation, and sufferings of the Savior being taken as a prejudice against Him, others set up as prophets and messiahs to Israel, according to the Savior's prediction, Mat. 24:23, 24. It should not seem strange to us, that false teachers set up in the church; it was so in the apostle's times; fatal is the spirit of delusion, sad that men should vaunt themselves for prophets and inspired preachers, that are by no means so!

2. He gives a test whereby the disciples may try these pretending spirits, v. 2. Jesus Christ is to be confessed as the Son of God, the eternal Life and Word, that was with the Father from the beginning; as the Son of God that came into, and came in, our human, mortal nature, and therein suffered and died at Jerusalem. He who confesses and preaches this, by a mind supernaturally instructed and enlightened therein, does it by the Spirit of God, or God is the Author of that illumination. On the contrary, Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, (or, that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh,) is not of God, v. 3. God has given so much testimony to Jesus Christ, that ye may be assured, that any impulse or pretended inspiration that contradicts this, is far from being from heaven and of God. The sun of revealed religion is comprehended in the doctrine concerning Christ, his Person and office. We see, then, the aggravation of a formed opposition against Him and it, v. 3. It was foreknown by God, that antichrists would arise; also that one eminent antichrist would make a long and fatal war against Christ; this great antichrist would have his way prepared, and his rise facilitated, by other and less antichrists, and the spirit of error working and disposing men's minds for him; the antichristian spirit began betimes, even in the apostles' days. Dreadful and unsearchable is the judgment of God, that persons should be given over to such darkness and delusion, as to set themselves against the Son of God, and all the testimony the Father hath given to the Son! But we have been foretold and forewarned that such opposition would arise; we should therefore cease to be offended; and the more we see the word of Christ fulfilled, the more confirmed we should be in the truth of it.

V. 4—6. In these verses, the apostle encourages the disciples against the fear and danger of this seducing, antichristian spirit, and that by such methods as these: 1. He assures them of a more divine principle in them, v. 4. We are of God, v. 6. We are

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. In giving this direction, the apostle did not make his appeal to the miracles wrought by the true prophets. Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Thes. 2:3—12. But he deemed it more decisive, to determine the matter by the agreement or disagreement of their doctrine with that which the apostles had from the first preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. For this was confirmed by the Scriptures of the Old Test. by all the miracles of Christ, and all the prophecies fulfilled in Him; by his resurrection, and the accomplishment of his engagements and predictions, and by all the miracles performed by the first preachers and professors of Christianity, during a number of years; and nothing done by those false prophets, who opposed their doctrine, could pretend to equal this multiplied demonstration.—This shows, that Christians who are well acquainted with the Scriptures, may, in humble dependence on divine teaching, know for themselves, who it is that preaches according to the doctrine of the apostles, and who contradicts it; and that they are bound to make this trial of men and their tenets; and so it establishes the right of private judgment. It shows, also, that no pretences to the Spirit, to inspiration, or new revelations, are to be regarded as anything better than Satanical delusions, when they are brought to disprove or oppose the fundamental doctrines delivered by the apostles; that even apparent miracles would be totally insufficient to authenticate an antisciptural doctrine; and consequently, that philosophical reasonings and human authority must be entirely disregarded. These premises conclude equally against Mystics, Enthusiasts, Papists, Socinians, and Deists, who may mutually despise and oppose each other, but all agree in setting up new lights, against the authenticated and complete light of divine revelation.—The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, in examining and deciding, who spake by the Spirit of God, and who did not, to observe, that every spirit which confessed Jesus Christ, as having come in the flesh, was of God. 2:18—25. Mat. 10:32, 33. 11:25—27. John 16:14, 15. 1 Cor. 12:1—3. This must be understood of an intelligent confession of the doctrine, delivered by the apostles, concerning the Lord Jesus, his Person, and his offices. The reality of his human nature was, no doubt, peculiarly adverted to by the expression, 'come in the flesh;' but, who could have doubted of his having been really a Man, if it had been generally understood and believed, that He was merely a Man? And if the apostle had not known, that, as 'the Son of God,' He could have come otherwise than 'in the flesh,' he would scarcely have noticed his 'coming in the flesh,' as an essential part of this confession. For who would have said, that John the Baptist, or John the apostle, came 'in the flesh,' when they were employed in preaching the Gospel? for they must have come in human nature, seeing they had no other nature. 1 Tim. 3:16. Heb. 2:14, 15. But the coming of Christ in human nature, when God 'the Word became flesh, and tabernacled among men,' was indeed essential to the apostle's doctrine concerning his redemption. (Note, John 1:14.) So that they, who did not confess Him as 'come in the flesh,' or who advanced any tenets contrary to his being 'the Christ, the Son of the living God;' or to any of those offices, which, as God manifested in the flesh, He was anointed to perform, were not of God, whatever pretences they advanced to inspiration, or whatever appearances they exhibited of miraculous powers. These heretics, whom the apostle here showed to be the forerunners of the principal antichrist, have been proved by learned men to be the very same persons, whose sentiments the Socinians, and some others, now adopt and patronize as primitive Christianity; and it is not very improbable, that the most fatal prevalence of antichrist, which is yet supposed to be future, will be in the garb of infidelity, or open opposition to the Deity and atonement of Christ; that is, 'denying that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is come in the flesh,' to be 'the propitiation for the sins of the world,' and not in that of gross popery. Rev. 11:7—12. SCOTT.

(1.) Spirit.] 'One who sets up for an inspired teacher; as 1 Tim. 4:1 and 1 Cor. 12:10.' BLOOMF.—'Worthy of imitation is the prudence of the early Christians, in regard to those whom they received as teachers of religion. They exercised a much stricter caution in admitting men to officiate in the ministry, than in admitting private members to commune in the church. In admitting members into the church, they were liberal and candid; but such as became members, were immediately subject to her discipline, and this though tender and kind, was vigilant and strict. But in receiving public teachers, they acted with great caution. They considered no man as having a right to exercise the office of a teacher in the church, unless he could exhibit positive proof of his qualification. They required not only a present personal profession, but a testimony from others of previous good conduct. Paul's account of himself, could not satisfy the disciples at Jerusalem. He must go to the apostles, to the known ministers of Christ, and from them obtain approbation. And they would not admit him to their ministerial fellowship, till they had obtained in his favor the testimony from Barnabas, who had a personal knowledge of his conversion and subsequent conduct. But there are some now, who would invert the primitive order. Before one is admitted to the church, they think there ought to be a course of trial, and positive, unequivocal proof of inward grace. But these same persons will run to hear a man preach, who is an utter stranger to them, in whose favor they have no testimony, and of whom they know not whether he has inward grace, or even external morality. Christ's "sheep follow not strangers, for they know not the voice of strangers."' LATHROP.

(2.) Every spirit that confesseth Jesus Christ, &c.] 'Every spirit that confesseth Jesus Christ, who is come in the flesh. So the words may very well, and, in this connexion, must be rendered. To confess Jesus Christ seems to mean, not barely professing some kind of regard to Him, but yielding a regular, consistent homage; and, as it were, harmonizing and falling in with his design.' DODDR.—'Has come in the flesh.' 'It is remarkable, so many able commentators should have taken up with the interpretation, "was a mere Man," so contrary to John's perpetual assertions in his gospel and epistles, that it cannot be the sense. Adverting to the known opinions of the heretics of that age, which consisted not in a denial of the Divinity, but the humanity of Christ, the best contrs. are agreed, that there is reference to the tenets of the Doctors, [Docetæ?] and others who held Jesus Christ to have been a mere phantasma, and not having a real body. Now the apostle maintains, that He came really (clothed) in the flesh, i. e. in a human body, and subject to all corporal pains and weaknesses. As to the being a mere Man, that is quite another thing; and that John could not mean that, is clear from what has been said above; nay, the passage supplies an inference the very contrary.—As Mackn. observes, the doctors, as well as the people, believed the Son of God to be Himself God. This has been abundantly proved by some learned Jews.' BLOOMF.

(2, 3.) 'The church has been obliged to prove that Christ was Man, against those who have denied it, as well as to prove that He was God; for appearances were as much against one as the other.' PASCAL.

(3.) Antichrist.] 'Not any particular person, nor any particular succession of persons in the church, but a general term for all false teachers in every age.' MACKN.—'The Roman Catholics plead, that the pope cannot be antichrist, because he admits and maintains that Jesus Christ has "come in the flesh;" but John tells us, that there are many antichrists; that is, many who oppose Christ, and his truth, though in different ways.' WILLIAMS.

V. 4—6. 2:20—25. The undeniable and stupendous miracles, as well as holy lives, of true Christians and faithful ministers, had in many places given them decided advantages over the false teachers, and driven them away with disgrace. The apostle might say with confidence, of himself greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world.

5 They are of the world: 'therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them.

6 We are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God.

born of God, taught of God, anointed of God, and so secured against infectious, fatal delusions. 2. He gives them hope of victory, v. 4. 'Ye have hitherto overcome these deceivers and their temptations, and there is good ground of hope that ye will do so still, and that on these two accounts.' (1.) 'There is a strong Preserver within you, v. 4. It is a great happiness to be under the influence of the Holy Ghost. (2.) 'Ye are not of the same temper with these deceivers; the Spirit of God hath framed your mind for God and heaven; but they are of the world; their heart addicted thereto; therefore speak they of the world: they profess a worldly messiah and savior, they project a worldly kingdom and dominion; forgetting that the true Redeemer's kingdom is not of this world. This worldly design procures them proselytes: the world heareth them, v. 5. (3.) He represents to them, that, though their company might be the smaller, yet it was the better; they had more divine and holy knowledge; 'He that knoweth God, heareth us. He who knows the purity and holiness of God, the love and grace of God, the truth and faithfulness of God, the ancient word and prophecies of God, the signals and testimonies of God, must know that He is with us; and he who knows this, will attend to us, and abide with us.' As, on the contrary, 'He that is not of God, heareth not us. He who knows not God, regards not us. Thus you have a distinction betwixt us and others; Hereby know we the Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error, v. 6. This doctrine concerning the Savior's person leading you from the world to God, is a signature of the Spirit of truth, in opposition to the spirit of error. The more pure and holy any doctrine is, the more likely to be of God.'

V. 7—13. As the Spirit of truth is known by doctrine, (so spirits are to be tried,) it is known by love likewise; and so here follows a strong, fervent exhortation to holy, Christian love, v. 7.

1. From the high and heavenly descent and of his brethren, the other apostles, 'We are of God;' and those who knew the holy and glorious character of God, and had an experimental acquaintance with Him, through regeneration and by faith, adhered to their doctrine and instructions; whereas, those who were not 'born of God,' and did not truly belong to Him, would not hear them, but attended to the more amusing, or flattering, or indulgent speculations of other teachers.—The same is the test and standard of truth to this day; nor can we, by any other rule, 'try the spirits, whether they be of God, or not.' 1—3. Mat. 16:18, 19. 'Though the apostles be all dead,' yet, as they speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this passage declares, that their writings are the test, by which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine.' Mackn.

V. 7, 8. The apostle here resumed his exhortation to those, who adhered to the true doctrine of Christ, that they would cultivate the most endeared affection towards one another; . . . For, 'GOD IS LOVE,' or essential goodness and benevolence. It is, as it were, his very nature to be kind, to communicate life, and impart felicity, and to provide for the happiness of his creatures, in all cases and methods, which consist with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and holiness; for love must always be exercised in entire consistency with these attributes, by the perfect Source of all excellence. 'The earth is filled with the goodness of the Lord,' and doubtless the immensity of the creation is the same; holy angels derive from God complete and endless felicity, and rebellion alone has made any rational creatures suffer pain and misery. Being and happiness could not have been communicated, in that vast extent and degree, which they are and will be, without the creation of intelligent agents. These form a kingdom to be governed by a perfect law, and a righteous Sovereign. The very law of God is 'love,' as well as his nature; love of Him and of each other, constitutes the sum of its holy, just, and kind requirements, and all would have been perfectly happy had all perfectly obeyed it. Ex. 20:8. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Rom. 7:9—12. Unless infinite wisdom had seen it proper, that omnipotence should be unremittingly exerted, to prevent free agents from transgression, (which undeniable facts demonstrate that it did not,) this law must be guarded by sanctions; and those who break it must be exposed to a punishment proportioned to the offence. Thus love to creatures, at large, dictated both the law and its sanctions. When angels sinned, a God of love, in kindness to his obedient creatures, turned those from heaven to hell, who would have converted heaven into hell if they had continued there; except some other act of omnipotence had prevented it. When man's apostasy took place, the love of God was shown, not only in sparing sinners, and giving them a rich profusion of temporal benefits, while the sentence denounced against them was in part repented; but, in so ordering it, that even their pains, sorrows, and temporal death were expressive of his wise compassion, and tended greatly to prevent the multiplication of crimes, and the increase of condemnation. Especially, the provision of the Gospel, for the forgiveness of sin and the salvation of sinners, in consistency with the glory of the law and justice of God, whilst present sufferings are made subservient to the final and eternal felicity of believers, undeniably manifests, that 'God is Love.' So immense were the obstacles to be surmounted, and so astonishing the method, by which mercy is honorably exercised to rebels, deserving of eternal misery, that, even if the entrance of sin had been prevented, or impunity and recovery to holiness could have been ensured to all transgressors without any such expedient, the love of God would not so clearly have appeared to be infinite and incomprehensible. Something we can now see of its immensity; and, though impenetrable and incomprehensible mystery rest on many particulars respecting it, yet it will surely at length be seen, resplendent as the noon-day sun, that the most perfect love presided, when, in the infinite wisdom of God, the entrance of sin was permitted, and when infinite justice, holiness, and truth determined to leave many rebels in their impenitency, to be 'vessels of wrath fitted for destruction,' as connected with the election, redemption, and sanctification of the 'vessels of mercy, who are thus prepared before unto glory.' So that, if wise and holy love, in its most perfect exercise towards universal being, through eternity, had required or even admitted of it, no pain would have been suffered by any creature, much less would any have been left to be finally miserable.—But to argue from hence, that none will be finally miserable, in direct opposition to his testimony, who is TRUTH, and a CONSUMING FIRE, as well as LOVE, is the height of impiety and presumption. What do we know, concerning the purposes of love, to unnumbered millions, through eternal ages, which may be answered, in the infinitely wise counsels of God, by leaving comparatively a small number of rebels, to the merited punishment of their crimes? Men might on the same principles argue, that prisons and executions could not have any place, in the dominions of an eminently benevolent prince; when, in reality, wise and equitable benevolence to numbers, would dictate severity to a few atrocious criminals, who would otherwise make multitudes wretched. Prov. 20:8, 26. 24:24, 25. Indeed, we might as reasonably argue, that, since 'God is Love,' there can be no such thing as misery in the creation; for Omnipotence could certainly have excluded it; but if infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, and truth require, that Love Himself should cause his creatures to endure anguish, (and here facts preclude the vain hypothesis which speculation might otherwise have adopted,) no created understanding can determine, in what degree, to what duration, or in how many instances, the wise, righteous, and holy purposes of LOVE, may require the suffering of his rebellious subjects. So that all arguments and calculations of this kind prove nothing, but the vain self-wisdom of foolish man, who deems himself competent to determine, what God ought to do, and what He will do; and, in this presumption, opposes his arguments to the explicit testimony of God Himself; and professes to honor his love, while he treats his truth as a lie, and suppresses his awful threatenings to be terrifying delusions, to frighten the ignorant part of mankind into good behavior, and to be despised by the more discerning! But it is enough for our purpose, that God has so shown Himself to be LOVE in his dealings with us, that, after all our crimes, we cannot come short of eternal happiness, except through our unbelief and impenitent rebellion, while strict justice would have consigned us to hopeless and final misery, as soon as ever we transgressed our Creator's law.

(7.) 'The apostle now returns to the subject of love to others, treated of at 3:23.' Bloom.—Let us love one another. 'It is reported, that when the apostle was grown old, and past preaching, he used to be led to the church at Ephesus, and only say these words to the people, Little children love one another.' Dodd.—'This is holy love, which assimilates its subject to God. He is born of God. It is that love which is the fulfilling of the law. It is religion. For every one that loveth knoweth God, and to know God is life eternal,—is religion. This love does not belong to man by nature. It is never a quality of his heart; but is, in all cases, the result of a divine interposition,—otherwise it would not be true, that "every one that loveth is born of God."'

(8.) 'In the words, "God is love," we have a perfect portrait of the eternal and incomprehensible Jehovah, drawn by his own unerring hand. The mode of expression here adopted, differs materially from that usually employed by the inspired writers, in speaking of the divine perfections. They say, God is merciful, God is just, or holy; but never, God is mercy, God is justice, God is holiness. In this instance, on the contrary, the apostle, instead of saying, God is loving, or good, or kind, says, GOD IS LOVE ITSELF. By this, we must understand, that God is all pure, unmixed love, and that the other moral perfections of his character, as his justice, mercy, truth, &c. are only so many modifications of his love. As the light which proceeds from the sun, may easily be separated into many different colors, so the holy love of God, which is the light and glory of his nature, may be separated into a variety of moral attributes and perfections. But, though separated, they are still love. His whole nature and essence are love; his will, his words, and his Word are love; He is nothing, can do nothing but love.' J. R. FAYSON.

9 In this <sup>j</sup> was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that <sup>k</sup> we might live through him.

10 Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation <sup>l</sup> for our sins.

11 Beloved, if <sup>m</sup> God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.

12 No <sup>n</sup> man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected <sup>o</sup> in us.

13 Hereby <sup>p</sup> know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

14 And we have seen, and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Savior of the world.

15 Whosoever <sup>q</sup> shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God.

16 And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God <sup>r</sup> is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.

for us; He has given his own, only-beloved, blessed Son for us, v. 9. This Person is in some peculiar, distinguishing way the Son of God; He is the Only-begotten. It may well be said, So (so wonderfully, so amazingly, so incredibly) God loved the world. (3.) That God loved us first, and in the circumstances in which we lay, v. 10. He loved us, when we had no love for Him; when we lay in our guilt, misery, and blood; when we were undeserving, ill-deserving, polluted, and unclean, and wanted to be washed from our sins in sacred blood. (4.) That He gave us his Son for such an end, to be the Propitiation for our sins; consequently to die for us, to die under the law and curse of God, to be crucified, to be wounded in his soul, and pierced in his side, to be dead and buried for us, v. 10. And then for such an end, v. 9. for such a good and beneficial end to us,—that we might live for ever through Him, might live in heaven, live with God, live in eternal glory and blessedness with Him and through Him: Oh, what love is here! Then,

3. Divine love to the brethren should constrain ours, v. 11. This should be an invincible argument. The example of God should press us. We should be admirers of his love, and lovers of his love, and consequently lovers of those whom He loves. The general love of God to the world, should induce a universal love among mankind, Mat. 5:45. The peculiar love of God to the church and to the saints, should be productive of a peculiar love there; If God so loved us, we ought surely (in some measure suitably thereto) to love one another.

4. The Christian love is an assurance of the divine inhabitation, v. 12. Now God dwelleth in us, not by any visible presence, nor immediate appearance to the eye, v. 12. but by his Spirit, v. 13. and in that way in which He has thought meet to describe and claim our love; and that is, in the illustration He has given of Himself and of his love, in the members of his church; in them, and in his appearance for them, and with them, is God to be loved; and thus, if we love one another, God dwelleth in us; the sacred lovers of the brethren are the temples of God; the Divine Majesty has a peculiar residence there.

5. Therein the divine love attains a considerable end and accomplishment in us, v. 12. It has obtained its completion in and upon us. God's love is not perfected in Him, but in and with us. His love could not be designed to be ineffectual and fruitless on us; when its proper, genuine end and issue are attained and produced thereby, it may be said to be perfected; so faith is perfected by its works, and love perfected by its operations. How ambitious should we be of this fraternal, Christian love, when God reckons his own [love] to us perfected thereby! To this the apostle, having mentioned the high favor of God's dwelling in us, subjoins the note and character thereof, v. 13. Certainly this mutual inhabitation is something more noble and great than we are well acquainted with, or can declare. One would think, that for God to dwell in us, and we in Him, were words too high for mortals to use, had not God gone before us therein. What it is, has been briefly said on ch. 3:24. What it fully is, must be left to the revelation of the blessed world.

V. 14—16. Since faith in Christ works love to God, and love to God must kindle love to the brethren, the apostle here confirms the prime article of the Christian faith as the foundation of such love; where,

1. He proclaims the fundamental article of the Christian religion, which is so representative of the love of God, v. 14. We here see, (1.) The Lord Jesus' relation to God; He is Son to the Father, such a Son as no one else is, and so as to be God with the Father. (2.) His relation and office toward us,—the Savior of the world; He saves us by his death, example, intercession, Spirit, and power against the enemies of our salvation. (3.) The ground on which He became so,—by his mission; the Father sent the Son, decreed and willed his coming hither, in and with the consent of the Son. (4.) The apostle's assurance of this,—he and his brethren had seen it; they had seen the Son of God in his human nature, so seen Him as to be satisfied He was the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. (5.) The apostle's attestation of this, in pursuance of such evidence; 'We have seen and do testify; our eyes, and ears, and hands, have been witnesses of it.' Thereupon,

2. He states the excellency, or the excellent privilege, attending the due acknowledgment of this truth, v. 15. This confession seems to include faith in the heart as the foundation of it; acknowledgment with the mouth to the glory of God and Christ; and profession in the life and conduct, in opposition to the flatteries or frowns of the world. And so he who thus confesses Christ, and God in Him, is enriched with, or possessed by, the Spirit of God, and has a complacental knowledge of God, and much holy enjoyment of Him. Then,

3. He applies this in order to the excitation of holy love, v. 16. The Christian revelation is, what should endear it to us, the revelation of the divine love; the articles of our revealed faith are but so many articles relating to the divine love; the history of the Lord Christ is the history of God's love to us; all his transactions in and with his Son were but testifications of his love to us, and means to advance us to the love of God, 2 Cor. 5:19. Hence we may learn,

(1.) That God is Love, v. 16. He is essential, boundless love; He has incomparable, incomprehensible love for us of this world, which He has demonstrated in the mission and mediation of his beloved Son. It is the great objection and prejudice against the Christian revelation, that the love of God should be so strange and unaccountable, as to give his own eternal Son for us; it is the prejudice of many against the eternity and the Deity of the Son, that so great a Person should be given for us. It is, I confess, mysterious and unsearchable; but there are unsearchable riches in Christ; it is pity the vastness of the divine love should be made a prejudice against the revelation

V. 9—12. Hence it appears, that Christ is called 'the only-begotten Son of God,' previous to his incarnation, or coming into the world; and that the love of God, in giving his own Son to assume our nature, in order to his expiatory sufferings, was more stupendous, than even in giving Him, as incarnate, to the death on the cross for us. Jn. 1:18. 3:16—21.—When God, in his infinite compassion and mercy, designed so vast a blessing as 'life eternal' for fallen men; his most perfect justice and holiness rendered it impossible for Him to confer it, (for 'He cannot deny Himself,') except an all-sufficient atonement could be made for their sins; and when no other method, nor none so proper for this end, was perceived by his infinite wisdom, as the sending of his own Son to be our Surety, and the atoning Sacrifice for our sins, 'He spared Him not,' but sent Him 'into the world, that we might live through Him.' Rom. 3:21—26. 8:32—34. Heb. 7:26—28. 10:3, 4. None of our words or thoughts can do justice to such gratuitous, abundant, astonishing love, of a holy God towards sinners, to whom He owed nothing, who could not profit, or harm Him, whom He might justly have crushed in a moment; who were most decisively shown to be deserving of his tremendous vengeance, in the very method by which they were saved; and when He could, by his omnipotent word, have created countless worlds, replenished with far more exalted beings, if He had seen good. Rom. 5:6—10, 15—21. Search we then the whole universe for LOVE, in its most enlarged and glorious displays? We must at length be constrained to own, that it is to be found in the Person and the cross of Christ. 'Herein is love,' the splendor of which eclipses all, which has been seen elsewhere, from the beginning of the world, and which will be the special subject of admiring and adoring praise to all eternity.—Does love subsist between God and sinners? Here was the origin of it; 'not that we loved God,' for we were enemies to his holy character, law, sovereignty, worship, and providence; but that 'He,' most freely, and with most condescending compassion, forgiveness, and liberality, 'loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.' 2:1, 2. Jn. 15:12—16. In this great event, all holy beings will for ever see, that 'GOD is

LOVE'; and, the more fully redeemed sinners understand this subject, the clearer views will they have of that love, which can never be perfectly comprehended; whereas, those who exclude this view of the divine benignity, may speculate about the subject, but can scarcely know anything concerning its real nature and glory. SCOTT.

(2, 15, 16.) 'Not that the saints are made partakers of the essence of God, according to the blasphemous notions of some heretics; but they are made partakers of his fulness, that is, of his moral beauty.' EDWARDS.

V. 13—17. The apostles knew, and true Christians might know, that they 'dwelt in God' by faith, and He in them as in his consecrated temple, 'because He had given them of his Spirit.' 3:18—24. Rom 8:5—17. For, besides the miraculous powers conferred on some, the Holy Spirit had so changed the hearts of all true believers, and so made them 'partakers of a divine nature,' that they loved the children of God with a holy love, and copied his example in their conduct to each other.—All such general expressions must be interpreted according to the context; for, unless the confession of Christ were sincere, intelligent, and influential, the man could not be a partaker of holy love; and therefore the apostle would have contradicted what he before asserted, if he had meant a mere confession with the lips, without faith and grace in the heart (8). But true Christians had known, understood, and experienced, as well as believed, the love, which God had shown towards them, in the redemption of his Son; and it had had a transforming effect on them, by bringing them to resemble God, in the nature and fruits of their love; and by an habitual exercise of this holy affection towards God, each other, and all men; and to live in the most endeared and intimate union with Him. Thus their love to the Lord was 'made perfect,' or produced its genuine and valuable effects, in their love to one another; and they cultivated this holy disposition, and acted from it, in order that they might have boldness in the day of judgment. (Notes, 2 2<sup>d</sup>—29. Mat. 25:31—46.) Because, as Christ was, so were they in this world; like Him, they were influenced by holy love to do good to others in a self-denying 17 Herein is 'our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world.

18 There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment. He that feareth, is not made perfect in love.

19 We love him, because 'he first loved us.

20 If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

21 And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

Love with us. t. Jn. 15:16. u. c. 3:17. v. Jn. 13:34.

and the belief of it. But what will not God do, when He designs to demonstrate the height of any perfection of his? In such a dispensation as that of giving a natural, eternal Son for us and to us, He will commend his love to us indeed; and what will not the God of love do, when He designs to commend his love, and to commend it in the view of heaven, and earth, and hell; and when He will commend Himself, and recommend Himself to us, and to our highest conviction, and also affection, as Love itself? And what if it should appear at last, (which I shall only offer to the consideration of the judicious,) that the divine love, and particularly God's love in Christ, should be the foundation of the glories of heaven, in the present enjoyment of those ministering spirits that comported with it, and of the salvation of this world, and of the torments of hell? This last will seem most strange. But what if therein it should appear, not only that God is love to Himself, in vindicating his own law and government, and love and glory; but that the damned ones are made so, or are so punished, because they despised the love of God, already manifested and exhibited; refused to be beloved in what was further proposed and promised; and made themselves unmeet to be the objects of divine complacency and delight? If the consciences of the damned should accuse them of these things, and especially of rejecting the highest instance of divine love; if the far greatest part of the intelligent creation should be everlastingly blessed through the highest instance of the divine love, then may it well be inscribed on the whole creation of God, God is love.

(2.) That hereupon, he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in Him, v. 16. There is great communion between the God of love and the loving soul, that is, him who loves the creation of God, according to its different relation to God, and reception from Him, and interest in Him.

V. 17—21. The apostle, having thus excited and enforced sacred love from the great Pattern and motive of it, the love that is and dwells in God Himself, proceeds to recommend it further by other considerations; and in both branches of it, love to God, and love to our brother or Christian neighbor.

I. Love to God; this seems here to be recommended on these accounts:

(1.) It will give us peace and satisfaction of spirit in the day when it will be most needed, or when it will be the greatest pleasure and blessing imaginable, v. 17. There must be a day of universal judgment. Happy they who shall have holy, fiducial boldness, before the Judge at that day; who shall be able to lift up their heads, and to look Him in the face, as knowing He is their Friend and Advocate! So do, and so may do, the lovers of God. Possibly here by the love of God may be meant our love to God, that is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost; that is the foundation of our hope, or of our assurance that our hope will hold good at last. Or, if by the love of God be meant the sense and apprehension of his love to us, yet that must suppose or include us as lovers of Him in this case; and, instead, the sense and evidence of his love to us, shed abroad in our hearts love to Him; and, thereupon, we have confidence toward Him, and peace and joy in Him; He will give the crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing; and we have this boldness toward Christ, because of our conformity to Him, because as He is, so are we in this world, v. 17.

(2.) It prevents or removes the uncomfortable result and fruit of servile fear, v. 18. so far as love prevails, fear ceases. We must here distinguish, I judge, between fear and being afraid; or in this case, between the fear of God and being afraid of Him; the fear of God is often mentioned and commanded as the substance of religion, 1 Pet. 2:17. Rev. 14:7. But then there is a being afraid of God, that arises from a sense of guilt, and a view of his vindictive perfections; so fear here may be rendered dread; there is no dread in love; love considers its object as good and excellent, and therefore amiable, and worthy to be beloved; love considers God as most eminently good, and most eminently loving us in Christ, and so puts off dread, and puts on joy in Him; and as love grows, joy grows too; so that perfect love casteth out fear or dread. That perfect love casteth out fear, the apostle thus sensibly argues, that it casteth out torment, casteth out fear or dread, v. 18. Fear is known to be a disquieting, torturing passion, especially such a fear as is the dread of an almighty, avenging God; but perfect love teaches the mind a perfect acquiescence and complacency in the beloved, and, therefore, perfect love casteth out fear. Or, which is here equivalent, he that feareth, is not made perfect in love, v. 18. It is a sign our love is far from being perfect, since our doubts and fears, and dismal apprehensions of God, are so many. Let us long for, and hasten to the world of perfect love, where our serenity and joy in God will be as perfect as our love!

(3.) From the source and rise of it, which is the antecedent love of God, v. 19. His love is the incentive, the motive, and moral cause of ours. We cannot but love

PRACT. OBS. We live in an age, in which but few advance claims to immediate revelations; yet we have at least as much cause to try men's doctrines and religion by the Word of God, as they had in the primitive times. If indeed no teachers, who do not confess the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, 'God manifested in the flesh,' 'are of God,' which the apostle expressly asserts; and if all others are actuated by the lying spirit of antichrist, we may truly say, that antichrist did not much more prevail, in the darkest days of popery, than in these times of infidelity, skepticism, socinianism, arianism, mysticism, and antinomianism; whilst the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person, or some of the offices of Christ, seems to be wholly excluded from the religion of a large proportion among his professed disciples! nay, from that of some, who possess high authority and much influence in the church.—We must not, indeed, take it for granted, as the apostle did, that 'we are of God;' or that 'He who knoweth God heareth us;' but, as far as we can prove, that our doctrine, temper, and conduct, 'accord to the oracles of God,' we may be confident, that He will maintain our cause, and that his friends and children will favor us; and the characters of the persons who adhere to the testimony of preachers, and that of those who reject it, may often go far in deciding, who they are that declare the humbling, holy truths of God, and who speak the dictates of 'the spirit of error.' For numbers are incapable of doing so much honor to the ministry of the true servants of God in any other way, as they do by forsaking, deriding, and reviling it; whilst their actions show to all, who understand that most emphatical language, the strong reasons of their dislike. John 3:19—21. 7:3—10. Again and again, we are exhorted to 'love one another, because love is of God;' in proportion as this love abounds in our heart, and regulates our behavior, we bear the image of God, and show that we are 'born of Him, and know Him.' Thus we anticipate the temper and happiness, and, as it were, breathe the air of heaven: whilst enmity, manner; and, being treated with contempt, reproach, and enmity, they meekly and patiently endured it, and persevered in 'doing good against evil,' as He had done. Or, 'as God is, so are they;' they bear his image, which the world hates; for this may be the meaning, and it is coincident with the preceding interpretation. SCOTT.

(15.) Whoever shall confess, &c. [Bp. Hopkins accounts for this, and such passages, by observing, that in the primitive times there were no temporal inducements to embrace Christianity; and consequently most of the professors of it acted upon conscience, and it might be charitably hoped, that they were indeed regenerate.] DODD.—'The apostle takes it for granted, not only that the profession is sincere, but productive of a suitable conduct. And, indeed, as in times like those, open confession and undaunted profession implied sincerity, it was likely to draw with it the other.' BLOOME.

V. 18. The obedience and good works performed from this principle [love], are not like the servile diligence of one, who reluctantly labors selfishness, malice and revenge, are from hell, and the beginning of the misery 'prepared for the devil and his angels' and children. But our 'GOD IS LOVE;' and with such displays of this endearing attribute before us, and such obligations as we are brought under to it; how large, liberal, and fervent ought our love of each other to be, and even that of our very enemies! And how should we lay ourselves out, to do good to our fellow-Christians for the Lord's sake! Let us not then think it enough to admire the love of God in Christ Jesus; but, since we cannot profit Him 'whom no man hath seen or can see;' let us show our love and gratitude to Him, by imitating his kind and merciful conduct, in our dealings with our brethren and neighbors. Then it will appear that we have understood the nature and glory, as well as believed the revelation, of 'the love which God hath to us;' and that, as 'God is love,' so 'we dwell in love,' and 'in God, and He in us.' In this way our love will grow unto perfection; and our confidence, before the mercy-seat, will be an anticipation of our 'boldness in the day of judgment;' while we are conscious, that as He, our Lord and Savior was, 'so are we in this evil world.' Nor would there be occasion for our being left to the painful restraint and impulse of terror, if we were more entirely 'constrained by love,' in every part of our duty: so that all our disquieting doubts, and apprehensions, arise from our not being made perfect in love. Jer. 32:39—41. Let us then pray without ceasing, that we may more entirely 'love Him, who hath first loved us;' and if it be evident, that our natural enmity is changed into filial affection and gratitude; let us bless the name of our God for this seal and earnest of eternal felicity; and, in return for his mercy, and in obedience to his commandment, let us do good to our brethren also, and to all men, for his sake, and after his example; and thus show, that though our love is imperfect, yet that we essentially differ from all those, who profess 'to love God whom they have not yet seen,' and yet 'hate their brethren whom they have seen.' SCOTT.

from dread of a hated master's indignation; but like that of a dutiful child, who performs services to a beloved father, which conduce to the benefit of his brethren and family, and are, on every account, pleasing, and voluntarily performed. . . . Yet this does not imply, that any Christians are made absolutely perfect in love on earth, to the full demand of the divine law; or that slavish fears prove a man to have no love, or grace; or that exemption from fear of every kind, is the privilege of believers. It is equally true, 'that blessed is he that feareth always,' as that 'perfect love casteth out fear;' for different kinds of fear are meant. Prov. 22:14. Rom. 11:16—21. Heb. 4:1, 2. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. SCOTT.

V. 19. Not that their love is merely gratitude for previous benefits, which, abstracted from other exercises of love, would only be a selfish affection, and not at all that holy love, which the law, as written in the hearts of all true Christians, requires; for that love is commanded previous to the consideration of redemption, and our failure in it causes us to need that love of God towards us, of which the apostle was so

CHAP. V.

1 He that loveth God loveth his children, and keepeth his commandments: 3 which to the faithful are light, and not grievous. 9 Jesus is the Son of God, able to save us, 14 and to hear our prayers, which we make for ourselves, and for others.

WHOSOEVER believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.

2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous.

4 For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

so good a God, who was first in the act and work of love; who loved us when we were both unloving and unlovely; who loved us at so great a rate; who has been seeking and soliciting our love at the expense of his Son's blood, and has condescended to beseech us to be reconciled unto Him. Let heaven and earth stand amazed at such love! His love is the productive cause of ours; Of his own will, of his own free, loving will, begat He us. The divine love stamped love on our souls; may the Lord still and further direct our hearts into the love of God! 2 Thess. 3:5.

2. Love to our brother and neighbor in Christ; such love is argued and urged on these accounts:

(1.) As suitable and consonant to our Christian profession. In the profession of Christianity we profess to love God as the Root of religion; If then a man say, or profess as much as thereby to say, I love God, and yet hate his brother, whom he should love for God's sake, he is a liar, v. 20. That such an one loves not God, the apostle proves by the usual faculty of loving what is seen, rather than what is unseen, v. 20. How shall the hater of a visible image of God pretend to love the unseen Original, the invisible God Himself?

(2.) As suitable to the express law of God, and the just reason of it, v. 21. Our Christian brethren having a new nature and excellent privileges derived from God, and God having his interest in them, as well as in us, it cannot but be a natural, suitable obligation, that he who loves God, should love his brother also.

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. 1. The apostle having, in the conclusion of the last ch., urged Christian love as suitable to Christian profession, and to the divine command, here adds, that such love is suitable to, or, indeed, demanded by their eminent relation; our Christian brethren or fellow-believers are nearly related to God; they are his children, v. 1. Wherein the Christian brother is, (1.) Described by his faith; he believeth that Jesus is the Christ; Messiah the Prince; the Son of God by nature and office; the chief of all the anointed, priests, prophets, or kings; perfectly prepared for the whole work of the eternal salvation; the believer, accordingly, yields himself up to his care and conduct; and then he is, (2.) Dignified by his descent; he is born of God, v. 1. This principle of faith, and the new nature that attends it, or from which it springs, are ingenerated by the Spirit of God; and so sonship and adoption are not now from Abraham according to the flesh, but spiritually from God; and all believers accordingly are to be beloved; as it is added, v. 1. and so we must first and principally love the Son of the Father, as He is most emphatically styled,

2 John 3: the Only (necessarily) begotten, and the Son of his love, and then those that are voluntarily begotten, and renewed by the Spirit of grace: thereupon,

2. The apostle shows, (1.) How we may discern the truth, or the true, evangelical nature of our love to the regenerate; the ground of it must be our love to God, whose they are, v. 2. Our love to them appears to be sound and genuine, when we love them, not merely on any secular account, as because they are rich, or learned, or kind to us, or of our denomination among religious parties; but because they are God's children, bear his image, and so in them God Himself is loved. Thus we see what that love to the brethren is, that is so pressed in this epistle; it is love to them as the children of God, and the adopted brethren of the Lord Jesus.

(2.) How we may learn the truth of our love to God: it appears in our holy obedience, v. 2. Then we truly love God, when we keep his commandments; for this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and the keeping of his commandments requires a spirit inclined thereto, and delighting therein, v. 3. Or, This is the love of God, that, as thereby we are determined to obedience, and to keep the commandments of God, so his commandments are thereby made easy and pleasant to us.

(3.) What is and ought to be the effect of regeneration,—an intellectual, spiritual conquest of this world, v. 5. He that is born of God, is born for God, and consequently for another world; his temper and disposition tend to a higher, better world; and he is furnished with arms to conquer this; as it is added, v. 4. Faith is the spiritual armor and artillery by which we overcome; for faith works in and by love to God and Christ, and so withdraws us from the love of the world. Faith sanctifies the heart, and purifies it from those sensual lusts by which the world obtains such sway and doing. If mere gratitude for mercy and personal forgiveness were exclusively intended, no man could love God at all, on good grounds, without some immediate revelation, to assure him that he was the object of his special love. even while he continued altogether impenitent and sinful. (Note, Luke 7:44—50. P. O. 36—50.) But the evident meaning is, that if the Lord had not 'loved them,' before they loved Him, 'even when they were dead in sin,' they must for ever have continued enemies to Him. 9:12.

SEOTT. Concluding Note. V. 7—13. 'God is love:—and the true theory of the universe is, that it is a vehicle or medium constructed expressly for the circulation and diffusion of his love. Full of blessedness Himself, his goodness burst forth, at first, into a celestial creation, replenished with bright intelligences, invested with the high prerogative of approaching as near to the Fountain of excellence as created natures can, to derive their happiness nearly from Himself, and to derive it to the full amount of their capacity for enjoyment.

'But heaven, with all its amplitude, was too confined for Infinite Love; He must enlarge the sphere of his beneficence; again his unmeasured goodness overflowed, and this terrestrial creation appeared,—an enlargement of heaven. On that occasion, however, He chose to diversify the form of his love in the production of man,—a creature whose happiness, though equally with that of angels derived from Himself, should reach Him through more indirect and circuitous channels. By creating, at first, one common father of the species, He designed that each should feel himself allied to all the rest, and pledged to promote their happiness. And, by rendering us necessary to each other's welfare, He sought to train us to an humble imitation of his own goodness; to teach us the divine art of benevolence,—to find and fabricate our own happiness from the happiness of others.

'Now, if the former, the angelic creation, was meant to exemplify how much his creatures could enjoy, the latter was intended to show how much they could impart; for He meant every heart and every hand to be a consecrated channel for his love to flow in. Had his great idea been realized, the world would have exhibited the glorious spectacle of a whole race in family compact; clothed in a robe of happiness, with charity for a girdle; feasting at a perpetual banquet of beneficence; hailing the accession of every new-born member, as the advent of an angel, an addition to their common fund of enjoyment; and finding greater blessedness than that of passively receiving happiness, in exercising the godlike prerogative of imparting it;—a whole order of intelligent beings, having one heart and one mind; a heart beating in concert with heaven, and diffusing, with every pulse, life, and health, and joy, to the remotest members of the body. The mere outline of the scene, as sketched by God in paradise, called forth audible expressions of his divine complacency; on surveying it from the height of the excellent glory, He pronounced it good, and the light of his countenance fell full upon it.

'But the awful invasion of sin frustrated the divine intention, destroyed it, even in its type and model. Man aspired to be as God. . . The standard of revolt was then erected, and the history of all his subsequent conduct has been the history of an insane endeavor to construct an empire, governed by laws, and replenished with resources, independent of God. . . Love to God is the all-combining principle which was to hold each individual in adhesion to all the rest, and the whole in affinity with God; the loss of that, therefore, like the loss of the great law of attraction in the material world, leaves all the several parts in a state of repulsion to each other, as well as the whole disjoined from God. [Note, Jude, v. 10.] Having lost its proper centre in God, the world attempts not to find any common point of repose, but spends itself in fruitless efforts to erect an infinity of independent interests. Every kingdom and province, [every sect and party,] every family, every individual, discovers a propensity to insulate himself from the common brotherhood, and to constitute himself the centre of an all-subordinating and ever-enlarging circle.' Mammon, a Prize Essay, by

REV. JOHN HARRIS.

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1—3. Every man, who truly believes Jesus to be the promised Messiah, and receives, honors, and obeys Him in that character, according to the predictions of the Old Test., and the testimony of the apostles concerning Him, is doubtless 'born of God.' John 1:10—13. as this faith must be the effect of divine life, and cannot be separated from repentance, love, and other graces, or those good fruits which spring from them. (Notes, John 14:15—17, 21—24. 15:9—11.) So that these distinct parts of the Christian's character, [i. e. love to God and love to Christian brethren,] must reciprocally prove each other to be genuine. But true Christians are possessed of a principle of divine life, which carries them above all these obstacles and impediments.

SEOTT. V. 4, 5. 'That which is born of God,' that new and heavenly nature communicated in regeneration, tends so powerfully to God and holiness, and includes in its essence such a spiritual judgment, and such heavenly affections; that all, in whom it is found, are by it made victorious over the world; and overcome both their natural love for its honors, riches, pleasures, decorations, and friendship; and their natural fear of the frown, rage, and contempt of worldly men. 2:15—17. 4:4—6. John 16: 31—33. Rom. 12:2. Thus they are prepared for submitting to losses, exercising self-denial, and enduring affliction in the cause of God; and are taught to disregard the maxims, fashions, customs, and opinions of ungodly men, however eminent, numerous, or powerful. This 'new creature,' as 'born of God,' has the ascendancy in the heart of the youngest and feeblest true Christian; and therefore they all aspire after and attain unto this victory. For though the conflict of grace with corrupt nature and the allurements and terrors of the world, is often very sharp; and the regenerate man may be baffled, cast down, nay, apparently slain in the battle: yet the divine life, being again invigorated by the Holy Spirit, will excite him to arise and renew the combat, with redoubled fortitude and resolution. So that at length the victory will be his decidedly; and he will habitually profess the truth, and do the will of God, as far as he knows them, whatever loss, suffering, disgrace, or hardship may ensue; even if he should be exposed to death, in its most terrifying form, by his adherence to his duty. In acquiring this honorable 'victory,' faith is principally concerned: a realizing belief of the testimony of God, concerning invisible and eternal things, operating by 5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God ?

6 This is he that came by <sup>e</sup> water and blood, even Jesus Christ ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit <sup>f</sup> that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth.

7 For there are three that bear record [in heaven, the <sup>g</sup> Father, the <sup>h</sup> Word, and the <sup>i</sup> Holy Ghost: and these three are one.

minion over souls. It receives and derives strength from the Object of it, the Son of God, for conquering the frowns and flatteries of the world. It obtains, by gospel-promise, a right to the indwelling Spirit of grace, that is greater than he who dwells in the world. It sees an invisible world at hand, with which this world is not worthy to be compared, and into which it tells the soul, in which it resides, it must be continually prepared to enter ; and, thereupon,

3. The apostle concludes, that it is the real Christian that is the true conqueror of the world, v. 5. The world lies in our way to heaven, and is the great impediment to our entrance there. But he who believes, must needs by faith overcome the world. For, (1.) He must be well satisfied that this world is a vehement enemy to his soul, to his holiness, his salvation, and his blessedness, ch. 2:16. (2.) He sees it must be a great part of the Savior's work, and of his own salvation, to be redeemed and rescued from this malignant world, Gal. 1:4. (3.) He sees in and by the life and conduct of the Lord Jesus on earth, that this world is to be renounced and overcome. (4.) He is taught and influenced by the Lord Jesus' death to be mortified and crucified to the world, Gal. 6:14. (5.) He is begotten by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to the lively hope of a blessed world above, 1 Pet. 1:3. (6.) He knows the Savior is gone to heaven, and is there preparing a place for his serious believers, John 14:2. (7.) He knows his Savior will come again, will put an end to this world, judge the inhabitants of it, and receive his believers to his presence and glory, John 14:3. (8.) He is possessed with a spirit and disposition that cannot be satisfied with this world, that looks beyond it, and is still tending, striving, and pressing, toward the world in heaven, 2 Cor. 5:2. So that it is the Christian religion that affords its proselytes a universal empire. And who, in all the world, but the believer on Jesus Christ, can thus overcome the world ?

V. 6—9. The faith of the Christian believer being thus mighty and victorious, it had need be well founded ; and it is so ; the Lord Jesus brings his credentials along with Him, in the way by which He came, and in the witness that attends Him.

1. In the way by which He came ; i. e. by water and blood ; or with water and blood ; even Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ, I say, came thus ; and none but He. I say it again, not by or with water only, but by and with water and blood, v. 6. these were as the notes and signatures of the true, effectual Savior of the world ; and as the means by which He would heal and save us. As these show us our double defilement, so they indicate the Savior's twofold purification. On the death of Jesus Christ, his side being pierced with a soldier's spear, out of the wound there immediately issued water and blood. This the beloved apostle saw, and seems to have been affected with the sight ; he alone records it, and seems to reckon himself obliged to record it, as containing something mysterious in it, John 19:35. Now this water and blood are comprehensive of all that is necessary and effectual to our salvation. By the water, our souls are washed and purified for heaven, for the region of saints in light. By the blood, God is glorified, his law honored, and his vindictive excellences illustrated and displayed, Rom. 3:25, 26. By the blood we are justified, reconciled, and presented righteous to God. By the blood, the curse of the law being satisfied, the purifying Spirit is obtained for the internal ablution of our natures, Gal. 3:13. &c. The water and the blood then comprehend all things that can be requisite to our salvation. They will consecrate and sanctify to that purpose all that God shall appoint or make use of in order to that great end, Eph. 5:25—27. He who comes by water and blood, is an accurate, perfect Savior. And this is He who comes by water and blood, even Jesus Christ ! Thus we see how, or, if you please, with what utensils, He comes. But we see his credentials also,

2. In the witness that attends Him, and that is the divine Spirit ; that Spirit to whom the perfecting of the works of God is usually attributed, v. 6. It was meet the commissioned Savior should have a constant Agent to support his work, and testify of Him, that a divine power should attend Him, his Gospel and servants ; and notify the world on what errand and office they came, and by what authority they were sent : this was done in and by the Spirit of God, according to the Savior's own prediction, John 16:15. And then the apostle adds the commendation, or the acceptableness of this witness ; because the Spirit is Truth, v. 6. One copy would afford us a very suitable reading thus ; because, or that, Christ is the Truth. And so it indicates the matter of the Spirit's testimony, that is, the truth of Christ ; and, consequently, that Christianity, or the Christian religion, is the truth of God. But it is not meet that one or two copies should alter the text ; and our present reading is very agreeable, so we retain it. The Spirit is Truth. He is indeed the Spirit of truth, John 14:17. And that the Spirit is Truth, and a Witness worthy of all acceptance, appears in that He is one of the witnesses that in and from heaven bare testimony concerning the truth and authority of Christ, v. 7. And so v. 7. most appositely occurs, as a proof of the authenticity of the Spirit's testimony ; He must needs be true, or even truth itself, if He be not only a Witness in heaven, but even one (not in testimony only, for so an angel may be, but in being and essence) with the Father and the Word.

But here opens the contest about the genuineness of verse 7. It is alleged, that many old Greek manuscripts have it not. We shall not here enter into the controversy. It should seem the critics are not agreed what manuscripts have it, and what not. But some rational surmises seem to support the present text and reading. As,

1. If we admit v. 8. in the room of v. 7. it looks too like a tautology and repetition of what was included in v. 6. This does not assign near so noble an introduction of these three witnesses as our present reading does.

2. It is observed, that many copies read that distinctive clause, upon the earth ; There fear of his wrath, and hope of holy felicity in his favor ; a believing reliance on Christ for redemption, and all the blessings that flow from it, working by love and gratitude ; with an abiding sense of God's presence at all times, to witness every action, and to support, help, and comfort those who trust in Him. These exercises of faith give such a determination to the true Christian's conduct, that he cannot habitually do what he knows to be contrary to the will of God, whatever emolument, credit, or favor he may acquire by so doing ; nor can he habitually neglect what God commands, to whatever loss, reproach, or suffering it may expose him. Rom. 6:1, 2. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Gal. 2:17—21. Heb. 11:27, 12:2, 3. Rev. 12:7—12. Through temporary weakness of faith, he may be drawn into sins and negligences ; but he will soon find such fear, shame, sorrow, remorse, and self-abhorrence, in his heart and conscience, that he cannot but return into the way of obedience, and reject the wages of transgression, whatever may be the consequence. This is universally the case with true believers ; though the temporary suspension of faith, and a consequent prevalence of worldly affections, may be longer in some cases than in others ; during which lamentable seasons, their evidence of sincerity must be equally weakened. And this is peculiar to believers ; so that we may challenge the whole earth, to produce one instance of a man, who 'did not believe in the Son of God,' that had, in every respect, so 'overcome' the love and fear of all persons and things in the world, as not habitually, in one way or other, to act contrary to his own judgment and conscience, from a regard to interest, reputation, ease, liberty, indulgence, friendship, or social and relative comfort and affection ; or in order to avoid derision, reproach, the censure of singularity, or more material losses and sufferings. All men, except believers in Christ, are habitually enslaved, in some respect or other, to the customs, opinions, or interests of the world : and who is there, that dares, in all things, to act according to the conviction of his own mind, without being warped by the general influence of society, or that of his own particular circle, or sometimes even of his own domesticity ? He, and he only, can do this, 'who believes that Jesus is the Son of God,' and trusts in Him for salvation, according to the Scriptures : his faith, united with humble love, spirituality, fear of coming short of salvation, hatred of sin, a constant respect to his Lord's example, an indifference for worldly objects, and a deep persuasion of the miserable condition of all worldly men, gives him this victory. Gal. 6:11—14. He habitually in all things follows the dictates of his own conscience, and the commandments of his Lord, whatever consequences may follow, and when he is betrayed into an incidental deviation from this rule, he deeply repents of it, and attempts renewed obedience.—Hence it is, that the world will tolerate all other persons, except true believers, whatever their forms or notions be ; because all others will, in some respects, comply with the humors, and court the friendship, of worldly men. But Christians are so suppliant, and so determined to follow their Lord, according to their own judgment of truth and duty, without regarding the opinions, counsels, attentions, derision, revilings, or enmity of the many, the wise, the great, the learned, or the virtuous ; nay, without being turned aside by persuasion, or the dictates of affection and gratitude, from the line of duty ; they cleave to their religious singularities (as they are deemed) at so great an expense, and often amidst so many sufferings ; and, in so many ways, they 'testify of the world, that its works are evil,' and its wisdom folly, that they can hope for no quarter from worldly men, but must expect to be hated, or despised by all for Christ's sake : even as He was, who perfectly 'overcame the world,' as their Surety and Example.—It may be proper here to observe, that the Christian, in proportion to his knowledge and grace, will be singular, only where truth and duty require him ; and steadfast, according to the certainty or importance of the truth and duty ; but in all things which he deems indifferent, and where his own will or interest alone are concerned, he will endeavor to be pliant, in order to show, that his pertinacious adherence to his rule of duty, is the effect of conscientiousness, and not of obstinacy and affectation. (4) Whoever is born. Some read, every one who is born. The meaning is nearly the same ; but it is not expressed so exactly and clearly, as in our reading, which is of far superior authority.—How can all these propositions concerning 'him who is born of God,' and 'all that which is born of God,' be explained by those, who suppose that baptism, or something inseparably connected with it, when rightly administered, is exclusively meant ?

V. 7, 8. As the accomplishment of the prophecies contained in the New Test. fully counterbalances the ceasing of miraculous gifts, so these divine attestations to the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, and the two grand constituent parts of his salvation, continue to this present day, and shall to the end of the world : and we at present have abundant testimony to those truths, which our Father in heaven, the incarnate Word, and the Holy Spirit, immediately testified to the

are three that bear record upon the earth ; now this bears a visible opposition to some witness or witnesses elsewhere ; and therefore we are told, by the adversaries of the text, that this clause must be supposed to be omitted in most books that want v. 7. But it should, for the same reason, be so in all. Take we v. 6. It would not now naturally and properly be added, For there are three that bear record on earth ; unless we should suppose the apostle would tell us, that all the witnesses are such as are on earth, when yet he would assure us, that one is infallibly true, or even Truth itself.

3. It is observed, that there is a variety of reading, even in the Greek text, as in v. 7. Some copies read,—are one ; others, (at least the Complutensian,)—are to one, or agree in one ; and in v. 8. (in that part that it is supposed should be admitted,) instead of the common,—in earth, the Complutensian reads,—upon earth ; which seems to show that that edition depended on some Greek authority, and not merely, as some would have us believe, on the authority either of the vulgar Latin, or of Thomas Aquinas ; though his testimony may be added thereto.

4. V. 7. is very agreeable to the style and theology of our apostle. He delights in the title,—The Father ; whether he indicates thereby God only, or a divine person distinguished from the Son : see him, throughout, as 2 John 3. Then the name, the Word, is known to be almost (if not quite) peculiar to this apostle. Had the text been devised by another, it had been more easy and obvious, from the form of baptism, and the common language of the church, to have used the name Son instead of that of the Word. As it is observed, that Tertullian and Cyprian use that name, even when they refer to this verse ; or it is made an objection against their referring to this verse, because they speak of the Son, not the Word ; and yet Cyprian's expression seems to be very clear, by the citation of Facundus himself. 'Blessed Cyprian, the Carthaginian Bishop and Martyr, in the epistle or book he wrote concerning the Trinity, considered the testimony of the apostle John as relating to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit ; for, he says, The Lord says, I and the Father are one ; and, again, These three are one.' Now it is nowhere written that these are one, but in v. 7. It is probable, then, that Cyprian, either depending on his memory, or rather intending things more than words, persons more than names, or calling persons by their names more usual in the church, (both in popular and polemic discourses,) called the second by the name of the Son, rather than of the Word. So we are told, that the author of the book,—De Baptismo Hæreticorum, allowed to be contemporary with Cyprian, cites John's words, agreeably to the Greek manuscripts and the ancient versions, thus : 'For John, in his epistle, says, concerning our Lord, This is He, Jesus Christ, who came by water and blood, not in water only, but in water and blood ; and it is the Spirit that bears witness, because the Spirit is Truth ; for there are three that bear witness, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one.' If all the Greek manuscripts and ancient versions say, concerning the Spirit, the water, and the blood, that they agree in one, then it was not of them that Cyprian spake, whatever variety there might be in the copies in his time, when he said, it is written, they are one. And therefore Cyprian's words seem still to be a firm testimony to v. 7. and an intimation, likewise, that a forger of the text would have scarcely so exactly hit on the apostolical name for the second Witness in heaven,—the Word. Then,

As this apostle only records the history of the water and blood flowing out of the Savior's side, so it is he only, or he principally, who registers to us the Savior's promise and prediction of the Holy Spirit's coming to glorify Him, and to testify of Him, and to convince the world of its own unbelief, and of his righteousness, as in his Gospel, ch. 14:16, 17, 26. 15:26. 16:7—15. It is most suitable, then, to the diction and to the gospel of this apostle, thus to mention the Holy Ghost as a Witness for Jesus Christ. Then,

5. It was far more easy for a transcriber, by turning away his eye, or by the obscurity of the copy, it being obliterated or defaced on the top or bottom of a page, or worn away in such materials as the ancients had to write upon, to lose and omit the passage, than for an interpolator to devise and insert it ; he must be very bold and impudent, who could hope to escape detection and shame ; and profane, too, who durst venture to make an addition to a supposed sacred book. And,

6. It can scarcely be supposed, that, when the apostle is representing the strength of the Christian's faith in overcoming the world, and the foundation it relies on in adhering to Jesus Christ, and the various testimony given to Jesus Christ in the world, he should omit the supreme testimony that attended Him, especially when we consider that he meant to infer, as he does v. 9. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater ; for this, that he had rehearsed before, is the witness of God which He hath testified of his Son. Now in the three witnesses on earth, there is neither all the witness of God, nor indeed any witness who is truly and immediately God. The anti-trinitarian opposers of the text will deny that either the Spirit, or the water, or the blood, are God Himself ; but, on our present reading, here is a noble enumeration of the several witnesses and testimonies supporting the truth of the Lord Jesus, and the divinity of his institution ; here is the most excellent abridgment or breviary of the motives to faith in Christ, of the credentials the Savior brings with Him, and of the evidences of our Christianity, that is to be found, I think, in the book of God ; on which single account, even waiving the doctrine of the divine Trinity, the entire text is worthy of all acceptance.

Having these rational grounds on our side, we proceed. The apostle, having told us that the Spirit that bears witness to Christ is truth, shows us that He is so, by assuring us that He is in heaven, and that there are others also who cannot but be true, or truth itself, concurring in testimony with Him, v. 7. Here is a Trinity of heavenly witnesses ; first, the Father ; He set his seal to the commission of the Lord Christ, more especially in proclaiming Him at his baptism, Mat. 3:17. confirming his character at the transfiguration, Mat. 17:5. accompanying Him with miraculous power and works, John 10:37, 38. avouching at his death, Mat. 27:54. raising Him from the dead, and receiving Him up to his glory, John 16:10. and Rom. 1:4. The second witness is the Word ; a mysterious name, importing the highest nature that belongs to the Savior Jesus Christ ; wherein He existed before the world was, whereby He made the world, and whereby He was truly God with the Father. He must bear witness to the human nature, or to the man

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—8. True faith in Christ always springs from regeneration ; and all, who are not 'born of God,' are either infidels and avowed unbelievers, or have only a dead and unprofitable faith.—Real Christians 'show their faith by their works.' By a new and divine nature, and the grace of the Holy Spirit, and by the exercise of faith in the testimony, the promise, the power, and the love of God, they gradually acquire 'a victory over the world,' and learn habitually to do the will of God, without being seduced, persuaded, or affrighted from it, primitive Christians.—It is well known, that volumes have been written, concerning part of the seventh verse and the beginning of the eighth, in order to prove, or disprove, the authenticity of the passage enclosed within crochets. It is certainly wanting in many of the ancient manuscripts and versions ; and is not authenticated by many of the fathers : but whether the Trinitarians interpolated it, or the Arians and Unitarians omitted it, is to this day a matter of controversy, and not likely to be fully determined. On such questions men will in general decide, according to their preconceived opinions : yet it is very wrong to deviate from truth in support of system. It is, however, perhaps, somewhat more likely, that the Arians or Anti-Trinitarians should silently omit in their copies a testimony which was so decisive against them, or that it should be left out by the mistake of some ancient transcriber than that the Trinitarians should directly forge and insert it. The Trinitarian, in fact, would be deprived only of one argument out of very many, with which he might attempt the conviction of his opponent, if this text were wholly rejected as spurious ; for his doctrine is abundantly supported by other scriptures : but if this testimony were admitted as the unerring Word of God, all the ingenuity and diligence of opponents, would scarcely suffice to explain it away, or to avoid the inference, which must naturally be drawn from it. It has indeed by some, even Trinitarians, been maintained, that the words rendered, 'these three are One,' only mean, that their testimony is one : but the writer of the passage, whoever he was, did not speak of testimony, but of persons : else, why is the word translated three, of the masculine gender ? Or why is the expression so remarkably varied in the next verse ? 'These three,' the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit 'are by any persons or objects in the world around them. Let then all who profess to believe the Gospel, inquire, whether they have attained, or are contending for, this victory. For we must all, after Christ's example, 'overcome the world,' or it will overcome us, to our final ruin. John 16:33. — Indeed, a worldly religion, exhibiting the appearance of evangelical doctrine, is the peculiar danger of the present day, and gives infidels and heretics of every name their chief advantage, against the great and glorious truths of the sacred Scriptures. SCOTT.

One.' It may also be doubtful, whether the passage connects with so much propriety, if the contested words be omitted, as it otherwise does : for if we read, with the copies in which they are wanting, 'The Spirit beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth : for there are three that bear record, . . . the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, &c.' there seems to be a remarkable repetition, and a want of the apostle's usual energy in the passage ; and it does not appear evident for what reason 'the water and the blood,' or the two great ordinances of the New Testament outward signs of sanctification and justification, by the grace and atoning blood of the Son of God, and as agreeing in One with the testimony of the Spirit, should be mentioned ; and yet nothing should be hinted, concerning the testimony of the Father from heaven to Christ, as his beloved Son ; or that of Christ Himself, as confirmed by his miracles and resurrection, and the fulfilment of his promise, in pouring the Holy Spirit on his assembled disciples. As the words stand in our copies, there is indeed a most abundant concurrence of divine testimonies to the Person and doctrine of Christ, pointed out in a most commendable and energetic manner.—It cannot, however, be expected, that in such a publication as this, a question, which has long employed the attention of the most learned men in Christendom, should be settled : and, after assigning the above reasons in favor of the authenticity of the passage, I confess, that I myself am very doubtful, whether they be sufficient to counterbalance the arguments of those who think otherwise. We need not, however, be anxious on the subject, as we have scriptural evidence in abundance, without this text, to confirm our faith in one God, subsisting in three co-equal Persons, 'the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,' into whose One name we have been baptized. 9 If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God, which he hath testified of his Son.

10 He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness <sup>m</sup> in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

Christ Jesus, in and by whom He redeemed and saved us; and He bore witness, by the mighty works He wrought, John 5:17. in conferring a glory on Him at his transfiguration, John 1:14. in raising Him from the dead, John 2:19. The third Witness is the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit; an august and venerable name, the Possessor, Proprietor, and Author of holiness. True and faithful must He be, to whom the Spirit of holiness sets his seal and solemn testimony. So He did to the Lord Jesus, the Head of the Christian world; and that in the miraculous production of his immaculate human nature in the Virgin's womb, Luke 1:35. &c. in the visible descent on Him at his baptism, Luke 3:22. &c. in an effectual conquest of the spirits of hell and darkness, Mat. 12:28. in the visible, potent descent on the apostles, to furnish them with gifts and powers to preach Him and his Gospel to the world, after He Himself was gone to heaven, Acts 1:4, 5. 2:2—4. &c. in supporting the name, gospel, and interest of Christ, by miraculous gifts and operations by and upon the disciples, and in the churches for two hundred years, I Cor. 12:7. Concerning which, see Dr. Whitby's excellent discourse, in the preface to the second volume of his Commentary on the New Test. These are witnesses in heaven; and they bear record from heaven; and they are one. It should seem not only in testimony, (for that is implied in their being three witnesses to one and the same thing,) but on a higher account, as they are in heaven; they are one in their heavenly being and essence; and, if one with the Father, they must be one God.

To these there is opposed, though with them conjoined, a trinity of witnesses on earth, such as continue here below, v. 8. Of these witnesses the first is the Spirit. This must be distinguished from the Person

V. 9, 10. The principal truth, which 'God hath testified' in his holy Word, is, that which relates to his Son, and to the way of salvation through Him. 11, 12. John 5:31—47. 20:24—31. He, therefore, who credits 'the witness' or testimony 'of God,' will 'believe on the Son of God,' and rely on Him for the blessings, which He came into the world to procure for sinners by his righteousness and redemption, and to bestow on them. In consequence of this faith, the Christian receives another, and still more satisfactory testimony to the truth of the Gospel, which also seals to him his interest in Christ and his salvation. For 'he that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness' or testimony 'in himself.' The discoveries made to him of the glory of God in the Person of Christ, and the change thus produced in his judgment, dispositions, and affections, (Notes, 20, 21. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:5, 6.) the views he has received of the evil of sin, of his own character and condition, of the deceitfulness and wickedness of his heart, and of the wretched state of the world around him, all of which he now perceives to accord exactly with the declarations of Scripture, though once he saw nothing of it; the victory he is enabled by faith to obtain over the world, his own evil habits and propensities, and the temptations of Satan; the evident answers many of his prayers receive, and his experience of the faithfulness of God to his promises, and of his providential regard to him; and, above all, 'the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Spirit of adoption; the peace, hope, and consolation connected with it; the pleasure he finds in communion with God, and obedience to his will; his delight in the society of spiritual persons, and the support he receives when afflicted; these, and similar experiences, form a 'testimony in himself' to which all other men must be strangers. For thus 'the Spirit of God witnesses with his spirit, that he is the child of God,' and gives him sweet earnestness and foretastes of his eternal inheritance. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:14—17. This puts the matter out of all doubt with him; (except in hours of peculiar darkness, conflict, temptation, or humiliating correction;) and he can no more be argued out of his belief of the leading truths of the Gospel, respecting the Person and salvation of Christ, by any ingenuity or sophistry of infidels or heretics, than he could be convinced by logic, that the sun is a dark, cold body, when he sees its light, and feels its genial warmth. This testimony proves, that the Scripture is the Word of God, that he rightly understands the most essential parts of it, and that he is a partaker of the blessing thus announced to him. (Notes, John 14:15—21. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. 2 Pet. 1:19 of the Holy Ghost, who is in heaven. We must say, then, with the Savior, as reported by this apostle, that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit, John 3:6. The true disciple becomes a new creature. The regeneration and renovation of souls are a testimony to the Savior. It is a testimony on earth, because it continues with the church there, and is not performed in that conspicuous, astonishing manner in which signs from heaven are accomplished. To this Spirit belong not only the regeneration and conversion of the church, but its progressive sanctification, victory over the world, her peace, love, and joy, and all that grace by which she is made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. Then the second is, the water. This was, before, considered as a mean of salvation, now as a testimony to the Savior Himself, and intimates his purity and purifying power. And so it seems to comprehend the purity of his own nature and conduct in the world; He was holy, harmless, and undefiled; the testimony of John's baptism, who bore witness of Him, prepared a people for Him, and referred them to Him, Mark 1:4, 7, 8. the purity of his own doctrine, by which souls are purified and washed, John 15:3. the actual and active purity and holiness of his disciples, 1 Pet. 1:22. and all this signed and sealed by the baptism He has appointed for the initiation or introduction of his disciples; in which He by that sign says, Except I wash thee, thou hast no part in Me, 1 Pet. 3:21. The third witness is, the blood; this He shed; and this was our ransom. This testifies for Jesus Christ; in that it sealed up and finished the sacrifices of the Old Test., confirmed his own predictions, and the truth of all his ministry and doctrine, John 18:37. showed unparalleled love to God, in that He would die a sacrifice to his honor and glory, in making atonement for the sins of the world, John 14:30, 31. demonstrated unspeakable love to us; and none will deceive those whom they entirely love, John 14:13—15. it showed also the disinterestedness of the Lord Jesus, as to any secular interest and advantage. No impostor ever proposes to himself contempt, and violent, cruel death, John 18:36. It likewise lays obligation on his disciples to suffer and die for him. No deceiver would invite proselytes to his side and interest, at the rate that the Lord Jesus did, John 16:2. Hcb. 13:13. Then the benefits accruing and produced by his blood, must immediately demonstrate that He is indeed the Savior of the world. And then, finally, these are signified and sealed in the institution of his own Supper, Mat. 26:28. Such are the witnesses on earth. Such is the various testimony given to the Author of our religion. No wonder, if the rejecter of all this evidence be judged as a blasphemer of the Spirit of God, and be left to perish without remedy in his sins. These three witnesses (being more different than the three former) are not so properly said to be one, as to be for one; to be for one and the same purpose and cause; or to agree in one; in one and the same thing among themselves, and in the same testimony with those who bear record from heaven.

The apostle justly concludes, If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater; for, this is the witness of God, that He hath testified of his Son, v. 9. God, that cannot lie, hath given sufficient assurance to the world, that Jesus Christ is his Son; the Son of his love, and Son by office, to reconcile and recover the world unto Himself; He testified therefore the truth and divine original of the Christian religion, and that it is the sure, appointed way and mean of bringing us to God.

V. 10—13. In these words we may observe,

1. The privilege and stability of the real Christian, v. 10. He hath not only the outward evidence others have, but in his own heart a testimony for Jesus Christ. He can allege what Christ and the truth of Christ have done for his soul, and what he has seen and found in Him. As, (1.) He has deeply seen his sin, guilt, misery, and abundant need of such a Savior; the excellency, beauty, and office of the Son of God, and the incomparable suitableness of such a Savior to all his spiritual wants and sorrowful circumstances. (2.) He sees and admires the wisdom and love of God in preparing and sending such a Savior to deliver him from sin and hell, and to raise him to pardon, peace, and communion with God. (3.) He has found and felt the power of the Word and doctrine of Christ, wounding, humbling, healing, quickening, and comforting his soul; and he finds that the revelation of Christ, as it is the greatest discovery and demonstration of the love of God, so it is the most apt and powerful mean of kindling and inflaming love to the

—21. Rev. 2:17.) On the other hand, he who believeth not God, in respect of his testimony to his Son, can never receive 'the witness in himself;' but must expect his heavy displeasure, seeing 'he maketh God a liar,' or treats his Word as a lie, as utterly unworthy of credit or confidence. This is the case of every one, 'who believes not the testimony which God hath given of his Son,' and confirmed in all the ways above enumerated. As all revelation centres in this fundamental doctrine, it is in vain for a man to plead, that he believes 'the testimony' of God in other things, while he rejects it in this. His opinion may indeed accord with the doctrine of Scripture, in matters less affronting to human pride, more level with the human understanding, or more reconcilable to the love, friendship, and pursuits of the world. Thus a man assents to scriptural truths, because he thinks they may be otherwise proved, at least there is no other evidence to be opposed to the testimony of God, and nothing to be lost by assenting to it. But if his own reasonings, or those of some philosopher, lead to a conclusion contrary to the Word of God, he will 'lean to his own understanding,' or believe in a philosopher, and treat 'the testimony of God as a lie.' Nay, men professing to believe the Scriptures, will reject doctrines expressly revealed there, or employ a perverse diligence and ingenuity to explain them away, merely because they can find no philosophical arguments, with which to confirm the testimony of God! The light of the sun is not sufficient for them, nor will they be satisfied with it, unless they can see the same objects by their own dim candle! On the other hand, they will profess to believe the Word of God, when it accords with their own reasonings, or the opinion of some philosopher, who perhaps borrowed that glimmering from Scripture, which preserves his scheme from total darkness; and they sometimes suppose themselves doing good service, when they call such witnesses to support 'the testimony of God!' So that, in fact, they do not believe God, but other witnesses, when they assent to scriptural truth; for they directly treat Him as a false Witness, when He contradicts their pre-conceived opinions. It is therefore evident, that no belief of the Bible, or of anything revealed in it, is of any avail to salvation, except a man believe 'the testimony, which God hath given of his Son.' 11:12. John 3:12—21, 27—36.

(10.) Witness in himself. Not an imaginary conceit,—not an unfounded persuasion, but an evidence in his own heart, from the work of God's Holy Spirit, who has created therein a love to holiness in all its branches.

holy, blessed God. (4.) He is born of God by the truth of Christ, as v. 1. has a new heart and nature; a new love, disposition, and delight, and is not the man he formerly was. He finds yet such a conflict with himself, with sin, with the flesh, the world, and invisible wicked powers, as is described and provided for in the doctrine of Christ. (5.) Such prospects and strength afforded him by the faith of Christ, that he can despise and overcome this world, and travel on towards a better. (6.) He finds what interest the Mediator has in heaven, by the audience and prevalence of his prayers in his name. Thus he is begotten again to a lively hope, to a holy confidence in God, and to a victory over terrors of conscience, dread of death and hell; to a comfortable prospect of life and immortality, being enriched with the earnest of the Spirit, and sealed to the day of redemption. Such assurance has the gospel-believer; he has a witness in himself. Christ is formed in him, and is growing up to the fulness and perfection, or perfect image of Christ in heaven.

PRACT. OBS. V. 9—13. Nothing can be more absurd, than the claim of those men, who will be satisfied with nothing but strictly logical demonstration in matters of religion; whilst, in the ordinary affairs of life, they do not hesitate to proceed on credible human testimony, and would deem him out of his senses who refused to do so; whereas, if 'we receive the witness of men,' surely 'the witness of God is greater!' Indeed, it is impossible, that the invisible things of God and the eternal world should be known, except by faith receiving the information of divine revelation; for, in what other conceivable way can we know the incomprehensible perfections of God, his inscrutable counsels, or the manner in which He will show mercy to his rebellious creatures? These are not subjects for man to discover, to know, or demonstrate, by speculation or abstract reasonings; but will always be best understood by those, who most simply believe the 'sure testimony of God' respecting them. And, indeed, 'they, who believe in the Son of God,' have an

V. 11, 12. He 'that hath the Son, hath life; he that by true faith receives Christ, as the Son of God, and as his Prophet, High Priest, and King: his 'Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;' who humbly depends on Him for all these purposes, and is thus interested in Him, and vitally united to Him, and continually seeks and derives the blessings of salvation from Him, through the influences of the Holy Spirit; 'hath life,' is spiritually alive; has the promise of eternal life ratified to him, and the sure earnest of it in his soul, which shall certainly be completed in his everlasting felicity. (Notes, John 1:10—13. 5:24—27. 11:20—27. 14:4—6.) 'And he, that hath not the Son of God, hath not life;' he who denies Him to be truly and properly 'the Son of God,' and refuses to trust and honor Him as such, or who disdains to submit to his teaching as his Prophet, to rely on his atonement and intercession as his High Priest, or to obey Him as his King, 'hath not life;' he is 'dead in sin,' under condemnation, and 'the wrath of God abideth on him;' nor will any morality, learning, philosophy, forms of religion, doctrinal notions, or enthusiastical confidences, at all avail him. Gal. 5:1—6. For Christ is the believer's 'Life,' and if a man do not live in Christ, by 'faith working by love,' and by the supply of his Spirit, he has no life, whether he be an Infidel, a Socinian, or an Arian, a Pharisee, a Mystic, an Enthusiast, or an Antinomian. (Notes, 2:20—25. Mat. 11:25, 26. John 5:20—23.) To have Christ, we must 'receive Him,' and abide in Him, for all the purposes for which He came into the world; we cannot truly receive Him in one character, whilst we reject Him in another. He will not protect, deliver, or accept services, as a King, from those who will not be taught by Him, [643] lieve, either that God did not send his Son into the world, when He has given us such manifold evidence that He did; or that Jesus Christ was not the Son of God, when all that evidence relates to and terminates on Him; or, that He sent his Son to deceive the world, and to lead it into error and misery; or, that He permits men to devise a religion, which, in all the parts of it, is a pure, holy, heavenly, undefiled institution, and so worthy to be embraced by the reason of mankind, and yet is but a delusion and a lie; and then lends them his Spirit and power to recommend and obtrude it on the world; which is to make God the Father, the Author; and Abettor of the lie.

3. The matter, the substance, or contents of all this divine testimony concerning Jesus Christ, v. 11. This is the sum of the Gospel, the epitome of the whole record given us by all the aforesaid six witnesses. (1.) That God hath given to us eternal life, designed it for us, prepared all the means necessary to bring us thither, and made it over to us by covenant and promise. Then, (2.) This life is in the Son. The Son is eternal life, in his own essence and Person, John 1:4. 1 John 1:2. He is eternal Life to us; the Spring of our spiritual and glorious life, Col. 3:4. And thereupon it must follow, [1.] He that hath the Son, hath life, v. 12. Such honor hath the Father put upon the Son; such honor must we put upon Him, too. [2.] He that hath not the Son of God, hath not life, v. 12. He continues under the condemnation of the law, John 3:36. he refuses the Son, who is Life itself, the Procurer of life, and the Way to it; he provokes God to deliver him over to endless death for making Him a liar; since he believes not this record that God hath given concerning his Son.

4. The end and reason of the apostle's preaching this to believers. (1.) For their satisfaction and comfort, v. 13. On all this evidence, and witness, it is but just and meet there should be those who believe on the name of the Son of God. God increase their number! How much testimony from heaven has the world to answer for! And to three witnesses in heaven! These believers have eternal life, have it in the covenant of the Gospel; in the beginning and first-fruits of it within them; and in their Lord and Head in heaven. They may know they have it, and should be quickened, encouraged, and comforted, in the prospect of it; and they should value the Scriptures, so much written for their consolation and salvation. (2.) For their confirmation and progress in their holy faith, v. 13. Believers must persevere, or they do nothing. To withdraw from believing on the name of the Son of God, is to renounce eternal life, and to draw back unto perdition. Therefore the evidences of religion, and the advantage of faith, are to be presented to believers, in order to hearten and encourage them to persevere to the end.

V. 14—17. Here we have,

1. A privilege belonging to faith in Christ; and that is, audience in prayer, v. 14. The Lord Christ imboldens us to come to God in all circumstances, with all our supplications and requests. Through Him our petitions are admitted and accepted of God. The matter of our prayer must be agreeable to the declared will of God. It is not fit we should ask what is contrary either to his majesty and glory, or to our own good, who are his, and dependent on Him. And then we may have confidence, that the prayer of faith shall be heard in heaven.

2. The advantage accruing to us by such privilege, v. 15. Great are the deliverances, mercies, and blessings, the holy petitioner needs. To know that his petitions are heard or accepted, is as good as to know that they are answered; and therefore that he is so pitied, pardoned, counselled, sanctified, assisted, and saved, (or shall be so,) as he is allowed to ask of God.

3. Direction in prayer, in reference to the sins of others, v. 16. Here we may observe, (1.) We ought to pray for others as well as for ourselves; for our brethren of mankind, that they may be enlightened, converted, and saved; for our brethren in the Christian profession, that they may be sincere, their sins be pardoned, and they delivered from evils, and the chastisements of God, and preserved in Christ Jesus. (2.) There is a great distinction in the heinousness and guilt of sin, v. 16, 17. All sin, as to the merit and legal sentence of it, is unto death, Gal. 3:10. But there is a sin unto death, in opposition to such sin as is here inward testimony to the truth, through the illumination, renewal, and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in their own happy experience, which, when possessed in a large degree, is a rational foundation of the most entire confidence, that can possibly be had by those who have not come to the immediate vision and enjoyment of God. But can it be expected, that this 'secret of the Lord' should be with those, who do not believe his Word, and who treat Him, who is the Truth itself, as a liar and deceiver? Disregarding then the self-wise reasonings of such incompetent judges, let us thankfully receive the record of Scripture, that 'God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is in his Son.' Thus we 'may give diligence' to obtain an assurance of our interest in Christ, and know that we have eternal life; and daily grow stronger in faith, more steadfast and rejoicing in hope, 'and always abounding in the work of the Lord; knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.' SCOTT.

or who despise or neglect his precious redemption and all prevailing intercession; and He will not save, as a High Priest, those 'who will not have Him to rule over them.' SCOTT.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle wrote the things above stated, unto those, who believed on the name of the Son of God, to confirm their faith, and to put them on their guard against the seductions of false prophets; to assure them, that theirs was the true religion of Christ, and that 'in Him they had eternal life;' 1 Pet. 5:12. and to encourage their hope, that they might, more constantly and vigorously, exercise and profess this 'faith in the Son of God,' amidst all the delusions, persecutions, and tribulations with which they met.—The epistle might be, as indeed it has been, very useful to other descriptions of men; but this was the primary intent of it.

V. 14, 15. The confidence, which established Christians had in God, respecting the promise of 'eternal life in his Son,' had an especial reference to his readiness to answer their prayers, through the heavenly Advocate, notwithstanding their sinfulness. In some things their prayers were evidently and speedily answered; in others, they might be satisfied they were granted in the best manner, though not exactly as they expected. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Even when their requests were for the present denied, they might make themselves sure, that in the best time and way they would at length be answered, in case this was for the glory of God, and their own real and abiding advantage; which would compose their invids, even as if they had already obtained their petitions. 16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it.

18 We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

said not to be unto death. There is therefore, A sin not unto death. That surely must be all such sin, as, by divine or human constitution may consist with life; in the human constitution with temporal or corporal life, in the divine, with corporal or with spiritual, evangelical life. In opposition to which there are sins, which, by righteous constitution, are to death, or to a legal forfeiture of life; such as we call capital crimes. Then there are sins which, by divine constitution, are unto death; and that either death corporal, or spiritual and evangelical. There may be sin unto corporal death, as in either gross hypocrites, as Ananias and Sapphira, or, for aught we know, in sincere Christian brethren; as when the apostle says of the offending members of the church of Corinth; For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep, 1 Cor. 11: 30. Then, There are sins, which, by divine constitution, are unto death spiritual and evangelical, that is, are inconsistent with spiritual and evangelical life; with spiritual life in the soul, and with an evangelical right to life above. Such are total impenitence; as also a blaspheming of the Spirit of God in the testimony He has given to Christ and his Gospel, and a total apostasy from the light and convictive evidence of the truth of Christian religion. These are sins deriving the guilt of everlasting death. Then comes,

4. The application of the direction for prayer, according to the different sorts of sin thus distinguished. The prayer is supposed to be for life; He shall ask, and He (God) shall give them life. In the case of a brother's sin, which is not (in the manner already mentioned) unto death, we may in faith and hope pray for him; and particularly for the life of soul and body. But in case of the sin unto death in the forementioned ways, we have no allowance to pray. Perhaps the apostle's expression, I do not say, he shall pray for it, may intend no more than, 'I have no promise for you in that case; no foundation for the prayer of faith.' (1.) The laws of punitive justice must be executed, for the common safety and benefit of mankind. (2.) The removal of evangelical penalties, can be prayed for only conditionally or provisionally, that is, with proviso that it consists with the wisdom, will, and glory of God that they should be removed, and particularly such death prevented. (3.) We cannot pray that the sins of the impenitent and unbelieving should, while they are such, be forgiven them; or that any mercy of life or soul, that supposes the forgiveness of sin, should be granted to them, while they continue such. But we may pray for their repentance, for their being enriched with faith in Christ, and thereupon for all other saving mercies, unless it should appear that some have committed the irremissible blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and the total apostasy from the illuminating, convictive powers of the Christian religion, for whom it should seem we are not to pray at all. Heb. 10: 27. And these last seem to be sins chiefly intended by the apostle by the names of sins unto death. Then, (4.) The apostle seems to argue, that there is sin that is not unto death; thus, All unrighteousness is sin, v. 17. but were all unrighteousness unto death, then we were all peremptorily bound over to death; but since it is not so, there is pardoned sin; sin that does not derive a plenary obligation to eternal death. If it were not so, there could be no justification, or continuance of the justified state. The gospel-constitution, or covenant, abbreviates, abridges, or rescinds the guilt of sin.

V. 18—21. Here we have,

1. A recapitulation of the privileges and advantages of the sound Christian believers:

(1.) They are secured against sin, against the fulness of its dominion, or the fulness of its guilt, v. 18. as ch. 3: 6, 9. and so against that sin that infallibly binds the sinner over unto the wages of eternal death; the new nature, and the inhabitation of the divine Spirit thereby, prevent the admission of such unpardonable sin.

(2.) They are fortified against the devil's destructive attempts, v. 18. that is, the wicked one may not touch him, to death. It seems not to be barely a narration of the duty or the practice of the regenerate; but an indication of their power by virtue of their regeneration; they are thereby prepared and principled against the fatal touches, the sting, of the wicked one; he may prevail too far with them, to draw them to some acts of sin; but it seems to be the design of the apostle to assert, that their regeneration secures them from such assaults of the devil, as will bring them into the same case and actual condemnation with the devil.

(3.) They are on God's side and interest, in opposition to the state of the world, v. 19. Mankind are divided into two great dence.] See on John 7:4.—In Him.] 'Concerning Him.' Marg. 'The Son of God' (13) is the immediate antecedent, and seems especially intended. 3:1—3. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.

V. 16—18. It had been shown, that apostasy, after an intelligent and credible profession of the Gospel, when connected with strong expressions of enmity, could seldom be separated from 'the sin against the Holy Spirit.' Mat. 12:31, 32. 2 Tim. 4:14, 15. Heb. 6:4—8. 10:26—31. This, no doubt, was 'the sin unto death,' which the apostle intended; and, when it appeared evident that any person had committed it, Christians were directed to leave him to the righteous judgment of God, without expecting to see him 'renewed to repentance,' or even praying for him. Jer. 7:16. 14:10—12. 15:1.—Indeed, 'all unrighteousness,' or every deviation from the perfect rule of righteousness, 'is sin,' and so deserves death, or final condemnation, according to the law; 3:4—6. and all who turn aside from the Gospel, or act contrary to it, merit this punishment. Yet 'there is a sin,' even of this kind, 'which is not unto death;' for, being the effect of surprise rather than of deliberate enmity, many, who have been thus overcome in the moment of temptation, have been recovered; so that Christians were admonished to pray for their brethren when grievously fallen, if they did not see in them the marks of determined obstinacy and enmity.—The apostle had before observed that none, 'who had been born of God,' could 'work or practise sin;' 3:7—10. and he here added, that none of them were left to commit the unpardonable sin; for though such apostates 'had gone out from them, they had not been of them.' (2:19.) The man, who, as 'born of God,' does not allow himself in any sin, but watches and prays, in faith, fear, and love, to be preserved from temptation, or supported under it, 'keeps himself,' by the Holy Spirit, out of the way of this fatal transgression; so that 'the wicked one,' by whom hypocrites and formalists are overcome and induced to apostatize, is not allowed access to him, or can make no impression on him.—Satan obtained leave to 'sift' all the apostles, and he grievously baffled and wounded Peter; but he could touch none of them, except hypocritical Judas, so as to prevail with them deliberately to renounce and betray their Lord; (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. Rom. 7:15—17.) for 'the incorruptible seed abode in them,' in the genuine faith, love, and integrity produced by it, and therefore they 'could not' thus 'sin, because they were born of God.' (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—5, 23.)—(18) Born of God.] 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God.' (1.) 'Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world.' 'Whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, &c.' 'Every one that doeth righteousness is born of Him.' (2:29.) 'Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.' (3:9.) 'Every one that loveth is born of God.' (4:7.) Everything forming an essential part of Christianity is inseparably connected with being 'begotten' or 'born of God;' and it is evidently intended, that they all co-exist in the regenerate.—But would the apostle have reversed these propositions? Would he have said, 'He that believeth not that Jesus is the Son of God, is not born of God?' 'That which does not overcome the world is not born of God.' 'He who doeth not righteousness is not born of God.' 'He that committeth sin is not born of God.' 'He who loveth not is not born of God.' Doubtless he would. But would he have said, 'He has not been baptized?' This is sufficient to expose the absurdity of baptism and regeneration being considered as the same thing, or inseparably connected. SCOTT.

(16.) Sin unto death.] 'Such an apostasy from Christianity, as is attended with blaspheming the operations of the Spirit of God, and ascribing them to Satan.' DODDR.—An apostasy like that mentioned by Paul, as irrecoverable, Heb. 6:4—6. and attended with the horrid aggravation of ascribing the operations of God's Holy Spirit to the devil, Mat. 12:31, 32. WILLIAMS.—The consideration of what our Savior says, of the sin against the Holy Ghost, (Mat. 12:31. and 32.) which is doubtless the same as this of which John speaks, led the learned Prof. THOLUCK, of Germany, to renounce the hope of the future restoration of all men to happiness. In a letter to a friend in this country, (see N. Y. Observer, of March 31st, 1838,) dated Dec. 22, 1837, he says, 'I have long been struggling in this respect. I formerly expressed the hope, [of the final restoration of all men,] though I confessed, that I did not know how to reconcile it with the clear passages in Scripture, which made me reluctant to embrace that opinion as unquestionable truth. Dogmatically, [i. e. by argument, or on philosophical grounds,] I felt myself drawn towards this opinion; but exegetically, [by ascertaining the meaning of scripture-texts,] I do not know how to justify it. Mature reflection, however, on the doctrine of the sin against the Holy Ghost, HAS MADE ME SINCE ABANDON THE IDEA OF THE FINAL RESTORATION OF ALL MEN; for what Christ says concerning it, seems too clearly to imply a degree of opposition against holy truth, which leads to ETERNAL unhappiness.' ED.

V. 19. This general declaration includes all unbelievers, whether Jews or Gentiles; idolaters, or hypocritical worshippers of the true God; atheists, infidels, profligates, profane persons, and formalists; the wise and the foolish; the learned and the unlearned; the rich and the poor; the royal and the noble, as well as the base and vile; yea, the moral and virtuous, as well as the vicious. All 'lie in wickedness,' under the power of unrepented and unmortified sin, or 'under the wicked one,' as, in some way or other, doing him service; those only excepted, who 'are delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the Son of God.' Acts 26:16—18. Col. 1:9—14. Rev. 12:7—12. This, the well-instructed and established Christian knows assuredly; and the criminality, slavery, and misery of the human race excite his lamentations, prayers, and endeavors to spread the Gospel; as the only method, by which they can be delivered from their abject condition. Rom. 10:12—17. Eph. 2:11—13. Yet other men perceive nothing of it; but are exceedingly offended at the declaration, and at the endeavors used, 'to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.'—As the apostle made no exception, in favor of unbelieving Jews in his day; so we can allow of none, in favor of unbelieving, heretical, and worldly and unregenerate men, called Christians, in this present time. SCOTT.

(19.) Lieth in wickedness.] 'In this short expression, the horrible state of the world is painted in the most lively colors; a comment on which we have in the actions, conversations, contracts, quarrels, and friendships of worldly men.' WESLEY, in Williams.

20 And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding; that we may know him that is true: and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life.

parties, that which belongs to God, and that which belongs to the wicked one. Christian believers belong to God; they are of God; from Him, to Him, and for Him, Deut. 32:9. but the rest, the whole world, by far the major part, lieth in wickedness, in the wicked one, the god of this world. Strange, such a knowing spirit should be so implicitly incensed against the Almighty and all his interests, when he cannot but know it must end in his own overthrow and everlasting damnation! How tremendous is the judgment of God on that wicked one! May the God of the Christian world continually demolish his dominion!

(4.) They are enlightened in the knowledge of the true, eternal God, v. 20. 'The Son of God is come into our world, and we have seen Him, and know Him, by all the evidence already asserted; He hath revealed unto us the true God, as John 1:18. opened our minds, given us internal light in our understandings, whereby we may discern the glories of the true God; and we are assured that it is the true God that He hath discovered to us; infinitely superior in purity, power, and perfection, to all the gods of the Gentiles; the same God that, according to Moses' account, made the heavens and the earth; who took our fathers the patriarchs into peculiar covenant with Himself; brought our ancestors out of Egypt, gave us the law on mount Sinai; gave us his holy oracles, and promised the call and conversion of the Gentiles; by his counsels and works, by his love and grace, by his terrors and judgments, we know that He, and He alone, in the fulness of his being, is the living and true God.' It is a great happiness to know the true God; to know Him in Christ, is eternal life, John 17:3. It is the glory of the Christian revelation, that it gives the best, clearest, and only account of the true God.

(5.) They have a happy union with God and his Son, v. 20. 'The Son leads us to the Father, and we are in both; in the love and favor of both; in covenant and federal alliance with both; in spiritual conjunction with both; by the inhabitation and operation of their Spirit; and that you may know how great a dignity and felicity this is, you must remember, that this true One is the true God and eternal Life;' (or rather, as it should seem a more natural construction;) 'This same Son of God is Himself also the true God and eternal Life,' John 1:1. and here, ch. 1:2. 'so that in union with either, much more with both, we are united to the true God and eternal Life.' Then we have,

2. The apostle's concluding monition, v. 21. Since ye know the true God, and are in Him, let your light and love guard you against all that is advanced in opposition to Him, or competition with Him; flee from the false gods of the heathen world; they are not comparable to the God whose you are, and whom you serve; adore not your God by statues and images which share in his worship; your God is an incomprehensible Spirit, and is disgraced by such sordid representations; hold no communion with your heathen neighbors in their idolatrous worship; mortify the flesh, and be crucified to the world, that they, [or self,] may not usurp the throne and dominion in the heart, which is due only to God; the God whom you have known, is He who made you, who redeemed you by his Son, who has sent his Gospel to you, who has pardoned your sins, begotten you unto Himself by his Spirit, and given you eternal life; cleave to Him in faith and love, and constant obedience, in opposition to all things that would alienate your mind and heart from God. To this living and true God be glory and dominion for ever and ever! Amen.'

PRACT. OBS. V. 14—21. We should abound in supplication, especially seeking to the Lord, to pardon and recover the fallen, as well as to relieve the tempted and afflicted; and, as we cannot know, who has 'sinned unto death,' we should not readily yield to discouragement, respecting those whom we once considered as brethren.—If we have so grown in faith and grace, as to 'know that we are of God,' we shall readily perceive, that 'the whole world lieth in wickedness,' and under the power of Satan; this will show us how vast our obligations are to redeeming love, and special grace: and it ought to excite our constant prayers and unremitting endeavors, to promote the preaching of the

V. 20, 21. This is the true God, &c. 'This Person is the true God, and eternal life.' 1:1, 2. This language is peculiarly to be noted; it is not obvious to determine, in some of the clauses, whether the Father or the Son was intended; but when 'the Son of God, even Jesus Christ,' had been mentioned, the apostle made use of a personal pronoun, often improperly rendered 'this Man,' when applied to Christ, but commonly signifying this Person. This demonstrative pronoun has Jesus Christ for its immediate and evident antecedent; and, having said 'this Person is the true God, and eternal Life,' the apostle concluded, by solemnly cautioning his beloved 'children' to 'keep themselves from idols;' which must imply, that they would do this, by adhering to the worship of the Son, as 'the true God and eternal Life,' and as One with the Father who sent Him. The Scripture, and the New Test. especially, was expressly intended, to draw men off from the worship of idols of every kind, to 'serve the One living, and true God;' and can it possibly be imagined, for a moment, that an inspired writer should speak in this manner of Jesus Christ, if He had not been, equally with the Father, the proper object of all adoration? If the worship of the Son of God be idolatry, (as it must be, if He be no more than a creature,) surely the apostle introduced his caution against idols in a very unaccountable manner! But if the triune JENOVAH, 'the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit,' three Persons in One undivided Godhead, be the Object, and the only Object, of divine adoration, nothing could be more proper and emphatical; for the Jews, rejecting the Son, and professing to worship God in One Person, (as the Mohammedans, Deists, Socinians, and others in after ages, have done,) had really changed the true Object of worship, the God of the Bible, for an imaginary Being; and could not be exculpated from the charge of idolatry; for they could not be discriminated from those, who worshipped the Supreme Being, under the name of Jupiter, or Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:17—21.) So that nominal Christians, in these days, (and not only in the church of Rome,) have more need to be warned to 'keep themselves from idols,' than it is generally supposed; and to be careful, that they adore the true God, in whose name Christ commanded, that his disciples should be baptized; and that, whilst they 'bow their knees to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus,' they forget not to 'honor the Son even as they honor the Father who sent Him,' 2:20—25. John 5:20—23. 2 John 7:11. in dependence on the omnipresent and divine Spirit, and under his guidance, that 'the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost,' 'may be with them at all times.' Mat. 28:19, 20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14, v. 14—20. We know.] Is there in these clauses nothing like personal assurance of acceptance and salvation, arising from inward consciousness of having been enlightened in that knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, which is eternal life? Sc.

(20.) This is the true God.] 'To paraphrase this of the true religion, is quite enervating the force of Scripture, and taking a liberty with plain words by no means to be allowed. It is an argument of the Deity of Christ, which almost all those who have written in its defence have urged; and which, I think, none who have opposed it have so much as appeared to answer.' DODDR.—'Athanasius, in the council of Nice, disputing against Arius, called this text of John a written demonstration; adding that, as Christ said of the Father, John 17:3. This is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, so John said of the Son, This is the true God and eternal life. Arius then acquiesced, and confessed the Son of God to be the true God.' GLASSIUS, in Mackn.—'That life and eternal life are, by the sacred writers, perpetually ascribed to

Gospel, and the conversion of sinners, at home and abroad, even to the ends of the earth, by every mean in our power. Happy are they, who 'know that the Son of God is come,' and to whom God 'hath given an understanding to know,' and a heart to rely on, 'Him that is true!' May this be our privilege, may we 'dwell in Christ, and Christ in us;' may we be 'one with Him, and He with us;' for 'This is the true God and eternal life;' thus our fellowship will be with the Father and the Son, through the Spirit; and we shall be preserved from all idols and destructive heresies, and idolatrous love of worldly objects, and 'kept by the power of God, through faith, unto eternal salvation.' SCOTT.

Christ, as the Author, is certain, and the words are nowhere applied to God the Father. However, most recent interpreters think it more agreeable to the context, to refer the this, not to the immediate antecedent, but to his, [his, before Son.] BLOOMF.—'The confident assurance with which the apostle maintains his conviction of the truth of the two doctrines, concerning the Divinity and human nature of Christ, which pervade the epistle, and are summarily confirmed in vs. 7, 8. are strikingly expressed in v. 20.'

Concluding Note. A few words may well be added here on a chief theme of the most spiritually minded of the apostles, from an 'Outline of the Scripture Evidence for the Trinity.' Glasgow, 1831. Not being so much controverted as the Deity of Christ, that of the Holy Spirit has been less treated of by controversialists; but that the believer may have wherewith to answer questions, hereon, the following summary is given from the above closely reasoned work, p. 158, &c.

Having proved that the Holy Spirit is neither to be regarded, with the Sabellians, as only another name for the Father, nor yet, with the Socinians, as only a figure for the virtue or power of God, but as truly an intelligent person [rather, persona], it is unnecessary to repeat the proofs of the divinity of the Spirit, these being involved in the whole of the preceding argument, and not being disputed either by Socinians or Sabellians. We conclude, then, that the Holy Spirit is the most High God, absolutely and properly so called, and yet is revealed as in some real manner to be distinguished from the Father and the Son.

Summary. The masculine pronoun is employed in speaking of the Holy Spirit.—The H. S. is described as having a will to choose, understanding to know, and power to execute his purposes.—Is represented as grieved, as interceding, commanding, forbidding, reproving, testifying, instructing.—We are baptized into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and as the first two are persons, so also is the Holy Spirit. We conclude, therefore, the Holy Spirit to be a distinct, intelligent person, and not a quality or attribute.

Again, the H. S. is a Divine person.—Sin against Him is unpardonable.—He is the Author and Worker of miracles.—He is the Author of all spiritual gifts; the Sanctifier of all hearts.—He is omnipotent, omniscient, and eternal.—He is sometimes called God. Honor and worship are ascribed to Him.—Therefore He is a Divine person.

The H. S. is distinguished from the Father and the Son, by the form of baptism, and by the apostolic benediction.—He is said to be sent by the Father and the Son; He is therefore neither the Father nor the Son.—By the Spirit we have access unto the Father; therefore He is not the Father.—The Spirit was distinguished from the Father and the Son at the baptism of Christ; the Son descended into the Jordan, the Father spoke from heaven, and the Spirit descended like a dove and abode on the Son.—The Holy Spirit is, therefore, a Divine person, and yet in some way to be distinguished from God the Father and God the Son.

The amount of our Scripture information is, that God is one; that there are two persons, each of whom, with the Father, we are led to consider as God, and to ascribe to all the three distinct, personal properties. The terms, person, Trinity, substance, &c. are not to be found in Scripture; they were introduced by controversy into the Christian church. The Nicene fathers were driven to their adoption by the evasions of the Arians, to bind the ever-changing Proteus of heresy. "I could wish," says Calvin, in his Institutes, "such terms might be buried, provided men would agree in believing the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit to be one God, yet so as that the Son is not the Father, nor the Holy Spirit the Son, but that they were in some way to be distinguished."

Similar are the sentiments of Dr. Pyle Smith, to whom we are indebted for the most learned and complete illustration of the "Scripture Testimonies to the Messiah."—"With regard to the three divine persons in heaven, these things are affirmed in Scripture. To the Messiah, and to the Holy Spirit, as well as the Father, divine attributes are ascribed; but these are to be combined with another fact, that of the divine unity. The doctrine of the Trinity, three persons in one substance, is the theory by which we attempt to combine these two apparently incompatible things. But some Christians think it more proper and becoming, under the darkness and infirmity of the present state, to say, and I incline to say so too,—I receive all the facts of the case; I believe them upon the authority of inspiration, but presume not to form any hypothesis for enjoining and generalizing them, because I conceive that so to do is beyond the range of my present faculties. I rely, therefore, with perfect assurance upon the veracity of the great Revealer; and am confident, that all the facts, necessarily mysterious as they are to my apprehension, are, in reality, in perfect harmony, and without discrepancy."

These two quotations, from Calvin and Smith, contain all that we know upon the subject, all that Scripture reveals and requires us to believe. Ed.

SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. T. Reynolds.)

HERE we find a canonical epistle inscribed, principally, not only to a single person, but to one also of the softer sex. And why not to one of that sex? Male and female are both one in Christ Jesus; our Lord Himself neglected his own repast, to commune with the woman of Samaria, in order to show her the Fountain of life; and when almost expiring on the cross, He would with his dying lips bequeath his blessed mother to the care of his beloved disciple, and thereby instruct him to respect female disciples for the future: it was to one of the same sex that our Lord chose to appear first after his return from the grave, and to send by her the news of his resurrection to this as well as to the other apostles: and we find afterwards a zealous Priscilla, so well acquitting herself in her Christian race, and particularly in some hazardous service toward the apostle Paul, that she is not only often mentioned before her husband, but to her, as well as to him, not only the apostle himself, but also all the Gentile churches, were ready to return their thankful acknowledgments. No wonder, then, that a heroine in the Christian religion, honored by divine providence, and distinguished by divine grace, should be dignified also by an apostolical epistle.

HENRY.

This short epistle, and that which follows, being written, as it is probable, not long before the apostle's death, and neither to any church by name, nor to the churches at large, but to individuals, were not generally and unanimously known and acknowledged to be written by him, in the earliest ages, in the decided manner, that the preceding epistle was; but their coincidence with it, in sentiment, manner, and language, satisfied all concerned, at an early period, that they were written by the same person. Mill observes, that of the 13 vs. in this epistle, 8 may be found in the first, either in sense or in expression.—The word rendered, 'The elder,' might probably be applied to John, when all the other apostles were dead, as a title of honorable distinction, for he was the senior of the whole church; or he might modestly, yet as claiming authority, assume it on this occasion. Some have conjectured, that the church of Jerusalem was figuratively meant by 'The elect lady;' and that of Ephesus, where John is supposed to have at this time resided, by 'her elect sister;' but it has more generally been thought, that an eminent and honorable Christian matron, well known in the church, was addressed by the title of 'the elect lady,' and that some other honorable Christian woman, nearly related to her, was intended by 'her elect sister' (13). On any supposition, however, the title of catholic cannot properly belong to it (Pref. to 1 Pct.); as the writer's purpose of visiting, in a short time, those whom he addressed, is alone a sufficient proof.—It is supposed, that the apostle especially intended, in this epistle, to put those to whom he wrote on their guard against such heretics, as affirmed that Jesus was not really a Man, but only appeared to be one; and appeared to do and suffer those things, which the apostles and evangelists recorded of Him. This heresy was, in its consequences, subversive of Christianity; which accounts for the decided language of the writer against those teachers who held it. (Note, 7—11.) The same decided conduct is, however, equally needful, reasonable, pious, nay, charitable, in the true sense of the word, in respect of those who propagate many other opinions, subversive of the Gospel; who yet exclaim against the bigotry of those, however benevolent and beneficent in all other things, who determine not to be 'partakers of their evil deeds.'

SCOTT.

A. D. 90.

1 He exhorteth a certain honorable matron, with her children, to persevere in Christian love and belief, 8 lest they lose the reward of their former profession: 10 and to have nothing to do with those seducers that bring not the true doctrine of Christ Jesus.

THE elder unto the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth;

2 For the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father; in truth and love.

4 I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

V. 1, 2. Ancient epistles began, as here, with salutations and good wishes: [thus] religion consecrates, as far as may be, old forms, and turns compliments into real expressions of life and love. Here, we have, as usually,

1. The saluter; not expressed by name, but by a chosen character,—The elder. The expression, style, and love, intimate, that the penman was the same with that of the foregoing epistle; he is now the elder, emphatically and eminently so; possibly, the oldest apostle now living; the chief elder in the church of God. He was now old in holy service and experience, had seen and tasted much of heaven, and was much nearer than when at first he believed.

2. The saluted; a noble Christian matron, and her children. Here is a pattern for persons of quality of the same sex; the elect lady; not only a choice one, but one chosen of God; it is lovely and beautiful to see ladies, by holy walking, demonstrate their election of God: and her children; probably, the lady was a widow; she and her children, then, are the principal part of the family, and so this may be styled an economical [or family] epistle. This lady and her children are further notified by the respect paid them, and that, (1.) By the apostle himself; whom I love in the truth, or in truth; whom I sincerely and heartily love. (2.) By all her Christian acquaintance, all the religions who knew her; and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth. Then here is the ground of this love and respect thus paid to this lady, and her children; for the truth's sake, (or true religion's sake,) which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever. Christian love is founded on the appearance of Christian, vital religion. We should not be religious merely by fits and starts; but constantly and permanently. The Spirit of Christianity, we may suppose, will not be totally extinguished: which shall be with us for ever.

V. 3, 4. Here we see, 1. The salutation, which is, indeed, an apostolical benediction, v. 3. Sacred love pours out blessings on this honorable Christian family: these blessings are craved, from God the Father, the God of all grace; and the Lord Jesus Christ, also distinguished by this emphatical character,—the Son of the Father; such a Son as none else can be; such a Son as is the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the ex- press Image of his Person; who, with the Father, is also eternal Life, 1 John 1: 2. From these divine Persons the apostle craves Grace,—divine favor and good-will, the spring of all good things; Mercy,—free pardon and forgiveness; they who are already rich in grace, have need of continual forgiveness; Peace,—tranquillity of spirit and serenity of conscience, in an assured reconciliation with God, together with all safe and sanctified outward prosperity: and these are desired in truth and love; either by sincere and ardent affection in the saluter, or as productive of continued truth and love in the saluted; these blessings will continually preserve true faith and love in the elect lady, and her children; and may they do so!

2. The congratulation on the prospect of the exemplary behavior of other children of this excellent lady. Happy parent, who was blessed with such a numerous religious offspring! I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in the truth, as we have received commandment from the Father. See how good it is to be trained up to early religion! Though religion is not to be founded on education, yet education may be, and often is blessed, and is the way to fortify youth against irreligious infection. Hence, too, let young travellers learn to carry their religion along with them, and practice it; as, possibly, these children of the lady were come to Ephesus where the apostle now was, and saw them. How happy a lady was this, who had brought forth so many children for heaven and for God! And how great a joy must it be to her, to hear so good an account of them from so good a judge! And see, further, it is joyful to good old minis-

NOTES. V. 1—3. The aged apostle seems to have written this short letter, about the time he wrote his general epistle, or something later; and he only styled himself 'the Elder,' (1 Pet. 5:1.) knowing that the honorable matron, whom he addressed, would be satisfied from whom she received it, and properly regard it, without a more explicit declaration of his authority. (1) Lady.] Kuria: from kurios; which is used in various ways, but always as addressing or speaking of one who is in some respect, an acknowledged superior.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.

6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist.

ters, and good old disciples, to see a hopeful, rising generation, who may serve God and support religion in the world when they are dead and gone. We see here, also, the rule of true walking; the commandment of the Father. Then is our walk true, our converse right, when it is managed by the Word of God.

V. 5, 6. We come now more into the design and substance of the epistle; and here, we have, 1. The apostle's request; I beseech thee, lady. Considering what it is he entreats, the way of address is very remarkable; here he might command or charge; but harsher methods are worse than needless, where milder will prevail; and the apostolical spirit is, of all other, the most tender and endearing. Whether out of deference, or apostolical meekness, or both, he condescends to beseech. He may be supposed speaking as another apostle does to a certain master to whom he writes, Phil. v. 9. Love will avail where authority will not; and we may often see, that the more authority is urged, the more it is slighted. The apostolical minister will love and beseech his friends into their duty.

2. The thing requested of the lady, and her children,—Christian, sacred love; that we love one another, v. 5. They that are eminent in any Christian virtue, have yet room to grow therein, 1 Thess. 4:9, 10. This love is recommended, from the obligation thereto; it is commanded, from the antiquity of the obligation, v. 5. The command may be said to be a new one, in respect of its new enactment and sanction by the Lord Christ; but yet, as to the matter of it, (mutual, holy love,) it is as old as natural, Jewish, or Christian religion. Then this love is illustrated from the fruitful nature of it, v. 6. This is the test of our love to God, our obedience to Him. This is love to ourselves, to our own souls, that we walk in obedience to divine commands. In keeping them there is great reward. Universal obedience is the proof of the goodness and sincerity of Christian virtues; and they that aim at all Christian obedience, will be sure to attend to Christian love; that is a fundamental duty in the gospel-charter, v. 6. The foresight of the decay of this love, as well as of other apostasy, might engage the apostle to inculcate this duty, and this primordial command, the more frequently, the more earnestly.

V. 7—9. In this principal part of the epistle, we find, 1. The ill news communicated to the lady; many deceivers are abroad. This report is introduced by a particle that bespeaks a reason of the report; for there are destroyers in the world; they who subvert the faith, destroy the love. Now here is, (1.) The description of the deceiver and his deceit; he confesses not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, v. 7. he brings some error or other concerning the Person of the Lord Jesus. Strange, that after such evidence, any should deny that the Lord Jesus is the Son of God, and Savior of the world! (2.) The aggravation of the case; such an one is a deceiver and an antichrist, v. 7. he deludes souls, and undermines the glory and kingdom of the Lord Christ.

2. The counsel given to this elect household hereupon, v. 8. The more deceivers and deceits abound, the more watchful the disciples must be. Delusions may so prevail, that even the elect may be endangered thereby. Two things they must beware of: (1.) That they lose not what they had wrought, v. 8. what they have done, or what they have gained; any religious labor, or fair reputation for religion, conviction of the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, the excellency of religion, and the power of God's Word, Heb. 6:4—6. Ga. 5:7. (2.) That they lose not their reward, none of that honor, praise, or glory, they once stood fair for, Rev. 3:11. The way to attain the full reward, is, to abide true to Christ, and constant in religion to the end.

3. The twofold reason of the apostle's counsel, and of their care and caution; (1.) The danger and evil of departure from gospel-light and revelation; it is in effect and reality a departure from God Himself, v. 9. The doctrine of Christ is appointed to guide us to God; it is that whereby God draws souls to salvation and to Himself; they who revolt from thence, in so doing re- volt from God. (2.) The advantage and happiness of firm adherence to Christian truth; it unites us to Christ, and thereby to the Father also; for they are one. The great God, as He has set his seal to, so He puts a value on, the doctrine of Christ. We must retain that holy doctrine in faith and love, as we hope or desire to arrive at blessed communion with the Father and the Son.

V. 10, 11. 1. On due warning given, concerning seducers, the apostle gives direction concerning the treatment of such; they are not to be entertained as the ministers of Christ; the Lord Christ will distinguish them from such, and so would He have his disciples. This doctrine here is concerning Christ as the Son of God, the Messiah and Anointed of God, for our redemption and salvation. Possibly, this lady was like Gaius, whom we read of in the next epistle, a generous housekeeper, and hospitable entertainer of travelling ministers and Christians. These deceivers might possibly expect the same reception with others, or with the best who came there; but the apostle allows it not; 'Do not welcome them into your family.' Doubtless, such may be relieved in their pressing necessities; but not encouraged for ill service. Deniers of the faith are destroyers of souls; and it is supposed that even ladies themselves should have good understanding in the affairs of religion. 'Bless not their enterprises; Neither bid him God speed. Attend not their service with your prayers and good wishes.' Bad work should not be consecrated or recommended to the divine benediction. God will be no patron of falsehood, seduction, and sin. We ought to bid God speed to evangelical ministration; but the propagation of fatal error, if we cannot prevent, we must not dare to countenance. Then,

2. Here is the reason of such direction, forbidding the support and patronage of the deceiver, v. 11. Favor and affection partake of the sin. We may be sharers in the iniquities of others. How judicious and how cautious should the Christian be! There are many ways of sharing the guilt of other persons' transgressions; it may be done by culpable silence, indolence, unconcernedness, private contribution, public countenance and assistance, inward approbation, open apology and defence. The Lord pardon our guilt of other persons' sins!

V. 12, 13. The apostle concludes this letter, 1. With an adjournment of many things to personal conference, v. 12. Here it is supposed that some things are better spoken than written. A pen and ink may be a merey and a pleasure; but a personal interview may be more so; the apostle was not yet too old for travel. The communion of saints should be by all methods maintained; and their communion should tend to their mutual joy. Excellent ministers may have their joy advanced by their Christian friends, Rom. 1:12.

2. With the presentation of service and salutation from some near relations to the lady, v. 13. Grace was abundant toward

V. 7—11. The influence of the false teachers tended to produce disunion among Christians, as well as to pervert and mislead the unstable. 1 John 2:18, 19. 4:1—6. It therefore behooved those, to whom this epistle was addressed, and all into whose hands it might come, to be on their guard, and 'to take heed to themselves,' to their principles, spirit, and conduct: Mat. 24:4, 5, 23—25. Heb. 12:15—17. lest the labor of their ministers should prove fruitless, and their expectations be disappointed; and lest even their own losses, self-denial, and diligence in the cause of the Gospel, should prove of no use to them. This would be wholly the ease of apostates; and in some degree of those, who were seduced into heretical opinions and an inconsistent conduct. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 4:8—11. Phil. 2:14—18. Rev. 3:10, 11.) Whereas the apostle's desire was, that he and they together might receive a full reward; which would be the case, if they were steadfast in the faith and obedience of the Gospel: as this would not present recompense him, by his joy in them, for all his labors on their account; and they would at last be 'his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ.'—The heretics especially intended, are supposed to be those who denied the real humanity of the divine Word; and explained all that was recorded of his pious and sufferings, as mere delusive appearances. (Note, 1 John 4:1—3.)—(9) Hath not God, &c. 1 John 2:23. 5:12. The latter part of the verse, 1 John 2:23, which is printed in Italics, as of doubtful authority, is here fully confirmed. SCOTT.

V. 12, 13. We know nothing concerning 'her elect sister,' who sent salutations to them, to which the apostle joined his hearty Amen. But it is probable, that some well-known and eminent family of believers, this family; here are two elect sisters, and, probably, their elect children. How will they admire this grace in heaven! The apostle condescends to insert the nieces' duty, (as we would call it,) or dutiful salutation to their aunt. The duty of inferior relations is to be cherished. Doubtless, the apostle was easy of access, and would admit all friendly and pious communication, and was ready to enhance the good lady's joy in her nieces as well as her children. May there be many such gracious ladies rejoicing in their gracious descendants and other relations! Amen.

PRACT. OBS. A consistent and fruitful profession of the Gospel is the principal honor, even of those few of the noble and exalted of the earth, who are thus distinguished: and that love is most cordial and permanent, which Christians bear to one another 'in the truth, and for the sake' of it; for this will dwell in their souls to eternity, and be with them as the source of most perfect felicity. Some few families of this kind are found among us: may 'the Lord bless them more and more, and their children after them;' and raise up many others to copy their example! For, alas, most of the superior orders in the community are rapidly diffusing irreligion, infidelity, and vice, in their extensive circles; and preparing to leave them as a fatal legacy to their posterity!—We should employ every argument and persuasion to induce Christians to abound in love of their brethren, and to render obedience to all the Lord's commandments: for those 'many deceivers, who confess not that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is come in the flesh,' 'to redeem us to God with his blood,' will have great success among such professed Christians, as are not 'rooted and grounded in love,' and taught to delight in God's commandments. Let us then equally disregard those, who 'transgress the commandments,' and those, who 'abide not in the doctrine of Christ;' that, by maintaining and obeying the truth, we may 'have both the Father and the Son' for our 'Shield, and exceeding great Reward.' Let us protest against such teachers, as do not bring with them 'the doctrine of Christ;' lest any should by our means be induced to hearken to their 'damnable heresies,' and so we should be found 'partakers of their evil deeds;' which, though little suspected, are often a thousand times more mischievous to mankind, than those of profligates, or even assassins; as they murder far more souls of men, than the others can do bodies.—In obeying this commandment of God, amidst the clamors which will be raised against our bigotry and uncharitableness, we should be careful to show great candor to those, who differ from us in matters less essential, who hold the doctrine of Christ's Person, atonement, and holy salvation: and we ought to pray for those de-luded men, who deny the fundamentals of Christianity; and show them kindness, in every way, and by every method, which implies no degree or kind of countenance to their heresies, and which consists with an open and decided protest against them. Thus we shall stand at a distance from all appearance of persecution and intolerance, while we strenuously assert the difference between the Gospel of Christ, and the doctrine of every antichrist; and between the love due to enemies, and that which belongs to the saints, in communion with whom we find much of our present joy, as an anticipation of our eternal felicity.

AN EXPOSITION OF THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

CHRISTIAN communion is exerted and cherished by letter. Christians are to be commended in the practical proof of their professed subjection to the Gospel of Christ. The animating and countenancing of generous and public-spirited persons, is doing good to many. — To this end, the apostle sends this encouraging epistle to his friend Gaius, in which also he complains of the quite opposite spirit and practice of a certain minister, and confirms the good report concerning another more worthy to be imitated.

'The writer of this epistle speaks with an authority, which the bishop of a particular church could not pretend to.—For if Diotrefes was bishop of one of the churches of Asia, the bishop of Ephesus' (that is, if not an apostle also) 'had no right to say to him, "If I come, I will remember his deeds which he docs." (Note, 9:10.) That language, and the visit made to the churches, denote a man who had a more general jurisdiction, than that of a bishop, and can only suit John the apostle.' Beausobre and L'Enfant, in Mackn. — All inquiries, whether Gaius, to whom the epistle is addressed, was, or was not, the same person mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the epistles of Paul, have hitherto terminated in uncertainty. (Note, 1—4.) There can be no reasonable doubt, that 'the strangers,' and those 'who for his name's sake went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles,' were evangelists, or missionaries. (Note, 5—8.)

A. D. 90.

I commendeth Gaius for his piety, 5 and hospitality 7 to true preachers: 9 complaining of the unkind dealing of ambitious Diotrefes on the contrary side, 11 whose evil example is not to be followed: 12 and giveth special testimony to the good report of Demetrius.

THE elder unto the well-beloved Gaius, whom I love <sup>a</sup> in the truth.

2 Beloved, I <sup>b</sup> wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest <sup>c</sup> in the truth.

V. 1, 2. Here, we see, 1. The sacred penman who writes and sends the letter, The elder. Some have questioned, whether this were John the apostle or no: but his style and spirit seem to shine therein. Gaius could not question from whom the letter came. The apostle might have assumed many more illustrious characters, but it becomes not Christ's ministers to affect swelling, pompous titles. He almost levels himself with the more ordinary pastors of the church, while he styles himself,—The elder. Or, possibly, most of the extraordinary ministers, the apostles, were now dead, and this holy survivor would countenance the continued standing ministry, by assuming the more common title,—The elder. 1 Pet. 5:1.

2. The person saluted and honored by the letter. He is notified, (1.) By his name, Gaius. We read of several of that name, particularly of one whom the apostle Paul baptized at Corinth, who possibly might be also the apostle's host there, Rom. 16:23. if this be not he, it is his brother in name, estate, and disposition. Then, (2.) By the kind expressions of the apostle to him,—the well-beloved, and whom I love in the truth. Love, expressed, is wont to kindle love. Here seems to be either the sincerity of the apostle's love, or the religion of it; the sincerity of it,—whom I love in the truth, whom I truly, cordially love; the religion of it,—whom I love in the truth, for the truth's sake, as abiding and walking in the truth, as it is in Jesus.

3. The salutation, or greeting; containing a prayer, introduced by an affectionate compellation,—Beloved, thou beloved one in Christ. Here is, (1.) The apostle's good opinion of his friend, that his soul prospered. (2.) His good wishes for his friend, that his body may prosper and be in health as well as his soul. We may well wish and pray that they who have prosperous souls, may have healthful bodies too; their grace will shine in a larger sphere of activity.

V. 3—8. In these vs. we have, 1. The good report the apostle had received concerning this friend of his, v. 3, 6. Where we may see, (1.) The testimony, or thing testified, concerning Gaius,—the truth that was in him; the reality of his faith, evinced

NOTES. V. 1—4. It has been generally supposed, that the Gaius, to whom John wrote, was the same person, of whom frequent mention is made in the writings and history of Paul: (M. R. b.—Note, Rom. 16:21—23.) and his character may seem to favor the opinion; but it is probable, that John wrote his epistle many years after Paul's death. Gaius was a very common name; and the person, here addressed, appears to have been converted by John's ministry; so that no certainty can be attached to the opinion; nor is it of any consequence.—Gaius was probably of a weak constitution, and had perhaps sustained heavy losses, from the cruel rapacity of persecutors; while, at the same time, 'his soul prospered' exceedingly, as the apostle well knew. — SCOTT.

(2.) Even as thy soul prospereth.] 'It is impossible to say, how much the comfort and usefulness of most of the pious is diminished, by their failing to make greater progress in the divine life. The difference between a lively, growing Christian, and one who makes little or no advancement, is as great, as between a healthy and a diseased body. The motives to growth in grace are of the strongest possible kind.'

Rev. Dr. ALEXANDER.

4 I have no greater joy<sup>d</sup> than to hear that my children walk in truth.

5 Beloved, thou doest<sup>e</sup> faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren and to strangers;

6 Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church: whom if thou bring<sup>f</sup> forward on their journey<sup>g</sup> after a godly sort, thou shalt do well:

7 Because that for his name's sake they went forth, taking<sup>h</sup> nothing of the Gentiles.

8 We therefore ought to<sup>i</sup> receive such, that we might be fellow-helpers to the truth.

[Practical Observations.]

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrophes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence<sup>j</sup> among them, receiveth us not.

10 Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth, <sup>k</sup>prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth<sup>l</sup> them out of the church.

by his charity, which includes love to the brethren, kindness to the poor, and hospitality to Christian strangers. (2.) The witnesses,—brethren that came from Gaius. A good report is due from those who have received good; though a good name is but a small reward for costly service, yet it is better than precious ointment, and will not be refused by the ingenuous and religious. (3.) The auditory before which the report and testimony were given,—before the church; this seems to be the church at which the apostle now resided; what church that was, we are not sure; what occasion they had thus to testify his faith and love before the church, we cannot tell; possibly, out of the fulness of the heart they could not but testify what they found and felt; possibly, they would engage the church's prayer for the continued life and usefulness of such a patron, that he might prosper and be in health, as his soul prospered.

2. The report the apostle himself gives of him, introduced by an endearing appellation again, v. 5. (1.) He was hospitable, good to the brethren, even to strangers; or, he was good to the brethren of the same church with himself, and to those who came from far; all of the household of faith were welcome to him. (2.) He seems to have been of a catholic spirit; he could overlook the petty differences among serious Christians, and be communicative to all who bore the image and did the work of Christ. And, (3.) He was conscientious in what he did; 'Thou doest faithfully;' the commendation of what is good in us, is designed, not for our pride, but for our encouragement to continue therein, and should be accordingly improved.

3. The apostle's joy therein, in the good report itself, and the good ground of it, v. 3. The best evidence of our having the truth, is, our walking in the truth. Good men will greatly rejoice in the soul-prosperity of others; and they are glad to hear of the grace and goodness of others; They glorified God in me.

4. The direction the apostle gives his friend concerning further treatment of the brethren with him, v. 6. It seems to have been customary in those days of love, to attend travelling ministers and Christians, at least some part of their road, 1 Cor. 16: 6. and this may be done after a godly sort, in a manner worthy of God, suitable to the deference and relation we bear to God. Christians should do even the common actions of life and of good-will, as serving God therein, and designing his glory. Then,

5. The reasons of this directed conduct; these are two: (1.) Because that for his name's sake these brethren went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles. It appears thus, that these were ministerial brethren; that they went forth to preach the Gospel, and propagate Christianity; possibly, sent out by this apostle himself: they went forth, also, to carry a free Gospel, taking nothing; these were worthy of double honor. Those who are not called to preach the Gospel themselves, yet may much contribute to the progress of it. The Gospel should be made without charge to those to whom it is first preached; they who know it not, cannot be expected to value it; the churches and Christian patriots ought to concur to support the propagation of holy religion in the Pagan countries; public spirits should concur according to their several capacities; they who are freely communicative of Christ's Gospel, should be assisted by those who are communicative of their purses. (2.) We ought, therefore, to receive such, that we may be fellow-helpers to the truth, to true religion. The institution of Christ is the true religion, it has been attested by God; they that are true in it and true to it, will earnestly desire and pray for, and contribute to, its propagation in the world.

V. 9—11. 1. Here is a very different example and character; an officer, a minister in the church, less generous, catholic, and communicative than the private Christians: a Gentile name,—Diotrophes, attended with an unchristian spirit, full of pride and ambition; He loves to have the pre-eminence. It is an ill, unbeseeming character of Christ's ministers, to love pre-eminence, to affect presidency and precedency in the church of God. See his contempt of the apostle's authority, letter, and friends. The deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words. Strange, the contempt should run so high! But ambition will breed malice against those who oppose it. I wrote to the church, v. 9. in recommendation of such and such brethren. But Diotrophes receiveth us not; admits not our letter and testimony therein. This seems to be the church of which Gaius was a member; and the apostle seems to write by and with these brethren. To an ambitious, aspiring spirit, apostolical authority, or epistle, signifies but little. Neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would; and casteth them out of the church, v. 10. There might be some differences, or different customs, between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians. Pastors should seriously consider what differences are tolerable. Church-power and church-censures are often abused. But woe to those who cast out the brethren whom the Lord Christ will take into his own communion and kingdom! Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth, v. 10. will remember to censure them. This seems to intimate apostolical authority. But the apostle seems not to hold an episcopal court, to which Diotrophes must be summoned; but will come to take cognizance of this affair in the church to which it belongs. Acts of ecclesiastical domination and tyranny ought to be animadverted upon. May it

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—8. A few, even in these days, are so eminent in grace, and zealous of good works, that the precarious state of their health, gives concern to all who love the Gospel. and they earnestly desire the continuance of their lives, and the increase of their ability to do good, and that they may 'prosper in all things, even as their souls prosper.' The conduct of such Christians, gives a joy to faithful ministers, which counterbalances their grief on account of those who disgrace their profession.—Parents and ministers should be as ready to commend what is well done, as to point out what is wrong, in the conduct of those, whom they superintend; and, indeed, this is far more pleasing to a benevolent mind.—The faithful stewards of Christ, whether they have been intrusted with the mysteries of God, or with talents of another sort, will at length 'obtain a good report; nor can multiplied charities, or hospitality without grudging,' be so concealed, as to remain unknown to the church. Mat. 5:19—16. 6:1—4. 1 Tim. 5:24, 25. Applause properly introduces exhortations, and even needful reproofs; 1

Cor. 11:2—22. and, indeed, it should be considered as an admonition, to proceed in the same commendable behavior.—Ministers and missionaries, who are 'constrained by the love of Christ,' and of the souls of men, to leave comfortable stations, to rend themselves from beloved relatives, submit to many and great privations, and even that of sweet communion with Christian friends, and abundant 'means of grace,' to go forth and encounter perils and hardships in spreading the Gospel; and who are content to struggle with poverty in 'their labor of love,' rather than quit their stations, or do anything to prevent their own success; are peculiarly entitled to the countenance and assistance of their fellow-Christians. Indeed, that money must be well expended, which promotes the faithful preaching of the Gospel, in any part of the world; and it is greatly to be wished, that all Christians would try to save, not only a little, but, if practicable, very much, from their expenses, in order to create a fund for conducting such important designs. SCOTT.

V. 5—8. 'The apostle's sentiment in this precept is, that such of the brethren as had not devoted themselves to the preaching of the Gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at home, were bound to contribute, according to their ability, towards the maintenance of those who went about preaching the Gospel.' Mackn.—It is manifest, at the first glance, how exactly this accords to the case of those, in this commercial country, who cannot, or do not, become missionaries; and to their conduct respecting those who do. SCOTT.

(6.) Before the church.] 'To wit, at Ephesus.' Ros. and Bl. Ed. (7.) His name's sake.] 'This, referring, as it must, to God, immediately preceding, [godly sort, marg. worthy of God,] Christ is here, as well as elsewhere, termed God.' BLOOMF.

V. 9—12. Some expositors think, the apostle here only meant, that he 'should have written to the church,' had not the report which he had heard concerning Diotrophes, determined him rather to address his letter to Gaius, but it does not appear how the words can admit of that construction. It seems that he had written to the church, to induce them to help on their journey, and assist in a manner becoming their profession, the persons before mentioned; (Note, 5—3.) but Diotrophes (probably a pastor of the church, whose circumstances, or abilities, or eloquence, concurring with his ambition of pre-eminence, had acquired for him an undue influence over his brethren) refused to entertain or countenance those evangelists or missionaries, whom the apostle had recommended; and even forbid others to do it: and when they regarded the apostle's authority, more than his prohibition, he proceeded to excommunicate them for so doing!—It is indeed most wonderful, that a professed minister of Christ, should thus pertinaciously oppose the aged apostle; and should acquire such authority over the affairs of any church, as to be supported in the disgraceful contest; yet this was most evidently the case.—But while the apostle cautioned Gaius against Diotrophes, he pointed out to him another person of his acquaintance, who was well worthy of his imitation. And Gaius would be sure to honor and imitate so excellent a man. SCOTT.

(9.) Who loveth, &c.] 'Who loveth the presidency,' or chief place, doubtless in the church, of which Diotrophes was most probably an officer; and, being one, magnified himself in his office; he loved such pre-eminence, and behaved haughtily in it.' GREENFIELD.

(10.) Casteth out, &c.] 'As it can hardly be supposed Diotrophes would excommunicate any one on so frivolous a pretext, it is best, with most recent commentators, to take the sense to be, "refuses to receive them as Christians;" for their thus denying them hospitality, compelled them to go elsewhere.' BLOOMF.

11 Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know that our record is true.

PRACT. OBS. V. 9-14. Alas! we live too much to ourselves, in these lukewarm days; and we need not wonder, if covetous and ambitious men, who 'love to have the pre-eminence' in the church, disdain admonitions from inferior ministers; when even the apostles were not secured from the presumptuous, insolent, and malicious opposition of persons of this description; but their deeds will one day be remembered against them, when 'every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he who humbleth himself shall be exalted.' Let us then not follow that which is proud, selfish, malicious, slanderous, and wicked; though the example be given by eminent, and distinguished, or accomplished persons; but let us be 'followers of God, as dear children, and

(11.) 'Many a man seems to reckon himself destitute of talents to do good, as if there were nothing for him to do. My friend, think again; inquire what your opportunities are; you will certainly find them to be more than you are aware of. "Plain men, dwelling in tents," persons of very ordinary rank in life, may, by their eminent piety, prove persons of extraordinary usefulness. A poor John Ulrich may make a Grotius the better for him. A poor mechanic,—who can tell, what an engine of good he may become, if humbly and wisely devoted to it?'—He that doeth good is of God. 'Were a man able to write in seven languages; could he daily converse with the sweets of all the liberal sciences; were he to entertain himself with all ancient and mod-be better agreed to whom that power belongs! 2. Here is counsel on that different character, dissuasion from copying such a pattern, and, indeed, any evil at all, v. 11. Imitate not such unchristian, pernicious evil; but pursue the contrary good, in wisdom, purity, peace, and love. Caution and counsel are not needless to those who are good already. Those cautions and counsels are most likely to be accepted, that are seasoned with love. The practice of goodness is the evidence of our filial, happy relation to God. Evil-workers vainly pretend or boast it.

V. 12-14. Here, we see, 1. The character of another person, one Demetrius; not much known otherwise. But here his name will live. His character was his commendation. Few are well spoken of by all: and sometimes it is ill to be so. But he had a good report of all, nay, even of the truth, also, the same being confirmed by the apostle's and his friends' testimony; and that with an appeal to Gaius's own knowledge. Probably, this Demetrius was known to the church where the apostle now resided, and to that where Gaius was. It is well for those who are commended, when those who commend them can appeal to the consciences of those who know them most.

2. The conclusion of the epistle: in which we may observe, (1.) The referring of some things to personal interview, v. 13, 14. (2.) The benediction; Peace be to you; all felicity attend you. They that are good and happy themselves, wish others so too. (3.) The public salutation sent to Gaius; Our friends salute thee. A friend to the propagation of religion deserves a common remembrance. (4.) The apostle's particular salutation of the Christians in Gaius' church or vicinity. He who had lain in Christ's bosom, lays Christ's friends in his heart.

walk in love,' after the example of our Lord, and such as have most closely imitated Him; for he, who thus habitually 'doeth good, is of God;' and he 'that doeth evil hath not seen or known God,' whatever his notions or gifts may be. We should therefore notice those, 'who by well-doing have put to silence the ignorance of foolish men,' and who have good 'report of the truth itself,' and of its most faithful and zealous friends; for, by associating with such Christians, and copying their example, we shall have peace within, and live at peace with the brethren. Thus our communications with the Lord's people on earth will be very pleasant, and we shall at length be 'numbered with them in glory everlasting.'

THE Gnostics.

The following account of these early heretics, alluded to in John's gospel, epistles, and perhaps Rev. 9; is principally from Mosheim, Woodhouse, and Walsh.

In the early times of the church, many fanatical and wicked notions sprung up, but they were checked by the efforts of the apostles and their fellow-laborers of a like spirit. Yet the increase of men of such characters was foretold by Paul and Peter, writing under the influences of the Holy Spirit. Soon afterwards they began to swarm through the Christian world. They could not destroy the spiritual life which was in Christ, but they exceedingly corrupted and debased the outward profession of the faith, as had been predicted. See 2 Cor. 11:13, 14. 1 Tim. 6:3-5, 20, 21. 2 Tim. 3:13. 2 Pet. 2:1. 1 Cor. 11:19. 2 Thess. 2:12. 3:2. Col. 2:18.

The first considerable body of heretical corrupters was the Gnostics; their beginnings are to be traced even in the apostolic times, and they were distinctly opposed by the apostle John. For Cerinthus, as well as the Nicolaitans, appears to have imbibed the Gnostic doctrines. But they did not prevail till the early part of the second century, when Irenæus, speaking of two of the Gnostic leaders, Basilides and Carpocrates, says, their impure followers are not to be numbered, springing up like mushrooms, and Epiphanius says, that they burst out of the earth together at one time, like mushrooms, the lurking-places of many scorpions. 9:3. Hegesippus, who lived in the times of Adrian, says, that when the sacred company of the apostles was departed, and the generation who heard their divine preaching was gone, then the conspiracy of impious deceit had its open beginning; then to the preaching of the truth did they dare to oppose their knowledge, falsely so called. The original documents belonging to those times mostly perished in the Dioclesian persecution, but there is sufficient proof of the general irruption of Gnostic principles about A. D. 120, when they burst from their obscurity into open day; and they continued to prevail about a century and a half. They had nearly disappeared by A. D. 270, although their injurious effects on the Christians, as a body, was felt long after.

The Gnostics are represented by the fathers, as carrying mischievous notions to the utmost excess. They held the wildest dreams of visionary and fantastic philosophy derived from the eastern schools, especially concerning the origin of evil, and the creation of the world; these they incorporated with the doctrines of Christianity, rejecting or corrupting those parts of the sacred writings which most clearly opposed their tenets, and many of them were guilty of the most immoral practices. Whatever might be the difference among their sects, and whether they imbibed or practised more or less of evil, they agreed in looking upon all as weak and simple, who interpreted Scripture in its plain and obvious sense. They affirmed, that the true and hidden meaning was possessed by themselves alone. Hence they assumed the title of Gnostics, formed from a Greek word, denoting knowledge, and their interpretations of Scripture were usually founded on the opinions of Plato and Pythagoras, though very much distorted and corrupted. These sects entertained unworthy doctrinal views, both of the Person and offices of Christ. The greater part denied that Christ had a real body, or that He really suffered pains and sorrows, and died on the cross, asserting, that He only appeared to do so. They taught, that He only came to teach mankind how to separate the mind from the body, and render the former worthy of being united to the Father of spirits. The tenets of the Egyptian Gnostics are stated to be, that there was one Supreme Being, perfect in goodness and wisdom, who produced from his own substance seven beings, or cons, of an excellent nature; two of these produced the angels of the highest order; many other generations of angels succeeded, until they amounted, as well as their respective heavens, to the number of 365, all of them under the empire of an omnipotent lord, named Abrasax, or Abrasax, a name which contains, in its numeral letters, the mystical number 365. The lowest of these formed a world, and created beings to people it, to whom the Supreme gave reasonable souls, and placed them under the rule of the angels. These angels fell, endeavored to seduce mankind from the worship of the Supreme Being, and warred with each other. To counteract this, the Deity sent the chief of the cons, who joined in union with the man Jesus, to destroy the empire of these angelic natures, particularly the most turbulent among them, who presided over the Jews, and at whose instigation the man Jesus was seized, and put to death; but their efforts against Christ were in vain. Others gave greater prominence to the doctrine of two principles, attributing more or less to the evil principle, as their foolish and depraved imaginations might please; but their doctrines need not be pursued further into detail, except to notice, that worshipping of angels was one of their tenets.

The works of several writers remain who have described their tenets, and Epiphanius, who had himself been a Gnostic, relates their rites and practices. Very numerous testimonies also exist, showing that they embraced much that was visionary, fanciful, impious, and licentious. These evidences are coins and engraved gems, which, being formed of lasting materials, uncorrupted by copyists, not having suffered by the lapse of ages, their devices and inscriptions become witnesses to history, and standards to ascertain its truth. These are very numerous, for the tenets of the Gnostics led them to suppose, that they could construct talismans or charms which would control the powers of evil. They therefore engraved various mysterious words and figures, on stones, or pieces of metal to be worn as amulets. Walsh, in his account of ancient coins, medals, and gems, as illustrating the progress of Christianity in the early ages, says, The immense number and variety of these talismans that have been and still are found in many places, very remote from each other, attest the accuracy of the historians who have described these sects, with their opinions, and their great encouragement and wide reception in different parts. They are found not only in the east, where travellers procure them without much difficulty, but in the west they are continually dug up; in Spain, Italy, and other countries; proving that no superstition was more widely spread, or so universally adopted. One author has given 300 fac-similes of these gems, with their different devices and inscriptions. Glancing at the emblems upon them, any one will readily appreciate the views of those modern skeptics, who represent the Gnostics as sublime in their views, rational in their opinions, and pure in their conversation, and rightly claiming a pre-eminence in knowledge or science! From such deceptive statements we must turn at once, and adopt the dark picture drawn by those who saw, and who knew the men and their tenets.

These are easily to be traced to the superstitions of Egypt and other countries. Some outward semblance of Christianity was assumed, under satanic influence, to bring discredit upon the cause of truth and holiness; and while a part of the votaries of the world, and the devil, thus assumed a new outward profession, the other part willingly confounded the followers of the truth with these hateful and atomian characters; and then, as now, refusing to discriminate, subjected the pearl of great price, and the counterfeit, to one common censure. But the early fathers disavowed and exposed the vile opinions and practices of these sects, and contrasted the pure doctrines and holy lives of real Christians with them.

The pretext, however, was too specious to be neglected; and, upon these plausible grounds, the persecutions were renewed, though Gnosticism had begun to decline. Dioclesian issued exterminating decrees, under which such vast numbers perished, that he erected pillars with inscriptions, to commemorate, that "the Christian superstition was exterminated;" and struck coins bearing an emblematical representation of the supposed success of his efforts; the device of a Jupiter, brandishing thunderbolts against a figure prostrate at his feet; intended to designate the Deity of the Christians, but personified with the characteristics adopted by the Gnostics, and thus identified with their Abrasax, having the same serpent-like feet as the figures engraved on their gems with that name; for one part of them adopted serpent-worship.

Walsh, referring to the account given by Minutius Felix of the allegations brought against the whole Christian church, says, "When the charges against the early Christians were so distinctly specified, and the whole body was thus identified with these widely-spread sectarians, it does not appear, that the fatal consequences of the doctrines and practices of the latter, and the dreadful injuries they inflicted on the cause of Christianity, have been sufficiently insisted upon, nor the additional proof which it affords of the Divine interposition to preserve it. The final triumph of the religion of the Gospel over all the efforts of the heathens to extinguish it, is no doubt a strong proof of superhuman support; but the argument for Divine interposition is much strengthened, when we add, to the persecutions of its enemies, what it had to encounter from the perverseness of its professed friends.

The work, however, was of God, and could not be stopped by man's vices or efforts. Woodh. entering into many details, to show the similarity between these heretics and the locusts. Rev. 9:1-12. says, "The important period of 150 years, during which the infant church was darkened and disfigured by the Gnostic heresies, and on that account exposed to scandal, and misrepresentation, and additional persecution, seems of magnitude sufficient to require the notice of Divine prophecy. The great and leading facts are fully established, and no doubt can be entertained of their extensive and powerful influence on the progress of Christianity. And this is its place in the apocalyptic visions, or it has none."

These principles were connected with the Judaizing views, so strongly opposed by Paul. Cerinthus borrowed many Gnostic terms and fictions from the Jews, and even taught, that a part of the Mosaic law was to be retained. He also endeavored to wrest the doctrine of the resurrection to his purpose; promising the resurrection of the mortal body, to enjoy a series of sensual delights, during an earthly reign of Christ, which was to last 1000 years. He taught, that Christ would one day return upon earth, and, renewing his former union with the man Jesus, reign with his people in the land of Palestine 1000 years. See Mosheim.

AN EXPOSITION
GENERAL EPISTLE OF JUDE,
WITH

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. J. Billingsley.)

This epistle (as some few others are) is styled general or catholic, because not immediately directed to any particular person, family, or church, but to the whole society of Christians of that time; and it is, and will be, of lasting, special use in the church as long as time shall last.

Some of the chief things contained in it summarily, are, 1. An account of the penman of it, a character of the church, the blessings and privileges of that happy society, v. 1, 2. 2. The occasion of writing it, v. 3. 3. A character of evil and perverse men, who were already sprung up in that infant state of the church, and would be succeeded by others of the like evil spirit and temper in after-times, v. 4. 4. A caution against hearkening to, and following after such, from the severity of God toward the unbelieving, murmuring Israelites at their coming out of Egypt, the angels that fell, the sin and punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, v. 5—7. 5. To these the apostle likens the seducers against whom he was warning them, and describes them at large, from v. 8. to 13. inclusive. 6. Then he cites an ancient prophecy of Enoch, foretelling and describing the future judgment, v. 14, 15. 7. Enlarges on the seducer's character, and guards against the offence honest minds might be apt to take at the so early permission of such things, by showing that it was foretold long before that so it must be, v. 16—19. 8. Exhorts them to perseverance in the faith, fervency in prayer, watchfulness against falling from the love of God, and a lively hope of eternal life, v. 20, 21. 9. Directs them how to act toward the erroneous and scandalous, v. 22, 23. And, 10. Closes with an admirable doxology in the last two verses.

The general scope of the epistle is much the same with 2 Pet. ch. 2. which, having been already explained, the less will need to be said on this.

It is designed to warn us against seducers and their seduction, to inspire us with a warm love to, and a hearty concern for truth, and that in the closest conjunction with holiness, of which charity, or sincere, unbiassed brotherly-love, is a most essential character and inseparable branch.

The truth we are to hold fast, and endeavor others may be acquainted with, and not depart from, has two special characters. 1. It is the truth as it is in Jesus, Eph. 4:21. 2. It is truth after (or which is according to) godliness, Tit. 1:1. Errors dangerous to the souls of men soon sprang up in the church. But such were the wisdom and kindness of Providence, it was, while some, at least, of the apostles were yet alive, to confute them, and warn others against them. We are apt to think, if we had lived in their times, we should have been abundantly fenced against the attempts and artifices of seducers; but we have their testimony and their cautions, which is sufficient; and if we will not believe their writings, neither would we have believed or regarded their sayings, if we had lived among, and conversed personally with them. HENRY.

The writer of this epistle so expressly describes himself, as Jude, the brother of James, (M. R. a. l.) that we must either allow him to have been Jude the apostle, called also Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, who was brother, or near relation to our Lord, (Note, Mat. 10:1—4.) or we must suppose the writer guilty of a direct forgery. Some hesitation, however, as to the authenticity of the epistle, seems for a time to have prevailed in the church, which was at length fully removed, though some learned moderns have, on frivolous pretences, as they appear to me, endeavored to revive it.—He calls himself, not an apostle, 'but a servant of Jesus Christ;' and so does Paul. (Phil. 1:1.) He is also supposed to quote apocryphal books; but did not Paul quote heathen poets, and Jewish traditions, when what was true in them might be adduced to good purpose, without at all sanctioning the fables which they contained? (Notes, Acts 17:26—29. 2 Tim. 3:6—9. Tit. 1:10—13.) These are the chief objections; and they amount to nothing against the internal evidence, and the general current of antiquity. It is probable, that Jude wrote to caution his brethren against the same deceivers, whom Peter, in his second epistle, had opposed; and nearly at the same time.—Many think they both had access to some ancient book, which is now lost, and that they quoted from it; and likewise, that Jude had seen Peter's epistle; and, in order to add his testimony to the same effect, adopted several of his thoughts, and even expressions. This, however, is uncertain; for the same 'Spirit of prophecy' might lead these two witnesses to oppose the corrupters of Christianity, by similar examples, arguments, and illustrations, without either of them knowing what the other wrote.—There is no ground for the opinion, that it was exclusively addressed to the Jewish converts; on the contrary, it seems to have been properly a catholic epistle, intended for all Christian churches throughout the world. The exact time when, and the place from which, it was written, are wholly uncertain. SCOTT.

* Laurmann, in Bloomf., regards this epistle as 'belonging rather to the species of oratorical writing,' and considers it 'with reference to the three great requisites of the orator, namely, invention, disposition, (or arrangement,) and elocution;' 'in all of which,' Bloomf. says, 'he shows Jude is well versed, nay, occasionally rises to a height not easily paralleled;' also, that 'his Greek is, on the whole, pure: and that, although fifteen words are here found which occur nowhere else in the New Test., yet they are such as are admirably adapted to the comprehension even of the unlearned, as being in general borrowed from the ideas and modes of thinking of common life.' ED.

He exhorteth them to be constant in the profession of the faith. 4 False teachers are crept in to seduce them; for whose damnable doctrine and manners horrible punishment is prepared: 20 whereas the godly, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and prayers to God, may persevere, and grow in grace, and keep themselves, and recover others out of the snares of those deceivers.

V. 1, 2. Here we have,

1. An account of the penman of this epistle, Jude, or Judas, or Judah, a name of worth, eminency, and honor. There was one Judas, (one of the twelve,) surnamed Iscaiot, (from the place of his birth,) who was a vile traitor. The same names may be common to the best and worst persons. But our Judas was quite another man, a sincere disciple and follower of Christ; therefore, here the one is very carefully distinguished from the other. Dr. Manton's note on this, is, that God takes great care of the good name of his sincere and useful servants. Note, further, In that the apostle Jude styles himself a servant, though an apostle, a dignified officer in Christ's kingdom: it is a great honor to the meanest sincere minister, (and it holds proportionably as to every upright Christian,) that he is the servant of Christ Jesus. Away, then, with all pretensions, in the ministers of Christ, to lordly dominion, either over one another, or the flocks committed to their charge. Let us ever have that of our dear Redeemer in actual view, It shall not be so among you, Mat. 20:25, 26. And brother of James, to wit, of him whom the ancients style the first bishop of Jerusalem, of whose character and martyrdom Josephus makes mention, and ascribes the horrible destruction of that city and nation to this wicked cruelty, as one of its principal causes. Of this James, our Jude was brother, whether in the strictest or a larger (though very usual) acceptation, I determine not. He, however, reckons it an honor to him, that he was the brother of such an one. We ought to honor those who are above us in age, gifts, graces, station; not to envy them; yet neither to flatter them, nor be led merely by their example, when we have reason to think they act wrong. Thus Paul withstood Peter, notwithstanding the high esteem he had for him, and the affectionate love he bare to him, when he saw that he was really blameworthy, Gal. 2:11. and following verses.

2. We are here acquainted, to whom this epistle is directed; namely, to all them who are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called. I begin with the last, called, that is, called Chris-

NOTES. V. 1, 2. Preface to James.—The unusual ascription of 'sanctification to God the Father,' and the arrangement of the sentence, have induced many expositors to explain 'sanctified,' of Christians, having been 'set apart,' or separated 'in the election of grace,' by 'God the Father;' in consequence of which they were 'given to Jesus Christ,' and preserved, in and by Him, from dying in their sins, or falling into fatal delusions, till called, by the Word and Spirit of God, into a state of actual fellowship in the Gospel of Christ. Others suppose the order of

2 Mercy unto you, and peace, and love, be multiplied.

3 Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.

e Tit. 1:4. f Ga. 2:5.

tians, in the judgment of charity, further than which we cannot, nor in justice ought to go, in the judgments or opinions we form or receive of one another; yet we ought to think the best we can of every man till the contrary appear; not being forward to receive or propagate, much less invent, disadvantageous characters of our brethren. This is the least we can make of 1 Cor. 13. and this we ought to make conscience of acting up to, which, till we do, the Christian churches will, as, alas! they are at this day, be filled with envying and strife, confusion and every evil work, Jam. 3:16. Or the apostle may speak of their being called to be Christians, by the preaching of the Word which they gladly received, and so were received into the society and fellowship of the church.

Christians are the called, called out of the world, the evil spirit and temper of it; above the world, to higher and better things, heaven, things unseen and eternal; called from sin to Christ, from vanity to seriousness, from uncleanness to holiness; and this in pursuance of divine purpose and grace, Rom. 8:30. Now they who are thus called, are,

1. Sanctified; sanctified by God the Father. Sanctification is usually spoken of in Scripture as the work of the Holy Spirit; yet here it is ascribed to God the Father, because the Spirit works it, as the Spirit of the Father and the Son. Note, All who are effectually called, are sanctified; made partakers of a divine nature, 2 Pet. 1:4. for without holiness no man shall see the Lord, Heb. 12:14. Observe, Our sanctification is not our own work. If any are sanctified, they are so by God the Father, not excluding Son or Spirit, for they are One, one God. Our corruption and pollution are of ourselves; our sanctification and renovation, of God and his grace; therefore, if we perish in our iniquity, we must bear the blame; but if we be sanctified and glorified, all the honor and glory must be ascribed to God, and to Him alone.

2. The called and sanctified are preserved in Christ Jesus. As it is God who begins the work of grace in the souls of men, so it is He who carries it on, and perfects it, Ps. 138:8. Let us not, therefore, trust in ourselves, nor in our stock of grace already received, but in Him, and in Him alone; still endeavoring, by all proper and appointed means, to keep ourselves, as ever we would hope He should keep us. All who are preserved, are preserved in Jesus Christ, and solely by virtue of their union with Him.

3. The apostolical benediction; Mercy, peace, and love; these the apostle prays may be multiplied, that Christians may not be content with scraps and narrow scantlings of them; but that souls and societies may be full of them. Note, God is ready to supply us with all grace, and a fulness in each grace. We are not straitened, if we are straitened, in Him, but in ourselves.

V. 3. We have here the design of the apostle in writing this epistle; namely, to establish believers in the Christian faith and practice, and in an open and bold profession thereof; especially in times of notorious opposition, by artful seduction, or violent and inhuman persecution.

But then we must see to it very carefully, that it be really the Christian faith that we believe, profess, propagate, and contend for; not the discriminating badges of this or the other party; not anything of later date than the inspired writings of the holy evangelists and apostles.

Here, observe, 1. The gospel-salvation is a common salvation, that is, in a most sincere offer and tender of it to all mankind to whom the notice of it reaches: for so the commission runs, Mark 16:15, 16. therefore, none are excluded from the benefit of these gracious offers and invitations, but they who obstinately, impenitently, finally exclude themselves, Rev. 22:17.

The application of it is made to all believers, and only to such, to the weak as well as to the strong. Let none discourage themselves on the account of hidden decrees which they can know little of, and with which they have nothing to do. God's decrees are dark, his covenants are plain.

2. This common salvation is the subject-matter of the faith of all the saints. The doctrine of it is what they all most heartily consent to, a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, 1 Tim. 1:15. the faith once, or at once, once for all, delivered to the saints; to which nothing can be added, from which nothing may be detracted, in which nothing more or less should be altered; from which, if we stir a step further, we are in danger of being either entangled or seduced.

3. The apostles and evangelists all wrote to us of this common salvation. It is enough that they have fully declared to us, by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, all that is necessary for every one to believe and do, in order to obtain a personal interest in the common salvation.

4. They who preach or write of the common salvation, should give all diligence to do it well: they should not allow themselves to offer to God or his people that which cost them nothing, little or no pains or thought, 2 Sam. 24:24. This were to treat God irreverently, and man unjustly.

The apostle, though inspired, gave all diligence to write of the common salvation. What then will become of those, who, though uninspired, give no diligence, or next to none, but say to the people, even in the name of God, what comes next? They who speak of sacred things, ought always to speak of them with the greatest reverence, care, and diligence.

5. They who have received the doctrine of this common salvation, must contend earnestly for it. Earnestly, not furiously. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God, Jam. 1:20. Lying for the truth is bad, and scolding for it is not much better. Observe, They who have received the truth, must contend for it. We must not suffer ourselves to be robbed of any essential article of Christian faith, by the cunning craftiness, or specious, plausible pretences of any who lie in wait to deceive, Eph. 4:14. Paul tells us, he preached the Gospel (mind it was the Gospel) with much contention, 1 Thess. 2:2. that is, as I understand it, with great earnestness, with a hearty zeal, and a great concern for the success of what he preached.

We have here the occasion the apostle had to write to this purport; as evil manners give rise to good laws, so dangerous errors often give just occasion to the proper defence of important truths.

the words to have been disregarded: and then the apostle's meaning is, that the persons addressed were regenerated and sanctified, by the grace communicated from God the Father; that they were thus brought home to the good Shepherd, who bought them with his blood; and were preserved by his watchful care; and, being called according to his purpose, they would be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. 1 Pet. 1:3-5.

SCOTT.

V. 3, 4. They could not but know the great fundamentals of that doctrine, respecting the Person and salvation of the Lord Jesus, and his mediatorial authority over his redeemed subjects, and 'as Head over all,' for their benefit. And, as these were violently assaulted, they ought to 'contend earnestly' for them; patiently and constantly professing the faith, and adhering to the commands of Christ, in the midst of hardships and persecution. They should diligently endeavor, notwithstanding all kinds of opposition, to disseminate the knowledge of uncorrupted Christianity in the world; refusing all countenance to those who opposed it; decidedly using all their influence to put others on their guard, and to centre them in the faith and practice of the Gospel; and to show them the falsehood and pernicious tendency of the heresies, which were propagated instead of them. Thus their example, profession, conversation, prayers, and improvement of talents, might be instrumental to stop the progress of fatal delusions; to establish the faith of the weak and wavering; and even to recover some of the fallen. And an earnest 'contending for the faith,' with such weapons as these, would consist with meekness and benevolence; differing widely from that controversy, which has too often been conducted with acrimony, slander, invective, and reciprocal contempt. 2 Cor. 10:1-6. These vigorous measures were peculiarly proper at that time, as certain men had glided in like serpents, with subtlety and plausible pretences, 'unawares' to the people and their pastors: but the Lord had foreseen them; for they 'were of old ordained,' or registered 'to this condemnation.' Many predictions had from the beginning been delivered to this effect, 14-16. Nay, these predictions had been extracts, as it were, from the registers in heaven; even the secret and eternal decrees of God, 'known unto whom are his works from the beginning of the world.' Some have supposed, that these ungodly men denied the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and atonement of Christ; 1 John 2:18-25. and they therefore explain 'turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness,' of some attempts made by them to traduce the doctrines of grace, as tending to licentious-

ness. But this construction is very unnatural: and the whole epistle shows, that they were abominable antinomians, who 'wrought all uncleanness with greediness,' under pretence of exalting free grace. It is, however, very probable, that they also held some wild notions concerning the Person of Christ; for this was generally the case, with the various descriptions of these primitive heretics; whose absurd and presumptuous speculations, concerning these mysterious subjects, would be wholly unworthy our notice, did they not illustrate the folly of man's wisdom, in matters of religion; the perverse disposition of the human heart to prefer any senseless falsehood to the truths of revelation; and the artifice of Satan in suiting the delusions, which he propagates by his ministers, to the tastes and capacities of those whom he means to ruin by them. The intellectual poison, which he administers, in this age of proud reasoning and skepticism, is of a more specious kind, and can be supported with more plausible show of argument; or else it would not be so generally received.—(3) Gave all, &c.] 'I was sedulously devising to write to you concerning the common faith; when the circumstances of the times rendered it necessary, and determined me to this subject.' The character of these deceivers had been drawn, and their doom denounced, by the ancient prophets from the beginning.—(Note, 5-8.) Gr. graphō, without a preposition, is used of those, 'whose names are written in the book of life.' Rev. 13:8-9. and this being generally understood of election, the venerable translators of the Bible rendered προγεγραμμένοι, ordained. This shows what their sentiments were on this subject; but it is not clear, that the decree was here meant, except as connected with the prophetic description. At least, it is not meant, that they were 'ordained' to commit these crimes, by any constraint: but merely, that their wilful sin and impenitence being foreseen, and God for wise reasons determining to leave them to themselves, He 'ordained them to this condemnation;' as He had done Judas, and those who crucified Christ. Mat. 26:21-24. Acts 2:22-24.

4 For there are certain men crept in <sup>g</sup> unawares, who <sup>h</sup> were before of old ordained to this condemnation; ungodly men, turning <sup>i</sup> the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that <sup>j</sup> the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed <sup>k</sup> them that believed not.

V. 4. Here, observe, 1. Ungodly men are the great enemies of the faith of Christ, and the peace of the church. They who deny or corrupt the one, and disturb the other, are here expressly styled ungodly men. Ungodly men raise scruples, start questions, cause divisions, widen breaches, merely to advance and promote their own selfish, ambitious, and covetous ends. This has been the plague of the church in all past ages. Nothing cuts us off from the church, but that which cuts us off from Christ; namely, reigning infidelity and ungodliness. We must abhor the thought of branding particular parties, or persons, with this character; especially of doing it without the least proof, or, as it too often happens, the least shadow of it. Those are ungodly men who live without God in the world, who have no regard to God and conscience. They are to be dreaded, and consequently to be avoided, not only who are wicked by sins of commission, but also who are ungodly by sins of omission; who, for example, restrain prayer before God, who dare not reprove a rich man, when it is the duty of their place so to do, for fear they lose his favor, and the advantage they promise themselves therefrom, who do the work of the Lord negligently, &c.

2. They are the worst of ungodly men, who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, who take encouragement to sin more boldly,

4:23-28. Whatever objection lies against this view of the subject lies at least equally against the whole system of prophecy, as far as the crimes and condemnation of men are expressly foretold.—The only, &c. These words may be differently rendered: but our translation seems to give the true meaning; preserving the scriptural distinction between the Father and the Son.

(4.) 'The word ordained, here, is supposed to be forensic, and the expression, ordained to this condemnation, to denote those cited to trial, by posting up their names, or those whose names were thus posted up, as required for condemnation and punishment. So 2 Pet. 2:3. The expression, therefore, does not imply any predestination of the persons, but merely imports that they were long since foretold, and thereby designated as persons who should suffer.' Bloomf.—'God decreed that condemnation should not be but for sin, nor hardening but for preceding rebellion, nor that the wages of death should be paid without the work of sin. No man is ordained to a just punishment but for some sin; the withdrawal of grace, the blindness and oblation of sinners, are the punishments of preceding sin, as appears, Rom. 1:27. To crown or condemn is an act of judiciary power, and proceeds according to the tenor of the revealed Gospel.—God never appointed that any should stumble at the Word, but for their contempt of it.—Never did God make any decree to condemn any man, though he should believe and live righteously.' Jenkyn, in Henry, abr.—Only Lord God, &c. 'If the word God, be here genuine, the Lord God and Lord must be understood of the same person, as is done by the Syriac and Coptic translators; i. e. [the expression must read], "denying our only Lord God, Jesus Christ." Comp. 2 Pet. 2:1-3.' Bloomf.

V. 5-8. 1 Cor. 10:1-12. 2 Pet. 2:4-9, 20-22. External privileges, profession, and apparent conversion, could not secure, from the severest vengeance of God, those who turned aside from Him in unbelief and disobedience. To evince this, the apostle deemed it proper to remind his readers [of the case of ancient Israel, the fallen angels, and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah.] (6) First estate. Either beginning, John 8:44. 1 John 3:8. or dignity, Eph. 6:12. Rev. 3:14—(7) In like manner. They were rebellious, as the fallen angels had been rebellious; and condemned as they were: but the main instance of this rebellion in the inhabitants of Sodom, and in the heretics whom Jude opposed, was such as evil spirits could not commit, [rejecting offered mercy in Christ.]—Eternal fire. Mat. 25:46. Is. 33:14. Mat. 25:41-45. Mark 9:43-50. It does not appear in what sense the fire which destroyed Sodom, and then was wholly extinguished, and succeeded by a lake, could be thus called, apart from its effects on the inhabitants. (Rev. 19:3.)—(8) Dreamers. 'Perfectly stupified, and destitute of reason, as if their senses had been locked up by a deep sleep, or an inveterate lethargy, from which no terrible example could awake them.' Beza.—The epithet filthy, added in our translation, implies that their very dreams were defiled, through the filthiness of their waking thoughts.

because the grace of God has abounded, and still abounds, so wonderfully; who are hardened in their impieties by the extent and fulness of gospel-grace, the design of which is, to reduce men from sin, and bring them unto God.

3. They who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, do, in effect, deny the Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, they deny both natural and revealed religion. They strike at the foundation of natural religion, for they deny the only Lord God; and they overturn all the frame of revealed religion, for they deny the Lord Jesus Christ. Now, his great design in establishing revealed religion in the world, was, to bring us unto God.

Note, They who deny our Lord Jesus Christ, do in effect deny the only Lord God. To deny revealed religion is, virtually, to overcome natural religion, for they stand or fall together, and they naturally yield light and force to each other. Would to God our modern deists, who live in the midst of gospel-light, would seriously consider this, and cautiously, diligently, and impartially examine what it is that hinders their receiving the Gospel, while they profess themselves fully persuaded of all the principles and duties of natural religion!

4. They who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, are ordained unto condemnation; they sin against the last, the greatest, and most perfect remedy; and so are without excuse. But what if our translators had thought fit to render the word in the original, of old forewritten of, as persons who would, through their own sin and folly, become the proper subjects of this condemnation, where had the harm been? Is it not enough that early notice was given by inspired writers, that such seducers and wicked men should arise in later times, and that every one, being forewarned of, should be forearmed against them!

5. We ought to contend earnestly for the faith, in opposition to those who would corrupt or deprave it, and such as are crept in unawares, a wretched character;—but the more busy and crafty the instruments and agents of Satan are, to rob us of the truth, the more solicitous should we be to hold it fast: always provided we be very sure, that we fasten no wrong or injurious characters on persons, parties, or sentiments. [Observe, next.]

The fair warning the apostle, in Christ's name, gives to those, who, having professed his holy religion, do afterwards desert and prove false to it.

V. 5-7. We have here a recital of the former judgments of God on sinners, with design to awaken and terrify those to whom warning is given in this epistle.

(7.) 'The full sense of the apostle seems to be this: "They are publicly set forth for an everlasting example [in their fiery destruction] of the punishment God sometimes inflicts for sin in this world; which is but a faint type of that which He hath reserved for the next." See Prof. Stuart's "Dissertation on Future Punishment," p. 61, sqq.' Bl.

(7.) Giving themselves over to fornication. 'Let the seducer and the fornicator remember, that each must stand with his victim and his partner in guilt, before the Judge of quick and dead. Let it be remembered, that a female is a moral and accountable being, hasting with us to the bar of God; that she is made to be the centre of all that is delightful in the domestic relations; that, by her very nature, she looks up to man as her protector, and loves to confide in his hands her hu-

Observe, The judgments of God are often denounced and executed for warning to others, rather than from immediate or particular displeasure against the offenders themselves; not that God is not displeased with them, but perhaps not more with them than with others, who, at least for the present, escape.

I will put you in remembrance. What we already know, we still need to be put in remembrance of. Therefore there will always be need and use of a standing, stated ministry, in the Christian church, though all the doctrines of faith, the essentials, are so plainly revealed in express words. Preaching [and writing new books] is not [always] designed to teach us somewhat we knew nothing of before; but to put us in remembrance, to call to mind things forgotten, to affect our passions, and engage and fix our resolutions, that our lives may be answerable to our faith.

Though ye know these things, yet ye still need to know them better; many things we have known, which we have unhappily forgotten. Is it of no use or service to be put afresh in remembrance of them?

Now, what are these things which we Christians need to be put in remembrance of?

1. The destruction of the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, v. 5. Paul puts the Corinthians in mind of this, 1 Cor. 10:1-10. which, as the Scripture is always the best commentary on itself, are the best explication of this verse. None, therefore, ought to presume on their privileges, since many who were brought out of Egypt by a series of amazing miracles, yet perished in the wilderness by reason of their unbelief, Rom. 11:20. Heb. 4:1. They had miracles plenty, miracles were their daily bread; yet even they perished in unbelief. We have much greater advantages than they had; let their so fatal error be our awful warning.

2. The fall of the angels, v. 6. A great number of the angels left their own habitation, not pleased with the posts and stations assigned them; but God did not spare them; high and great as they were, He threw them off; for the great, the all-wise God, could not be ignorant, as the wisest and best of earthly princes often are, what designs they were hatching.

After all, what became of them? They thought to dare and outface Omnipotence itself; but God was too hard for them, He cast them down to hell. Here, see, the condition of fallen angels; they are in chains, bound under the divine power and justice, bound over to the judgment of the great day; they are under darkness, who were once angels of light; so horribly in the dark are they, that they continue to fight against God, as if there were yet some strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

8 Likewise also these filthy dreamers defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities.

9 Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee.

10 But these speak evil of those things which they know not: but q other. s Da. 12:1. u Ex. 22:23.

small hope, at least, left them, of prevailing and overcoming in the conflict. Dire infatuation! Light and liberty concur; chains and darkness, how well do they agree and suit each other!

The devils, once angels in the best sense, are reserved, &c.

Observe, There is, undoubtedly, a judgment to come; the fallen angels are reserved to the judgment of the great day; and shall fallen men escape it? Surely no. Let every reader consider this in due time.

Their chains are called everlasting, because it is impossible they should ever break loose from them, or make an escape. Hear and fear, O sinful mortals of mankind!

3. The apostle here calls to our remembrance the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, v. 7. Even as, &c. It is in allusion to the destruction of Pentapolis, or the five cities, that the miseries of the damned are set forth by a lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; they were guilty of abominable wickedness, not to be named or thought on but with the utmost abhorrence and detestation; their ruin is a particular warning to all people, to take heed of, and fly from fleshy lusts, that war against the soul, 1 Pet. 2: 11.

God is the same holy, just, pure Being now, as then; and can the beastly pleasures of a moment make amends for your suffering the vengeance of eternal fire? Stand in awe, therefore, and sin not, Ps. 4: 4.

The apostle next exhibits a charge against deceivers, who were now seducing the disciples of Christ from the profession and practice of his holy religion.

V. 8—13. He calls them filthy dreamers, for as much as delusion is a dream, and the beginning of, and inlet to, all manner of filthiness.

ness for life; and that she can only be ruined by abusing that confidence, proving false to that reliance, and using the very loveliest trait in her character, as the instrument of her own undoing. And then let us consider the misery into which a loss of virtue must plunge the victim and her friends for ever; the worth of that soul, which, unless a miracle interpose, must, by the loss of virtue, be consigned to eternal despair; and I ask, whether, in the whole catalogue of human crime, there be one whose atrocity more justly merits the deepest damnation, than that, which, for the momentary gratification of a lawless appetite, will violate all these obligations, outrage all these sympathies, and work out so wide-spreading, so interminable a ruin.

(3.) No difficulty here presents itself, except in enupniazomenoi, [translated filthy dreamers.] and this the best expositors, from Beza down to Hantein and Laurmann, are justly agreed, that the term must be taken in a figurative sense, denoting the giving away to idle and delusive fancies, promising themselves security and acceptance in courses which the Gospel disallows.

V. 9, 10. 2 Pet. 2: 10—17. It is most probable, that the apostle took this account concerning Michael, from an ancient tradition which was well known among the Jews; and by thus adding it, he has given an attestation to its truth. Deut. 34: 6. Dan. 10: 10—14, 20, 21. 12: 1. In Daniel, Michael has been supposed to be the Son of God Himself, as the great Ruler over all angels, and worshipped by them all: Yet we do not seem authorized to interpret this text of the Son of God, as spoken of in the tradition by the name of Michael; but rather of some created angel, invested with great authority over his fellows, perhaps as Messiah's peculiar vicegerent. 1 Thes. 4: 13—16. Though the hateful character and atrocious conduct of the devil must have excited the holy abhorrence and indignation of the archangel; he yet dared not to utter any reviling expression; not from fear of the devil; but because, even in those circumstances, it would not have been consistent with the perfection of his character. Yet the heretics, of whom Jude was speak-

These filthy dreamers dream themselves into a fool's paradise on earth, and into a real hell at last: let their character, curse, and end, be our seasonable and sufficient warning; like sins will produce like punishments and miseries.

1. They defile the flesh: the flesh or body is the immediate seat, and often the irritating occasion, of many horrid pollutions; yet these, though done in and against the body, do greatly defile and grievously maim and wound the soul; fleshy lusts do war against the soul, 1 Pet. 2: 11. and in 2 Cor. 7: 1. we read of filthiness of flesh and spirit; each of which, though of different kinds, defiles the whole man.

2. They despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities; are of a disturbed mind and a seditious spirit, forgetting that the powers that be are ordained of God, Rom. 13: 1. God requires us to speak evil of no man, Tit. 3: 2. but it is a great aggravation of the sin of evil-speaking, when what we say is pointed at magistrates, men whom God has set in authority over us, by blaspheming or speaking evil of whom, we blaspheme God Himself.

Or, if we understand it with respect to religion, as some do; such evil-speakers despise the dominion of conscience, and the Word of God, the rule of conscience; the revelations of the divine will go for little with them.

Or, as others account for the sense of this passage, the people of God, truly and specially so, are the dignities here spoken of or referred to, according to that of the Psalmist, Ps. 105: 15.

They speak evil of, &c. Religion and its serious professors have been always and everywhere evil spoken of; though there is nothing in religion but what is good, and deserves our highest regards, both as it is perfective of our natures, and subservient to our truest and highest interests; yet this sect, as its enemies are pleased to call it, is everywhere spoken against, Acts 28: 22.

On this occasion, the apostle brings in Michael the archangel, &c. v. 9.

Interpreters are at a loss what is here meant by the body of Moses. Some think the devil contended that Moses might have a public and honorable funeral, that the place where he was interred might be generally known; hoping thereby to draw the Jews, so naturally prone thereto, to a new and fresh instance of idolatry. Dr. Scot thinks, that by the body of Moses we are to understand the Jewish church, whose destruction the devil strove and contended for, as the Christian church is called the body of Christ in the New Test. style. Others bring other interpretations, which I will not here trouble the reader with.

Though this contest was mighty eager and earnest, and Michael was victorious in the issue, yet he would not bring a railing accusation against the devil himself; it is said, He durst not bring, &c. Not that he was afraid of the devil, but he believed God would be offended, if, in such a dispute, he went that way to work; he thought it below him to engage in a trial of skill with the great enemy of God and man, which of them should out-scold or out-rail the other. A memorandum this to all disputants, never to bring railing accusations into their disputes. Truth needs no supports from falsehood or scurrility. Some say, Michael would not bring a railing accusation against the devil, as knowing beforehand that he would be too hard for him at that weapon. Some think the apostle refers here to the remarkable passage we have Numb. 20: 7—14. Satan would have represented Moses under disadvantageous colors, which he, good man, had at that time, and on that occasion, given but too much handle for. Now Michael, according to this account, stands up in defence of Moses, and, in the zeal of an upright and bold spirit, says to Satan, The Lord rebuke thee! He would not stand disputing with the devil, nor enter into a particular debate about the merits of that special cause; he knew Moses was his fellow-servant, a favorite of God, and he would not patiently suffer him to be insulted, no, not by the prince of devils; but, in a just indignation, cries out, The Lord rebuke thee! like that of our Lord Himself, Mat. 4: 10. Moses was a dignity, a magistrate, one beloved and preferred by the great God; and the archangel thought it insufferable, that such an one should be so treated by a vile, apostate spirit, of how high an order soever. So the lesson hence is, 'That we ought to stand up in defence of those whom God owns, how severe soever Satan and his instruments are in their censures of them and their conduct.' They who censure (in particular) upright magistrates, on every slip in their behavior, may expect to hear, The Lord rebuke thee! and divine rebukes are harder to be borne than careless sinners now think for.

V. 10. But these speak evil of the things which they know not, &c. of religion and godliness. Observe, Men are most apt to speak evil of those persons and things that they know least of. How many had never suffered by slanderous tongues, if they had been better known! On the other hand, retirement screens some even from just censure. But what they know naturally, &c. in those things they corrupt themselves; that ing, claimed superior eminence, as the favorites of heaven, and dared to speak evil of dignities, whom God had commanded them to honor and obey. Thus they spoke language concerning princes and rulers, which Michael scrupled to use concerning the devil himself; and surely they would not maintain, that they were more privileged than the archangel! or that their rulers were more execrable than that great enemy of God and man! To suppose, as some learned men have done, that the body of Moses, means the Jewish church after the captivity: because the true church is called the body of Christ, and to refer the whole to the transaction recorded in the third of Zechariah, merely because the Lord rebuke thee, Satan, occurs there, may be ingenious; but it is ingenious trifling, which brings no instruction nor satisfaction to the mind. Zech. 3: 1—4. Michael, one of the principal angels, was contented to deliver up the devil, however execrable, to be coerced by the judgment of God: yet these perverse and insignificant men, were not ashamed to reproach "the powers, ordained by God" Himself! Beza. 'The angels have no disposition, and I believe they have no talent, or faculty, for railing: the cool consideration whereof should make all men, especially those who call themselves divines, and especially in controversies about religion, ashamed and afraid of this manner of disputing.' Abp. Tillotson.

(9.) The connexion may be thus traced: "The Gnostics imitate the fallen angels in their rebellious speeches and conduct; but the archangel will afford them a better example, who, even under the greatest provocation, refused to pronounce a harsh sentence of condemnation against a fallen spirit." Bloomf.—'If the angel did not rail even against the devil, how much less ought we against men in authority, even supposing them in some things to behave amiss.' Doddr.—As to this being only an instructive fable, (as supposed by recent commentators,) Bl. adds,—'besides, it is difficult to believe that an inspired apostle would thus enforce his doctrine,—that it is evidently mentioned, not as a fable, but as a fact.'

what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves.

14 And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the <sup>i</sup> Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, is, in things that lie most open and obvious to natural reason and conscience; even in those things they corrupt, debase, and defile themselves: the fault, whatever it is, lies not in their understandings or apprehensions, but in their depraved wills, and disordered appetites and affections. It is hard, if not impossible, to find any obstinate enemies to the Christian religion, who do not, in their stated course, live in open or secret contradiction to the very principles of natural religion. The apostle likens such to brute beasts, though they often think and boast themselves, if not the wisest, yet at least the wittiest, part of mankind.

V. 11. He represents them as followers of Cain, and in v. 12, 13, as atheistical and profane, as greedy and covetous, who, so they could but gain present worldly advantages, cared not what came next; rebels to God and man, who like Core, ran into attempts in which they must assuredly perish, as he did.

V. 12. These are spots in your feasts of charity, or love-feasts, so much spoken of by the ancients; these happened, by whatever means or mischance, to be admitted among them, but were spots in them, defiled and defiling. These are spots. Yet how common in all Christian societies here on earth, the very best not excepted, are such blemishes! The more is the pity! The Lord remedy it in his due time and way.

When they feast with you, they feed themselves without fear. Arrant gluttons, no doubt, they were; they had no regard to Solomon's caution, Prov. 23:2. In common eating and drinking, a holy fear is necessary, much more in feasting; though we may sometimes be more easily and insensibly overcome at a common meal than at a feast.

Clouds they are without water; which promise rain in time of drought, but perform nothing of what they promise.

Carried about of winds; light and empty, easily driven about this way or that, as the wind happens to sit; such are empty, ungrounded professors, an easy prey to every seducer.

Trees whose fruit withereth, &c. Trees they are, for they are planted in the Lord's vineyard, yet fruitless ones.

Observe, They, whose fruit withereth, may be justly said to be without fruit. It is a sad thing when men seem to begin in the Spirit, and end in the flesh; which is almost as common a ease as it is an awful one.

The text speaks of such, as being twice dead. What is the meaning? They had been once dead in their natural, fallen, lapsed state; but they seemed to recover, and, as a man in a swoon, to be brought to life again, when they took upon them the profession of the Christian religion; but now they are dead again by the evident proofs they have given of their hypocrisy; whatever they seemed, they had nothing truly vital in them.

Plucked up by the roots; as we commonly serve dead trees, from which we expect no more fruit; they are dead, dead, dead; why cumber they the ground? Away with them to the fire.

V. 13. Raging waves of the sea; boisterous, noisy, and clamorous; full of talk and turbulency, but with little if any sense or meaning.

Foaming out their own shame; creating much uneasiness to men of better sense and calmer tempers, which yet will, in the end, turn to their own greater shame and just reproach.

Raging waves are a terror to sailing passengers; but when they are got to port, the waves are forgotten, as if no longer in being; their noise and terror are for ever ended.

Wandering stars. This allusion carries in it a lively emblem of false teachers, who are sometimes here and sometimes there, so that one knows not where nor how to fix them.

To whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever. False teachers are to expect the worst of punishments in this and a future world: not every one who teaches by mistake anything that is not exactly true; but every one who prevaricates, dissembles, would lead others into by-paths, to make a gain, prey, or merchandise of them, 2 Pet. 2:3. As for the blackness of darkness for ever, I shall only say, that this terrible expression, with all the horror it imports, belongs to false teachers, truly, not slanderously so called, who corrupt the Word of God, and betray the souls of men. If this will not make both ministers and people cautious, I know not what will.

The doom of this wicked people is declared.

V. 14-16. This prophecy of Enoch we have no mention of in any other place of Scripture; yet one plain text of Scripture is proof enough of any one point we are required to believe, especially when relating to a matter of fact; though, in matters of faith, there is no fundamental of Christian religion, truly so called, which is not inculcated over and over in the New Test., by which we may know what the Holy Ghost does, and consequently we ought to lay the greatest stress upon. Some say, this prophecy was preserved by tradition in the Jewish church; others, that Jude was immediately inspired with it: be that how it will, it is certain there was such a prophecy of ancient date, and universally received in the Old Test. church; and it is a main point of our New Test. creed.

Observe, Christ's coming to judgment was prophesied of as early as the middle of the patriarchal age, and was therefore even then a received and acknowledged truth.

The Lord cometh with his holy myriads; including both angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. What a glorious time will that be, when Christ shall come with ten thousand of these! and we are told for what great and awful ends and purposes He will come so accompanied and attended, namely, to execute judgment upon all.

Observe, It was spoken of then, so long ago, as a thing just at hand; 'Behold the Lord cometh.' He cometh, 1. To execute judgment on the wicked. 2. To convince them.

Observe, Christ will condemn none without trial, and conviction; such conviction as shall at least silence even themselves; then every mouth shall be stopped, the Judge and his sentence shall be approved; even

(10.) But what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves. Go to the people of another planet, over whom the hold of allegiance to their Maker is unbroken,—in whose hearts the Supreme sits enthroned, and throughout the whole of whose history there runs the perpetual and the unailing habit of subordination to his law. It is conceivable, that with them, too, there may be varieties of temper and of natural inclination, and yet all of them be under the effective control of one great and imperious principle; that, in subjection to the will of God, every kind and every honorable disposition is cherished to the uttermost; and that, in subjection to the same will, every tendency to anger, [selfishness,] malignity, revenge, [&c.] is repressed at the present moment of its threatened operation; and that, in this way, there will be the fostering of a constant encouragement given to the one set of instincts, and the struggling of a constant opposition made against the other. Now, only conceive this great bond of allegiance to be dissolved; the mighty and subordinating principle, which went to wield an ascendancy over every movement and every affection, to be loosened and done away; and then would this loyal, obedient world, become what ours is,—independent of Christianity. Every constitutional desire would run out, in the unchecked spontaneity of its own movements. The law of heaven would furnish no counteraction to the impulses and the tendencies of nature. And tell us, in these circumstances, when the restraint of religion was thus lifted off, and all the passions let out to take their own tumultuous and independent career,—tell us, if, though amid the uproar of the licentious and vindictive propensities, there did gleam forth at times, some of the finer and lovelier sympathies of nature,—tell us, if this would at all affect the state of that world, as a state of enmity against God; where his will was reduced to an element of utter insignificance; where the voice of their rightful Master, fell powerless on the consciences of a listless and alienated family; where humor and interest, and propensity, at one time selfish and at another social, took their alternate sway over those hearts, from which there was excluded all effectual sense of an overruling God. . . The way, then, to assert the depravity of man, is, to fasten on the radical element of depravity, and to show how deeply it lies incorporated with his moral constitution. It is not by an utterance of rash and sweeping totality, to refuse him the possession of what is kind in sympathy, or of what is dignified in principle,—for this were in the face of all observation. It is to charge him direct with his utter disloyalty to God. It is to convict him of treason, against the majesty of heaven. It is to press home upon him the impiety of not caring about God. It is to tell him, that the hourly and habitual language of his heart is, I will not have the Being who made me, to rule over-me. The Mercantile Virtues without Christianity. Disc. 1. vol. 2.

V. 11-13. The word rendered spots, primarily means, the tops of the rocks, appearing above the water, which give the sea the appearance of being spotted, and on which ships are wrecked. Thus the disgraceful appearance of these heretics, and the danger arising from them, may be at once exhibited.—The word rendered 'wandering stars,' signifies planets; but it may be questioned, whether the apostle used it in the strict astronomical sense; or not, rather, according to the popular meaning of it, which best suited his purpose.—The horrible enormities, ascribed to the heretics who are supposed to be here intended, are almost incredible; but, if true, it is by no means proper to speak of them in the detail.

(12.) Feasts of charity. 'Agapae, those sacred meals which at first, among the primitive Christians, preceded the Eucharist, and afterwards succeeded it, and to which all, especially the richer, furnished their contributions.'—Twice dead. This is explained by the best commentators, doubly, i. e. altogether dead.

V. 14. On the question, whether Jude quotes here from the book called Enoch's Prophecy, commentators differ. Bloomf. thinks, he did, but Horne and Doddr. think he did not,—though the latter says, 'a precious fragment of antediluvian history is here preserved to us, as it seems by the special providence of God, who taught Jude to distinguish between what was genuine, and [what was] spurious in the tradition.'—

16 These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts; and their mouth speaketh great swelling words, having men's persons in admiration because of advantage.

17 But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

18 How that they told you <sup>l</sup> there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts.

19 These be they who separate <sup>m</sup> themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit.

21 Keep <sup>p</sup> yourselves in the love of God, looking <sup>q</sup> for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

Observe, How often, here, v. 15. and how emphatically, the word ungodly is repeated; no less than four times! Godly or ungodly

This apocryphal book of Enoch, often quoted by the fathers, but supposed to be lost, was discovered, a few years since, in an Æthiopic Version, and edited, with a translation, by Ahp. Laurence, Oxford, 1821, who refers the composition to the time of Herod the Great. Ed.

V. 15. 'Carry back your thoughts, fellow sinner, to the earliest period upon which your memory can fasten; let a solemn hour of meditation be occupied with the unnumbered mercies which you have received, at the hand of Providence; let another hour be devoted to a recall of those dangers, from which you have been rescued; let another be occupied in recounting the calls of God's Word, which have sounded in your ears,—the opportunities of grace and salvation, which you have enjoyed and abused; let all the warnings, promises, and threatenings of Jehovah, which you have slighted, come up together, in remembrance; and not even the deceitfulness, and the desperate depravity of the heart, can hide from you the solemn truth,—"Thou hast destroyed thyself."'

V. 17—19. 2 Pet. 3:1—4. These warnings and predictions related to those persons, who, at that time, separated from the apostolical churches, to form heretical sects: being 'sensual,' or natural, unregenerate men, who, not having the Spirit of God dwelling in them, as the Author and Preserver of divine life and holy affections, were entirely actuated by pride, ambition, avarice, malignant and licentious inclinations. Jam. 3:15—16. It is absurd to suppose, that the apostle would class with these abominable heretics, all those professed Christians who had not the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit; and if that interpretation be set aside, as inadmissible, 'not having the Spirit' most mean being unregenerate, not having the Holy Spirit as a Sanctifier. Rom. 8:5—11.—It should be observed, that Jude, as well as Peter and John, appeals to the 'word of the apostles,' as the standard according to which all ought to be regulated: but this word of the apostles, can be found in their writings only. SCOTT.

(18, 20, 21.) 'To an attentive observer of the signs of the times, it will appear one of the most extraordinary phenomena of this eventful crisis, that, amid the ravages of atheism and infidelity, real religion is evidently on the increase. The kingdom of God, we know, cometh not with observation; but still there are not wanting manifest tokens of its approach. The personal appearance of the Son of God was an-signifies little with men now-a-days, unless to scoff at and deride even the very expressions; but it is not so in the language of the Holy Ghost.

Observe, Omissions as well as commissions, must be accounted for in the day of judgment.

Observe, further, Hard speeches of one another, especially if ill-grounded, will most certainly come into account at the judgment of the great day. Let us all take care in time. 'If thou,' says one of our good old puritans, 'smite (a miscalled heretic, or) a schismatic, and God find a real saint bleeding, look thou to it, how thou wilt answer it.' It may be too late to say before the angel, that it was an error, Eccl. 5:6. I only here allude to that expression of the divinely inspired writer.

In v. 16. the apostle enlarges further on the character of these evil men and seducers; they are murmurers, complainers, &c.

Observe, A murmuring, complaining temper, indulged and expressed, lays men under a very ill character; such are very weak at least, and, for the most part, very wicked. Such walk after their own lusts, their will, their appetite, their fancy; they who please their sinful appetites, are most prone to yield to their ungodly passions.

Lastly, The apostle here gives exhortation to those to whom he wrote, which, with the doxology in the last two verses, concludes the epistle.

V. 17—25. V. 17. But, beloved, remember, &c. 'Remember, take heed, that ye think it not strange, that such people as the seducers before described and warned against should arise in the Christian Church, seeing all this was foretold by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ.

1. They who would persuade, must make it evident that they sincerely love those whom they would persuade.

2. The words of inspired persons, duly remembered and reflected on, are the best preservative against dangerous errors; this will always be so, till men have learnt to speak better than God Himself.

3. We ought not to be stumbled, if errors and persecutions prevail in the Christian church; this was foretold, therefore we should not think worse of Christ's Person, doctrine, or cross, when we see it fulfilled. See 1 Tim. 4:1. and 2 Tim. 3:1. and 2 Pet. 3:3. We must not think it strange, but comfort ourselves with this, that Christ will make good his promise to his church, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, Mat. 16:18.

4. The more religion is ridiculed and persecuted, the faster hold we should take and keep of it; being forewarned, we should show that we are forearmed; under such trials we should stand firm, and not be soon shaken in mind, 2 Thess. 2:2.

V. 19. These are they who separate, &c. Observe, 1. Sensualists are the worst separatists; they separate themselves from God, and Christ, and his church, to the devil, the world, and the flesh, by their ungodly courses and vicious practices. 2. Sensual men have not the Spirit, that is, of God and Christ, the Spirit of holiness, which, whoever has not, is none of Christ's, does not belong to Him, Rom. 8:9.

V. 20. Building up, &c. Observe, Having laid our foundation well in a sound faith, we must make further progress continually; and we should take care with what materials we carry on our building, 1 Cor. 3:12. Praying in the Holy Ghost. Observe,

1. Prayer is the nurse of faith; the way to build up ourselves in our most holy faith, is, to continue instant in prayer, Rom. 12:12.

2. Our prayers are then most likely to prevail, when we pray in the Holy Ghost, under his guidance and influence, according to the rule of his Word, with faith, fervency, and constant, persevering importunity; this is praying in the Holy Ghost.

V. 21. Keep yourselves, &c. 'Keep up the grace of love to God in its lively, vigornounced by the shaking of nations; his spiritual kingdom, in all probability, will be established in the midst of similar convulsions and disorders. The blasphemous impiety of the enemies of God, as well as the zealous efforts of his sincere worshippers, will doubtless be overruled to accomplish the purposes of his unerring providence. While, in inflicting the chastisements of offended Deity on corrupt communities and nations, infidelity marks its progress by devastation and ruin, by the prostration of thrones and concessions of kingdoms; thus appalling the inhabitants of the world, and compelling them to take refuge in the church of God, the true sanctuary; the stream of divine knowledge, unobserved, is flowing in new channels, winding its course among humble valleys, refreshing thirsty deserts, and enriching, with far other and higher blessings than those of commerce, the most distant climes and nations, until, agreeably to the prediction of prophecy, the knowledge of the Lord shall fill and cover the whole earth.' Rev. ROB. HALL.

(19.) Who separate themselves.] 'God will not walk with any man who is so unlike Him as the retired monk; who, with all his prayers, will not give a cent, or put forth his hand, to save a world from death.' Dr. GRIFFIN.

V. 20, 21. The doctrine of faith is 'most holy' in its nature and tendency; leading men to repent, and hate all sin, to love and obey God, and to lead a sober, righteous, and godly life; by which it may be distinguished from all false doctrines. The grace of faith 'is most holy,' as it 'worketh by love,' 'purifieth the heart,' and 'overcometh the world,' by which it is distinguishable from a false and dead faith. Adhering, therefore, to the holy doctrine of the Gospel, by a living, obedient faith, Christians ought continually to be seeking an increase in knowledge of the truths of God, and in the experience of the power of them on their hearts, that they may be more and more established, in a realizing and efficacious belief of them, and in all those holy dispositions, and that obedient practice, which depend on it, as the superstructure rests upon the foundation. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Eph. 2:19—22. Note, Gal. 5:1—6.—Certainly, 'praying in the Holy Ghost,' does not mean extemporaneous prayer, as distinguished from a liturgy; for both those who pray without a form, and those who read words previously put together, often come short of 'praying by the Holy Spirit.' But how is the whole of this most beautiful passage enervated, by explaining the words in question, of inspiration, or miraculous gifts! Whether with a written form, or without, no man can pray spiritually, except by the teaching and assistance of the Holy Spirit, exciting, in the mind and heart, holy desires, affections, and expectations; and this is wholly independent of miracles, and of inspiration, properly so called. All Christians are commanded to pray in, or 'by, the Holy Spirit'; but, for at least fifteen hundred years, no Christians have had the Spirit of miracles and inspiration. Have none, then, during this period, prayed according to the exhortation of the apostles and prophets? John 4:21—24. SCOTT.

(20.) 'No wonder God hears prayer, when it is the Holy Ghost that prays. What an awful place is the Christian's closet. The whole Trinity are about it every time he kneels. There is the Spirit praying to the Father, through the Son.' Dr. GRIFFIN.

ous actings and exercises in your souls.' Looking for the mercy, &c. Eternal life is to be looked for only through mercy ; not only through the mercy of God as our Creator, but through the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, as Redeemer ; all who come to heaven, must come thither through our Lord Jesus Christ, Acts 4:12. compared with v. 10. A believing expectation of eternal life will arm us against the snares of sin, 2 Pet. 3:14. a lively faith of the blessed hope will help us to mortify our lusts.

V. 22, 23. And of some have compassion, &c. Observe, here, We ought to do all we can to rescue others out of the snare of the devil, that they may be saved from dangerous errors, or pernicious practices. We are not only, under God, our own keepers ; but every man ought to be, as much as in him lies, his brother's keeper ; none but a wicked Cain will contradict this, Gen. 4:9.

PRACT. OBS. When the servants of Christ address those, who 'are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called,' and for whom they pray, 'that mercy, peace, and love may be multiplied unto them,' they must not only instruct them, 'with all diligence,' in things pertaining to 'the common salvation,' but select such subjects as more especially suit the circumstances of the times, and tend to put them on their guard against prevailing delusions.—Whilst we 'contend earnestly' for the truths which relate to the Person and Salvation of Christ, we should guard with equal caution against every perversion of them : for, though the infidel or the Pharisee will as surely come short of salvation, as the Antinomian, yet he does not so immediately dishonor the Gospel, or in general do so much to set mankind against it. We ought, therefore, to remind the people, not to rest in any profession, knowledge, or experience, which does not bring the soul into subjection 'to the obedience of Christ ;' 2 Cor. 10:1-6. for nothing, but the renewal of our souls to the divine image, by the Holy Spirit, can secure us from being destroyed among the enemies of God. Whilst we are on our guard against 'filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh,' let us also stand aloof from those, whether moral or immoral in other respects, who revile their rulers. When we deem anything amiss in the conduct of our governors, and wish well to sober, and regular, and peaceable

V. 22-25. The latter [others who were more hardened and profane] they were directed 'to save with fear,' being cautious, lest by attempting their recovery, they should be themselves entangled.—Garment spotted, &c. It has been observed by some writers, that such ornamental or improper clothing, as serves to tempt others to sinful inclinations or practices, or is purchased with the wages of licentiousness, may very properly be called 'garments spotted with the flesh,' and, as such, however rich, elegant, or becoming, it ought to be detested and loathed, more than the meanest rags, by all those who would be thought Christians.—As the Lord Jesus alone will visibly appear at the day of judgment, to 'present his saints' unto Himself, it has been thought by some expositors, that this doxology was addressed personally to Him. (Marg. Ref.) But others suppose, that the apostle had the 'One true and living God' in his mind, without exclusive respect to any of the Persons in the sacred Trinity : as 'God is become our Savior,' in Jesus Christ, and the glory 'of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' in the salvation of believers, will be displayed at the day of judgment : though Christ alone will visibly and personally, appear to judge the world. 1 Tim. 1:17. Rev. 5:9-14. 7:9-12. Seorr.

(22, 23.) Pulling out of fire. 'When asked, "How it came to pass that the clergy, who spoke of things real, affected the people so little,

This must be done with compassion, making a difference. How is that ? We must distinguish between the weak and the wilful.

1. Of some, we must have compassion ; treat them with all tenderness, restore them in the spirit of meekness ; if God has forgiven them, why should not we ? We infinitely more need his forgiveness than they do, or can do, ours ; though perhaps neither they nor we are justly or sufficiently sensible of this.

2. Others save with fear ; urging on them the terrors of the Lord ; 'Endeavor to frighten them out of their sins ; preach hell and damnation to them.'

But what if prudence and caution in administering even the most just and severe reproofs, be what are primarily and chiefly here intimated ; (I do but offer it for consideration ; ) as if he had said, 'Fear, lest you frustrate your own good intentions and honest designs by rash and imprudent management ; that you do not harden, instead of reclaiming, even where greater degrees of severity are requisite, than in the immediately foregoing instance.'

Hating even the garment, &c. that is, keeping yourselves at the utmost distance from what is or appears evil, and designing and endeavoring that others may do so too ; avoid all that leads to sin, or that looks like sin, 1 Thess. 5:22.

Lastly, The apostle concludes this epistle with solemn ascription of glory to the great God. Note, Whatever is the subject or argument we have been treating of, ascribing glory to God is fittest for us to conclude with, v. 24, 25.

Note, further, God is able, and as willing as able, to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory ; not as those who have never been faulty, but as those whose faults shall not be imputed, to their ruin, which, but for God's mercy and a Savior's merits, they might most justly have been.

Before the presence of his glory. Observe, 1. The glory of the Lord will shortly be present ; every eye shall see Him, Rev. 1:7. This is now the object of our faith, but hereafter, (and surely it cannot now be long,) it will be the object of our sense ; whom we now believe in, Him we shall shortly see, to our unspeakable joy and comfort, or inexpressible terror and consternation. See 1 Pet. 1:8.

Observe, 2. All real, sincere believers shall be presented, at the Lord Redeemer's appearance and coming, by Him their glorious Head, to the Father, in order to his approbation, acceptance, and reward ; they were given Him of the Father, and of all that were so given Him, He has lost none, nor will lose any one, not a single soul, but will present them all perfectly holy and happy, when He shall surrender his mediatorial kingdom to his God, and our God ; his Father, and our Father, John 6:39. with ch. 17:12. 1 Cor. 15:24.

Observe, 3. When believers shall be presented faultless, it will be with exceeding joy. Alas ! now our faults fill us with fears, doubts, and sorrows ; but be of good cheer ; if we are sincere, we shall be, our dear Redeemer has undertaken for it, we shall be presented faultless ; where there is no sin, there will be no sorrow ; where there is the perfection of holiness, there will be the perfection of joy. Surely, the God who can and will do all this, is worthy to have glory, majesty, dominion, and power, ascribed to Him, both now and for ever !—And to this we may well, with the apostle, affix our hearty Amen.

plans of securing liberty, and redressing grievances, let us by no means lose sight of 'the meekness of wisdom,' but leave every matter to the Lord in the use of proper means. Nay, even if oppressed and persecuted, we should, without 'rendering evil for evil,' 'commit ourselves to Him that judgeth righteously.'—The way of Cain, of Balaam, and of Korah, has, in every age and place, been frequented : and enmity against God, concurring with avarice, ambition, and sensuality, drives men headlong in similar courses to their own destruction. The 'men of God,' from the beginning of the world, have declared the doom, which will be denounced on all such persons, when Christ shall come 'with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment on all the ungodly,' for all their wicked works, and for all the impious words, which they have spoken against Him, by reviling his truths, servants, providential appointments, righteous decrees, and holy commandments. We should therefore avoid those 'murmurers and complainers, who walk after their ungodly lusts,' and want a religion to suit such a course of life ; and we ought to disregard their 'great swelling words of vanity ;' whilst we mark, how they have 'men's persons in admiration' for their own secular advantage ; especially such as are rich, and can afford to purchase, at a high rate, flattery, authority, and influence in the visible church. Seorr.

and the players, who spoke of things barely imaginary, affected them so much," one said, "My lord, I can assign but one reason ; we players speak of things imaginary, as though they were real, and too many of the clergy speak of things real as though they were imaginary." Thus it was in his, and all know it to be too much the case, in our time. Hence it is, that even on our most important occasions, the worthy gentlemen concerned in our public churches, generally find themselves more obliged to musicians than the preachers. Whitfield's maxim was, "to preach, as Apelles painted, for eternity."—He was first struck with this maxim, at the table of Abp. Boulter, in Ireland, where the great Dr. Delany said to him, "I wish, whenever I go up into a pulpit, to look upon it as the last time I shall ever preach, or the last time the people may hear." He never forgot this. He often said, "Would ministers preach for eternity, they would then net the part of true Christian orators, and not only calmly and coolly inform the understanding, but, by persuasive, pathetic address, endeavor to move the affections, and warm the heart. To act otherwise, bespeaks sad ignorance of human nature, and such an inexcusable indolence, and indifference in the preacher, as must constrain the hearers to suspect, whether they will or not, that the preacher, let him be who he will, only deals in the false commerce of unfeeling truth." Phillip's Life and Times of Whitfield.

MARRIAGE. 1 Pet. 3:7.

Giving honor. See Wayland's Elts. Mor. Sci. in 'Law of Marriage.' Heirs together of the grace of life. 'Virtue in the present life, perhaps, never reaps so large and exquisite a reward, as when it goes to enhance the pleasures of love. None but the virtuous have power to admit more than a transient, passionate, capricious joy ;—a joy that alights upon an hour ; and is gone in search of other sweets. But souls fraught with goodness find, that every noble sentiment, every high principle, every generous energy, every grace, every softness, and every sparkling adornment of mind or person, when it meets its corresponding sentiment, and principle, and purpose, and grace, and beauty, in the being beloved, becomes a power inculcably productive ; so that every pleasure creates and re-creates itself, a thousand times, and without end.—If the beneficence of the Supreme is seen, suffusively shedding its glories over the ample fields of the material world, and is mildly reflected from myriads of points through earth and air, are not its benms brought to an intensity upon that circle, wherein virtuous love takes its bliss ?—Temple of Melekartha. Ed.

AN EXPOSITION OF THE REVELATION OF JOHN, THE DIVINE, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. William Tong.)

It ought to be no prejudice to the credit and authority of this book, that it has been rejected by men of corrupt minds, such as Cerdon and Marcion, and doubted of by men of a better character; for that has been the lot of other parts of holy writ, and of the divine Author of the Scripture Himself.* The image and superscription of this book are truly sacred and Divine, and the matter of it agreeable with other prophetic books, particularly Ezekiel [which it exceedingly resembles, says Lightfoot, in method and things spoken] and Daniel [in that, says Lightfoot, it repeats the same history, in varied and enlarged expressions]; the church of God has generally received it,† and found good counsel and great comfort in it.

From the beginning, the church of God has been blessed with prophecy; that glorious prediction of breaking the serpent's head, was the stay and support of the patriarchal age; and the many prophecies of the Messiah to come, were the Gospel of the Old Test. Christ Himself prophesied of the destruction of Jerusalem; and about the time in which that was accomplished, He intrusted the apostle John with this book of revelation, to deliver it to the church, as a prediction of the most important events that should happen to it, to the end of time, for the support of the faith of his people, and the direction of their hope. It is called the Revelation, because God therein discovers those things which could never have been sifted out by the reasonings of human understanding; those deep things of God, which no man knows, but the Spirit of God, and those to whom He reveals them. HENRY.

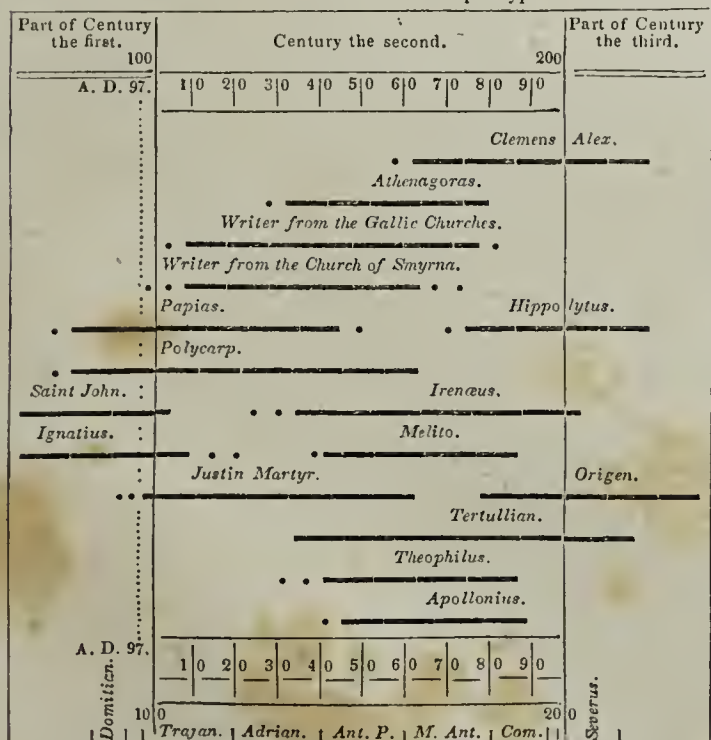

It is a singular circumstance, concerning this book, that its authenticity was very generally, if not universally acknowledged, during the first two centuries; and yet, in the third century, it began to be questioned! This seems to have arisen from some absurd opinions concerning the millennium, which were grounded on it by those who maintained them: and therefore their opponents injudiciously and presumptuously endeavored to discredit their tenets, by denying the authority of the book itself. But it was then too late for the success of such an attempt; and its divine original and authority have been fully established by the clearest, and most decisive evidence.—Indeed, the prophecies contained in it have, in so many undeniable instances, been most circumstantially accomplished through a long series of ages, that it stands as little in need of external evidence, as any book in the whole Scripture.

No doubt it was written by John, the apostle, to whose name the title of 'The Divine,' or the Theologian, (Theologos), was added, some time after; either because of the deep and mysterious truths with which his writings abound; or because he spoke so much concerning the divine Person and glory of the Lord Jesus. (Theos Logos).—The book is styled, 'The Apocalypse,' or 'The Revelation;' consisting of matters chiefly prophetic, which were immediately revealed to John, from Jesus Christ. This took place when he was in the isle of Patmos, in the Ægean Sea, whither he was banished, as is generally thought, by the emperor Domitian, A. D. 94, or 95, [96, or 97.] Some, indeed, maintain, that this happened much earlier, even during the persecution of Nero, A. D. 67 or 68, or even before that time: but the arguments adduced in support of this opinion are by no means conclusive: and, as it stands last in the sacred canon, so it seems to have been written last, and to have been intended to occupy that place. (Notes, 6: 1, 2. 22: 18—21.)

The Revelation opens with the apostle's account of an extraordinary vision he had of the Lord Jesus, appearing to him in glory. Then follow seven short epistles, from Christ Himself, to the seven principal churches in Asia: ‡ Acts 19: 8—12. and after them it

* 'Of the authenticity of the Book of the Revelation there can be no doubt. Yet in the third century it began to be questioned, which seems to have arisen from some notions respecting the millennium, which a few well-meaning, but fanciful expositors of that day endeavored to support from this book. No one can peruse the Revelation without being forcibly struck by the peculiar sublimity of its composition, so superior to any other writings, that it could have been written only by a man divinely inspired. It is likewise so suitable as a continuation of the prophecies of Daniel, that the N. T. dispensation would have appeared incomplete without this prophetic book; for it has been the uniform plan of the Divine proceedings, to give a more distinct view of interesting future events, as the time of their accomplishment approaches. A succession of living prophets not having been continued to the church, by this book a succession of prophecy is continued, always speaking to us, especially by the vastly enlarged circulation of the SS, since the discovery of the art of printing, and speaking by a witness, whose testimony as to future events cannot be called in question, since so many have already occurred to verify parts of the predictions it contains.' HENRY, abr.

A Biographical Chart of Writers in the early Christian Church, who appear to have afforded evidence in favor of the Apocalypse.

The dotted line marks the year 97, when the Apocalypse was published. The lines under each name show the years when the writers lived, to be measured upon the scale below. When the birth or death of a writer is uncertain, that uncertainty is expressed by dots, before or after the line. Woodhouse.

† 'The external evidences for the genuineness of the book, are clearly stated by T. H. Horne, from the testimony of the earliest Christian writers; which are so strong as fully to satisfy any candid mind, that it is to be received as Divine Scripture, communicated to the church by John the evangelist.' [See table, from Woodhouse, opposite.]

‡ In the words of Woodhouse, "We may see its rise, as of a pure fountain, from the sacred rock of the apostolic church. We may trace it through the first century of its passage, flowing from one fair field to another, identified through them all, and everywhere the same. As it proceeded lower, we see many attempts to obscure its sacred origin, to arrest or divert its course, or lose it in the sands of antiquity, or bury it in the rubbish of the dark ages. We see these attempts repeated in our own times, and by dexterous adversaries, but it has at length arrived to us, such as it flowed forth at the beginning."

The internal evidence is equally indisputable. T. H. Horne reduces it to three points, which he states as follows, entering fully into the details. 1. The Apocalypse corresponds in doctrine and imagery with other books of divine authority. 2. The sublimity of the ideas and imagery is another striking, internal evidence of the genuineness and divine origin of the Apocalypse. 3. The style of the Apocalypse coincides with that of the undisputed writings of St. John. HENRY, abr.

‡ As the pictures of the present state of the more or less ruined towns of Asia, where the '7 churches' were situated, face this page, comparative descriptions of the ascertained sites of those interesting towns are here given (from Henry, abr.), to be compared with the engraved views.

The Present State of the Seven Churches.

Ephesus, in the time of the Romans, was the metropolis of proconsular Asia. This celebrated city, the vast remains of which give a high idea of its former beauty, extent, and magnificence, is situated in that part of Asia anciently called Ionia, (but now Natolia,) about 5 miles from the Ægean sea, on the sides and at the foot of a range of mountains, overlooking a fine plain, watered and fertilized by the river Cayster. Ephesus was particularly celebrated for the temple of Diana, a most magnificent edifice, erected at the common expense of the inhabitants of Asia Proper, and reputed one of the seven wonders of the world: but the very site of this magnificent and celebrated edifice is now undetermined, though some stupendous columns in the large mosque, there is reason to believe, once graced that structure. Widely scattered and noble ruins attest the splendor of the theatre, mentioned in Acts 19:31. built on mount Prion. The loud shouts of the immense multitude, reverberated from the neighboring mount Corissus, would augment the uproar occasioned by the populace rushing into the theatre. Just below it, is the public place where the law proceedings were going forward, to which the town clerk referred Demetrius and his companions. In the time of Paul, this city abounded with orators and philosophers; and its inhabitants, in their Gentile state, were celebrated for their idolatry and skill in magic, as well as for their luxury and licentiousness. The present state of Ephesus affords a striking illustration of the accomplishment of prophecy. After a protracted struggle with the sword of Rome, and the sophisms of the Gnostics, Ephesus at last gave way. The beginnings of indifference, censured by the warning voice of the prophet, increased to a total forgetfulness; till at length the threatenings of the Apocalypse were fulfilled, and Ephesus sunk with the general overthrow of the Greek empire, in the 14th century. Ephesus is now in a state of almost total ruin; innumerable inscriptions are lying about in disorder and neglect, or built into the Turkish structures. The plough has passed over the city; and in March, 1826, green corn was growing, in all directions, amidst the forsaken ruins; and one solitary Greek only was found, who bore the Christian name, instead of its once flourishing church. Where once assembled thousands exclaimed, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," now the eagle yells, and the jackal moans. As for the stork, the ruins of Ephesus are her house. This bird is seen perching in all directions upon the summits of the buildings, or hovering round them in the air, or fixing its immense nest, like the capital of a column, on the large masses of ruins.

Smyrna, a city of Asia Minor, is situated about 40 miles to the N. of Ephesus. It is still celebrated for the number, wealth, and commerce of the inhabitants. Its population is estimated at about 75,000 inhabitants; 45,000 are Turks, 15,000 Greeks, 8,000 Armenians, 3,000 Jews, and less than 1,000 Europeans. There are more than 20 mosques in Smyrna, and 3 Greek churches, and the Jews have several synagogues. The angel of the church of Smyrna, addressed in the 2d apocalyptic epistle, is supposed to have been Polycarp, the disciple of John, by whom he was appointed bishop of Smyrna. As he afterwards suffered much, being burnt alive at Smyrna, A. D. 166, the exhortation in Rev. 2:10. would be peculiarly calculated to support and encourage contains a series of prophecies, chiefly emblematical, relating to events which would take place, in the church, and the nations of the earth, through all the subsequent generations of mankind, to the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the eternal state.* This series is sometimes interrupted by explanatory digressions, which will be noted as we proceed: such predictions as are supposed by the author to be already fulfilled, will be compendiously stated, with the events to which they relate, according to the judgment of the most approved writers: and an endeavor will be thus far made, to render the great outlines of the book as plain as possible to the unlearned reader, whose edification must principally be considered. But in respect of those things, which seem not to be yet fulfilled, a judgment must be formed, and an opinion ventured, with very great caution, and in a very general manner. Many, indeed, have objected to every attempt to explain a book, so extremely abstruse, and, as they think, unintelligible; nay, some professed Christians, and ministers of the Gospel, have even derided these endeavors.† No doubt, many have affected to be 'wise above what is written,' and have applied general prophecies, by a 'private interpretation,' in a very unwarrantable manner: (Note, 2 Pet. 1: 20, 21.) and this should teach others modesty, reverence, and a simple dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, in all their inquiries, whatever helps or advantages they may possess for such investigations. But, if we are enabled to study, write, and read, in this manner, there can be no doubt, that we shall derive most abundant, practical instruction, and obtain increasing vigor to our faith and holy affections, by attending carefully to every part of this most surprising discovery of the Lord's purposes, respecting his church and the world, which was made so many ages before the period of their accomplishment.

They who censure and dissuade the study of it, do it, for the most part, because they have not studied it themselves; and imagine the difficulties to be greater than they are in reality. It is still "the sure word of prophecy;" and men of learning and leisure cannot better employ their time and abilities, than in studying and explaining this book, provided they do it, as Lord Bacon adviseth, with him. Smyrna will ever interest the real Christian. On the firmness of the early martyrs depended, under Divine Providence, the transmission of the truth to the latest generations.

Pergamos was the ancient metropolis of Mysia, and the residence of the Attalian kings: it still preserves many vestiges of ancient magnificence. Against the church at Pergamos, was adduced the charge of instability, Rev. 2:14, 15, but to its feeble faith was promised the all-powerful protection of God. The errors of Balaam and the Nicolaitans have been purged away. Pergamos has been preserved from the destroyer; and 3,000 Christians (out of a population of about 15,000 inhabitants) now cherish the rites of their religion in the same spot where it was planted by the hands of Paul, though, alas! their religion has little in common with the faith taught by the apostle, but the name and profession. Of these Christians, about 200 belong to the Armenian communion; the remainder are members of the Greek church. They have each one church, but the other churches of Pergamos have been converted into mosques, and are profaned with the blasphemies of the false prophet, Mohammed. There are about 100 Jews, who have a synagogue. Pergamos, or Bergamo, as it is now called, is about 64 miles N. of Smyrna.

Thyatira is a considerable city in the road from Pergamos to Sardis, about 48 miles eastward of the former. It is called by the Turks, Akhisar, and is embosomed in cypresses and poplars; it is now, as anciently it was, celebrated for dyeing, and large quantities of cloths, dyed scarlet, are sent weekly to Smyrna. In 1826, the population was estimated at 300 Greek houses, 30 Armenian, and 1,000 Turkish. The two former have churches. The streets are narrow and dirty.

Sardis, the metropolis of the region of Lydia, in Asia Minor, is situated near mount Tmolus, between 30 and 40 miles E. from Smyrna. It was celebrated for great opulence, and for the voluptuous and debauched manners of its inhabitants. Considerable ruins still attest the ancient splendor of this once celebrated capital of Croesus and the Lydian kings, which is now reduced to a wretched village, called Sart, consisting of a few mud huts, inhabited by Turkish heidsmen. A great portion of the grounds once occupied by this imperial city, is now a smooth, grassy plain, browsed over by the sheep of the peasants, or trodden by the camels of the caravan, and only a few disjointed pillars, and the crumbling rock of the Acropolis, remain to point out the site of its glory. The ruins are more entirely gone to decay than in most of the ancient cities in those parts. No Christians reside on the spot: two Greek servants of a Turkish miller, in 1826, were the only representatives of the church at Sardis; the present state of which affords a striking illustration of the accomplishment of the prophetic denunciation against the church in that city.—A name to live, while dead.

Philadelphia is situated about 27 miles S. E. of Sardis, on a rising ground, beneath the snowy mount, Tmolus. The houses are embosomed in trees, which gives a pleasing effect to the scene. Not long before the date of the apocalyptic epistle, this city had suffered so much from earthquakes, that it had been in a great measure deserted by its inhabitants; which may in some degree account for the poverty of this church, as described in this epistle. Philadelphia appears to have resisted the attacks of the Turks in 1312, with more success than the other cities. At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperor, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant citizens defended their religion and freedom above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans, Bajazet, in 1390. In these words Gibbon, the skeptical historian, bears a testimony, perhaps unconsciously, to the truth of Scripture: he states, that "among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect; a column, a pillar, in a scene of ruins." Whatever may be lost of the spirit of Christianity, there is still the form of a Christian church in this city, which is now called "Allah Shelah," or the "City of God." It contains about 1,000 Christians, chiefly Greeks, most of whom speak only the Turkish language. They have 25 places of public worship, 5 of which are large and regular churches, with a resident bishop and inferior clergy. In 20 others of a smaller description, the Greek liturgy is read once a year. The lamp still exists, but where is its oil? When the very epistle to their own church is read, they understand it not! The remains of antiquity here are not numerous.

Laodicea is about 42 miles to the S. of Ephesus. This city was often damaged by earthquakes, and restored, either by the opulence of its inhabitants, or by the munificence of the Roman emperors. From the researches of modern travellers, it appears to have been seated on a volcanic hill, of moderate height, but of considerable extent. Its ruins attest that it was large, opulent, and splendid; and there are still to be seen the remains of an amphitheatre, an aqueduct, and many other buildings. In the primitive time of Christianity, as appears from Paul's epistle to the Colossians, in which the Laodiceans are twice mentioned, this place possessed a flourishing church. But the doom of Laodicea seems to have been more severe and terrible than that of the other 6 apocalyptic churches, as its state was more degraded; and its present condition is in striking conformity with the rebukes and threatenings of God. Not a single Christian resides at Laodicea! Not even a Turk has a fixed residence on the spot. A fox, discovered by its ears peeping over a brow, was the only inhabitant seen by Chandler. It is even more solitary than Ephesus: the latter has a prospect of a rolling sea, or a whitening sail, to enliven its decay; the former sits in widowed loneliness. Its temples are desolate; the stately edifices of ancient Laodicea are now peopled only by wolves and jackals. The prayers of the Moslem are the only prayers heard near the still splendid ruins of the city, on which the prophetic denunciation seems to have been fully executed in its utter rejection as a church. "Its crime was pride; its punishment, desolation. Infidelity itself must confess, that the menace of the Scriptures has been executed and accomplished; it now stands rejected of God, and deserted of men; its glory a ruin, its name a reproach." — From Hortley, Arundell, Emerson, and T. H. Horne.

* The book consists of two principal divisions.

I. Relates to "the things which are," that is, the then state of the church, and contains the epistle of John to the 7 churches, and his account of the appearance of the Lord Jesus, and his direction to the apostle to write what he beheld, ch. 1:9—20. Also the addresses or epistles to 7 churches of Lydian or Proconsular Asia. These doubtless had reference to the state of the respective churches, as they then existed, but contain excellent precepts and exhortations, commendations and reproofs, promises and threatenings, which are calculated to instruct the Christian church at all times.

II. Contains a prophecy of "the things which shall be hereafter," and describes the future state of the church from the time when the apostle beheld the apocalyptic visions. Fraser thus expresses the arrangement recommended by Vitringa, and now generally adopted. The series of events is carried on in the Apocalypse, by 7 seals opened in their order, 7 trumpets sounded in their order, and 7 vials poured out in their order. The 7 trumpets are the evolution of the 7th seal, the 7 vials are the evolution of the 7th trumpet. The 7th vial introduces the millennium, from which period the aspect of the church and the world is uniform until the day of judgment, except a short interruption at the close of the millennium.

This prophecy may be arranged under the following sections:—

1. The representation of the divine glory, ch. 4.
  2. The sealed book, and the Lamb that opens it, ch. 5.
  3. The opening of the first 6 seals, ch. 6.
  4. The sealing of the 144,000, and the presentation of the palm-bearing multitude before the throne, ch. 7.
  5. The opening of the 7th seal, and the first 6 trumpets, and the prophetic commission to John, ch. 8. and 9. including also the vision of the open little book, with the measuring of the temple, and the two witnesses, ch. 10. and 11:1—14.
  6. The sounding of the 7th trumpet; the vision of the woman persecuted by the dragon, and of the wild beasts from the sea and the land, ch. 11:15—19. ch. 12. and 13.
  7. The vision of the Lamb and 144,000 elect on mount Zion, and the proclamations or warnings, ch. 14.
  8. The 7 vials; the harlot of Babylon and her fall, ch. 15: to ch. 19:10.
  9. The great conflict, the millennium, the conflict renewed, the judgment, and the new creation, ch. 19:11—21. and ch. 20.
  10. Description of the new Jerusalem, ch. 21. 22:1—5. The conclusion, ch. 22:6—21.
- The 2d portion of the Apocalypse, according to Mede, is the prophecy of Daniel, expanded and opened into detail, the great topics being the same, and the termination exactly identical.

HENRY, abr.

† Respecting the scope and design of this book, the variety of opinions is almost incredible. No two commentators agree in the interpretation of it, every one forming in some respects a different hypothesis, while no entire exposition has yet been offered, in which the cool and cautious inquirer will altogether acquiesce. Holden.—But this book represents to us, as in a small but exact map, the steadiness and exactness of Providence, and Christ's government of the world. For here we see the various and seemingly confused events of Providence so exactly methodized, as to make up one uniform and noble piece. Here piety and wickedness, angels and devils, the church and antichrist, act various and contrary parts; and yet Christ makes use of all for noble purposes, and carries all on for one great end. Fleming.

No book has been more commented upon, or has given rise to a greater variety of interpretations, and it has ever been accounted the most difficult portion of the N. T. The figurative language in which the visions are delivered; the variety of symbols under which the events are signified; the extent of the prophetic information, which appears to include all ages of the Christian church, afford little hope of its perfect elucidation, till a further process of time shall have ripened more of the events foretold in it. T. H. Horne.

It was wise and proper, by a prophesy in the Christian church, to support the minds of good men under afflictions, with assurances of Christ's second coming, and of the watchful providence of God over the cause of true religion in the mean time. Thus the prophecies of this book are of the like use to the Christian church, that the prophecies of Christ's first appearance were to the ancient church,—and the obscurity of this book is not so much owing to anything in the book itself, as to the methods taken by several to explain it; and nothing has really so much darkened it, as the common attempts made to interpret it. Lowman.

Although many parts of the Apocalypse are thus obscure, yet enough is clear to convey to us the most important religious instruction. This book is to us, what the prophecies of the O. T. were to the Jews. No prophecies in the Revelation can be more clouded with obscurity, than that a child should be born of a virgin, that a mortal should not see corruption, that a person despised and numbered among malefactors should be established for ever on the throne of David. Yet still the pious Jew preserved his faith entire amongst all these wonderful, and, in appearance, contradictory intimations. He looked into the holy books in which they were contained, with reverence; and with patient expectation "waited for the consolation of Israel." We, in the same manner, look up to the prophecies of the Apocalypse, for the full consummation of the great scheme of the Gospel; when Christianity shall finally prevail over all the corruptions of the world, and be universally established in its utmost purity. Gilpin. Any impartial reader, if he has been a doubting Christian, must gain an assurance; or, if atheistically inclined, a conviction, that it was impossible, without a divine prophetic Spirit, to foretell some of the things that have come to pass. Wall.

It is much to be regretted, that commentators on this book have usually gone into extremes; that they either have attempted to apply all the various symbolical representations, and to interpret them according to some preconceived system, or else they have wholly shrunk from the work, and, hastily concluding that all which has been written is conjecture, have assumed merit to themselves for refusing to indulge in a similar course. Thus Calvin and A. Clarke declined to comment upon this book. Would it not have been preferable, to confine themselves to noticing the general bearing of these symbols, according to their usual meaning in Scripture, and then to proceed to the application only of those which appear most clearly developed by the lapse of time? Prof. to Rev.

great wisdom, sobriety, and reverence.—The folly of interpreters has been, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, to foretell times and things by this prophecy, as if God designed to make them prophets. By this rashness, they have not only exposed themselves, but brought the prophecy, also, into contempt. The design of God was much otherwise. He gave this, and the prophecies of the O. T., not to gratify men's curiosities, by enabling them to foreknow things; but that, after they were fulfilled, they might be interpreted by the event; and his own providence, (or foresight,) 'not the interpreter's, might be manifest thereby to the world.* Bp. Newton. It is worthy of notice, in respect of the Revelation, that the views given in it of God and heavenly things, of the kingdom of providence and grace, of the Redeemer's glory, the happiness and character of his people, with the wickedness and the ruin of his enemies, are set forth in so striking and peculiar a manner, that even those who do not at all understand the prophetic meaning, are uniformly interested and edified by reading it, in proportion to the degree of their humility, faith, and piety.

In the notes to Revelation, the Ed. must confine himself, generally, to a statement of the views of the last English and American writers on the book, in addition to those of Henry and Scott; and, to avoid confusion, other views, partly in a tabular form, will be given at the end of Revelation. A list of some works upon Revelation will be seen in the note below;† and the length of it will prove the necessity of the course adopted.

As to the style of Revelation, it is very prophetic and hebraizing. Exceeding much of the old prophets' language and matter is adduced, to intimate new histories, and exceeding much of the Jews' language and allusion to their customs and opinions, thereby to speak the things better to be understood.—Lightfoot. Its writer employs Hebrew phrases, and often has Jewish customs and observances in his mind, even in passages where it may be but little suspected.—Tulloch.

A principal aim [we should keep in view in reading the book] too often is forgotten, in the longest and most elaborate treatises on it, namely, the design and object, for which, assuredly, it has been given to the Christian church; that, like the other books of Scripture, it is intended for our spiritual improvement,—to warn the careless sinner, point out the way of salvation to the awakened inquirer, build up the weak believer, comfort the afflicted and tempted Christian, and, we may especially add, to strengthen the martyr of Christ under the cruel persecutions and sufferings inflicted by Satan and his followers.

* It should, however, be admitted, that to give the attentive and pious reader a general assurance of the final and most glorious victory, which the cause of God, of truth and righteousness, shall certainly acquire even on earth, for his encouragement, during the triumphs of superstition, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and wickedness, which on every side have hitherto been witnessed, or reported from all quarters, was one most important end for which this revelation was given.—But when even the most learned and respectable men attempt, with particularity and exactness, to explain those predictions which are not evidently fulfilled; it commonly happens, that others oppose their interpretation by some counter scheme, supported also by plausible arguments. And while several are thus engaged, each in defending his own conclusions against those who combat them, the readers in general are perplexed, instead of being convinced; the difference between that part which is fulfilled, and may clearly be explained, and the unaccomplished predictions, seems to disappear; the evidence, arising from the fulfilment of prophecy, as demonstrating the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, fails of producing its full effect; and not unfrequently, the whole is laid aside, as uncertain or inexplicable, seeing the most learned writers advance such discordant opinions on the subject. In most other controverted topics, truth is generally supposed to lie on one side or the other, or to be divided between the disputants; but in this particular, the debates often produce a kind of skepticism in the minds of very many readers; so that they are led to doubt about the whole and every part of it. In order to avoid this, great care should be taken, to mark strongly the difference between what is fulfilled, and what is not fulfilled; and to draw the line between these, as exactly as may be; that the uncertainty, as to the grand outlines, may not appear to attach to those parts, which have already received their accomplishment, but be wholly confined to the other part.—In respect of those predictions, especially, which are supposed to be fulfilling in the eventful period during which we live, peculiar caution is necessary; for an unexpected turn in the affairs of nations may, after a very few years, confute some of the most plausible and confident assumptions of the expositors; and weaken the credibility, in the minds of men, even of those interpretations which are well founded. In fact, I apprehend this has been, in many instances, strikingly verified since these remarks were first written. It does not, indeed, appear probable, that the prophecies, fulfilling in any age, should be clearly understood by the contemporaries; any more than that impartial histories should be written by men, of their own times. The events, in which our interests, and those of the country or party to which we belong, are deeply concerned, must have such an effect on our minds, as to deduct from that cool and impartial judgment, which is absolutely requisite in inquiries of this nature. It cannot so soon be known, how the successes and advancement of some, and the subversion of other powers, may terminate; and, till that be known, the application of the transactions of our own age to the events predicted in Scripture, must be attended with a great degree of uncertainty. Our nearness to the objects, likewise, tends to magnify them to us; and we are apt too readily to conclude, that such important transactions must have a prominent place in prophecy. But, I apprehend, that prophecy (especially that contained in this book) resembles a map of the world, on a small scale; in which only countries, and capital cities, and some very remarkable places, are noticed; so that they, who dwell near considerable cities and large towns, are disappointed at not finding them in the map. Thus the events of a century, through whole continents, being foretold in a few verses, or at most in a single short ch. we certainly shall look in vain for many transactions, which appear to us of very great importance. But those who shall come after us, on reviewing the history of the century, or the continent, and comparing it with the prophecy, will doubtless perceive a sufficient coincidence, to enable them to say, 'Thus it was written, and thus it must be;' yet, probably, they will find this accomplishment of prophecy, materially differing from what the most sagacious of us now suppose. Since the author first printed his thoughts on this book, (in 1792,) most extraordinary changes indeed have taken place, in the state of the nations, and of the visible church, which he doubts not will be found accomplishments of the predictions contained in it. Many books also have been written on the subject; several of which he has considered, and means further to consider, and to make such use of as he is able. But he purposes still to adhere to his former plan; and to be very cautious and general, in attempting to explain what has not hitherto allowedly been fulfilled; and merely supplying this deficiency, (if it be one,) by a few quotations from those who have ventured to be more particular. He does not indeed write for the learned. These may and will consult the several authors, who have purposely and exclusively treated on this subject, and judge for themselves; nor has he the presumption to attempt the office of an umpire, between those who maintain different opinions respecting it. The plan and method, on which he proceeds, will appear to the best advantage, in the notes on the several parts of the prophecy; and a general analysis, or outline of the whole, will be more properly introduced towards the conclusion, than at the beginning of the book.

The task of the critic, says Bp. Middleton, scarcely yields in difficulty to that of the expositor: for, as BL remarks, the textus receptus is in a worse state in this, than in any other book of the Scriptures: adding, after promising a more full work on Rev. hereafter, that in his N.T. he himself 'presents as correct a text as he can, from the use of all the critical materials extant:' and that in it he generally and sedulously notices 'any differences of readings adopted, respectively, in the standard texts of Bengel, Wetstein, Matthæi, and Griesbach: in all doubtful cases the text of Matthæi being, for good reasons, preferred.' BL also bestows 'great pains on the punctuation. All these corrections of the text, which are of any importance, will be noted by the Editor. Ed.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. We have, I. The pedigree of this book.

1. It is the revelation of Jesus Christ; the whole Bible is so; for all revelation comes through and centres in Him. Christ, as King, has thus far let his church know by what rules and methods He will govern; and, as Prophet, He has made known the things that shall be hereafter.

2. It is a revelation God gave to Christ. Though Christ is Himself God, yet, as He sustains the office of Mediator between God and man, He receives his instructions from the Father; the human nature of Christ, though endowed with the greatest sagacity, judgment, and penetration, could not, in a way of reason, discover these great events, which, wholly depending on the will of God, could be the object only of divine presence, and must come to a created mind only by revelation.

3. This revelation Christ sent and signified by his angel. Observe, here, the admirable order of divine revelation. God gave it to Christ, and Christ employed an angel to communicate it to the churches. The angels are God's messengers; ministering spirits; Christ's servants; principalities and powers all worship Him.

4. The angel signified it to the apostle John; some think the only apostle surviving, the rest having sealed their testimony with their blood. John was the beloved dis-

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. An infinity of the divine designs or decrees remain impenetrably concealed in the mind of God, till the event discovers them, but He has seen good previously to make known some of his purposes respecting future ages, in order to confirm the faith, encourage the hope, and enlarge the views of his people, and that the accomplishment of them, in after times, might demonstrate the truth of the Scriptures to every diligent inquirer. (Note, Deut. 29:29.)—This book was therefore called 'The Revelation of Jesus Christ,' because its principal subject is, 'A previous discovery of the purposes of God, respecting the affairs of the church, and of the nations as connected ciple; under the N. T., as Daniel under the Old, a man greatly beloved; the servant of Christ; an apostle, evangelist, and a prophet; he served Christ in all the three extraordinary offices of the church. James was an apostle, but not a prophet or evangelist; Matthew was an apostle and evangelist, but not a prophet; Luke was an evangelist, but neither a prophet nor apostle; but John was all three; and so Christ calls him, in an eminent sense, his servant John.

5. John was to deliver this revelation to the church; to all his servants, not only extraordinary servants the ministers, but all the members of the church; all have a right to the oracles of God, and all have their concern in them.

II. Here we have the subject-matter of this revelation, namely, the things that must shortly come to pass. These are showed, not in the clearest light in which God could have set them, but in such a light as He saw most proper, and which would best answer his wise and holy purposes; they are foretold more darkly, to beget veneration, engage attention, and excite inquiry; we have in this revelation a general idea of the methods of Divine Providence and government in and about the church, and many good lessons may be learned hereby. These events, it is said, were such as should come to pass not only surely, but shortly; i. e. they would begin to come to pass very shortly, and the whole would be accomplished in a short time; for now the last ages of the world were come, [and all time is short compared with eternity.]

III. Here is an attestation of the prophecy, v. 2. John bare record. It is observable, that the historical books of the O. Test. have not always the name of the historian prefixed to them, as in the books of Judges, Kings, Chronicles; but in the prophetic books the name is always prefixed, as Isaiah, Jeremiah, &c. So in the N. Test., John did not prefix his name to his first epistle, yet does to this prophecy, as ready to vouch and answer for the truth of it; and he gives us not only his name, but his office. Nothing recorded in this revelation was his own invention or imagination; but all the record of God, and the testimony of Jesus; and as he added nothing to it, so he kept back no part of the counsels of God.

V. 3—8. We have here an apostolical benediction, given more generally and more especially.

I. More generally, to all who either read or hear the words of prophecy. This blessing seems to be pronounced with a design to encourage us to study this book, and not weary of the obscurity of many things in it. Observe, It is a blessed privilege to enjoy the oracles of God. It is not sufficient to our blessedness, that we read and hear the Scriptures, but we must keep the things that are written; we must keep them in our memories, in our minds, in our affections, and in practice, and we shall be blessed in the deed. The nearer we come to the accomplishment of the Scriptures, the greater regard we shall give to them. The time is at hand, and we should be so much the more attentive as we see the day approaching.

II. More especially, and particularly to the seven Asian churches, v. 4. These are named, v. 11. and distinct messages sent to each respectively in the chs. following. The apostle's blessing is more expressly directed to these, because nearest to him, and perhaps under his peculiar care and superintendency. Here observe,

1. His blessing,—grace and peace, holiness and comfort: grace, i. e. the good-will of God towards us, and his good work in us; and peace, i. e. the sweet evidence and assurance of this grace.

2. Whence it is to come; in whose name,—that of God, of the whole Trinity. And here,

(1.) The Father is first named; which may be taken either essentially, for God as God, or personally, for the first Person in the ever blessed Trinity, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and He is described as the Jehovah who is, and who was, and who is to come, eternal, unchangeable, the same to the Old Test. church which was, and to the New Test. church which is, and who will be the same to the church triumphant which is to come.

(2.) The Holy Spirit, called the seven spirits, not seven in number, or in nature, but the infinite, perfect Spirit of God, in whom there is a diversity of gifts and operations.

(3.) The Lord Jesus Christ. He mentions Him after the Spirit, because he intended to enlarge more on the Person of Christ, as God manifested in the flesh, whom with it, from the time when it was given, even to the end of the world. Signified.] John 12:33. 13:32. 21:19. Acts 11:29. 25:27. In whatever way the angel was employed, doubtless the immediate revelation was made by the Holy Spirit, and not by any creature.—The angel Gabriel, indeed, brought a verbal message to Daniel, containing an extraordinary prophecy: Dan. 9:21—27. but the visions and revelations of this book, were not verbal messages. 9—11. 2:6, 7. 4:1—3. 1 Cor. 2:10—13. 2 Pet. 1:20, 21.

(1) 'A human spirit, sent from heaven on this message, as well answers to the term angel here, as would an intelligence of a superior order. And some, from 22:9. have thought this messenger was the prophet Daniel, sent to give an enlarged view of his own former prophecies.' [But see the original Greek. Ed.] Rev. BRUNN SARRI.

(2) Bare record, Hath (herein) solemnly testified and recorded. Ed.

V. 3. Nothing tends more to fortify the mind against the cavils of infidels and skeptics, or the incursions of unbelief, or to produce patient hope amidst trials and difficulties, than the observation and experience of the fulfilment of the Scriptures, in the events which take place around us: an acquaintance therefore with this revelation, concerning the purposes of God, respecting his church to the end of time, when connected with humility, sobriety, and the obedience of faith, must greatly conduce to the Christian's stability, constancy, hope, peace, and patience. It must exceedingly enlarge his views of the great, and glorious, and stupendous plan of the Lord's providential government of the world, as combined with the redemption of mankind, and direct or encourage his prayers, for those prosperous days of the church, in which all her tribulations shall terminate, and animate his exertions in the glorious cause. It also must greatly conduce to reconcile his mind to those events, which, though distressing in themselves, form a part of one vast design, already in a considerable measure accomplished, and evidently hastening to an entire completion, to the eternal glory of God our Savior, the final victory of his cause over all opposition, and the endless felicity of all his faithful servants. Nay, the very mysteries and difficulties of this book are wonderfully, yet inseparably, united with such grand and interesting discoveries of the glory of God, and the work and worship of heaven, as are peculiarly suited to impress with awe, and to enliven and purify, the soul of the humble and attentive reader, even when he cannot discover the prophetic meaning of the passage. Nor is it any objection to say, that many have read it in another spirit, and got much harm by it; for this is the case with other scriptures; especially with those passages, which may be called 'strong meat,' being peculiarly strengthening to the faith, love, and gratitude of such as can digest them; though not suitable nourishment for babes, and even capable of being turned into a fatal poison, by the vicious affections of a proud and carnal mind. Heb. 5:11—14. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.—The reasons which induce infidels and profane 'mockers, who walk according to their own ungodly lusts,' to deride all attempts towards explaining this prophecy, are obvious; for so much of it has most manifestly been already fulfilled, as must for ever ruin their cause, could the attention of men be drawn to the subject, in proportion to its vast importance; and no part of Scripture more awfully denounces the doom of all impenitent sinners, and all opposers of the Gospel. But pious men could never have been led to object to the study of it, as some have done, in strong, nay, rather contemptuous language; had not the misconduct of many in this respect filled them with prejudice, and formed an association, in their minds, of ideas which have no necessary relation to each other. The Lord grant, that the writer and the readers of the present attempt, to render this mysterious book more intelligible and instructive to Christians in general, may rely on and pray for the participation of the blessing here promised, in every part of their progress through it; that, in faith, humility, reverence, and expectation of great advantage, they may read, hear, meditate on, and keep, the things which are written in it; 'for the time is at hand,' when the further accomplishment of them will render them so plain, that they shall no longer be either neglected or misunderstood.

(3.) Readeth, &c.] 'This refers to the ancient custom when books were scarce, for some one to read to a considerable number of listeners. —Time.] I. e. of their being, or beginning to be fulfilled.' BLOOMF.

V. 4—6. From Him which is, &c.] The original is peculiar, perhaps unexampled, and almost, if not absolutely incapable of an exact tr., the preposition governing the genitive case of the article, and yet all the subsequent words being in the nominative. It is supposed to refer to the name of God revealed to Moses, and with a similar disregard to the ordinary rules of grammar. Ex. 3:14. John 8:54—59.—Thus is here especially meant of the Person of the Father. 8—11. 22:13. Heb. 13:7, 8.—As 'the One true and living God' communicates blessings to sinful man, through the mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the agency of the eternal Spirit; it is almost unavoidable, under such an economy, to speak of the Father in the absolute style of Deity, and of the Son and the Spirit with relation to their assumed characters and offices, though in language evidently implying a participation in all divine perfections, and co-equality with the Father, in their original and essential nature and dignity.—The seven Spirits, &c.] This is generally, and doubtless justly, interpreted of 'the divine Spirit,' with respect to the abundance, sufficiency, and variety of his gifts, graces, and operations; and in relation to 'the seven churches,' with each of which, and all others, the One and self same Spirit dwelt, as the Fountain of life, grace, and peace; being omnipresent and omnipotent, and One with the Father and the Son, 'God over all, blessed for evermore.' 3:1—3. 5:5—7. This manner of expression well accords with the enigmatical or emblematic style of this book; and it is absurd to suppose any created spirits to be joined, in this solemn benediction, with the eternal Father, and Jesus Christ the Son of the Father; and indeed it would fully sanction the worship of created angels. Mat. 23:19, 20. 2 Cor. 13:11—14.—This declaration of the Redeemer's sovereignty over all 'the kings of the earth,' was a proper introduction to the prophecies which were about to be delivered, of the opposition which would be made to his cause, and his final triumph over all his enemies. 11:15—18. 17:9—14. 19:11—16. Psa. 2:7—12. 72:8—11. 89:19—37. Pr. 8:15, 16. Animated with a view of the glory of his beloved Lord, and contrasting it with the vastness of his condescension, and the depth of his self-abasement; the inspired writer broke out in adoring praises, 'to Him who,' great and glorious as He was, 'had loved them,' when defiled with the loathsome stains of guilt and sin, and when deserving the final wrath of God; and whose love had been so immense, that He had 'washed them from their sins in his own blood,' which He had willingly shed on the cross, to make satisfaction to divine justice, and to procure all the blessings of salvation for them. The apostle ascribed unto Christ, personally, the glory and dominion

5 And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first-begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood,

6 And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

7 Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.

8 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.

he had seen dwelling on earth before, and now saw again, in a glorious form. Observe this particular account of Christ, v. 5.

[1.] He is the faithful Witness: from eternity a Witness to all the counsels of God, John 11:18. and in time a faithful Witness to the revealed will of God, who has now spoken to us by his Son; on his testimony we may safely depend, for He is faithful, cannot be deceived, cannot deceive.

[2.] He is the First-begotten or First-born from the dead, or the first Parent and Head of the resurrection, the only one who raised Himself by his own power, and who will, by the same power, raise up his people from their graves to everlasting honor; for He has begotten them again to a lively hope by his resurrection.

[3.] He is the Prince of the kings of the earth; from Him they have their authority; by Him their power is limited, and their wrath restrained; by Him their counsels are overruled, and to Him they are accountable. This is good news to the church, and it is good evidence of the Godhead of Christ, who is King of kings and Lord of lords.

[4.] He is the great Friend of his church and people; one who has done great things for them, and this out of pure, disinterested affection; Washed them from their sins in his own blood. Sins leave a stain on the soul, and, rather than it should not be washed out, Christ was willing to shed his own blood, to purchase pardon and purity for them. He has made them kings and priests to God and his Father. Having justified and sanctified them, He makes them kings to his Father; that is, in his Father's account, with his approbation, and for his glory. He hath made them priests; given them access to God, enabled them to enter into the holiest, and to offer spiritual and acceptable sacrifices; He has given them an unction suitable to this character; and for these high honors and favors they are bound to ascribe to Him dominion and glory for ever.

[5.] He will be the Judge of the world, v. 7. This book, the Revelation, begins and ends with a prediction of the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. We should set ourselves to meditate frequently on the second coming of Christ, and keep it in the eye of our faith and expectation. John speaks as if he saw that day; Behold He cometh. He shall come, to the terror of those who pierced Him and have not repented; and of all who have wounded and crucified Him afresh by their apostasy from Him; He shall come, to the astonishment of the pagan world. For He comes to take vengeance on those who know not God, as well as on those that obey not the Gospel of Christ.

[6.] This account of Christ is ratified and confirmed by Himself, v. 8. Here our Lord Jesus justly challenges the same honor and power that is ascribed to the Father, v. 4.

for ever and ever; Phil. 2:9-11. 2 Pet. 3:17,13. and in thus 'honoring the Son,' he especially 'honored the Father that sent Him,' as all do, who cordially add, Amen. Jn. 5:20-23. Some, indeed, apply the doxology to the Father; but the construction is by no means so obvious and natural. S.

(4.) Asia. 'The Lydian or Proconsular Asia, is said to have contained 500 great cities, at that time. Of these, Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamos, contended for pre-eminence.—Seven.] A number frequently and symbolically used in this book ['where we find at least 7 septenaries']: as 7 Spirits, angels, seals, trumpets, vials, heads, &c. In which passages, for the most part, as in others of Scripture, this number appears to represent a large, complete, yet undefined quantity. Thus, at 1 S. 2:5. it means a large but indefinite number; and God threatens to punish Israel 7 times, i. e. very completely and severely. In Heb. etymology, it signifies fullness and perfection. (Daubuz.) Philo styles it, telesphoros, the completing number; and so Cyprian. It was thus important with the Israelites, because God, having completed his work of creation in 6 days, and added thereto the 7th, a day of rest, commanded them, in memorial thereof, to reckon time by sevens. Through the Orientals, this computation passed to the Greeks and Romans. By the 7 churches of Asia, are implied [also] all the churches of Asia, and, it may be, all the Christian churches, in whatever situation or period of the world. So the most ancient contrs. who lived near the time of the Rev. See Andreas Cæsariensis, Arethas, Victorinus, Cyprian, &c. who profess to follow them. These particular churches being now sunk, all the Christian churches at this day, and to the end of time, inherit the prophetic knowledge revealed, the advice given, the threatenings denounced, and the blessings promised, by their divine Lord? WOODR.—Bl. rejects the Theou of some MSS. but would retain the article, translating, 'the I am,' &c. Seven. [Wolfius fully and ably maintains the interpretation (Scott gives), as does Poole; from whose statements it is evident it was so understood by ancients and moderns, till the middle of the 18th cent. This old and preferable view is also maintained by Dean Woodhouse, and Dr. Pye Smith. Bl. 'In the eastern style, the perfection of any quality is expressed, by the application of the number 7, which came to be regarded as a dignified and sacred number. Thus, this expression conveys to us the representation of the One Divine Person, called in Scripture the Holy Spirit, in his own original and infinite perfections, in the consummate wisdom of his operations, and the gracious munificence of his gifts.' PYE SMITH.

(5.) Seven Spirits. 'No other power can be here intended but that perfect, universal, holy Spirit of God, which proceeds from the Father and the Son, and, in the form of fire, descended upon the apostles at the great day of Pentecost. There is a striking resemblance in "the cloven tongues, like as of fire," to the lights heaving from [the rag, or unsupported wick, laid carelessly in] oil, on the branches of the lamp-bearer, [as was and is still the custom in those countries.]' WOODR.

(6.) Kings. Bl. reads kingdoms, i. e. people, priests, &c. En.

V. 7. The prophecy of this book principally relates to the opposition, which, in one form or other, would be made to the cause of Christ, the temporary success of his enemies, and his final triumph over them all; and therefore, at the very opening of it, the reader's attention is called to that great day, when these scenes will be closed, and when all will see the wisdom and happiness of the friends of Christ, and the madness and misery of his enemies. The intervening space would soon pass away, and it might even then be said, 'He cometh!' Jude 14-16. Then, all nations, being raised from the dead, will be gathered before his tribunal, and 'every eye shall see Him,' in human nature, exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all divine perfections, who once lay prostrate in unknown agony at Gethsemane, and was numbered with malefactors on mount Calvary! Then, they especially, 'who pierced Him,' shall be compelled to witness his glory, as well as to feel the power of his avenging indignation. Zech. 12:9-14. John 19:31-37. Judas the traitor, Caiaphas and the chief priests, 'Herod and his men of war,' Pilate and his soldiers, with all concerned in his condemnation and crucifixion, and those in every age, who, by their infidelity, apostasy, persecutions, heresies, and daring crimes, have 'crucified Him afresh, and put Him to open shame,' shall then with unutterable terror behold Him, preparing to pronounce and execute the righteous sentence of their eternal condemnation. And, as 'all the kindreds of the earth,' through successive generations, hitherto have combined in opposing, despising, perverting, or neglecting Him and his great salvation, with the exception only of a small remnant, so will they at that time 'wail because of Him,' in horror and despair; for neither their numbers nor their power can defend them from his omnipotent vengeance. 6:15-17. The apostle, however, assured of the justice of these awful proceedings, and knowing that then the redemption of all true Christians will be completed, subjoined to this awful declaration, 'Even so, Amen,' 'Thus let all things' implacable 'enemies perish, O LORD.' 22:18-21.—Wail. 18:9. Mat. 11:17. 24:30. Luke 23:27.—The word signifies to cut, or smite; Mat. 21:8. and is used figuratively for wail, or lament.—'They shall smite themselves,' i. e. on their breasts, [face, &c.] SCOTT.—Comp. notes, Gen. 50:10, and 31:27.

(7.) 'It will be a day of lamentation and woe to all the enemies of Christ; but a day of joyful exultation and triumph to all his faithful followers. He will own them as his, and openly acquit them in the judgment. And oh! what sovereign and unmerited grace will then appear! When the saints shall reflect, that the awful sentence now passed on the wicked, was deserved by themselves as richly as by the vilest of them; when they think on that love which made the difference, and on that precious blood which washed them from their sins, and delivered them from this wrath; what transports of joy, love, and gratitude will fill their souls! Bossuet pertinently observes: "In the gospel of John, we read the life of Christ on earth; and we there see a Man conversing with men, humble, weak, and suffering: we behold a sacrifice ready to be offered by One appointed to sorrows and death; but in the book of Revelation by John, we have the Gospel of Christ, now raised from the dead. He speaks and acts as having conquered the grave, and triumphed over death and hell, and so having entered into the place of his glory, angels, principalities, and powers being made subject to Him; and exercising the supreme, universal power He has received from the Father, to protect his church, and ensure the happiness of his faithful servants to the end." W. JONES.

(7.) 'The Jews, descendants of the tribes of the holy land, continuing their fathers' rejection of Christ, seem more particularly described here.' WOODR.—'Here is prefixed the great moral, which the whole book is designed to illustrate; namely, that though there should be great opposition made against the kingdom of Christ, it should ultimately and illustriously triumph. Comp. 22:20.' WOODR.

V. 8. As the Lord Jesus was evidently spoken of in the preceding v. it is obvious to conclude, that 'the Lord,' who speaks in this, is the same Person; nor can any sufficient reason be assigned, why it should be understood of 'the Father' personally; except that men are reluctant 'to honor the Son, even as they' ought to 'honor the Father that sent Him.' The whole vision related to Christ, from whom immediately the revelation was given; 1, 2. most of the expressions here used, or others equivalent to them, are afterwards spoken by Him, and concerning Himself, and the construction and arrangement of this passage, and the context, would be very intricate, if we were to suppose the Father to be the Speaker.—The Lord Jesus, therefore, here declared, 'that He is the Alpha and the Omega,' which are the names of the first and the last letters in the Greek alphabet, the language in which the apostle wrote. This implies, that He is the First Cause and the Last End, the Author and Finisher of all things, in creation, providence, and redemption; 'the Beginning and the Ending,' the Source of existence, of life, of holiness, and of felicity, and the Completion of them, in every sense, and in all respects.—'Who is, and who was, and who is to come,' as One with the eternal Father; 4-6. 'the Almighty,' the omnipotent and sovereign Ruler of all worlds, by and 'for whom all things were made, and by whom all things consist.'—No words can more strongly express eternal power and Godhead, than these do. 9-11. 22:13. The Almighty. 'No pantokrator.' 4:8. 11:17. 15:3. 16:14. 19:6. 21:22. 2 Cor. 6:18. 'He who has dominion over all.' (Note, Eph. 1:15-23.) Se.

(8.) The beginning and the ending. Bl. rejects the three Gr. words thus tr., also the article before 'Lord.'—Which is, &c. 'Hereby is defined the sense in which the Gr. word [Kurios] Lord is used, when employed to represent the Heb. name Jehovah. Other explanatory terms are added by the writer, under the divine guidance, thus fully defining the meaning of the word, and not leaving it under any uncertainty'

9 I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ.

10 I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, 11 Saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea.

12 And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks.

V. 9—20. Here is the glorious vision the apostle had of the Lord Jesus Christ, when He came to deliver him this revelation.

I. The account of the person favored with this vision. He describes himself,

1. By his present state and condition, v. 9. He was, at this time, as the rest of true Christians were, a persecuted man, banished, and perhaps imprisoned, for his adherence to Christ. He was their brother, though an apostle; he seems to value himself on his relation to the church, rather than his authority in it. By this account he gives of his present state, he acknowledges his engagements to sympathize with them, and to endeavor to give them counsel and comfort; and bespeaks their more careful attention to what he had to say to them from Christ their common Lord.

2. By the place where he was when favored with this vision,—in the isle Patmos; he does not say who banished him thither; it becomes Christians to speak sparingly and modestly of their own sufferings. Patmos is one of the Cyclades, about 35 miles in compass; but under this confinement it was the apostle's comfort that he did not suffer as an evil-doer, but that it was for the testimony of Jesus, for bearing witness to Christ as the Immanuel, the Savior. This was a cause worth suffering for; and the Spirit of glory and of God rested on this persecuted apostle.

3. The day and time in which he had this vision,—the Lord's day; the day Christ had set apart for Himself, as the Eucharrist is called the Lord's Supper. Surely this can be no other than the Christian Sabbath; the first day of the week, to be observed in remembrance of the resurrection of Christ. Let us who call Him our Lord, honor Him on his own day,—the day which the Lord hath made, and in which we ought to rejoice.

4. The frame his soul was in at this time; he was in the Spirit; not only when he received the vision, but before he received it; he was in a serious, heavenly, spiritual frame, under the blessed, gracious influences of the Spirit of God. God usually prepares the souls of his people for uncommon manifestations of Himself, by the quickening, sanctifying influences of his good Spirit. Those who would enjoy communion with God on the Lord's day, must endeavor to abstract their thoughts and affections from flesh and ty.' TILLOCH.—'The sense is very applicable to God, the Father, as most recent contrs. interpret (to which purpose similar expressions are cited from the classical and rabbinical writers); but the context, (see v. 7, 17, 18. and 2:8.) plainly shows, that it is applied to God the Son, who, indeed, applies those titles to Himself, 21:6. 22:13. which fully establishes the Deity of Christ.'

BLOOMER.
 V. 9—11. It is recorded, that he [the apostle] was confined to the mines, and compelled to labor in them, [a most miserable condition, note, Is. end.] notwithstanding the infirmities of his extreme old age.—While in this situation, 'he was in the Spirit,' or brought under the immediate impulse of the Spirit of prophecy, as Ezekiel, Daniel, and others had been, when favored with visions of the Almighty. (Note, 4:1—3.) This [I was in the Spirit, &c.] is conclusive proof, that the first day was set apart, and kept holy, by the primitive Christians, in commemoration of that great event [the resurrection of Christ], for on what other account could it have been thus mentioned? Ju. 20:19—23. Acts 10:7—12.—They [Alpha and Omega, &c.] (8) must here be understood of Christ, and this is an additional reason for interpreting the others of Him; and the immediate recurrence of them, in this connexion, gives energy to the arguments drawn from them. But if any should still be disposed to understand the foregoing passage of the Father; they cannot but admit, that Christ and the Father are One; for otherwise, how can it be conceived that Christ would have used the same words of Himself, which had just before been spoken by the Father, as descriptive of his eternal Godhead? So that, on either interpretation, they are conclusive, in respect to the Deity of Christ.—The voice then ordered John to write what he saw, in a book, and send it to the seven churches in Asia, which... seems to confirm the ancient tradition of John's having resided and labored at Ephesus, and in that vicinity, for a considerable time before his banishment to Patmos.—(10) The Lord's day. Kurialē is an adjective from Kurios, Lord. 1 Cor. 11:20.—The first day of the week is 'the Lord's day,' as the Eucharist is 'the Lord's supper,' and to be distinguished from other days, as that from other meals.

SCOTT.

 (10.) 'As to the change of the Sabbath from the 7th to the 1st day of the week; the prophet Isaiah, predicting the mission of Christ on earth, as a rod from the stem of Jesse, Is. 11. says, "his rest shall be glorious;" in the Heb. "His Sabbath shall be glorious;" Christ then should have a special, and a glorious Sabbath. The psalmist, predicting the rejection of Christ, and his yet becoming the Head of the corner, as He did, indeed, by his resurrection from the dead, says, "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will be glad and rejoice in it." Ps. 113. These prophecies, it is thought, give the change of the Sabbath from the 7th day of the week, as kept by the Jews, to the first day, to be kept by Christians. Accordingly, our Lord made special visits to his disciples, after his resurrection, on the 1st day of the week. See Ju. 20:19—23. where the 1st day of the week is repeatedly noted as the time of the gracious visits of Christ to his disciples, as well as the day of their convocations for his worship. Paul, at Troas, waited some time for the arrival of the 1st day of the week, when Christians would convene, that he might preach to them. And to the Corinthians, Paul gave directions for their performance of their charities and pious donations on that holy day. These, together with the testimony in our text, of John's being in the Spirit on this day, and having on this day his Revelation, afford ample testimony to the divinity of the change of the Sabbath from the 7th to the 1st day of the week. [The day's being called the Lord's day, seems the strongest argument.] The example of the inspired apostles is equal to a command of God. And when we add to these arguments, the considerations that the day of Pentecost was on the day following the Jewish 7th day Sabbath, or was on the 1st day of the week, answering to the Christian Sabbath; as was also the ancient jubilee; and the arguments in favor of this change of the Sabbath are most complete. On this day was changed the dispensation of the covenant of grace, from the Mosaic to the Christian; when the Holy Ghost came like a rushing, mighty wind, and 3,000 were converted to Christ. And this 1st day of the week gives the true antitype of the ancient jubilee trumpet, proclaiming liberty and salvation! On this holy day, John was in the Spirit. If Christians now better imitated him in this, they would, no doubt, have more and richer interviews with heaven.'

 V. 12—20. When the apostle had distinctly heard the words which have been considered, he turned to see from whom the voice proceeded; and he then had a vision of 'seven golden candlesticks,' in allusion to the golden candlestick with seven branches, which was made for the tabernacle, (Notes, Ex. 25:31—40. Zech. 4:2, 3, 11—14.) and in the midst of them, as presiding over and taking care of them, he 'saw One like unto the Son of man.' The apostle had been well acquainted with Jesus, when He was on earth, 'a Man of sorrows,' (Note, Ju. 13:18—30.) and honored as his peculiar friend; but, while he perceived Him in human form, and with some resemblance of his former appearance, he saw Him in such resplendent glory, that He seemed quite another person. (13) Clothed, &c.] Perhaps representing his perfect mediatorial righteousness and royal priesthood. (14) His hairs, &c.] May signify his majesty, purity, and eternity. Dan. 7:9—14. His eyes, &c.] May represent his omniscient acquaintance with the secrets of all hearts, and with the most distant events. 2:18, 19. 19:11—16. Heb. 4:12, 13. (15) His feet, &c.] May denote the stability of his appointments, and the transcendent excellency of all his proceedings. (M. R. d.) Fine brass.] Chalkolibanō. 2:18. It is not agreed what kind of brass, or mixed metal, formed principally of copper, was meant. His voice, &c.] May represent the energy of his Word, to astonish and terrify, or its invincible efficacy to convert or destroy, as He sees good. Ez. 1:15—25. 43:1—5. Heb. 4:12, 13.  (12.) Candlestick.] The lamp-stand (for candles were not then used), lamp-stand, or, as it is improperly tr. candlestick, was an ancient and universal symbol of a wife; and ephraim, as bodies, are said to be married to Christ, while the Church universal is spoken of as the Lamb's wife. See Wemyss' Symbol. Dict. So Artemidorus also says, that the light of the lamp represents the master of the house because he overlooks it; stars also symbolized inferior princes or governors, ruling under a supreme. Diet. in Suppl., under the word 'candlestick,'] which bears aloft the spiritual light of divine knowledge, for the information and direction of the world, note, v. 4. The Lord Jesus has Himself supplied this light, and is, therefore, fitly represented as in the midst of these lamp-bearers, this his universal Church. So Frenæus.

fleshly things, and be wholly taken up with things of a spiritual nature.

II. The apostle heard an alarm, given as with the sound of a trumpet, and then he heard a voice, the voice of Christ applying to Himself the character before given, the First and the Last, and commanding the apostle to commit to writing the things now to be revealed to him, and to send it immediately to the seven Asian churches, whose names are mentioned. Thus our Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, gave the apostle notice of his glorious appearance, as with the sound of a trumpet.

III. We have now an account of what he saw; he turned to see the voice, whose it was, and whence it came; and then a wonderful scene of vision opened to him.

1. He saw a representation of the church, under the emblem of seven golden candlesticks, as it is explained in the last v. of the ch. The churches are compared to candlesticks, because they hold forth the light of the Gospel to advantage; they are golden candlesticks, for they should be precious and pure, comparable to fine gold; not only the ministers, but the members of the churches ought to be such; their light should so shine before men, as to engage others to give glory to God.

2. He saw a representation of the Lord Jesus Christ in the midst of the golden candlesticks; for He has promised to be with his churches always to the end of the world, filling them with light, and life, and love, for He is the very animating, informing Soul of the church. And here observe,

(1.) The glorious form in which Christ appeared in several particulars. [1.] He was clothed with a garment down to the foot; a princely and priestly robe, denoting righteousness and honor. [2.] He was girt about with a golden girdle; the breastplate of the High Priest, on which the names of his people are engraven; He was ready girt to do all the work of a Redeemer. [3.] His head and hairs were white like wool or snow; He was the Ancient of days; his hoary head was no sign of decay, but it was indeed a crown of glory. [4.] His eyes were as the flame of fire, piercing and penetrating into the very hearts and reins of men, scattering terrors among his adversaries. [5.] His feet were like unto fine burning brass; strong and steadfast, supporting his own interest, subduing his enemies, and treading them to powder. [6.] His voice was as the sound of many waters; of many rivers falling in together. He can and will make Himself heard to those who are afar off, as well as to those who are near. His Gospel is a profuent and mighty stream, fed by the upper springs of infinite wisdom and knowledge. [7.] He had in his right hand seven stars; the ministers of the seven churches, who are under his direction, have all their light and influence from Him, and are secured and preserved by Him. [8.] Out of his mouth went a two-edged sword; his Word, which both wounds and heals, strikes at sins on the right hand and on the left. [9.] His countenance was as the sun shining; its strength too bright and dazzling for mortal eyes to behold.

(2.) The impression this appearance of Christ made on the apostle, v. 17. He fell at the feet of Christ as dead; overpowered with the greatness of the lustre and glory in which Christ appeared, though he had been so familiar with Him before. How well is it for us, that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, whose terrors shall not make us afraid. For none can see the face of God, and live.

(3.) The condescending goodness of the Lord Jesus to his disciple, v. 17. He laid his hand upon him; raised him up, did not plead against him with his great power, but put strength into him, and spake kind words to him,—words of comfort and encouragement; Fear not:—words of instruction; telling him particularly who He was, that thus appeared to him. And here He acquaints him, [1.] With his divine nature; the First and the Last. [2.] With his former sufferings; I was dead; the very same that his disciples saw on the cross dying for the sins of men. [3.] With his resurrection and life; I live, and am alive for evermore; have conquered death, and opened the grave, and am Partaker of an endless life. [4.] With his office and authority; I have the keys of hell and of death; a sovereign dominion in and over the invisible world. [5.] With his will and pleasure; that John should write both the things he had seen, and the things that are, and that should be hereafter. [6.] With the meaning of the seven stars, that they are the ministers of the churches; and of the seven candlesticks, that they are the seven churches, to whom Christ would now send, by him, particular and proper messages.

(13.) Girdle.] 'The priests, for coolness and decency, were required to gird higher than others, and the girdles crossed the breast, also, and fell to the feet.' DODDR.—'From the writer of this vision having noted this likeness to the Son of man, we are led to conclude, that he was one of the disciples who had seen the Lord in his human appearance. And what John could this be, at so late a period as when this Revelation was written, but John the apostle and evangelist?' Woodhouse. But, says Bl., 'though most recent commentators, arguing from the absence of the article, render, "a Son of man;" i. e. human being, yet its absence will not prove this to be the sense; and though Woodhouse adopts this interpretation, and ingeniously accounts for the expression being used of Christ; yet there is no reason to abandon the opinion of the ancient and most modern comtrs. that it means the Son of man. See on Heb. 1:2.'

(14.) White.] 'To be understood of splendor, not of age.' BL. (15.) 'Whether chalkolibanos means smelting brass, (from chalcos [brass] and clibanos [a furnace], or chalcos, and Libanus, mt. Lebanon,) or the oreichalcos (a sort of fine brass more valuable than gold), as Hesiod describes Hercules' feet, is not agreed. The expression happily designates irresistible power, as the voice like many waters, is a most noble image of Christ's grandeur and majesty.' Id.

(16.) In his right hand.] 'On his right hand, rather; the allusion is to the custom of wearing many rings on the fingers, each studded with diamonds, or other sparkling gems' Bl. The Ed. of the Pict. Bib. asserts, that these rings were usually worn on the wrist; if so, the brilliants would be larger, and the simile more apposite. Ed.

(17.) Right hand.] 'This, in Scripture, bestows protection, and conveys spiritual gifts. Ps. 18:35. 20:6. Ac. 8:18. The touch felt palpably by the apostle, agrees with that part of holy writ which represents our Lord's body an object of feeling after his resurrection. The passage is sublime. Mahomet has imitated it, but with a vicious excess.' WOODH.—'The minute accuracy, simplicity, and sublimity of this stupendous representation, must have been drawn from the life; no human fancy could furnish such details.'

(18.) Hell.] From helan, to cover, 'the word helle, to cover, is still used in W. England. The Gr. hades means here, the unseen world.' DODDR.—Hell.] 'Hades, the region of dead.' Stuart. Comp. the ents in the Concordance, (forming part of the Supplement to the Comp. Comrs.) under the words gates of death; and note and cut, Is. 22:22. 'Power over death and the dead, to unlock the gates of Hades, and make my disciples triumph over it, by giving them both life and salvation.' Bl. 'I have entered the region of Hades, (Ac. 2:17, 18.) and am come forth living; yea, in possession of everlasting life.' Stuart. Ed.

(19.) Write therefore.] So it should be tr.; and it divides the subject. See Woodh. Ed.—'The Apoealypse has a number of grand divisions, as will be seen, each in its place. Here is one of interest. (1.) "The things which thou hast seen," on this introduction of the book, in ch. 1. (2.) "The things which are" consist of the 7 epistles to the 7 churches, which follow in chs. 2 and 3. (3.) "The things which shall be hereafter;" all the events then future, which shall be found contained in the book. The great events of salvation to the church, and of destruction to her enemies, from that time to the end of the world. These are subdivided; the first 6 seals give a course of judgments on Pagan Rome, for the last quarter of the 1st cent. till about the close of the 1st quarter of the 4th; the first 4 of the trumpets then commence a following course of judgments on the Christian empire after the revolution under Constantine, from paganism; fulfilled in the northern invasions of the empire, till the dethroning of its last emperor, Momylus;—the 1st of the 3 woe-trumpets then sounded in the rise of Mohammedism; the 2d in the rise of the grand supporter of it, the Turkish empire; the 3d will destroy Antichrist;—and the vials of the 7 last plagues, in the 2d division, will occupy the space between the 2d and 3d woe-trumpets, the 7th of which and the 3d woe-trumpet will be the same.' E. SMITH.

(20.) Mystery.] 'Musterion: in Scripture language it generally means hidden and recondite knowledge, accessible only by divine revelation. But here, as in ch. 17; it is used to signify the meaning concealed under figurative resemblances. . . In Mal. 2:7. the priest of the Lord is styled the angel or messenger of the Lord. And the chief minister of the Jewish Synagogue was styled Sheliach Zibbor, the angel of the synagogue or congregation. In conformity with this, the presidents (or bishops, as they were afterwards called) of the ancient Christian church, were so denominated. The words apostolos and kēruax, principally used in the N. T., have a similar meaning. They imply, that such persons act by a delegated authority from the Lord Christ, as his messengers or ambassadors; who are therefore fitly represented under the emblem of stars, placed in his hand, under his direction, being the lights supplied by Him to illumine and instruct the churches, which are represented as the candlesticks or lamp-bearers, on which the sacred light or doctrine is placed, and held forth to the world.' Woodh.—Angels.] 'Aggeloi: an allusion to the Jewish economy, [comp. 'Guide,' pt. iii.] wherein the priests or rulers of the synagogues were styled by this name, as bringing the commands of God to the people, and conveying their prayers to God. Abp. Newcome, however, explains aggetoi as denoting, either the ministering spirits employed in the invisible government of these churches; or their visible governors who presided over them.' BLOOMF.

I. The inscription; to the church of Ephesus, a famous church planted by Paul, Acts

PRACT. OBS. The revelations of God, by Jesus Christ, were intended to inform his servants about as much of his designs, respecting them and others, through the short period of time, and to the countless ages of eternity, as it was useful and useful for them to know; . . . and the times may speedily arrive, when the dispensations of Providence will fully illustrate the meaning of obscure prophecies, to the most unlearned readers.—The 'grace and peace,' which come from the everlasting and unchangeable love of the Father, by the communion of the omnipresent Spirit, who dwells in all believers; and through 'Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness, the First-born from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth;' belong to all those, and to those only, whom He had 'washed from their sins, in his own blood;' nor can they sufficiently admire 'his love which passeth knowledge,' or rejoice in the dignity and felicity, to which He has advanced them; or devote themselves too much to the sacred duties of their royal priesthood; or ascribe too great honor to their divine Redeemer, 'to whom be glory and dominion for ever and ever.' Amen. This will soon appear: for, 'behold He cometh in the clouds, and every eye' of man, however averse to the sight, 'shall see Him' placed on the dread tribunal, from which there can be no appeal. And they, who will not believe Him to be the great I AM, and who refuse to honor Him as co-equal with the Father, will discover their awful mistake, when made to feel the weight of his anger, and the power of that eternal vengeance, which they now despise.—A peaceful conscience, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, will enable NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1. Many expositors have imagined, that these epistles, to the seven churches, were mystical prophecies of seven distinct periods, into which the whole term, from the apostle's days to the end of the world, would be divided. But there is no proof from Scripture, that seven such periods, and no more, were to be expected, in the state of the church; unless the epistles themselves be admitted as proofs of it: nor are there any distinct traces in ecclesiastical history, in respect of such as are supposed to be already past; though a lively imagination, and a prompt invention, may advance plausible things on the subject. It cannot be conceived, if the concluding part of this book itself be recollected, that the last period of the church will be worse than any that has gone before, as the Laodicean church was far more corrupt than any of the rest. (Notes, 20:1—10.) Nor can it be true in fact, that a more flourishing period succeeded that of the church in the apostle's days, or that immediately subsequent to their death; yet the state of the church of Smyrna was far purer and more excellent, than that of Ephesus, nay, perhaps, than that of Philadelphia, which on this hypothesis must accord to the Millennium. So that there seems no ground at all for this sentiment, though it has been sanctioned by many respectable names.

An opinion has been held by some commentators of note, which may be given in the words of Vitrina: "That under this emblematical representation of the seven churches of Asia, the Holy Spirit has delineated seven different states of the Christian church, which would appear in succession, extending to the coming of our Lord, and the consummation of all things. That this is given in descriptions taken from the names, states, and conditions of these churches, so that they might behold themselves, and learn both their good qualities and their defects, and what admonitions and exhortations were suitable for them." Vitrina has given a summary of the arguments which may be alleged in favor of this interpretation. Some of them are ingenious, but they are not now considered sufficient to support such a theory. Gill is one of the principal of the English commentators who adopt this view, that "they are prophetic of the churches of Christ, in the several periods of time until He appears again." He applies them as follows, finding also some allusion in the name of each, to the age described. Ephesus represents the church in the apostolic age, and under the abatement of the fervency of the love of the primitive Christians towards the close of that state. Smyrna represents the state under the persecutions of the Roman emperors, expressing the bitter afflictions and persecutions of that interval. Pergamos, the church from the time of Constantine, rising up to great riches and honor, introducing the popes and their haughty actions and corruptions. Thyatira takes in the darkest and most superstitious times, to the Reformation. Sardis, the state from the Reformation to the reign of Christ, being emblematical of the reformed churches. Philadelphia, the period in which will be the spiritual reign of Christ. Laodicea, from the end of the spiritual reign of Christ till his coming to judge the quick and dead, when there will be formality, spiritual sloth, and security. Girdlestone makes another division as to the eras signified, by causing them to end previously to the millennial period.

HENRY, abr.

The churches, here addressed, were in such different states, in respect of purity of doctrine, and 'the power of godliness;' that the words of Christ to them will always be suitable to the case of other churches and professors of Christianity, in all ages and places, to the end of the world: and some of them contain the proper message or instruction to those of

19. and after that watered and governed by John, who had his residence very much there. We can hardly think Timothy was the angel or sole pastor and bishop of this church at this time; that he, who was of a very excellent spirit, should become so remiss as to deserve the rebukes given to the ministry of this church. Observe,

From whom this epistle to Ephesus was sent; here we have one of those titles given to Christ, in his appearance to John, in ch. 1: 13, 16. It consists of two parts:

1. He that holdeth the stars in his right hand. The ministers of Christ are under his special care and protection. It is the honor of God, that He knows the number of the stars, and calls them by their names; and the honor of the Lord Jesus Christ, that the ministers of the Gospel, who are greater blessings to the church than the stars are to the world, are in his hand; He directs all their motions, disposes of them into their several orbs, fills them with light and influence, supports them, or else they would soon be falling stars.

2. He walketh in the midst of the golden candlesticks. This speaks his relation to his churches, as the other his relation to his ministers. Christ is in an intimate manner present and conversant with his churches; though in heaven, He walks in the midst of his churches on earth, observing what is amiss in them, and what it is that they want; this is a great encouragement to those who have the care of the churches,—that the Lord Jesus has graven them on the palms of his hands.

II. The contents of the epistle, in which, as in most of those that follow, we have,

1. The commendation Christ gave this church, ministers and members.

(1.) For their diligence in duty, v. 2. I ble the afflicted Christian to be more joyful in communion with God, when immured in a prison, than ungodly men can be in the most prosperous circumstances. If believers are confined, on the Lord's holy day, from public ordinances and the communion of saints, by necessity and not by choice, they may expect great comfort in meditation and secret duties, from the influences of the Spirit; and by hearing the voice and contemplating the glory of their beloved Savior, of whose gracious visits no confinement or circumstances can deprive them. The name itself shows how this sacred day should be observed: surely 'the Lord's day' should be wholly devoted to the Lord; and none of its hours employed in a secular, sensual, or dissipated manner.—We may well be satisfied to walk by faith, during our continuance here on earth; for could we now see the Lord 'as He is,' the displays of his glory, even as dwelling in human nature, would overwhelm us: Is. 6:1—7. John 12: 37—41. and we must be totally changed in body and soul, before we can hear the effulgency of his majesty, and find unalloyed happiness in that beatific vision. Let us then at present hearken to his voice, lean on his arm, and receive the encouragements of his love to obviate our fears: for what can He, 'the First and the Last,' even the eternal Son of the Father, withhold from those, for whom He became incarnate, that He might die for their sins; and what can be too hard for Him, who has 'the keys of death and hell,' and lives as our almighty Friend for evermore? John 14:18—20. Acts 7:51—54. Rom. 5:6—10. 8:32—39. Col. 3: 1—4.

one character, and some to those of another, in all the variety which they [possess].—The Lord Jesus Himself, appearing in vision to John, directed him what to write to each of these seven churches: so that, in fact, they may be considered as 'the epistles of Jesus Christ;' even as those which the apostle wrote by an amanuensis, are called properly 'the epistles of Paul.'—Each of these was addressed to 'the angel of the church,' the stated messenger or ambassador of Christ among them. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. It is more natural to understand this of one presiding minister, than of several elders or pastors spoken of collectively, because one in office; and thus it countenances the opinion, which has been advanced, concerning the introduction of a moderate kind of episcopacy in the primitive church, even in the days of the apostles. Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22, 24, 25. Tit. 1:5—9. It is also undeniable, that there were several elders, or pastors, in the church at Ephesus, before this time; so that some ruler, or minister, presiding over the other pastors, must be intended.—There is no proof that Timothy ever staidly resided there: Acts 20:1—6. Pref. to 1 Tim. nearly 30 years seem to have elapsed, since 2 Tim. was written; various changes had doubtless taken place in that time: and it was longer since Paul wrote to the Ephesians. John himself is also recorded to have abode at Ephesus, and to have superintended that and the neighboring churches for several years. [It has been remarked, that the churches are mentioned in the order in which a person journeying from Ephesus might come to them, respectively.] Ephesus was the capital of the province called Asia; Acts 19:8—12. and the apostle was directed to write the first epistle to the church in that city, as a message from 'Him that holdeth the 7 stars in his right hand, and walketh amidst the 7 golden candlesticks.' 1:12—20. This intimated the absolute authority of Christ over his ministers, with their entire dependence on Him; and his constant, though invisible presence with his churches, in which He had fixed the light of his Word and ordinances; Mat. 28:19, 20. his attention to their whole conduct; his readiness to help and bless them, whilst they made a proper use of their light; and his power and purpose to remove it, if provoked by their perversion or neglect of it.—They shine by his light, and are absolutely under his control, and at his disposal. [But see note, 1 Pet. 5:2.]

(1.) Angel. 'Or presiding officer. That there was one pastor who presided in each of these churches, is indeed evident from the expression here used; but that he was a diocesan bishop, or had several congregations of Christians under his care, can by no means be proved. Nor is there the least hint of it, that I know of, in any of these epistles. Many have shown, from ancient Jewish writings, that there was an officer of the synagogue who had the name of angel. See Vitr. And Lightf. adds, that, from his overlooking the reader of the law, he was called thouz, or episcopus. Comp. Mal. 2:7. [Note, 1 Pet. 5:2.] Doddr.—'We learn in church history, that in the first Christian ages, contiguous churches were led to form themselves into a kind of consociation, for their mutual benefit; each consociation having a standing moderator; which moderator might be the person denoted by the angel of the church. Whether this were the case, or whether this angel means the eldership of that church, meaning to include all its officers, is not essential. . . . This order [?] of ministers thus arose, (see Mosheim.) only by human discretion and custom, and were only first among equals in office.' Rev. Ethan Smith.—There is not the slightest proof, however, that even this was done in the apostles' times.

V. 2—5. There is some difficulty in conceiving, how the persevering diligence and patience of this church, could consist with that abatement hor, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil: and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars:

3 And has borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast labored, and hast not fainted.

4 Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love.

5 Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen; and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

6 But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate.

7 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God.

know thy works and thy labor. This may more immediately relate to the ministry of this church. Those that are stars in Christ's hand, need be always in motion, dispensing light to all about them. Christ keeps an account of every day's work, and every hour's work, his servants do for Him, and their labor shall not be in vain in the Lord.

(2.) For their patience in suffering, v. 2. Thy labor and thy patience. It is not enough that we be diligent, but we must be patient, and endure hardness as good soldiers of Christ. Ministers must exercise great pain love, with which it is charged. But observation and experience combine to prove, that in many instances, while the affections are lively and fervent, men engage zealously in services, and form habits of exertion, self-denial, patience, and courageous disregard to opposition and reproach; in which, as to the outward conduct at least, they persevere, from various motives, and often conscientiously; though it is lamentably true, and they know it, that their hearts are not so thoroughly engaged in what they do, as they once were. Many are well aware, that this is their case: they have zeal enough to retain them in their former course of active service, which is become habitual, and in some circles creditable: but, had they not been more 'servant in spirit, serving the Lord,' in former days, those habits would never have been formed, those services had never been engaged in. Perhaps most Christians are too apt to take encouragement from such diligence, and to silence the remonstrances of their consciences by it: but it is plain, that our Savior and Judge considers this as a very criminal state of heart and conduct. (2) Bear. To bear or carry a burden; to sustain what is wearisome. Primarily, it relates to the body; and figuratively, to the mind; the Ephesians could carry the cross though heavy; but they could not endure wicked persons, who were a burden to them, which they resolutely threw off.

(2.) I know. Christ knows the thoughts, the secret springs of action, and the whole moral character of men. The knowledge thus asserted in the solemn message to each of the churches, is clearly shown to include the most perfect acquaintance with the sincerity or hypocrisy of individuals, and with all the complication of human feelings and actions. This is real omniscience, and is again asserted in the strongest and plainest terms, v. 23. and we find in v. 6. and elsewhere, the Lord Jesus purifying, correcting, and rewarding the professors of religion, in pursuance of his perfect knowledge of their hearts and characters. The very nature of the acts specified, implies a complete dominion over the arrangements of Providence in the present life, and its fullest powers in reference to the future state. Pye Smith.—Canst not bear. 'Limborch has sufficiently shown the absurdity of opposing such a text as this to the great Christian doctrine of toleration, which some have madly endeavored to prejudice, by trifling inferences from such detached and perverted clauses, in opposition to the whole tenor of the N. T. But the pretending to enforce such ecclesiastical censures, as the laws of Christ do indeed in some cases require, with those secular terrors which the magistrate, by virtue of his office, is to inflict on immoralities prejudicial to society, has been the destruction of Christian discipline in popish countries universally, and generally in all Protestant establishments too.' Doddr.—Tried. 'I. e. by the Word of God; for these impostors, as all false teachers do, pretended they were sent of God.'

Rev. E. SMITH.

(4.) First love. By some, this former love is understood, of that of God, by others, of the love of man. But the expression comprehends both, for neither can be complete without the other. The love of God is seen and proved by keeping the commandments, which are fulfilled only by charity. In the next v. the Ephesians are called to repentance, and no Christian can be without it. There must be bearing patience, to endure injuries; and waiting patience, that, when they have done the will of God, they may receive the promise. We shall meet with such difficulties in our way and work, as require patience to go on and finish well.

(3.) For their zeal against what was evil, v. 2. Thou canst not bear them that are evil. This their zeal was the more to be commended, because it was according to knowledge; true zeal proceeds with discretion; none should be cast off till they are tried. Some were risen up in this church, that pretended to be not ordinary ministers, but apostles; their pretensions had been examined, and found to be vain and false.

2. The rebuke given to this church, v. 4. Those that have much good in them, may have something much amiss in them; and our Lord Jesus, as an impartial Master and Judge, notices both; though He first observes what is good, and is most ready to mention that, yet He also observes what is amiss, and will faithfully reprove them for it. The sin Christ charged this church with, is, their decay and declension in holy love and zeal. The first affections of men toward Christ, and holiness, and heaven, are usually lively and warm. These will abate, if great care be not taken to preserve them in constant exercise. Christ is grieved and displeased with his people, when this is the case, and will one way or other make them sensible He takes it ill.

3. The advice and counsel given them from Christ, v. 5. (1.) They must remember whence they are fallen, and consider how much peace, strength, purity, and pleasure they have lost, by leaving their first love. (2.) They must repent; must be inwardly grieved and ashamed for their sinful declining; must humbly confess it in the sight of God, and judge and condemn themselves for it. (3.) They must return and do their first works; must revive and recover their first zeal, tenderness, and seriousness, pray as earnestly, and watch as diligently, as they did when they first set out in the ways of God.

Now this advice is urged, [1.] By a severe threatening, if it should be neglected; I will come unto thee quickly, and remove thy candlestick out of its place. If the presence of Christ's grace and Spirit be slighted, we may expect the presence of his displeasure. [2.] By an encouraging mention made of what was yet good among them, v. 6. The Nicolaitans were a loose sect, who sheltered themselves under the name of Christianity; they held hateful doctrines, and were guilty of hateful deeds, hateful to Christ, and to all true Christians. Indifference between truth and error, good and evil, may be called charity and mekness, but it is not pleasing unto Christ. Our Savior subjoins this kind commendation to his severe threatening, to make the advice more effectual.

III. The conclusion of this epistle, in which, as in those that follow, we have,

1. A call to attention, v. 7.

Observe, What is written in the Scriptures, is spoken by the Spirit of God. What is said to one church, concerns all, in every place and age. We can never employ our faculty of hearing better, than in hearkening to the Word of God; and they who will not hear the call of God now, will wish at length they had never had a capacity of hearing anything at all.

2. A promise of great mercy to those who overcome. The Christian life is a warfare against [selfishness,] sin, satan, the world, and the flesh. It is not enough that we engage in it, but we must pursue it to the end; never yield, but fight till we gain the victory, as all persevering Christians shall do; and the warfare and victory shall have a glorious triumph and reward, even that confirmation in holiness that Adam would have had, if he had gone well through the course of his trial; then he would have eaten of the tree of life, which was in the midst of paradise; not the earthly, but the heavenly, ch. 22:1, 2.

penitance, and the performance of the first or former works of charity.' [But recur to Scott, above. Ed.]

(5.) Candlestick removed. The Ephesian church, so defective in love and good works, shall cease to be a Christian church of eminence, giving light and example to the surrounding regions. By Ignatius' testimony, (Epist. ad Eph. Sect 9.) given 10 or 20 years after, and just before his martyrdom, we learn, that this severe threatening produced a good effect, for when others were corrupting, this flourished in a pure faith and practice. She continued for some ages in high account among the churches of Christendom, but gradually sunk into the common corruption.

Id. V. 6, 7. Nicolaitans. This was a sect of avowed and most abominable Antinomians. 14—16. 2 Tim. 2:14—18. 3:1—9. (7) He that hath an ear. This, added to every epistle, is a most emphatical call to ministers and Christians, in every age, carefully and diligently to study these epistles to the churches; as replete with most important instruction, not only to those immediately addressed, but to all others, 'even to the end of the world.' (M. R. a.) [and so Guise.] Eat of the Tree of Life.—This is a figurative expression, taken from the account of the garden of Eden, Gen. 2:8, 9. 3:22—24. and denoting the pure, satisfactory, and eternal joys of heaven; and the anticipation of them in this world, by faith, communion with Christ, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit. 22:2—5. Ez. 47:12. Every victory over sharp temptation would be graciously rewarded with foretastes of this fruit; [for men are like healthy or poisonous fruit-bearing plants, and trials are like medicines or poisons, according as they are eaten, i. e. received as nourishment into the spiritual body;] and the final victory, with the eternal fruition of the happiness intended by it, in heaven itself, and in the presence and love of God. 10, 11, 17, 26—28. 3:4—6, 12, 13, 20—22. 7:9—12. (7) Paradise. Paradeisos. Luke 23:43. 2 Cor. 12:4. Neh. 2:8. Ec. 2:5. 'Orchards planted for the sake of pleasure and delight.'

Leigh. (6.) The Nicolaitans, from the general testimony of the ancients, were 'impious in doctrine, and impure in life,' says Woodh.; 'denied Christ's humanity and real sufferings in the flesh, and are meant by Jude, v. 7. and Peter. It is of their practice Christ speaks.' 'They pleaded for a licentious community of wives. It is improbable, that Nicholas, one of those 7 deacons said to have been full of the Holy Ghost should have been their infamous leader.'

(7.) 'Adam, in Eden, (we are led to believe,) was, at the close of his term of trial, to "put forth his hand, and eat of the tree of life, and live for ever." This act was to have been the sealing of his active, personal righteousness, and his legal title to an eternal confirmation in holiness and bliss; alluding to which order, our text assures us, that all who overcome shall find, at the close of their season of trial, something in their second Adam well answering to this. Jesus Christ.—"the Lord our Righteousness,"—"the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth,"—will he to them the tree of life, indeed, to fix them in eternal holiness and bliss.' E. Smith.—Bl. omits 'midst' reading. 'in the paradise.'

8 And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write; These things saith the <sup>k</sup> first and the last, which was dead, and is alive;

V. 8—11. I. The preface or inscription; to the angel of the church in Smyrna, a place well known at this day by our merchants, a city of great trade and wealth, perhaps the only city of all the seven still known by the same name, now however, no longer distinguished for its Christian church, being overrun with Mohammedism, [except as modern Christian missionaries are beginning to plant again, in that ancient city, the true religion of the Gospel.] Here we have also another of the glorious titles of our Lord Jesus, The First and the Last, He that was dead, and is alive, taken out of ch. 1:17, 18. This surely is the title of God from everlasting and to everlasting, and of an unchangeable Mediator between God and man, Heb. 13:8. He laid the foundation of the church in the patriarchal state; and by Him the top-stone will be brought forth and laid in the end of time. He was dead, and died

V. 8, 9. 'The First and the Last.' Note, 1:8—11. These words were spoken by JEHOVAH of Himself, when declaring his own eternal Deity, and asserting, 'that beside Him there was no God, yea, He knew not any;' Is. 44:6—8. so that the repeated use of them by the Lord Jesus must be allowed by all, who reverence the words of the prophets and apostles, to be a full proof, that He is the self-existent and eternal God. And, as the distinction between the Father and the Son is everywhere established, whilst it is declared, that there is but 'One living and true God,' it might easily be proved in form, that there can be no consistent alternative, between rejecting the Bible, or denying it to be the unerring Word of God, and acknowledging a plurality of Persons in the Unity of the Godhead. For the same has repeatedly been shown concerning the Holy Spirit, in respect of the attributes and operations peculiar to Deity, and his distinct, personal subsistence. John 14:15—17, 16:8—13, 1 Cor. 2:10—13, 3:16, 17, 12:4—11. [Note, end of Jude.] Thus the doctrine of the Trinity is fixed on the firm basis of divine revelation; and it will always be found, that no other scheme, however modified, can be supported by any learning, ingenuity, or diligence of man, except with a proportionable disregard to the oracles of God; and the full establishment of such doctrine, must be the effect of a total disbelief of the Scriptures, in respect of the nature, subsistence, and perfections of the Godhead. The church, indeed, as built on the Person of Christ, cannot be subverted by 'the gates of hell;' Mat. 16:18. and though we may well be concerned for our children, and the cause of the Gospel in these lands; and should therefore use every proper method of earnestly contending for the truth once delivered to the saints; yet we may be free from anxiety about the event of the contest, and predict, that the triumphing of those, who strive against 'the First and the Last,' will assuredly be short.—He who thus asserted his own essential Deity, in the same place gave an intimation of his incarnation, death, resurrection, and everlasting intercession; (1:13.) and, in the character of the omnipotent Friend and Savior of his people, He assured the Christians at Smyrna, that He noticed and accepted their works, and was well acquainted with their trials and poverty; for though Smyrna was a rich and populous city, either the poorest of the inhabitants alone had been converted, or the Christians there had been impoverished by persecution. Moreover, he knew the blasphemy of certain persons, who 'said they were Jews,' and reviled both them and Him. Some think, that these men professed Christianity; but in their zeal for the Mosaic law, they spoke such things of the Person and righteousness of Christ, as amounted to constructive blasphemy; but it is more obvious to conclude, that they were virulent opposers and persecutors, who 'contradicted and blasphemed,' as the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia had done, at the time when Paul preached among them. (Acts 13:45.) They professed to be Jews, and the people and worshippers of God, but they were not what they professed to be. Whether they were of the Jewish nation or not, God did not allow of them as his congregation; the rites for which they contended were no longer of any validity; their for our sins; He is alive, for He rose again for our justification, and He ever lives to make intercession for us. By dying He purchased salvation for us; and by his life He applies it to us. Rom. 5:10.

II. The subject matter,—after the common declaration of Christ's omniscience, and the perfect cognizance He has of all the works of men, and especially of his churches, He notices,

1. The improvement they had made in their spiritual state. This comes in, in a short parenthesis; yet is very emphatical; but thou art rich, v. 9. poor in temporals, but rich in spirituals. Many, rich in temporals, are poor in spirituals, so the church of Laodicea. Some who are poor outwardly, are inwardly rich; rich in faith, in good works, in privileges, in bonds and deeds of gift, in hope; rich in reversion: spiritual riches are usually the reward of great diligence. Where there is spiritual plenty, outward poverty may be better borne; and when God's people are impoverished in temporals, for the sake of Christ and a good conscience, He makes all up to them in spiritual riches, which are much more satisfying and enduring. [Note Jas. 2:5.]

2. Of their sufferings; I know thy tribulation and thy poverty; the prosecution they underwent, even to the spoiling of their goods. In all the afflictions of his people, He is afflicted, and He will recompense tribulation to those who trouble them, but to them that are troubled, rest with Himself.

3. He knows the wickedness and the falsehood of their enemies; I know the blasphemy of them that say they are Jews, but are not; Of those who pretend to be the only peculiar, covenant people of God, as the Jews boasted themselves to be, even after God had rejected them; those who would be setting up the Jewish rites and ceremonies, now not only antiquated, but abrogated. Observe, (1.) As Christ has a church in the world, the spiritual Israel of God, so the devil has his synagogue; those that oppose the truths of the Gospel, and promote damnable errors. (2.) For the synagogues of

Satan to give themselves out to be the church or Israel of God, is no less than blasphemy; and He has a high resentment of it, and will take a just revenge on those who persist in it.

4. He foreknows the future trials of his people, forewarns them of them, and forearms them against them, v. 10. The people of God must look for troubles in this world, and their troubles usually rise higher; they had been impoverished by their tribulations before, now they must be imprisoned. Observe, It is the devil that stirs up his instruments, wicked men, to persecute the people of God. But Christ forearms them against these approaching troubles; (1.) By his counsel: Fear none of these things; this is not only a word of command, but of efficacy, not only forbidding slavish fear, but subduing it, and furnishing the soul with strength and courage. (2.) By showing them how their sufferings would be alleviated and limited. [1.] They should not be universal; it would be some of them, not all, who should be cast into prison. [2.] They were not to be perpetual, but for a set time, and a short time, ten days, Mat. 24:22. [3.] It should be to try them, not to destroy them; that their faith, and patience, and courage, might be proved and be found to honor and glory. (3.) By proposing and promising a glorious reward to their fidelity.

Observe, 1. The sureness of the reward; I will give thee. He has said it, that is able to do it.

2. The suitableness of it; A crown, to reward their poverty, their fidelity, and their conflict. A crown of life, to reward those who are faithful even unto death, are faithful till they die, and who part with life itself, in fidelity to Christ; that life, so worn out in his service, or laid down in his cause, shall be rewarded with another, and a much better life, that shall be eternal.

III. The conclusion of this message, and that, as before, 1. With a call to universal attention, that all men, all the world, should hear what passes between Christ and his churches; how He commends them, how worship was carnal and hypocritical; they violently opposed the truth and cause of God; and they were in fact 'the synagogue of Satan,' a company of people, bearing the image, [receiving the influences,] copying the example, doing the works, and combining together to support the kingdom of the devil. 3:8, 9, John 8:41—47. SCOTT.

(9.) Poverty.] Polycarp, Bp. of Smyrna, had, indeed, as many of the primitive bishops did, reduced himself to voluntary poverty, by selling his estate, and distributing it to the poor, but, says Doddr., the next v. proves this is not referred to. Jews.] 'That is, of God's peculiar people; and this instance may help us to explain many prophetic phrases, where Jewish rites are spoken of with as great a latitude, viz. for rites God's peculiar people should use.' Doddr.—Bl. inserts 'but rich,' after 'poverty.' ED.

V. 10, 11. These concluding vs. intimate, that the persons above mentioned were fierce persecutors, and not subtle deceivers; for Christ did not warn his people to beware of false doctrine; but to prepare for the cross.—Ten days.] This may either mean ten years, which is recorded to have been the duration of Domitian's persecution; or a considerable but limited time; [and so Guyse takes it for an indefinite number;] during which space, many of them might be called to suffer martyrdom for the truth.—This epistle also concerned all, who could hear and understand; as no one, who conquered in this spiritual warfare, should be hurt by 'the second death;' though he might die in winning the battle.—Nothing of reproof or warning is contained in this epistle; and it is remarkable, that there are more Christians, at this day in Smyrna, than at any other place in all that part of the world; the candlestick has not wholly been removed from them; but some glimmerings of light are still continued to the harassed remnant of this church. SC.

(10.) 'The word "crown," is used by our translators for both the "stephanos," and the "diadem." The "diadem," Parkh. states to have been a swathe, or fillet of white linen, bound about the heads of the ancient eastern kings, [see cuts, 2 Chr. 12:2—3, &c.]—and as the ensign of royal authority this word is used, 12:3, 13:1, 19:12. The "stephanos," was a crown or garland, bestowed on the victors in combats, or given to conquerors, as 2 Tim. 4:8. See Mackn. This occurs, 2:10, 3:11, 4:4, 10, 6:2, 9:7, 12:1, 14:14.—'There is no proof that the persecution at Smyrna, in 169, when Polycarp suffered there, continued 10 years, or days, and this was 70 years and more after the prophecy. Diocletian's did not last 10 years, and was universal. More probably, that foretold took place in that generation, during 10 days, and among the Smyrneans only, and from the Jews mentioned. Thus fulfilled, this prophecy could not fail to authenticate itself and the rest, to those 7 churches, and so they would revere and carefully transmit the book, uncontaminated; as they appear to have done.' WOODH.

(11.) 'The second death, is an expression peculiar to the Apocalypse. Irenæus, who lived very near the time of St. John, explained it to mean the Gehenna, or eternal fire, the place of punishment for incorrigible sinners.' ID.

12 And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write; These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges;

13 I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth.

14 But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication.

15 So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate.

He comforts them, how He reproveth their failures, how He rewards their fidelity; it concerns all the inhabitants of the world to observe God's dealings with his own people; all the world may learn instruction and wisdom thereby. 2. With a gracious promise to the conquering Christian, v. 11. Observe, There is not only a first, but a second death; a death after the body is dead. This second death is unspeakably worse than the first death, both in the dying pangs and agonies of it,—agonies of the soul, without any mixture of support, and in duration eternal; this is hurtful, indeed, fatally hurtful to all who fall under it. From this hurtful, this destructive death, Christ will save all his faithful servants; the second death shall have no power over those who are partakers of the first resurrection; the first death shall not hurt them, and the second death shall have no power over them.

V. 12—17. Here also we are to consider,

I. The inscription; to the angel of the church of Pergamos; whether a city raised up out of the Ruins of old Troy, or some other city of the same name, is neither cer-

V. 12, 13. Pergamos was a city north of Smyrna. Where Satan's seat is must denote, that Pergamos was not only a very wicked city, but also that it was, as it were, the head quarters of both persecution and heresy; the two principal engines of the devil, in opposing the pure Gospel of Christ; and that from thence these dire evils diffused their baleful influence to other cities. Acts 20:29—31. Antipas, probably, was a pastor of the church. SCOTT.

V. 14—16. Hence it is evident, that the teachers of this sect, [Nicolaitans,] sought 'the wings of unrighteousness,' by endeavoring to corrupt and pervert professed Christians; and that, in order to obtain them, they laid 'stumbling-blocks' in their way, and, on some pretence or other, encouraged and enticed them to join in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbors; and on those occasions, and at other times, to commit fornication. Num. 25: 1 Cor. 8:7—15. 10:23—28. They might, perhaps, inculcate the lawfulness of dissembling their religion to escape persecution, which is an occasion of falling to numbers in circumstances which expose men to it; and joining in the idolatry and excess of the heathen worship would effectually answer this end. They, however, certainly grafted this prevarication on more general principles; and an erroneous and perverted view of the evangelical doctrine of 'salvation by grace,' and concerning Christian liberty, constituted 'the root of bitterness,' from which their evil practices naturally grew. 'They turned the grace of God into lasciviousness,' and taught others to do the same, and were the Antinomians of the primitive church; a heresy, which, in one form or other, has always hitherto sprung up, when the tain nor material. In the message sent, the same Jesus describes Himself as one that hath the sharp sword with two edges, ch. 1: 16.

Some have observed, that, in the several titles of Christ prefixed to the several epistles, there is something suited to the state of those churches; as, in that to Ephesus, what could be more proper to awaken and recover a drowsy and declining church, than to hear Christ speaking as one that held the stars in his hand, and walked in the midst of the golden candlesticks? &c.

The church of Pergamos was infested with men of corrupt minds, who did what they could to corrupt both the faith and manners of the church; and Christ, being resolved to fight against them by the sword of his Word, takes the title of Him that hath the sharp sword with two edges. The Word of God is a sharp sword, offensive and defensive; a sword with two edges, the edge of the law against transgressors of that dispensation, and the edge of the gospel against the despisers of that; an edge to make a wound, and an edge to open a festered wound, in order to its healing; an edge, if ye turn aside to the right hand, on that side; if on the left hand, an edge on that side; it turns every way.

II. From the inscription we proceed to the contents of this epistle, in which the method is much the same as in the rest. Here,

1. Christ notices the trials and difficulties this church encountered, v. 13. The circumstance which added very much lustre to the good works of this church, was, that of the place where it was planted, a place where Satan's seat was. As our great Lord notices all the advantages and opportunities we have for duty by the places we dwell in, so He notices all the temptations and discouragements we meet with from them, and makes gracious allowances. This people dwelt where Satan's seat was, where he kept his court; some think the Roman governor in this city was a most violent enemy to the Christians; and the seat of persecution is Satan's seat.

2. He commends their steadfastness, v. 13. These two expressions,—holdest fast, and hast not denied,—are much of the same sense; the former may signify the effect, and the latter the cause or means. Our faith will have a great influence on our faithfulness; it has been seldom known that those who let go the true faith, retain their fidelity; usually, on that rock on which men make shipwreck of their faith, they make shipwreck of a good conscience too: and here our blessed Lord aggrandizes the fidelity of this church, from the circumstance of the times, as well as of the place where they true Gospel of Christ has been successfully preached; being a kind of tare, which the enemy will at all times sow among the good seed, as far as he is permitted.—Many have supposed, that this sect derived its name from Nicholas, one of the primitive deacons; and such a tradition prevailed early in the church. Yet the name was then so common, and might be given to the sect on so many other accounts, that there is no certainty in it. We read nothing of Nicholas in Scripture, to warrant so unfavorable an opinion of him; neither Peter nor Jude, who opposed heretics of the same stamp, called them by this name; and it may thence, almost with certainty, be concluded, that it was afterwards given them. Some have noted, that Nicolaus, in Greek, signifies the same as Balaam does in Hebrew, namely, 'the conqueror of the people;' and have thence inferred, that they were so called from the influence which they obtained over men's minds, and the fatal use which they made of it, as Balaam had done before them.—Pergamos is at present in a very ruinous condition; very few professed Christians are found in it, and they are wholly dependent on the church at Smyrna; being in a most abject state, and having scarcely anything of our holy religion, except the empty name. [The reader is, once for all, referred to the Pref. to Rev. for an account, with engravings, of these places, as they now are. Eo.] (14) Them that hold. 13, 25. 3:11. Mark 7:3. 2 Thes. 2:15. (15.) Whom I hate. Ho misō: rather homaiōs, 'likewise.' BL. after Beng., Wets., Griesb., Mat., Tittm., and Vater. ED.

V. 17. What the Spirit spake by John, to the church at Pergamos, was meant for the instruction of all, who should ever hear or read it; for whilst judgments impended over the head of the impenitent, blessings were prepared for those, who overcame the multiplied temptations to which they were exposed.—The expression, [No man knoweth, &c.] may also signify, that the felicity which awaits the children of God, lived; they had been steadfast even in those days wherein Antipas his faithful martyr was slain among them. Who this person was, and whether there be anything mysterious in his name, we have no certain account; he was a faithful disciple, and sealed his faith and fidelity with his blood, in the place where Satan dwelt; and though the rest of the believers there knew this, and saw it, yet they were not discouraged nor drawn away from their steadfastness; this is mentioned to their honor.

3. He reproveth them for their sinful failures, v. 14. There were some who taught, that simple fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols, was no sin; they, by an impure worship, drew men into impure practices, as Balaam the Israelites. Observe, The filthiness of the spirit and of the flesh often go together; corrupt doctrines and corrupt worship often lead to corrupt conversation, [every doctrine makes its own nest.] It is very lawful to fix the name of the leaders of any heresy on those who follow them; it is the shortest way of telling whom we mean. To continue in communion with persons of corrupt principles and practice, is displeasing to God, draws a guilt and blemish on the whole society; and, though the church, as such, has no power to punish the persons of men, either for heresy or immorality, with corporal penalties; yet it has power to exclude them from their holy communion; and if it do not so, Christ, the Head and Lawgiver of the church, will be displeased with it.

4. He calls them to repentance, v. 16. Observe, here, Repentance is the duty of saints as well as sinners; the duty of churches and communities as well as particular persons; Christian societies, even, must repent of other men's sins, as far as they have been accessory to them, though but so much as by connivance. When God comes to punish the corrupt members of a church, He rebukes that church itself for allowing such to continue in its communion, and some drops of the storm fall on the whole society. No sword cuts so deep, nor inflicts so mortal a wound, as the sword of Christ's mouth; let but the threatenings of the Word be set home on the conscience of a sinner, and he will soon be a terror to himself; let these threatenings be executed, and the sinner is utterly cut off: the Word of God will take hold of sinners, sooner or later, either for their conviction or their confusion.

III. We have the conclusion of this epistle, where, after the usual demand of universal attention, there is the promise of great favor to those that overcome, v. 17. 1. The hidden manna, i. e. the influences and comforts of the Spirit of Christ in communion churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

18 And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write; These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass;

19 I know thy works, and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first.

20 Notwithstanding, I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols.

21 And I gave her space to repent of her fornication; and she repented not.

22 Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds.

23 And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts; and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.

with Him; this is hidden from the rest of the world; a stranger intermeddles not with this joy; and it is laid up in Christ, the Ark of the covenant, in the holy of holies. 2. The white stone, with a new name engraven on it, is absolution from the guilt of sin, alluding to the ancient custom of giving a white stone to persons acquitted on trial, and a black stone to those condemned. The new name is the name of adoption; adopted persons took the name of the family into which they were adopted: none can read the evidence of a man's adoption but himself; he cannot always read it; but, if he persevere, he shall have both the evidence of sonship and the inheritance.

V. 18—29. The form of each epistle is much the same; and in this, as the rest, we have to consider the inscription, contents, and conclusion.

I. The inscription; To the angel of the church of Thyatira, a city of the proconsular Asia, bordering on Mysia on the N. and Lydia on the S., a town of trade; from whence came the woman named Lydia, a seller of purple; whether by her means the Gospel was brought here, is not certain; but that it was successful to the forming of a gospel-church, this epistle assures us.

The Son of God, who sent the epistle, is here described in two characters: 1. His eyes are like unto a flame of fire, signifying his piercing, penetrating, perfect knowledge, a thorough insight into all persons, and all things, v. 23. 2. His feet are like fine brass; that the outgoings of his providence are steady, awful, and all pure and holy: as He judges with perfect wisdom, so He acts with perfect strength and steadiness.

II. The contents of this epistle.

1. The honorable character and commendation Christ gives of this church, ministry, and people. (1.) Of their charity; either more general, a disposition to do good to all men; or more special, to the household of faith. There is no religion where there is no [love in action, or] charity. (2.) Their service, or ministration; this respects chiefly the officers of the church, who had labored in the Word and doctrine. (3.) Their faith, which was the grace that actuated both their charity, and their service. (4.) Their patience; for those that are most charitable, and most faithful, must yet expect to meet with that which will exercise their patience. (5.) Their growing fruitfulness; their last works were better than the first: it should be the ambition and earnest desire of all Christians, that they may be better and better every day, and best at last.

2. A faithful reproof for what was amiss; this is not so directly charged on the church itself, as on some wicked seducers among them; these wicked seducers are compared to Jezebel, a great patroness of idolaters and false prophets, and called by her name: their sin was, they attempted to draw the servants of God into fornication, and to offer sacrifices to idols; they call themselves prophets, and so would claim a superior authority and regard to the ministers of that church. Two things aggravated their sin: they made use of the name of God to oppose the truth of his doctrine and worship; and they abused the patience of God to harden themselves in their wickedness. God gave them space for repentance, but they repented not; and, where the space for repentance is lost, the sinner perishes with a double destruction.

Now the wickedness of this Jezebel is charged on the church of Thyatira; not that as a church, they had civil power to banish or imprison her; but they had ministerial power to censure and to excommunicate her; and it is probable, that their neglect to use the power they had, made them sharers in her sin.

3. The punishment of this seducer, this Jezebel, v. 22, 23. In these words is couched a prediction of the fall of Babylon: the bed is a bed of pain, not of pleasure; and the death is the second death, which leaves no hope of future life, but only shame and everlasting contempt.

4. The design of Christ in the destruction of these wicked seducers; and that was, the instruction of others, especially of his churches; All the churches shall know, &c.

when they shall have obtained a complete victory over all their enemies, can never be understood, but by the enjoyment of it; yet I apprehend, that present consolations, as the gracious recompense of victory over particular, urgent temptations, were principally, though not exclusively intended.

(17.) Manna. That, hidden and laid up in the tabernacle, free from corruption, was considered a type of the spiritual bread of life, John 4: 26, &c. namely, the benefits derived to the faithful by Christ's offering,—forgiveness, and eternal life. So WOODH. It was never seen but by the high priest, says Schoettgen; and the spiritual manna may be said to be hidden, as being enjoyed in the heart of the true Christian. Comp. John 6:32—35. 1 Pet. 3:4. BL.—Stone. Many consider the allusion here is, to the stones used for balloting in judicial proceedings, to declare guilt or innocence; but T. H. Horne thinks a tessera is alluded to, which was a stone, shaped in the form of an oblong square, divided into two parts, upon each of which, one of two parties wrote his name, and exchanged it with the other. [Cut, Gal. 2:9. So Dr. Ward, Heinrichs, Prof. Lee, and BL. think, there is allusion to these tessere hospitalitatis; a sort of carte blanche, entitling the person who showed it, to ask for and receive what he might want.] Each party, and their descendants, on producing these at the house of the other, were recognized and hospitably received. These tokens were kept with much care and privacy, that they might not be used by others. This practice, it is known, prevailed among the ancient Christians. Valpy thinks, it referred to the judges, who presented to conquerors in the games, a white stone, assigning and containing the name and the prize of him that conquered. HENRY, abr.—As God's favored servants in the O. T. are frequently honored with new names, [comp. the oriental custom,] this new name is a token of spiritual benefit, so surpassing, it can be known only by being enjoyed. WOODH.—No man knoweth. Is this an allusion to the anagrammatic method of writing names on seals, &c., which is now and has ever been common in the E., and to counterfeit which is capital? The Sultan of Turkey has a secretary, whose sole business it is to write the Sultan's tooghra, or cypher containing his name, and numerous titles. EN.—Princes sometimes gave particular names, expressing familiarity and delight, to distinguish favorites, by which to call them in the greatest intimacy of converse. DONR. I incline to think "new name" merely figurative, importing a title to heaven, and thus agreeing to the "white stone" on which it is written. As the latter indicates an acquittal from guilt, or the blessing of justification; the former may denote the believer's title to life, or blessing of adoption into the family of God, and a right to all the privileges and immunities connected with being sons and heirs of God, and joint heirs of the eternal inheritance with Christ.—The hidden manna, white stone, and new name, imply privileges of the same nature with "the fruit of the tree of life;" but the style may be varied to teach us, that though spiritual blessings are all the same in kind, they are adapted to the diversified wants and capacities of men.

V. 18. Son of God. Comp. 1:13, 14. SCOTT.

V. 20—23. It is not agreed, whether 'that woman Jezebel,' is a literal or figurative expression. From the reading in some manuscripts it has been thought, that the wife of the presiding minister was intended; that she had obtained great influence in the affairs of the church, and made bad use of it; that she pretended to prophetic gifts, and under that sanction propagated abominable principles, and though her conduct was disapproved by many, yet no proper decision was used in censuring her, or preventing the mischiefs which she occasioned.—The figurative meaning, however, seems more suited to the style and manner of this book; and in this sense, we may understand it to denote a company of persons, of the spirit and character of Jezebel, within the church, under one principal deceiver; as the Roman antichrist is represented by the emblem of an abandoned harlot. 17:1—5. Jezebel, a Zidonian, and a zealous idolater, being married to the king of Israel, contrary to the divine law, used all her influence to seduce the Israelites from the worship of JEHOVAN into idolatry, with which the vilest licentiousness was connected; and this greatly aided the temptation. (M. R. a.) Thus these persons at Thyatira, having, through the fault of the pastors and members of the church, found admission among them, and by their artifices and blandishments attached a party to their cause, employed their whole influence to draw men from the pure religion of Christ, into carnal and spiritual fornication and adultery, and to poison their minds with abominable doctrines. Yet they had not been duly censured and opposed; and it is evident, that neither the fatal tendency of their opinions, nor the atrociousness of their conduct, had been fully noticed and understood, till this epistle was sent. 1 Cor. 5: All the churches, &c.] Here again the peculiar style of Deity is employed by 'the Son of God.' It is far more expressive to say, 'I am He, who searcheth the heart,' than 'I search;' nor can such language be accounted for, on any other ground than the trinitarian doctrine, whatever pains and ingenuity may be employed in the attempt. M. R.—Note, Jer. 17:9, 10. In.

(20.) Jezebel. Grot., &c. understand a person of rank and influence, who seduced them to join heathen impurities in their worship. But in scripture allegory, the body of a nation is often designated under the name of a woman. Therefore, Ham., Durham, Vitruv., &c., following Andreas Cesariensis, (who professes to give the explications of Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, &c.,) Arctas and Bede, understand a sect or body of misleading teachers, harbored in the church at Thyatira. It was, doubtless, clear to the church addressed: at v. 23. children are spoken of, which confirms the idea, that a sect and its proselytes are meant. For the innocent children of a bad woman might justly be spared. WOODH. (20, 21.) Few. PRACT. OBS. The Lord Jesus alone can uphold and prosper his ministers; it therefore behooves all those, who are favored with able and faithful teachers, to be thankful for them, to walk in the light thus vouchsafed them, and to be careful that they do not provoke the Lord to remove it. And all, who sustain that important and arduous office, should remember their dependence on Christ, and their accountability to Him; and 'take heed to themselves, and to their doctrine,' and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost has made them overseers; to feed the church of God, which He hath purchased with his own blood.' Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 4:11-16.—The manifold evils, which abound in every part of the church, in a very great degree, arise from the misconduct and negligence of its rulers and pastors, who ought especially to weigh with great seriousness, and much self-examination, as in the prospect of the last decisive day, the import of these epistles of Christ; and frequently they will find cause to apply to themselves a great part of the reproof and warning, which they contain.—Surely this single mention in Scripture, of Christians 'forsaking their first love,' when the context and consequences are well considered, most awfully reproves those numbers, who speak of this as a common case; who excuse lukewarmness and sloth, in themselves and others, as a thing of course, by words to this effect; 3:14-16. and who, speaking of Christians as 'in their first love,' mean that this is a low attainment; and that they will, as a thing of course, grow 'less fervent in spirit, in serving the Lord,' as they get above the infancy of Christianity! When the (27.) 'This is predicted of Christ, in Ps. 2: relative to the heathen: which has a special allusion to "the battle of that great day of God Almighty," which shall sink the antichristian world. And this event Christ sees fit to ascribe to the persevering, triumphant saints. They are noted as doing this work of judgment, in the same sense in which they are to "judge the world." They will have perfect fellowship with Christ in those mighty operations; and He will do these things in answer to their prayers for the salvation of Zion. Christ thus puts upon his children the honor of his operations of judgment, even as the two witnesses are said to have the power to shut heaven, and smite with plagues, &c. The psalmist gives the same view of this "honor all the saints have," Ps. 149. Received.] I. e. officially.' E. SMITH.

(28.) 'Since Christ, 22:16. calls Himself the bright morning star, some (as Woodh. and Burton) assign the same sense here, q. d. "that He will give Himself, i. e. his light and truth." It is, however, the general opinion of learned comtrs., that the sense is, "I will give Him glories

God is known by the judgments that He executeth; and, by this revenge taken on seducers, He would make known his infallible knowledge of the hearts of men, and his impartial justice, in giving every one according to his work, that the name of Christians should be no protection, their churches should be no sanctuaries, for sin and sinners.

5. The encouragement given to those who kept themselves pure and undefiled, v. 24. Observe, The seducers called their doctrines depths, profound mysteries; amusing the people, and endeavoring to persuade them they had a deeper insight into religion than their own ministers had. But Christ called them depths of Satan, satanical delusions and devices, diabolical mysteries; for there is a mystery of iniquity, as well as the great mystery of godliness. How tender Christ is of his faithful servants, v. 25. Christ is coming to put an end to all the temptations of his people; and if they hold fast faith and a good conscience till He comes, all the difficulty and danger are over.

III. We now come to the conclusion of this message, v. 26-29. Here we have, 1. The promise of an ample reward to the persevering, victorious believer, in two parts: (1.) Very great power and dominion over the rest of the world; power over the nations; which may refer either to the empire's turning Christian, as in Constantine's time; or to believers sitting down with Christ on his throne of judgment, in trying, and condemning, and consigning over to punishment, the enemies of Christ and the church. The upright shall have dominion in the morning. (2.) Knowledge and wisdom, suitable to such power and dominion; Christ is the Morning Star; He brings day with Him into the soul, the light of grace and of glory; and He will give his people that perfection of light and wisdom requisite to the state of dignity and dominion they shall have in the morning of the resurrection. 2. This epistle ends with the usual demand of attention; in the foregoing epistles, it comes before the concluding promise; but in this, and all that follow, it comes after, and tells us, that we should all attend to the promises as well as to the precepts that Christ delivers to the churches.

CHAP. III. V. 1-6. Here is,

I. The preface; to the angel of the church of Sardis, an ancient city of Lydia, on the banks of the mountain Timolus, said to have been the chief city of Asia the Less, and the first city in that part of the world converted by the preaching of John; and, some say, the first that revolted from Christianity, and one of the first laid in ruins, in which it still lies, without any church or ministry.

This message was sent by the Lord Jesus, who here assumes the character of Him that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars, as ch. 1: 4. where the seven Spirits are said to be before the throne. 1. He hath the seven Spirits, i. e. the Holy Spirit with his various powers, graces, and operations; for He is personally one, though efficaciously various; and may be said here to be seven, which is the number of the churches, and of the angels of the churches, to show that to every minister, and to every church, there is a dispensation and measure of the Spirit given for them to profit withal. 2. He hath the seven stars, the angels of the churches; they are disposed of by Him, and accountable to Him; which should make them faithful and zealous. He has ministers to employ, and spiritual influences to communicate to his ministers, for the good of his church; the Holy Spirit usually works by the ministry, and the ministry will be of no efficacy without the Spirit; the same divine hand holds them both.

majority in any church adopt such notions, and accustom themselves and each other to such expressions, it is a certain sign, that they will speedily provoke Christ to 'remove their candlestick, unless they repent.' nay, it is the natural language of stony-ground hearers, whose joy and affection have subsided, and who, 'having no root in themselves,' are gradually withering away. Mat. 13:20-22. P. O. 18-23. For, though the aged, flourishing Christian may feel less vigor of affection, than he did at some times, soon after his conversion, in which novelty and self-love had no small share; yet there is far more constancy and energy in his love, influencing him to habitual self-denying obedience, and exertion in the cause of God, apart from all selfish motives, than there was before. The former resembles the transient, noisy flame of thorns; the latter is like the constant, vehement, penetrating, and efficacious heat of a fire made by substantial fuel.—As 'the First and the Last, who was dead and is alive,' is the believer's Brother and Friend; he must be rich in the deepest poverty, honorable amidst the lowest abasement, and happy under the heaviest tribulations. Mat. 12:46-50. 25:34-40. John 15:12-16. But this confidence cannot be supported, without steady obedience. When we are tempted to sin, let us recollect what consolations He has promised to the victorious combatant; and, looking to Him for help, let us aspire to 'the hidden manna,' 'the joy that a stranger intermeddeth not with,' the assurance of acceptance, the Spirit of adoption, and the earnest of eternal glory. SCOTT.

of which that Star is an emblem," Dan. 12:3. See Sc.'s Morning Star.—'A Star is a teacher, 1:16. our Lord is eminently such, and so entitles Himself, 22:16. "the shining, morning Star;" as such He was foretold, Num. 24:17. and a star, in the eastern or morning quarter, preceded his birth. "He was the true light, (Jn. 1:9.) to lighten the Gentiles," Lu. 2:32. and of this light which was in Him, He imparted a share to the first preachers of his Gospel, for converting the nations. Taken in this sense, the gift of the morning star, is in connexion with the "power over the nations," which is mentioned before it. Some refer it to a future life; because to obtain it the Christian must keep his Lord's works, "even unto the end." But all the prospects of a Christian will have reference to eternal life, as promised to the faithful; and the dawnings and first light of such splendid blessings, taking possession of his mind, even during his sojourn here, will be a source of infinite delight, "shining more and more unto the perfect day." Prov. 4:13. WOODH.

V. 29. This concerned all other professed Christians, as such as those to whom it was immediately written. (M. R.)—This church is at present wholly extinct, and the city is in a very desolate condition. [See Pref.]—Each epistle begins with 'These things saith the Son of God, &c.' and each ends with the call, 'Let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.'—What 'Christ saith,' that 'the Spirit saith;' the same individual words and works are ascribed to each; as in many instances to the Father and to the Son. 'For the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit' are three; and 'these three are one.' SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-3. Sardis lay to the S. of Thyatira, and was once the renowned capital of Lydia, the kingdom of Creesus.—The bishop, or presiding minister, [but see notes, 2:1. and 1 Pet. 5:2.] it is probable, had, by his misconduct, his bad example, or want of vigilance

2 Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God.

3 Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard; and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.

4 Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy.

5 He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

7 And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and no man openeth;

n Is. 22:22.
o Job 12:14.

II. The body of this epistle; there is this observable in it, that, whereas, in the other epistles, Christ begins with commending what was good in the churches, and then proceeds to tell them what was amiss; in this (and in the epistle to Laodicea) He begins,

1. With a very severe reproof; I know thy works, &c. This church had gained a great reputation; we read not of any unhappy divisions among themselves; everything appeared well, as to what falls under the observation of men. But it was not really what it was reputed to be; they had a name to live, but were dead; had a form of godliness, but not the power; there was a great deadness in their souls, [in their spiritual affections,] and in their services; a great deadness in the spirits of their ministers, and in the people, in hearing, prayer, and conversation; what little life was yet left among them, was, in a manner, expiring, ready to die.

and activity, greatly contributed to reduce the church to a very declined and withering condition. (1 He that hath the seven spirits of God.) This accords with the several texts, in which our Lord promises to send the Holy Spirit to his disciples; but who is He that has the Spirit of God, and sends Him to men, even as He Himself was sent by the Father? (2 Be watchful.) Become watchful, though now unwatchful. Sc. (1.) 'Sardis had great natural advantages for acquiring riches; but riches are corruptive, and lead to that supineness in religion, and profligacy of morals, in this address so alarmingly rebuked.' Woodh.—'Yet what town, what individual, fears being too rich?' Ed.—Livest, &c.] 'By a frequent scripture-metaphor, a person, living in the defilements of this world, and neglectful of preparation for another, is said to be "dead while he liveth," while he who meets death in the discharge of his Christian duty, is pronounced "living though he die." Jn. 11:25, 26. 1 Tim. 5:6. 1 Jn. 3:14. Jude 12. Thus Christ commanded, to "let the dead bury the dead," Mat. 23:29.'

V. 4—6. Even at Sardis there were a few Christians, whose names would be at length mentioned with distinguished honor, on account of their holy singularity; as they had not 'defiled their garments,' or disgraced their profession by the worldly lusts, and sinful practices, to which the rest were addicted. And Christ assured them, that they 'should walk with Him in white,' the emblem of perfect purity, triumph, and joy; and so be his accepted, holy, and honored companions, in heavenly felicity. Notes, 6:9—11. 7:9—17. 19:7, 8, 11—16. Eth. 3:15. Ec. 9:7—9.—All this related to other bishops, pastors, and churches also, who were, or should hereafter be placed in similar circumstances.—This once flourishing city now lies in ruins; a few persons called Christians are found there; but they are reduced to the most abject slavery, and have neither church nor minister among them. SEOTT.

(1.) Garments.] 'By an obvious metaphor, what raiment is to the

2. Our Lord proceeds to give this degenerate church the best advice, v. 2. (1.) He advises them to watch; whenever we are off our watch, we lose ground, and therefore must return to our watchfulness against sin and Satan, and whatever is destructive to the life and power of godliness. (2.) To strengthen the things that remain, and that are ready to die. Some understand this of persons; there were some few who had retained their integrity, but they were in danger of declining with the rest. Or it may be understood of practices, as it follows.—I have not found thy works perfect before God, not filled up; there is something wanting in them; the kernel, the soul, the substance, the inward thing,—thy works are hollow and empty; prayers are not filled up with holy desires, almsdeeds with true charity, sabbaths with suitable devotion of soul to God; there are not inward affections suitable to outward acts and expressions; now when the spirit is wanting, the form cannot long subsist. (3.) To recollect themselves, and remember how they have received and heard, v. 3. not only to remember what they had received and heard, what messages from God, what tokens of his favor, what sermons; but what impressions the mercies of God had made on their souls at first, what affections they felt working under the Word and ordinances, the love of their espousals, the kindness of their youth, how welcome the Gospel and the grace of God were to them when they first received them; where is the blessedness they then spake of? (4.) To hold fast what they had received, that they might not lose all, and repent sincerely that they had lost so much of the life of religion, and had run the risk of losing all.

3. Christ enforces his counsel with a dreadful threatening, in case it should be despised, v. 3. Observe, When Christ leaves a people as to his gracious presence, He comes to them in judgment; and his judicial presence will be very dreadful to those who have sinned away his gracious presence; to a dead, declining people, it will be surprising; their deadness will keep them in security, and, as it procures an angry visit from Christ to them, it will prevent their discerning it, and preparing for it. Such a visit from Christ will be to their loss; He will come as a thief, to strip them of their remaining enjoyments and mercies, not by fraud, but in justice and righteousness; taking the forfeiture they had made of all to Him.

4. Our blessed Lord does not leave this sinful people without some comfort and encouragement, v. 4. and here, (1.) He makes honorable mention of the faithful remnant in Sardis, though but small; they had not given into the prevailing corruptions and pollution of the day and place in which they lived. God notices the smallest number of those who abide with Him; the fewer the more precious. (2.) He makes a very gracious promise to them; the white robes of justification and adoption, and comfort; or the white robes of honor and glory in the other world; they shall walk with Christ in these, in the pleasant walks of the heavenly paradise; and what delightful converse will there be between Christ and them when they thus walk together! This is an honor proper and suitable to their integrity; not a legal, but a gospel worthiness, is ascribed to them; not merit but meetness; they who walk with Christ in the clean garments of real, practical holiness here, and keep themselves unspotted from the world, shall walk with Christ in the white robes of honor and glory in the other world; this is a suitable reward.

III. The conclusion of this epistle; 1. A great reward promised to the conquering Christian, v. 5. much the same with what has been already mentioned; the purity of grace shall be rewarded with the perfect purity of glory; holiness, when perfected, shall be its own reward; glory is the perfection of grace, differing not in kind, but in degree; now to this is added another promise very suitable to the case; I will not blot his name out of the book of life, but will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. Observe, Christ has his book of life, a register, a roll of all who shall inherit eternal life. Men may be enrolled in the registers of the church, as baptized, as making a profession, as having a name to live, and that name may come to be blotted out of the roll, when it appears it was but a name, a name to live, without spiritual life. Christ will produce this book of life, and confess the names of the faithful who stand there, before God and all the angels; He will do this as their Judge, when the books shall be opened; do it as their Captain and Head, leading them with Him triumphantly to heaven, presenting them to the Father; Behold Me, and the children that Thou hast given Me. How great will this honor and reward be! 2. The demand of universal attention finishes the message: every word from God deserves attention from men; that which may seem more particularly directed to one body of men, has something in it instructive to all.

V. 7—13. In this 6th letter, observe,

I. The inscription; to the angel of the church of Philadelphia, a city in Asia the Less, seated on the borders of Mysia and Lydia; it had its name from that brotherly-love for which it was eminent; we suppose it was its ancient name, before it received the Gospel; such love and kindness was body, namely, its covering and ornament, such is the habit of practice to the soul.' Woodh.—White.] 'White robes were worn on occasion of great joy, and sometimes in triumphant processions. Some see an allusion to the Sanhedrim's giving a white garment to a candidate for the high-priesthood, if found worthy when examined; if unqualified, he was sent out from them in mourning. L'Enfant.' DODR.

(5.) Blot out.] 'Spoken after the manner of men, but the literal fact is, apostates discover only that they never were truly of the righteous; and their names were never in the book of life. Had they been there, they never would have been suffered fatally to apostatize. Prov. 24:16. Rom. 8:35, 39.' E. Smith. 'In states and cities, they who obtained freedom and fellowship, were enrolled in the public register, and thence proved their title to citizenship.' Woodh.—'Others think the allusion is to names of the cashiered, expunged from the military muster-roll.' BLOOMF.

(6.) He that hath, &c.] 'This is the form of bespeaking spiritual attention to figurative language, so frequently used by our Lord in the Gospels. It is used for the same purpose at the close of all the 7 addresses; in that particular part of them where the language changes from plain to figurative; where attention is required to gain and apply the spiritual knowledge conveyed by symbols.' WOODH.

V. 7. 'He that is holy,' 'He that is true,' or 'the Holy One,' and the 'True One,' are words which contain a very conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ; for what mere creature can with propriety speak of himself in this language? 4:6—8. 6:9—11. 15:1—4. Is. 6:1—4. 30:8—14. 57:15, 16. It was also sent in the name of Him, "that hath the key of David." 1:18. Notes, 3, 9. 5:1—10. Is. 22:20—25. SEOTT.

(7.) Holy, &c.] 'This is so peculiarly the prerogative of God, I am surprised, no greater stress has been laid upon it, in proof of Christ's Deity. Openeth.] The office of lord steward of the household, who

8 I know thy works : behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it : for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name.

9 Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie ; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

10 Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth.

11 Behold, I come quickly : hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.

12 Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God ; and he shall go no more out : and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God : and I will write upon him my new name.

excellent, and, when sanctified by the grace of the Gospel, would render them an excellent church, as indeed they were ; for here is no one fault found with this church ; and yet, doubtless, it had faults of common infirmity ; but love covers such faults. This letter was signed by the same Jesus, who is alone the universal Head of all the churches. Observe, by what title He represents Himself ; He that is holy, He that is true, He that hath the key of David, &c. You have his personal character, holy, and true ; holy in his nature, and therefore true to his Word ; you have also his political [governmental] character, He hath the key of David, He openeth, and no man shutteth ; He hath the key of the house of David, the key of government and authority in and over the church.

1. Observe, the acts of his government ;

hath the power of *openin*g and *shuttin*g what apartments of the palace he pleaseth, is described by these terms.

V. 8, 9. Perhaps the unexpected success of the Gospel, in Philadelphia and the neighborhood, rendered the Christians so powerful, that the Jews and their adherents were glad to seek their protection, from the rage of the multitude, by which vast numbers of them were frequently massacred in those turbulent times. The language leads us also to conclude, that many were converted to Christianity by means of those events. Some indeed think, that Judaizing Christians were meant ; but it is far more natural to understand the word 'Jews' in its ordinary sense ; and to consider them as open opposers, rather than as false professors of the Gospel.

(8.) Door.] For spreading the Gospel by preaching, &c. 1 Cor. 16:9. 2 Cor. 2:12. Little strength.] Has not numbers, wealth, and power to repel persecution, say Newc. and Bloomf. But faith, nearness to God, constancy, purity, and singleness of heart, are a greater 'strength' than all the other three against persecution, and increased by it where they really exist.

(9.) Make, &c.] 'Cause some of them to come over to Christianity, and so honor thee. Burton. See Rom. 11:1. And Prof. Lee says, the v. is a remarkable instance of the language used under the old dispensation, being applied even to the new ; for it is taken from Is. 49:23. or 60:14. which belongs exclusively, from first to last, to the times of the Christian dispensation.

V. 10, 11. The hour of temptation.] This relates to some remarkable season of persecution, heresy, or apostasy, which was about to come on all the churches in the world, especially through the whole Roman empire, to try and prove the sincerity and strength of their faith and love. On this trying occasion, the Lord Jesus would shelter the church in Philadelphia from the fury of the storm, and not let them be so sharply tried or tempted, as other churches were ; which might, in some respects, have more strength, but had also more need of correction, and of being proved and purified. It is generally supposed to refer to Trajan's persecution, which was more general and violent, than the persecutions under Nero and Domitian. But, at this city was the last of all the seven, which was taken by the Mohammedans ; and as there has been a succession of Christians there, in every generation, to this time ; some have applied this to their preservation from that awful delusion, which almost extirpated Christianity in those regions.—It is indeed to be

He opens, opens a door of opportunity to his churches, of utterance to his ministers,—of entrance to the heart, of admission into the visible church, nay, into the church triumphant. He shuts the door, shuts it when He pleases ; He leaves obstinate sinners shut up in the hardness of their hearts ; He shuts the door of church-fellowship against unbelievers and profane persons ; the door of heaven against the foolish virgins who have slept away their day of grace ; and against the workers of iniquity, how vain and confident soever they may be.

2. The way and manner in which He performs these acts, that is, absolute sovereignty, independent on the will of man, and irresistible by the power of men ; He openeth, and no man shutteth ; He shutteth, and no man opens. These were proper characters for Him, when speaking to a church that had endeavored to be conformed to Christ in holiness and truth, and that had enjoyed a wide door of liberty and opportunity under his care and government.

II. The subject-matter of this epistle :

1. Christ puts them in mind of what He had done for them, v. 8. Learn here, Christ is to be acknowledged as the Author of all the liberty and opportunity his churches enjoy. He notices, and keeps account, how long He has preserved their spiritual liberties and privileges for them. Wicked men envy the people of God their door of liberty, and would be glad to shut it against them. If we do not provoke Christ to shut this door against us, men cannot do it.

2. This church is commended, v. 8. In this there seems to be couched a gentle reproof ; 'Thou hast a little strength, a little grace, not proportionate to the wide door of opportunity I have opened to thee, yet true, and that hath kept thee faithful.' True grace, though weak, has the divine approbation, and will do more than the greatest gifts, or highest degrees of common grace, for it will enable the Christian to keep the Word of Christ, and not to deny his name. Obedience, fidelity, and a free confession of the name of Christ, are the fruits of true grace, and pleasing to Christ as such.

3. The great favors God would bestow on this church, v. 9, 10. They consist in two things :

(1.) Christ would make this church's enemies subject to her. They are described to be such as said they were Jews, but lied in saying so ; being really the synagogue of Satan. Their subjection to the church is described ; They shall worship at thy feet ; shall be convinced they have been in the wrong, and the church in the right, beloved of Christ, and they shall desire to be taken into communion with her, that they may worship the same God after the same manner. How shall this great change be wrought ? By the power of God on the hearts of his enemies, and by signal discoveries of his peculiar favor to his church ; They shall know that I have loved thee. Observe, [1.] The greatest honor and happiness any church can enjoy, consist in the peculiar love and favor of Christ. [2.] Christ can discover this his favor to his people, in such a manner, that their very enemies shall see it, and be forced to acknowledge it. [3.] This will, by the grace of Christ, soften the hearts of their enemies, and make them desirous to be admitted into communion with them.

(2.) Another instance of favor that Christ promises to this church is, persevering grace in the most trying times, v. 10. and this as the reward of their past fidelity ; To him that hath, shall be given. Observe, The Gospel of Christ is the Word of his patience ; the fruit of God's patience to a sinful world ; sets before men the exemplary patience of Christ in all his sufferings for men ; it calls those who receive it to the exercise of patience in conformity to Christ. This Gospel should be carefully kept by all that enjoy it ; in doing which they must expect an hour of temptation ; and this sometimes is more general, it comes on all the world, and when it is so, it is usually the shorter. They who keep the Gospel in a time of peace, shall be kept by Christ in an hour of temptation ; by keeping the Gospel they are prepared for the trial ; and the same divine grace that has made them fruitful in times of peace, will make them faithful in times of persecution.

4. Christ calls the church to that duty which He before promised He would enable her to do, and that is, to persevere, to hold fast that which she had. The motives are taken from the speedy appearance of Christ ; 'Behold, I come quickly.'

III. The conclusion of this epistle, v. 12, 13. Here, after his usual manner, our Savior promises a glorious reward to the victorious believer, in two things :

feared, that the professed Christians at Philadelphia, have at present but little of the power of godliness ; yet we may hope, that Christ has had a few real disciples in every age, and has some even at present in this city.—'The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia was consummated,' (viz. by the Ottomans,) 'A. D. 1312 ; and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick of the Revelation : the desolation is complete ; and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally elude the search of the curious traveller. The circus, and three stately theatres of Laodicea, are now peopled with wolves and foxes ; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village ; the God of Mohammed, without a rival, . . . is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamos ; and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians.' Philadelphia alone had been saved by prophecy or courage. (Such is the insidious language of this infidel writer, who sneers at the prophecy, while he records its accomplishment !) 'At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant sons defended their religion and freedom, above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies, and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect ; a column in a scene of ruins ; a pleasing example, that the paths of honor and safety may sometimes be the same.' Gibbon.—Some readers may need to be informed, that Gibbon wrote a much admired history of 'The Decline of the Roman Empire,' in which he has, with great skill, infused an abundant proportion of infidelity and impiety, in a peculiarly plausible and imposing manner. [See the above, in part, p. 664.] SCOTT.

V. 12. Pillar.] 'Few texts in the N. T. are more illustrated by antiquity than this. Many inscriptions commemorating victories, have come down to us. Some were placed near, others inside the temples, to be under the protection of the gods, whose names, as well as the conqueror's, were inscribed on them ; also the names of their cities and generals. Much more do these circumstances suit the victories obtained in the games. See West.' DODDR.—'On the columns of temples it was the ancient custom to inscribe names, the honorable names of benefactors, and of their cities.' WOODR.—Perhaps there is allusion to the columnar images of men supporting the ancient temples. Cut, Vol. III. Ed.

I. He shall be a monumental pillar in the temple of God; a monument of the free and powerful grace of God, a monument that shall never be defaced nor removed.

2. On this there shall be an honorable inscription; The name of God, in whose cause he engaged, and the name of the city of God, the church of God, the new Jerusalem, which came down from heaven; on this pillar shall be recorded all the services the believer did to the church of God. And then another part of the inscription is, The new name of Christ, the Mediator, the Redeemer, the Captain of our salvation; by this it will appear under whose banner this conquering believer was enlisted, under whose conduct he acted, by whose example he was encouraged, and under whose influence he fought the good fight, and came off victorious. The epistle is closed with the demand of attention; He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches, how Christ loves and values his faithful people, how He commends, and how He will crown their fidelity.

V. 14—22. We are now come to the last and worst of all the seven Asian churches,

V. 14—16. Laodicea lay to the S. of Philadelphia, and in the road from that city to Ephesus, for the seven churches were situated in a kind of circle; and the progressive journey from one to another of them, in rotation, might be made in the order of these epistles. He sent to the Laodiceans also, under the title of 'the Beginning of the creation of God,' or the Origin, Author, and Ruler of the whole universe, who has authority and power to dispose of all things as He sees good. Col. 1:15—17.—While they were called by his name, and reluctantly performed a scanty measure of external duties, with an evident indifference, and weariness in them, their evil tempers, unholy actions, and attachment to the world, and to its pleasures, company, and interests, dishonored Him more than their apostasy could do; and, in the event, it would be equally fatal to their own souls. Because in this manner they would give numbers an unfavorable opinion of Christianity, as if it had been an unholy religion; while others would conclude that it could afford no real satisfaction, otherwise its professors would not have been so heartless in it, or so ready to seek pleasure or happiness from the world; or that it was not of much value, seeing they would not give up anything of supposed value for the sake of it.—In short, professed Christians of this character are traitors in the camp, who are always more dangerous than open enemies; or wicked servants, who disgrace and rob their masters more, than they can do after they quit, or are turned out of, the family.—Unless, therefore, they became more 'servent in spirit, in serving the Lord,' He was determined to show his contempt and abhorrence of them, by rejecting them; even as a man, whose stomach nauseates water which is lukewarm, casts it out of his mouth with loathing and disgust. the reverse of the church of Philadelphia; for as there was nothing reprov'd in that, here is nothing commended in this; and yet this was one of the seven golden candlesticks; for a corrupt church may be still a church. Here we have, as before,

I. The inscription; to the angel of the church of Laodicea, once a famous city near the river Lycus; it had a wall of vast compass, and three marble theatres, and, like Rome, was built on seven hills. It seems, Paul was very instrumental in planting the Gospel in this city, and from hence he wrote a letter, which he mentions, Col. 4:16. and sends salutations to them, as being not above 20 miles distant. In this city was held a council in the 4th century; but it has been long since demolished, and lies in its ruins to this day, an awful monument of the wrath of the Lamb.

Here, as the one who sends the message, our Lord Jesus styles Himself the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the Beginning of the creation of God. As such He is steady and unchangeable in all his purposes and promises; his testimony of God to men ought to be received and fully believed, and his testimony of men to God will be so believed and regarded, and will be a swift but true witness against all indifferent, lukewarm professors. As The Beginning of the creation of God, He is either of the first creation, and so the Beginning, i. e. the first Cause, the Creator, and the Governor of it; or of the second creation, the church; and so He is the Head of that body, the First-born from the dead, as ch. 1:5. whence these titles are taken.

II. The subject-matter; in which observe,

1. The heavy charge against this church, ministers and people, v. 15. Lukewarmness or indifference in religion is the worst temper in the world. If religion be a real thing, it is the most excellent thing, and therefore we should be in good earnest in it; if it be not a real thing, it is the vilest imposture, and we should be earnest against it; indifference is inexcusable. Christ expects that men should declare themselves in earnest either for Him or against Him.

2. A severe punishment threatened; I will spue thee out of my mouth. As lukewarm water turns the stomach, and provokes to a vomit, lukewarm professors turn the heart of Christ against them; therefore they shall be rejected, finally rejected; far be it from the holy Jesus to return to that which has been thus rejected.

3. We have one cause of this indifferency and inconsistency in religion assigned, and that is, self-conceit'dness and self-delusion, v. 17. Here observe, what a difference there was between the thoughts they had of themselves, and the thoughts Christ had of them.

(1.) They had high thoughts of themselves; Thou sayest, I am rich, &c. rich, and growing richer, and increased to that degree, as to be above all want or possibility of wanting. How careful should we be not to cheat our own souls! Doubtless, many are in hell, that once thought themselves in the way to heaven. Let us daily beg of God, that we may not be left to flatter and deceive ourselves in the concerns of our souls.

(2.) Christ had mean thoughts of them; and He was not mistaken. He knew they were wretched and miserable, &c. their state was such as called for pity and compassion from others. They were poor; really poor, when they said and thought they were rich; they had no provision for their souls. They were blind; they could not see their state, way, nor danger; yet they thought they saw; and the very light that was in them, was darkness; and then how great must that darkness be! They could not see Christ, though evidently set forth, and crucified, before their eyes; they could not see God by faith, though always present in them; they could not see death, though just before them; they could not look into eternity, though they stood on the very brink of it continually. They were naked; without clothing, house, or harbor for their souls; had neither the garment of justification, nor of sanctification; their nakedness both of guilt and pollution had no covering; they were without God, and He has been the Dwelling-place of his people in all ages; in Him alone the soul of man can find rest and safety, and all suitable accommodations; the soul is different from the body, and must have accommodation suitable to its nature, or else, in the midst of bodily prosperity, it will be wretched and miserable.

4. We have good counsel given by Christ to this sinful people, and that is, that they drop their vain and false opinion of themselves, and endeavor to be that really which they would seem to be, v. 18. Observe, Our Lord continues to give good counsel to those who have cast his counsels behind their backs. These people were poor; Christ counsels them to buy of Him gold tried in the fire, that they might be rich; He lets them know where they might have true riches,—from Himself. But they must buy it, Is. 55:1. Something indeed must be parted with, but it is nothing valuable, it is only sin and self-sufficiency. These people were naked; Christ tells them where they might have clothing, and such as would cover the shame of their nakedness. This they must receive from Him; his own imputed righteousness for justification, and the garments of holiness and sanctification. They were blind; and He counsels them to give up their own wisdom and reason, which are but blindness in the things of God, and re-

(15, 16.) 'True religion, which God requires and will accept, does not consist in weak and lifeless inclinations, raised a little above a state of indifference. God, in his Word, insists upon it, that we should be in earnest, "servent in spirit," having our hearts vigorously engaged in religion. Without this, we are nothing as to religion. The things of religion are so great, that there can be no suitability, in the exercises of our hearts, to their nature and importance, unless they are lively and powerful. In nothing is lukewarmness so odious. Religion is frequently compared to those exercises in which the mind and strength are much engaged, as running, wrestling, and fighting.'

PRES. EDWARDS.

(16.) Persons whose spiritual affections are deadened after being once excited, are less likely to have them excited, than those who have never been aroused; perhaps, because spiritual truths and feelings will not then have to them the additional charm and power of novelty. EP.

V. 17. Thou art wretched, &c. The original is peculiarly emphatical; for the article is prefixed to the first epithet, so that the passage may be thus rendered, 'Thou art the wretched one, the miserable one, &c.' and thus alone were they distinguished from all the other churches. SCOTT.

V. 18, 19. The counsels of Christ are commands, invitations, and promises.—These warnings and exhortations were not given them in indignation, but in mercy; for it was the general rule of his conduct, to 'rebuke and chasten those whom He loved.' sign themselves to his Word and Spirit; and their eyes shall be opened to see their way, their end, their duty, their true interest, and this light would be marvellous to them who were but just now delivered from the powers of darkness. This is the wise and good counsel Christ gives to careless souls; and if they follow it, He will judge Himself bound in honor to make it effectual.

5. Here is added great and gracious encouragement to this sinful people, to take the admonition and advice well that Christ had given them, v. 19, 20. He tells them, it was given them in true and tender affection,

PRACT. OBS. When He, who has 'the fulness of the Spirit,' and who rules over all means and instruments, reproves, counsels, or commands; his words imply the promise of all needful assistance, to those who obediently attend to them. But how many professed Christians does that heart-searching Judge, who 'knoweth our works,' behold, 'who have a name that they live,' and perhaps much celebrity in the church, and 'yet are dead in trespasses and sins!' Alas! it is to be feared, that in some cases both national establishments, regularly constituted, with rulers and teachers, but many more select religious societies, who have exact forms and notions, and who profess the truths of the Gospel with some reputation, consist almost entirely of such persons, and have very little vital godliness among them. We should, therefore, be very diligent and impartial in examining ourselves by the rules of Scripture, very earnest in prayer to the Lord to show us what we are, and very careful not to rest satisfied with the opinion of men, even of the wisest and most discerning of the human race, respecting us.—In seeking a revival, in our own souls, or in those of others, it is incumbent on us, 'to remember what we have received and heard;' that, by comparing our advantages and profession with our proficiency, we may be humbled and quickened, and so excited, 'to hold fast' what we retain, and to 'repent and do our first works.'—If we would escape those severe corrections and violent temptations, which, from time to time, are permitted to try the churches throughout the earth; we must patiently adhere to the truth and will of Christ, and shrink from no cross, with which we meet, when following his example; for an unwatchful conduct makes way for temptation, and unfits men to resist it. Alas! how many are there of the Laodicean stamp in every place! Did we suppose these epistles to be prophetic, as to the church in general, we might be induced to conclude, that the end of the world was nigh; for amidst the abounding of iniquity and infidelity, 'the love of many waxed cold;' and the state of religion, Mat. 24:9—14, even in this highly favored nation, too much resembles that of this 7th church. The Lord knows, that very many professors of evangelical doctrine at

Whom I love, I rebuke and chasten. Sinners ought to take the rebukes of God's Word and rod, as tokens of his good-will to their souls, and should accordingly repent, and turn to Him that smites them; better are the frowns and wounds of a friend, than the flattering smiles of an enemy. If they would comply with his admonitions, He was ready to make them good to their souls, v. 20. Behold, I stand at the door and knock, &c. Here, observe, Christ is graciously pleased to come to the door of the heart of sinners, to make them a kind visit; and, though He finds the heart is by nature shut against Him, by ignorance, unbelief, and sinful prejudices; yet He does not immediately withdraw, but waits to be gracious, uses all proper means to awaken them, calls by his Word, and knocks by the impulses of his Spirit on their conscience. They who open to Him, shall enjoy his presence, to their great comfort and advantage. Alas! what do careless, obstinate sinners lose, by refusing to open the door of the heart to Christ!

III. We now come to the conclusion of this epistle; and here, as before, is the promise to the overcoming believer. It implies, that, after all, it was possible, that, by the reproofs and counsels of Christ, they might be inspired with fresh zeal and vigor, and might come off conquerors in their spiritual warfare; and that, if they did so, all former faults should be forgiven, and they should have a great reward, v. 21. Here it is intimated, that Christ Himself had met with his temptations and conflicts; that He overcame, and, as the reward of his conflict and victory, is set down on his throne, to appear in his divine glory equal to the Father; while those also who are conformed to Christ in his trials and victories, shall likewise be conformed to Him in his glory, shall sit down with Him on his throne; on his throne of judgment at the end of the world, on his throne of glory to all eternity; shining in his beams by virtue of their union with Him, and relation to Him, as the mystical body of which He is the Head. All is closed up with the general demand of attention, v. 22, putting all, to whom these epistles shall come, in mind, that what is contained in them is not of private interpretation, but intended for all the churches of Christ in all ages and parts of the world; so that they may expect God will deal with them as He dealt with these; yea, that God's dealings with his churches may afford useful instruction to the rest of the world, to put them on considering, If judgment begin at the house of God, what shall the end of them be that do not obey the Gospel of Christ? I Pet. 4:17. Thus end the messages of Christ to the Asian churches; the epistolary part of this book. We now come to the prophetic part.

present are 'neither cold nor hot;' except as their indifference in essential matters is strangely counterpoised by a hot and fiery spirit of disputation about things of far inferior moment! No doubt, the Laodicean state of the Christian churches, in most parts of the world, is one grand hindrance, nay, the grand hindrance of all, to the propagation of the Gospel among the nations; who can scarcely conceive that religion to be from heaven, the professors of which are so 'earthly, sensual, devilish;' and certainly the state of those who 'hold the truth,' too often 'in unrighteousness,' and generally in a lukewarm manner, forms one grand objection and prejudice against the Gospel, in the minds of numbers in this land; and gives moral and decent Infidels, Socinians, and Arians, their chief advantage against us. Yet the persons, who are chiefly reprehensible, are least likely to regard such admonitions; for whilst the Lord is saying, 'I would thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth;' they are boasting 'that they are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing!' The Pharisaical spirit is indeed always odious and dangerous; whilst it renders men ignorant of their wretchedness, poverty, nakedness, and blindness, and insensible of the preciousness of Christ and his salvation; yet the legal Pharisee is a hopeful character, compared with those, who graft the Pharisee on an evangelical profession, and strangely connect it with Antinomian principles and laxity of morals! The gracious Savior, however, still continues to declare to all men their lost estate [and to counsel them]; may we then hear the voice of his Word and his rod, while, with infinite compassion and condescension, He continues to stand waiting and knocking at the door of our hearts; that He may enter in, and bring salvation with Him. Let us earnestly beseech Him to put forth his almighty power, and thus break down all obstacles to his own admission; and so take entire possession of our whole souls; that we may be ashamed of our folly and ingratitude, in allowing any creature to rival Him in our affections, or attempting to divide our hearts between Him and worldly objects. SCOTT.

V. 20—22. In short, to every conqueror over such strong temptations as the Laodiceans were exposed to, the Lord promised a blessing proportioned to the difficulty of the conflict; for He engaged to 'grant him to sit with Him in his throne;' and, by an inconceivable union and fellowship with Him in all his glory, and an interest in all the benefits of his mediatorial authority and power, to possess an honor and felicity which can never be explained or conceived, except by those who experience it. The same inexpressible dignity would also be bestowed on other conquerors in like difficult circumstances, for the warnings and instructions were intended for the benefit of all who heard them, in every age and nation.—The ruins of this city show that it once was most magnificent; but at present no human creature dwells there. So that the state of these seven cities, both respecting Christianity, and their outward prosperity, exactly accords to the commendation or rebuke, which were given to the churches established there, by the Spirit of prophecy, near 1800 years ago! which remarkable coincidence contains an instructive lesson, and a solemn warning to all other cities and nations favored with the Gospel, and to their rulers ecclesiastical and civil, not to neglect or trifle with so great a blessing.—Nothing, in these short epistles, is said, concerning distinct congregations in any of the cities mentioned; though some time before, there were several elders (presbiteroi or episcopoi) at Ephesus; on the other hand, nothing is introduced respecting any dependent churches in the neighboring towns, or villages, as under the authority of the angel, or presiding minister, in each of these churches. Hence it appears, that men of discordant sentiments, on the subject of ecclesiastical government, in vain attempt to support their several systems, in every part, by this portion of Scripture.

Concluding Note. With this chap. closes that part of the Apocalypse, in the explanation of which, as to the chief matters, most are agreed. The letters are addressed to the 7 Asiatic churches in particular; and I through them to the universal Christian church, in all times and places. Such is the figurative import of 7; and in this sense, this part of Rev. was understood and applied by the most ancient expositors, who have been followed by Grotius, Hammond, Daubuz, Bengel, Ep. Newton, &c. A few, among whom are the respectable names of Henry More, and Vitringa, have thought, that they have discovered a yet deeper prophetic mystery in these addresses, viz. the state of the church to the end of the world, divided into 7 successive and similar periods. Vitringa has discussed this mystical interpretation, with superior learning, and ability; but it has insuperable difficulties. No description of any of the 7 will be found to quadrate with the long period of Gothic darkness preceding the Reformation. Nor do any, especially the last, contain ought applicable to that victorious and pure period, which, from the prophecies of this sacred book, we are entitled to look forward to in the latter days. Besides, Vitringa closes the Christian church as yet to come, before its end on earth.—Bede, and some others, further, fancifully find the successive character of the universal church to be hidden beneath the Greek name of each; thus he finds myrrh in Smyrna, and so applies its quality, &c. Woodh.

The same careful and sober author makes the following important remark:—'The greater part of the comra. have entirely disregarded, or very little noticed the first 3 In these, as the productions of a divine interpreter, I expected to find such specimens of the symbols and language of the Apocalypse, as might materially lead to the interpretation of the remainder. I studied them accordingly, as the means of obtaining a safe Clavis Apocalyptica, and was not disappointed.'

CHAP. IV. V. 1-7. Here is an account of a second vision, with which the apostle John was favored. Observe,

I. The preparation for the apostle's having this vision, 1. A door was opened in heaven. Whence, we learn, (1.) Whatever is transacted on earth, is first designed and settled in heaven. There is the model of all the works of God; all of them are therefore before his eye, and he lets the inhabitants of heaven see as much of them as is fit for them. (2.) We can know nothing of future events but what God is pleased to discover to us; they are within the veil, till God opens the door. But, (3.) So far as God reveals his designs, we may and ought to receive them, and not pretend to be wise above what is revealed. 2. To prepare John

NOTES. CHAP. IV. Prefatory Remarks on this 2d part of the Apocalypse. After the first terrestrial vision, others still more amazing were vouchsafed to the enraptured apostle by successive openings in heaven, affording new and more extended prospects of futurity: (1.) A door was opened in heaven, which gave him a view of the spiritual church and worship, 4:1. (2.) The spiritual sanctuary was opened, 11:19. (3.) Again, 15:5. (4.) Heaven itself was fully opened, 19:11. Hence, the remainder of the book naturally resolves itself into 4 celestial visions. The first and grand division, ch. 4:—11:18.; 2d, 11:19. to 14:20.; 3d, ch. 15 to 19:10.; 4th, 19:11. to 22:5. Hales.

Explication. Woodhouse seems to have pursued the best course; in taking care to fix the precise import of the symbols from their use by the old prophetic and other writers of the O. and N. T.; also, in understanding them, for the most part, in a spiritual, not a literal sense. Bp. Hurd; who gives these as the chief reasons why Woodhouse's book is the best. Woodhouse adopts the following rules:

1. As in inspired writings a mutual relation must exist, we should compare the language, symbols, predictions, of Rev. with those of former revelations; and admit only such interpretation, as should appear to have the sanction of divine authority.

2. Unless the language and symbols of Rev. should in particular passages direct, or evidently require another mode of application, the predictions are to be applied to events occurring in the progressive kingdom of Christ. For whenever sacred prophecy is seen to deviate from its peculiar object, it is in such instances only, wherein the fortunes of God's people have become necessarily involved with those of the heathen nations; and thus we find in the boundless mass of history to what kind of history prophecy is to be applied. When the people of God were to become subservient to the four monarchies, the character and succession and fates of these monarchies were predicted: but the main object continually kept in view in the sacred history, was their deliverance from these successive yokes by the superseding dominion of the Messiah. This supreme and universal dominion, gradually and finally to prevail, appears to be the grand object of all sacred prophecy: and revolutions of worldly power, among the Gentiles, seem noticed only at those times when they impede or promote it. Sec Hurd, serm. 2. 3. And the extension of divine prophecy to the nations, may be observed to take place in exact proportion to their increasing connexion with the Jews. First Moab, Edom, Amalek, the Philistines, &c. are noticed; then Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, &c.; afterwards the 4 great monarchies; lastly, the Gog and Magog, the distant and barbarous nations.

3. As Christ's kingdom, the object of the apocalyptic prophecies, is spiritual, so they are to be understood in a spiritual sense. Spiritual are to be compared with spiritual, as says Paul, 1 Cor. 2:13. It is a kingdom not of this world, John 18:36. not established by the means and apparatus of worldly power and pomp, Lu. 17:20. not with observation, nor bearing the external ensigns of royalty; but governing the inward man, by possession of the ruling principles; the kingdom of God, says our Lord, Lu. 17:21. is within you.

'Such a kingdom,' continues Woodh., (and it is an admirable remark,) 'may be in a great degree independent of the fates and revolutions of empires; affected only by those changes in the political world which are calculated to produce the increase or decline of religious knowledge, and of pure profession and practice. Wars, therefore, and conquests, and revolutions of vast extent, and of great political import, may be supposed to take place, even in the Christian world, without becoming the proper object of Christian prophecy. The inhabitants of the Christian world may be subdued by a ferocious conqueror; the sufferings of the vanquished may be such as result from ferocious conquest: the faithful servants of Christ may undergo their common share in this calamity, may suffer grievously in their property and persons; yet, in such times of general distress, if their religion be not denied them; if they enjoy those consolations, which, under such afflictions, their religion is designed to bestow; if, corrected by the awful visitation, not only they, but Christians of looser practice, and the inhabitants of the earth in general, shall be seen to turn to their God, and allow to his purifying religion its divine influence on their hearts and lives:—shall we expect, that such a revolution should be predicted as a calamity, as a woe? Our conception of the nature of Christ's kingdom, (the object of such prophecy,) will determine us to answer in the negative. But if such a conqueror, after having subdued the bodies of men, should proceed to extend his usurped dominion over their souls; should require them to renounce their allegiance to the heavenly King; to deny their God and Redeemer,—then will succeed a conflict of another nature, and a resistance deserving the notice and interference of divine prophecy. Then will be employed those arms, which properly belong to this spiritual warfare, Eph. 6:16; then will the kingdom of God be truly advanced or diminished.'

'In adopting the rule, I have obeyed the Scripture; which requires a spiritual interpretation of its mysteries, 1 Cor. 2:12-15.; they are not to be taken according to the bare letter, 2 Cor. 3:6. nor in a carnal or worldly acceptance, Jn. 6:26-63. The warfare of the Christian kingdom. (the subject of these prophecies,) is not to be carried on by worldly arms and battles, Jn. 18:36. they who entertain such notions of this religion, "know not what manner of spirit it is of," Lu. 9:55. As the Captain of our salvation conquered by suffering, and refused the sword of Peter, and the legions of angels, ready for his defence, Heb. 2:10. Mat. 27:52-55. so neither by external force must his followers expect to prevail. The kingdom of God is not advanced by crusades; nor is the sword of man employed successfully to seat the Messiah on his throne. To obtain his destined dominion, Christ must reign in the hearts and consciences of his far-extended subjects. His reign is advanced when Christian principles, when faith, and righteousness, and charity, abound. It is retarded when [selfishness,] ignorance, impurity, idolatrous superstition, infidelity, and wickedness prevail.'

As the prophecies of the O. T., interpreted carnally by the Jews, to designate a worldly conqueror, have been seen to lead that infatuated people into egregious error; so, in these days of superior light, when, by experience, as well as divine direction; a spiritual interpretation is so clearly recommended and enforced, it seems extraordinary that any sober and well-informed Christian can look to any other.' Woodh. Indeed, principles are eternal, and infinite, while occurrences are but for a moment, and many a year may pass over a nation, as over an individual, while not one hour of spiritual progress is made. Christians, however, are beginning to view in prophecy, and record in history, not battles and pomps, but the silent march of principles, giving (a thing hitherto the reverse) lines to one, and pages, as is fit, to the other.

4. The 4th rule adopted by Woodh., is, Not to attempt the particular explanation of those prophecies which remain yet to be fulfilled.

Rev. E. Smith remarks, 'One thing is found in the prophetic part of the Rev. of essential interest in its correct exposition.' It is this, that the prophetic part is found in two great and general divisions; each having a plan peculiar to itself. After a notable preparation, in chs. 4 and 5. for an unfolding of the events of futurity, prophecies in the first division commence, in ch. 6. with the opening of the 1st seal, giving an event near the commencement of the Christian era. It thence moves onward through a period of about 2000 years, and closes in the end of ch. 11. in presenting the battle of the great day of God, under the 7th trumpet, and the millennial kingdom of Christ.

'A second general division then commences, like the first, with a plan peculiar to itself,—commencing with the Christian era, and passing onward, as did the first division, and others, not there noted. When it reaches the millennium, where the first division closes, and gives the battle of the great day of God, and the millennium; it thence proceeds to describe that happy period; an apostasy at the close of it; the general judgment; and heaven.'

'This duality of courses over the same period, affords a most happy facility in the exposition of the book. Place the two courses of the divisions side by side; and place by them, as a third column, the history of the church, internal and external, during the same period; add these, with the knowledge of the prophetic, figurative language of the Rev., together with the aid furnished in the prophecy of Daniel, of which a portion of the Rev. is but an inspired exposition,—and a pious, intelligent expositor is happily prepared for his work. E. Smith: whom see, on the 'duty, benefits, and encouragement of a devout and diligent study' of Rev. pp. 23-29.

The same writer pertinently asks... 'May one decide... that no notice is taken in Rev. of the flight of our pilgrim fathers [ &c. ] to this new world, and planting here a cause of salvation, which was to convert the world? no notice taken of the flight of the present missionary angel round the earth to preach the Gospel to all nations? ... To which we may add, that expositors seem also to have quite overlooked another combination of the beast and dragon, a union of oppressive civil power with ecclesiastical despotism, which compels idolatrous regard to its 'autocratic' temporal head, crushing civil liberty and freedom of conscience together,—we mean the portentous power of that vast northern empire which overhangs the west and east, whose imperial will may soon be able to dictate to Europe, on the one hand, and China on the other! Why, too, forget China, containing from a third to a half of the population of the earth? Ed.

for the vision, a trumpet was sounded, and he was called up into heaven, to have a sight of the things to be hereafter: into the third heavens.

3. To prepare for this vision, the apostle was in the Spirit; in a rapture, as before, ch. 1:10. all bodily actions and sensations were for a time suspended, and his spirit was possessed with the spirit of prophecy, and wholly under a divine influence. The more we abstract ourselves from all corporeal things, the more fit we are for communion with God. We should, as it were, forget the body, when we go in before the Lord in duty, and be willing to drop it, that we may go up to Him in heaven. This was the apparatus to the vision. Now observe,

II. The vision itself; it begins with the strange sights the apostle saw, such as these.

1. A throne set in heaven, the seat of honor, and authority, and judgment. 2. A glorious One on the throne; One who filled it, God, who is here described by those things that are most pleasant and precious in our world; not by any human features, so as to be represented by an image, but only by his transcendent brightness. The jasper is a transparent stone, which yet offers to the eye a variety of the most vivid colors, signifying the glorious perfections of God; the sardine-stone is red, signifying the justice of God; that essential attribute which He never divests Himself of, but gloriously exerts in the government of the world, and especially of the church, through our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. A rainbow about the throne, like unto an emerald, v. 3. The rainbow was the seal and token of the covenant of providence God made with Noah and his posterity, and is a fit emblem of that covenant of promise God has made with Christ as the Head of the church, and all his people in Him; which covenant is as the waters of Noah unto God, an everlasting covenant ordered in all things, and sure. This rainbow looked like the emerald; the most prevailing color was a pleasant green, to show the reviving and refreshing nature of the new covenant. 4. He saw four and twenty seats round about the throne, not empty, but filled with four and twenty elders, presbyters, representing, very probably, the whole church of God, both in the Old Testament and in the New Testament state; not the ministers of the church, but rather the representatives of the people. Their sitting denotes their honor, rest, and satisfac-

V. 1-3. When the Lord Jesus had dictated to his apostle the preceding epistles, and thus instructed him to write 'the things which then were,' a short interruption of his visions seems to have taken place. But afterwards, looking and waiting for further discoveries, he beheld 'a door opened in heaven,' the holy habitation of God; and then another vision was introduced, which made way for his being shown 'things which must be hereafter.' 1:12-20. For this ch. and the next constitute an introduction to the prophetic part of the book, especially to the 'opening of the seals,' in chs. 6 and 7. In the spirit. It is not to be supposed, that any external objects were presented to the senses of the prophet, on such occasions: but, the natural use of all their faculties being suspended, their minds were supernaturally impressed with the ideas of such things, as were particularly suited to illustrate the subjects, which they were employed to reveal. Ez. 1:1-3. 8:1-4. 11:22-25. Acts 22:17-21. 2 Cor. 12:1-6. It should not therefore be supposed, that the objects, afterwards mentioned, have a real existence in heaven: but they were visionary emblems, suited to give proper instruction to the apostle, and to his readers: and the chief business of the expositor is to develop the meaning of them, and, as it were, to read the hieroglyphics. This [the throne and He that sat upon it] was emblematical of the universal, absolute, and eternal dominion of JEHOVAH; and of his exaltation far above all creatures, as their great Creator and Sovereign Lord. 4-11. 5: 7:9-17. Is. 6:1-4. Ez. 1:26-28. There is throughout these visions an allusion to the temple, its furniture, and services. 'The rainbow' was a well-known emblem of the covenant of grace. On [the signification of these emblems] the author writes with great diffidence. He conceives, that all the scriptural emblems have some distinct meaning, especially those of this book: but, whether he has pointed out that meaning, or not, in general, and in particular instances, forms another question. See the 'Symbolical Dictionary,' given in the 'Supplement' to this Commentary. Ed.

(2.) In the spirit signifies, to be under a strong and supernatural impulse, caused by the miraculous operation of the Spirit of God acting on the imagination in such a manner, as to open extraordinary scenes, which had not any exact external archetype. It is much illustrated by Ezekiel's trance. (Ez. 8:1.) during which he was insensible to all that passed around him. Ed. 'To the visions by Moses, Ex. 14:9. 10. by Isaiah, 6:1. 2. by Ezekiel, 1:1. 26. by Daniel, 7:9. this has a general resemblance, but such a dissimilarity, as shows they are not copied from each other, but from one common original, varied by circumstances, as portraits of the same person will appear, when drawn by different hands and in varied attitudes. Jasper.] A pellucid, watery gem, so Pliny: it has at 21:11. the epithet, crystal-like, which Schl. refers to the diamond. The clear brilliancy of the divine appearance, seems to have suggested this likeness at first to the prophet's mind; but there was a fiery tinge in it, as Ez. 1:27. so he adds, perhaps, the sardine, which (so Pliny) has a fiery glow.' WOODH.—'We are not to suppose these are real, existing beings, though represented as such.' DODD.

(3.) 'The rainbow would be seen in a circular form, could the whole of it come into view at the same time in our hemisphere.' Vitr.—Such circular halos are sometimes seen around the moon in our climate. The 'bow,' as at Ez. 1:27. indicates a brightness too great to be transmitted by the atmosphere around it, and thus compelled to add to its beauty and glory. Ed.—'The circular session of the 24, is entirely new, (Vitr.) though there is an intimation of it, Is. 24:23. where for "ancients," the Sept. has the word of the text, presbuteroi, elders. Perhaps they represent the spiritual priesthood of both Testaments, and so Mede. See *Woodh. 5 And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices: and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God.

6 And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal: and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before and behind.

7 And the first beast was like a lion, and the second beast like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle.

8 And the four beasts had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.

tion; their sitting about the throne, signifies their relation to God, their nearness to Him, the sight and enjoyment they have of representatives of the whole church of God, both under the old and the new dispensation. The number of these elders may refer to the 24 courses, into which the priests were divided, 1 Chr. 24: or to the 12 patriarchs, and 12 apostles, as the heads of the Old and the New Test. churches. SCORR.—There were also 24 courses of sacred Levite musicians.

(5.) Lamps.] Not lamp-stands, as before; these are explained, Zech. 4:1, 7—10, as the Holy Spirit; of this the antitypes of the lamp-bearers are the receptacles. See Woodh.

V 6—8. Various opinions have been held concerning 'the four beasts,' or 'living creatures;' as it certainly ought to have been tr., in order to adhere to the exact meaning of the original, and to preserve the truth of the emblem. The unaccountable notion, that the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead was represented by them, while two emblems were given of the Son, because of his incarnation and sacrifice, can have no other support, than the names which have sanctioned it; for this plain reason; that 'these living creatures' are, throughout, represented as the principal worshippers, not as the Object of worship. Nor can the far more general and plausible opinion, that they were representatives of the angels, as the cherubim in Ezekiel's vision evidently were, be supported by any sufficient proof. Ez. 1:5—14, 10:1, 2. Angels indeed are personally introduced, in the subsequent part of this vision; but 'these living creatures' are spoken of, as adoring 'the Lamb that was slain, who had redeemed them to God with his blood.' 5:3—10. They must therefore, undeniably, represent some part of the church of redeemed sinners, of the human race. Perceiving this, some expositors have supposed them to be representatives of the whole church, and the 24 elders of its rulers and pastors: but it is surely far more reasonable to reverse this arrangement, and to conclude that 'the four living creatures' represent a part, the 24 elders the whole, of the church, than that the larger number should represent only a part, and the smaller the whole. In short, it seems evident that they were emblems of the true ministers of Christianity, in the different parts of the earth, through successive generations.—Ezekiel, being about to predict providential dispensations respecting the nation of Israel, had a vision emblematical of the ministry of angels, by which those events would be accomplished: but John's predictions relating chiefly to the church in the different regions of the earth, and to the affairs of nations only in subserviency to it, he had a vision emblematical of the ministers of religion, by whom the interests of the church would principally be maintained. As the heavenly temper of mind, and the spiritual endowments which qualify men for this arduous work, accord in great measure, though in a far lower degree, to the affections and endowments of angels; it is not at all wonderful to find a coincidence in the hieroglyphics, by which they were represented. But each cherub, in Ezekiel's vision, had four faces; while John's 'living creatures' had the same four appearances, divided among them; for angels may be supposed to possess singly the several excellences, which are given to many of the most eminent ministers.—In various particulars, the emblem teaches what true and able ministers are and do: and thus it serves to instruct and remind them of their important duties.—(6.) Ex. 24:10. Rev. 15:2. but St. John calls it here a sea, and not a pavement; before, not under the throne; and, at 22:1. water is also represented, as here, by crystal. Four beasts.] 'I. e. living creatures.' No part of the Apocalypse has afforded a greater variety of opinions,' says Woodh, whom see, pp. 111—113. 'By referring to other passages

Him, and their continual regard to Him. They are clothed in white raiment, the righteousness of the saints, both imputed and inherent; they had on their heads crowns of gold, signifying the honor and authority given them of God, and the glory they have with him. All these may in a lower sense be applied to the gospel-church on earth, in its worshipping assemblies; and in the higher sense, to the church triumphant in heaven. 5. He perceived lightnings and voices proceed out of the throne; i. e. the awful declarations God makes to his church of his sovereign will and pleasure. 6. He saw seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are explained to be the seven Spirits of God, v. 5. See on 1:4. 7. He saw before the throne a sea of glass, like unto crystal. In the temple there was a great vessel of brass filled with water, in which the priests were to wash when they went to minister before the Lord, called a sea; so in the gospel-church, the sea or laver for purification is the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, who cleanses from all sin, even from sanctuary-sins. 8. He saw four animals, living creatures, between the throne and the circle of the elders, (as seems most probable,) standing between God and the people; these seem to signify the ministers of the Gospel, not only because of this their situation nearer to God, and between Him and the elders or representatives of the Christian people, and because fewer in number than the people; but as they are here described, (1.) By their many eyes, denoting sagacity, vigilance, and circumspection. (2.) By their lion-like courage, their great labor and diligence, in which they resemble the ox; their prudence and discretion becoming men, and their [moving on God's errands, with alacrity, as well as their] sublime affections and speculations, by which they mount up with wings like eagles toward heaven, v. 7. and these wings full of eyes within, to show that in all their meditations and ministrations they are to act with knowledge, and especially should be well acquainted with themselves and the state of their own souls, and see their own concern in the great doctrines and duties of religion, watching over their own souls as well as the souls of the people. (3.) By their continual employment, and that is, praising God, and not ceasing to do so night and day. The elders sit and are ministered unto; they stand, and minister, they rest not night and day. This now leads to the other part of the representation.

V. 8—11. We have considered the sights the apostle saw in heaven: now let us observe the songs he heard there. 1. He heard the song of the four living creatures, of the ministers of the church, which refers to the prophet Isaiah's vision, ch. 6. And here, they adore (1.) One God, the One only, the Lord God Almighty. (2.) The three Holies in this one God, the Holy Father, in this sacred book, where mention is made of these zōa, (5:6, 14, 6:1, &c. 7:11, 15:7.) it plainly appears, that their station is, as in part here described, "round about the throne." They encompassed it on every side, and are within the encircling body of the elders. But in this passage, they are said also to be "in the midst of the throne,"—the position of the great Father, and afterwards (ch. 5.) of the Lamb, in union with Him; and it can only be applied to the zōa, as expressing their very near approach to the throne. Like the cherubim, in the midst of which the God of Israel, under the O. T., is represented as sitting, they seem to occupy a part of the throne.—But this passage can be understood only by comparing it with similar descriptions of the appearance of the divine glory to mortal eyes, as delivered in the prophecies of Is. 6. and Ez. 1. In Is. angelic beings, called by him seraphim, surround the divine throne, and each of them has 6 wings, like those in the Apocalypse, and they sing Holy, Holy, Holy, in the same manner. In the vision of Ez., the angelic beings are, like them, 4 in number; and, together with one human appearance, they have the faces of the 4 animals to which these in Rev. are likened. And Ez. has pronounced that the zōa he saw and described, were cherubim, and that he knew them to be such.—These two descriptions, though differing from each other in the name, and in some few particulars, are of the same divine original. The variety is because the throne in Is. is stationary, in Ez. movable. But in Rev. they are brought to a closer similitude, by a common measure of comparison resembling them both. This comparison of the 3 visions, so necessary to a right understanding of the zōa in Rev., may be seen to advantage in Vitr.—As to the objection to consider them thus,—as cherubim or seraphim, the most exalted of created beings, the nearest to the throne of the Almighty King, his inseparable attendants, not angels (messengers), but superior beings, of angelic nature,—drawn from the expression 5:9. we must restore the text from the MSS. of highest authority, which read, 5:10. them, instead of us. Besides, they sing their song in behalf of the universal church, uniting with the elders, to whom, as ministers from the Christian church on earth, this song more peculiarly belongs. 4:9, 5:8—14. Woodh.—Newc. explains, 'the whole body of the church, who serve God in heaven, with the strength of affection, perseverance, reason, swiftness.' It is the hypothesis of Dr. J. R. Park, that, in these 'living creatures,' the lion is symbolical of the Hebrew race, from which the Messiah was Himself descended, styled, ch. 5. 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah.' The calf he applies to the Pagan race, as a noted object of Egyptian worship. The 3d creature, represents, he thinks, the race of Ishmael; and the eagle, the Romans. See his book.

(7.) 'The ancients dealt much in hieroglyphics: Middleton gives a gem, having a man's face, an elephant's head, a peacock and a sceptre joined together. This he thinks symbolized Socrates, whom the man's face resembled; while the other figures showed the beautiful and divine images in his mind. The peacock would mean the beauty of his virtue; the sceptre, his majesty and authority; the elephant, the strength and fortitude of his mind. Or, it may express the philosopher, especially the Stoic's wise man, who was furnished with all kinds of virtues and perfections, being the only beautiful and valiant man, and a king, whatever his circumstances might happen to be.' Doddr.—Comp. the 'Symbol Dictionary,' given in the 'Supplement'; also the list of scripture-symbols prefixed to the notes on this ch.; and compare the engraving there given of the famous Zodiac of Dendera, which contains a large proportion of the symbols in use in the apostolic age, especially in Egypt. the mother of mysteries. This tablet was taken from the ceiling of a temple in Dendera, the ancient Tentyris, in Egypt, and is supposed to represent the horoscope of Octavius Cæsar. Much controversy was aroused on its removal to the hall of the great French Library at Paris, where it now is; and some, taking it for a zodiac, made out by labored calculations, that the date of its drawing must overture the Bible account of the deluge. The premature triumph of the infidel was checked, however, when Champollion read the name of the Cæsar, (see repeated again and again in our ent.) who caused his own nativity to be east, and here drawn out. the Holy Son, and the Holy Spirit; and these are one infinitely Holy and Eternal Being, who sits upon the throne, and lives for ever and ever. In this glory the prophet saw Christ, and spake of Him. 2. He heard the adorations of the 24 elders, that is, of the Christian people represented by them; the ministers led, and the people followed, in the praises of God, v. 10, 11. Here, observe, (1.) The Object of their worship, Him that sat on the throne, the eternal, ever-living God. (2.) The acts of adoration. They fell down before Him that sat on the throne; they discovered the most profound humility, reverence, and godly fear. They cast down their crowns before the throne; they gave God the glory of the holiness where-with He had crowned their souls on earth, and the honor and happiness with which he crowns them in heaven. The Lord Jesus, 'having overcome the sharpness of death, hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers;' and if we look unto Him by faith, and obediently attend to his voice, whilst He calls us to 'set our affections on things above;' we shall, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, behold the glory of our reconciled God on his 'throne of grace;' he encouraged by the engagements of his everlasting covenant, and draw nigh in humble boldness with our worship; notwithstanding the terrors of his justice, and the awful curses of his brok-

It appeared as a roll, consisting of several parchments, according to the custom of those times; and though it was supposed to be written within, yet nothing could be read till the seals were loosed. It was afterwards found to contain 7 parchments, or small volumes, each of which was separately sealed: but if all the seals had been on the outside, nothing could have been read till they had all been loosed; whereas the loosing of each seal was followed by some discovery of the contents of the roll: yet the appearance on the outside seems to have indicated, that it consisted of 7, or at least of several parts. (1.) 'The most judicious comtrs. are generally agreed on this ch.' WOODH. Right, &c.] 'As being of divine original, and infallibly true.' Bl. Book.] Most of these volumes, or books (for the ancients arranged them both in leaves and rolls, note end of Jer.) were only written inside, those written outside also were called opisthographoi, as here. So Bl.; who thinks the notice of its being written on both sides, is to intimate 'the copiousness of the matter.' Sealed.] Mede supposes them to Observe, They do not say, We give Thee glory, and honor, and power; for what can any creature pretend to give unto God? But they say, Thou art worthy to receive glory. In this they tacitly acknowledge, that God was exalted far above all blessing and praise; He was worthy to receive glory, but they were not worthy to praise, nor able to do it according to his infinite excellences. (4.) We have the ground and reason of their adoration, which is threefold. He is the Creator of all things, the first Cause; and none but the Creator of all things should be adored. He is the Preserver of all things, and his preservation is a continued creation. He is the final Cause of all things; for thy pleasure they are and were created. It was his will and pleasure to create all things; He was not put on it by the will of another; there is no such thing as a subordinate creator, that acts under, and by the will and power of another; and if there were, he ought not to be worshipped. As God made all things at his pleasure, He made them for his pleasure; to deal with them as He pleases, and to glorify Himself by them one way or other. Though He delights not in the death of sinners, but rather that they should turn and live, yet He hath made all things for Himself, Prov. 16: 4. Now if these be true and sufficient grounds for religious worship, as they are proper to God alone, Christ must needs be God, one with the Father and Spirit, and be worshipped as such; for we find the same causality ascribed to Him, Col. 1: 16, 17. All things were created by Him, and for Him, and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist.

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. Hitherto the apostle had only seen the great God, Governor of all things; now, 1. He is favored with a sight of the model and methods of his government, as written in a book He holds in his hand; and this we are now to consider as shut up and sealed in the hand of God. Observe, (1.) The designs and methods of Divine Providence toward the church and the world are stated and fixed; as that which is written in a book. The great design is laid, every part adjusted, all determined, and everything passed into decree, and made a matter of record. The original and first draft of this book, is the book of God's decrees, laid up in his own eternal mind: but there is a transcript of so much as was necessary to be known, in the book of the Scripture in general, in the prophetic part of Scripture especially, and in this prophecy in particular. (2.) God holds this book in his right hand, to declare the authority of the book, and his readiness and resolution to execute all the counsels and purposes therein recorded. (3.) This book in the hand of God, is shut up and sealed; it is known to none but Himself, till He allows it to be opened. (4.) It is sealed with seven seals. This tells us with what inscrutable secrecy the counsels of God are laid, and also points to us seven several parts of this book of God's counsels; each of which seems to have its particular seal, and, when opened, discovers its proper events; these seven parts are not unsealed and opened at once, but successively, one scene of Providence introducing another, and explaining it, till the whole mystery of God's counsel and conduct be finished in the world.

2. He heard a proclamation made concerning this sealed book. (1.) The crier was a strong angel; who seems to come out not only as a crier, but as a champion, with a challenge to any, or all the creatures, to try the strength of their wisdom in opening the counsels of God; thus he cried with a loud voice, that every creature might hear. (2.) The challenge proclaimed, was, v. 2. 'If any creature thinks himself sufficient either to explain or execute the counsels of God, let him stand forth, and make the attempt.' (3.) None could accept the challenge; none in heaven; none of the glorious, holy angels, though before the throne of God, and the ministers of his providence; none on earth; no man, none of the magicians and soothsayers; none of the prophets of God, any further than He reveals his mind to them: none under the earth; none of the fallen angels, none of the spirits of men departed, though they should return to our world, can open this book. Satan himself, with all his subtlety, cannot do it; the creatures cannot open it, nor look on it; they cannot read it, God only can do it.

3. He felt a great concern about this matter, so that he wept much; it was a great disappointment to him. Observe, Those who have seen most of God are most desirous to see more; those who have seen his glory, desire to know his will; and they may be too eager and too hasty to look into the mysteries of divine conduct; so much so, as to be greatly grieved that their desires are not presently answered.

4. The apostle was comforted, and encouraged to hope this sealed book should yet be opened. God had revealed it to his church; one of the elders. God can make his people to instruct and inform their teachers when He pleases. It was the Lord Jesus Christ who would do the thing; called, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, according to his human nature; alluding to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49: 10. and the root of David, according to his divine nature, though a branch of David, according to the flesh. He who is a middle Person, God and Man, and bears the office of Mediator between God and man, is fit en law. For blessed are all they who belong to his church, in heaven, or on earth. If we are baptized with the illuminating, purifying, and transforming influences of the Holy Spirit, washed in the pure fountain of the Redeemer's blood, and clothed in the sacerdotal robe of his righteousness; we shall ere long have done with conflict and suffering, receive the victor's honorable crown, and join in the rapturous adoration of the heavenly worshippers. The 4 first trumpets then commence a following course of judgments on the Christian empire, after the revolution under Constantine, from Paganism; fulfilled in the northern invasions of the empire, till the dethroning of its last emperor Momylus. 5 And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof.

6 And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb, as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.

7 And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne.

8 And when he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints.

9 And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And hast made us our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; and worthy to open and execute all the counsels of God toward men. And this He does in his mediatorial state and capacity, as the King and Head of the Israel of God; and He will do it, to the consolation and joy of all his people.

V. 6—14. Here,

I. The apostle beholds this book taken into the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ, in order to its being opened and executed by Him. Where Christ is described, 1. By his place and station; in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and of the elders; on the same throne with the Father; Christ, as Man and Mediator, is subordinate to God the Father, but nearer to Him than all the creatures, for in Him all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily. The ministers stand between God and the people; Christ, as Mediator, between God and both ministers and people. 2. The form in which He appeared. Before, He is called a Lion; here, He appears as a Lamb slain: a Lion, to conquer Satan; a Lamb, to satisfy the justice of God. He appears as a Lamb, having seven horns and seven eyes; perfect power to execute all the will of God, and perfect wisdom to understand it all, and to do it in the most effectual manner; for He hath the seven Spirits of God, He has received the Holy Spirit without measure, in all perfection of light, and life, and power, by which He is able to teach and rule all parts of the earth. 3. He is described by his act and deed; He came and took the book, &c., v. 7. not by violence, nor by fraud, but prevailed to do it, as v. 5. prevailed by his merit and worthiness; He did it by authority, and by the Father's appointment.

II. The apostle observes the universal joy and thanksgiving that filled heaven and earth on this transaction. And, indeed, it is just matter of joy to all the world, to see that God does not deal with men in a way of absolute power and strict justice, but in a way of grace and mercy through the Redeemer.

The song of praise offered on this occasion, consists of three parts; one sung by the church, the other by the church and the angels, the third by every creature.

1. The church, as being more immediately concerned, v. 8. the four living creatures, and the 24 elders, the Christian people, under their minister, they lead up the chorus; where, observe, (1.) The object of their worship,—the Lamb, the Lord Jesus Christ; all men should honor the Son as they honor the Father; for He has the same nature. (2.) Their posture; they fell down before Him; gave Him not an inferior worship, but the most profound adoration. (3.) The instruments used in their adorations; harps and vials; the harps, instruments of praise, the vials full of odors or incense, which signify the prayers of the saints. (4.) The matter of their song; suited to the new state of the church, the gospel-state introduced by the Son of God. They acknowledge the infinite fitness and worthiness of the Lord Jesus for this great work of opening and executing the counsel and purposes of God, v. 9. They mention the grounds and reasons of this worthiness; and though they do not exclude the dignity of his Person as God, without which He had not been sufficient for it, yet they chiefly insist on the merit of his sufferings, which He had endured for them; these more sensibly struck their souls with thankfulness and joy. Here, They mention his suffering; Thou wast slain, and the fruits of his sufferings; Thou hast made us, &c. redemption to God, from the bondage of sin, guilt, and Satan; and high exaltation, kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth, v. 10.

2. The angels; they take the second part, in conjunction with the church, v. 11. they are said to be innumerable, and to be the attendants on the throne of God, and guardians to the church; though they did not need a Savior themselves, yet they rejoice in the redemption and salvation of sinners; and they agree with the church in acknowledging the infinite merits of the Lord Jesus, as dying for sinners; that He is worthy to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing.

3. This doxology, thus begun by the church, and carried on by the angels, is resounded and echoed by the whole creation; v. 13. the whole fares the better for Christ, by Him all things consist; and that part that (by a prosopopœia) is made for the whole

A Lamb slain, &c.] This was an emblematical representation of the Savior's High Priesthood, before God, in our nature, as risen from the dead, through the merit of his sacrifice, in behalf of 'all who come to the Father through Him;' so that it was in consequence of that atonement, which the sacrificing of spotless lambs had prefigured from the beginning, that He prevailed to open the book. Seven Spirits, &c.] Notes, 1:4—6. 4:4, 5.—Several eminent expositors suppose, that 7 superior angels, or archangels, are meant; but the texts referred to, and the emblematical style of the book, are inconsistent with that interpretation. 2 Chr. 16:7—10. (6.) And lo.] 'Probably interpolated.' Bl. As it, &c.] 'The Gr. implies, that the Lamb appeared with a wounded neck and throat, as if smitten at the altar, as a Victim. And this He said immediately after He had vanquished the formidable enemies of man, Sin and Death, under this form of a victim. Mat. 28:18.' WOODR.

V. 8—10. When Christ, as 'the Lamb which had been slain,' had received the book, and was preparing to loose 'the seals,' the 'four living creatures, and the elders,' who had before prostrated themselves in adoration of the great Creator, 4:9—11. now fell down in like manner to worship the Lamb, or the incarnate Son, as the Savior of sinners; thus rendering Him divine honor, even in the presence of the Father's manifested glory. Harps, golden vials, &c.] Though heaven is the scene of these visions, yet they had continual reference to the temple and its worship; and the state of the church on earth is throughout particularly adverted to: harps were emblems of praise and thanksgiving; and the golden vials, or small censers, or cups, represented the acceptableness of the prayers of the saints, through the intercession of Christ, and by the influences of his sanctifying Spirit. Moreover, they all joined in a song of praise, which was not only most excellent, but it was also new, in respect of the occasion and composition: for the O. T. church celebrated the praises of JEHOVAN, their Redeemer from Egypt, and anticipated the coming of the expected Messiah; but the N. T. church adored Christ, as actually come, as having finished his work on earth by his sacrifice on the cross, and as entered into his mediatorial glory. M. R. z.—Notes, 7:9—12. 14:1—5. 15:1—4. It is indisputably manifest, that the 'four living creatures' join in, or rather lead, the worship of the Lamb, as 'having redeemed them to God;' and this proves, beyond controversy, that part of the redeemed church is meant by this emblem; and not angels, whose worship is next described, but in language evidently different. 11—14. 4:4—11. SCOTT.

We will embalm it by our praise, which shall live while we have breath, and sink away upon our dying lips. And we will embalm it among the songs of the upper world. If we are permitted to come and stand where the elders now, how will we bow and sing. When we shall look down to hell, and see our old companions there, and then back to Calvary, and then look up and read the touching traces of love in those melting eyes, and among the prints of the nails and thorns, we will embalm his name, if love and songs can do it. If ever new inhabitants should come in from other worlds, they shall hear the story of Calvary. If commissioned, in remote ages of eternity, to visit other systems, we will carry the amazing tidings to them. While gratitude and truth remain, the name and love of Jesus shall never be forgotten.' V. 11—14. While these adoring praises were rendered, by the representatives of the church of redeemed sinners, to their divine Savior; the apostle heard likewise 'the voice of many angels round about the throne,' and encircling without the living creatures and elders, whose number amounted to many millions, and could not be ascertained. Yet they all, in perfect harmony, with a loud voice of adoration confessed, that 'the Lamb, who had been slain,' for the redemption of sinful men, was 'worthy to receive power,' in his mediatorial character, and in human nature, over all creatures in heaven and earth; and 'riches,' even all the treasures of grace and glory, for the benefit of his people, and that 'wisdom, strength, honor, glory, and blessing,' should be vested in Him, and ascribed to Him, as the Object of universal adoration, praise,

PRACT. OBS. How vain and presumptuous must all man's endeavors be, to discover future events, beyond the discernment of a sagacious probable conjecture, or as instructed by 'the sure word of prophecy;' seeing that all things respecting the future are sealed up in impenetrable secrecy; and no creature in heaven, earth, or hell, is able or worthy to disclose the least tittle of them, except the incarnate Son of God alone! We need not indeed weep, that we cannot foresee the future events respecting ourselves in this world; as the eager expectation and prospect of distant prosperity would unfit us for present duties and conflicts; and the foresight of future calamities would render our most prosperous days distressing. Yet in this distracted, evil world, we may properly desire to learn, from the promises and prophecies of Scripture, what will be the final event to believers, and to the church; and in both gratitude, and admiring love. Thus 'the innumerable company of angels,' though they do not stand related to the Savior as partakers of the same nature, and have no immediate concern in his redemption, are yet represented, as beholding such divine excellency and glory in Him, and his mediatorial work, (for 'into these things they desire to look,') that they adore and honor Him with most rapturous ascriptions of praise; rejoice in his exaltation 'far above all principality and power,' and his authority in human nature over all of them, and seem to vie with redeemed sinners in his worship! Notes, Eph. 3:9-12. 1 Pet. 1:10-12.—In this they were immediately joined by all the inhabitants of heaven and earth, and the souls of those in the separate state, whose bodies were under the earth, or in the sea; or by all creatures in the universe, according to their several capacities, with the exception of none but the determined enemies of God. (Notes, Ps. 148:) These, indeed, the nature of the case, and the whole tenor of Scripture, as well as other visions in this book, necessarily exclude; yet they too, though reluctantly, shall bow to Christ, and be put under his feet. (Notes, Is. 45:20-25. Rom. 14:10-12. 1 Cor. 15:20-28. Phil. 2:9-11.) All the rest, however, rendered and ascribed 'blessing, and honor, and glory, to Him that sat on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever,' to which 'the four living creatures' joined a cordial 'Amen.' Thus the whole church, by its representatives, fell down and worshipped the eternal God. 1:8-11. 4:9-11. John 5:20-23. 1 John 5:20, 21.—What words could more fully and emphatically declare, that Christ is and ought to be worshipped, equally with the Father, by all creatures, to all eternity? Will any one, after reading this, assert, that He is a mere Man, or a created Being? or that it is idolatry to worship Him? Or will such persons profess to believe, that this book is the unerring Word of God? If they waver as to this point, can they disprove the divinity of a book, the prophecies of which have already been so remarkably accomplished? Or can any man, who opposes the worship of Christ, or the doctrines of his Deity and atonement, and of salvation through faith in his blood, suppose that he can ever enter heaven? or, if this might be, that he could join in the work and worship of that blessed world, or even so much as endure it?—But there can be no dissentients, no discordant voices, in that world of light and love! (Note, Col. 1:9-14.)—(11) Ten thousand, &c. Not 'ten thousand times ten thousand;' but 'ten thousands of ten thousands,' both being plural. 9:16.—(14) Him that liveth for ever and ever. 1:18. 4:9. creation, is a song of blessing, and honor, and glory, and power; (1.) To Him that sits on the throne, to God, as God; or to God the Father, as the first Person in the Trinity, and the first in the economy of our salvation; and, (2.) To the Lamb, as the second Person in the Godhead, and the Mediator of the new covenant; not that the worship paid to the Lamb is of another nature, an inferior worship, but their parts in the work of our salvation being distinct, they are distinctly adored. We worship and glorify one and the same God, for our creation, and for our redemption.

We see how the church that began the heavenly anthem, finding heaven and earth join in the concert, closes all with their Amen, and end as they began, with a low prostration before the eternal and everlasting God. Thus we have seen this sealed book, passing, with great solemnity, from the hand of the Creator, into the hand of the Redeemer.

CHAP. VI. The book of the divine counsels being thus lodged in the hand of Christ, He immediately enters on the work of opening the seals, and publishing the contents; but this is done in such a manner, as still leaves the predictions very abstruse, and difficult to be understood: now, therefore, we are to launch into the deep; and our business is, not so much to fathom it, as to let down our net to take a draught. We shall only hint at what seems most obvious; the prophecies of this book are divided into 7 seals opened, 7 trumpets sounding, and 7 vials poured out. It is supposed that the opening of the 7 seals discloses those providences that concerned the church in the first three centuries, from the ascension of our Lord and Savior to the reign of Constantine; this was represented in a book rolled up, and sealed in several places, so that when one seal was opened, you might read so far of it, and so on, till the whole was unfolded. Yet we are not here told what was written in the book, but what John saw in figures enigmatical and hieroglyphic; and it is not for us to pretend to know the times and the seasons, which the Father has put in his own power.

V. 1, 2. Here, 1. Christ, the Lamb, opens the first seal; He now enters on the great work of opening and accomplishing the purposes of God toward the church and the world. 2. One of the ministers of the church calls on the apostle, with a voice like thunder, to come near, and observe what then appeared. Whereupon, 3. We have the vision itself, v. 2. White horses are generally refused in war, because they make the rider a mark for the enemy; but our Lord Redeemer was sure of the victory and a glorious triumph, and He rides on the white horse of a pure but despised Gospel, with great swiftness through the world. The bow in his hand may denote convictions impressed by the Word of God, which are as sharp arrows; ministers of the Word may draw the bow, but it is God who directs it, and makes it effectual. When Christ was going to war; one would think a helmet had been more proper than a crown; but a crown is given Him as the earnest and emblem of victory. So He went forth conquering and to respects, the Incarnate Son has prevailed to procure us all the information which our circumstances need. May we then value, and study to become acquainted with, every part of that revelation, which He has given us.—The whole universe could never, in any other instance, show such a union of unsearchable riches and deep poverty, of sovereign authority and willing, entire subjection, of divine dignity and immense humiliation and condescension, of majesty and meekness, of holiness and love of sinners, of justice and mercy, of desert of honor and happiness, with patient endurance of most complicated sufferings. In these, and various other respects, He is altogether worthy of our admiration, confidence, and imitation, as far as it is possible for us to be placed in similar circumstances. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. Upon the establishment of Constantine the Great on the Imperial throne, as the first Christian emperor, the persecutions of Pagan Rome ceased, and Christianity became the established and favored religion, throughout the empire.—When the Lord Jesus, as 'the Lamb that had been slain,' 'opened the first seal,' the apostle's attention was excited, by a voice like thunder, and one of 'the four living creatures' called on him to come and see what passed. This was the voice of him who was 'like a lion;' and the same took place, respecting the other living creatures in their order, after the opening of the next three seals; but the meaning of the emblem does not clearly appear. 4:6-8.—Those who suppose the apostle to have had this vision in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 68, explain this emblem [the 'white horse,' &c.] of the victories gained by Vespasian and Titus, among which the taking and destruction of Jerusalem was most considerable. But it is almost incredible, that this most important event should be only thus obscurely hinted at, if it had been then in futurity; and it is far more likely, that the apostle wrote this book a considerable time after that event. Others, therefore, explain this discovery, of some victories, obtained by the Emperor Trajan, over the surrounding nations; but these events had no immediate connexion with the affairs of the church, and Trajan, who was a persecutor, however celebrated in other respects, was not aptly described by one mounted 'on a white horse.' Zech. 1:7-11. 6:1-8. This emblem rather denotes righteousness and purity; and the mild, beneficent victories of Christ, by his Word and Holy Spirit, in the conversion of sinners to 'the obedience of faith,' seem to have been thus predicted. After his advancement to his mediatorial throne, He had gone forth, as a merciful and beneficent Conqueror, and had obtained many victories; but both Jews and Gentiles opposed the progress of his Gospel; yet the opening of this seal showed, that He would still go on with his conquests, and more widely than ever extend his spiritual dominion. Accordingly, accurate historians are of opinion, that Christianity spread more rapidly and extensively among the Gentiles just after this time, than it had before done. SC.

This state lasted, perhaps, for 3 centuries. Two periods seem designated: the 1st when the Christian religion, preached in purity by its apostles, overcame the powers of darkness and all human opposition. The 2d, when, after a long warfare, during which this holy religion has been corrupted and debased, it will at length be seen to overcome all opposition, and to conquer. These two periods are plainly distinguished in Dan. 2:34, 35.'

(2.) It is impossible to enumerate any considerable part of the very numerous interpretations of the symbolic horses. Mede, Newton, and many others, consider they point out four periods in the latter history of the Roman empire, and select successive events which they consider to correspond with the personifications. Keith applies them respectively to the four religious systems; Christianity, Mohammedism, Popery, Infidelity. That of Woodh. is adopted by Cuninghame, W. Jones, and others. This idea seems also to have been long since recommended by Pareus. See the general [tabular] note, for further particulars of the views of the leading modern commentators on this and the other symbolical representations.

V. 3, 4. The Lord Jesus, in his righteous providence, seems to be here represented, as commissioning and employing the executioners of his vengeance on his obstinate enemies. (Marg. Ref. i-1.) Accordingly historians record, that insurrections, bloody battles, massacres, and devastations of a most extraordinary kind, took place, between A. D. 100, and A. D. 138. 580,000 Jews are computed to have been slaughtered, in different places, during that period; and even a larger number of the Romans and Greeks seem to have been butchered by them, in the most barbarous manner imaginable. So that the two parties of the enemies of Christ and the Gospel, the Jews and idolaters, seemed to vie with each other, in executing his righteous vengeance on their competitors. Notes, Is. 10:5-15. Jer. 27:4-9. 51:20-24. Ez. 30:20-26.—Some make this period to have lasted longer than is above stated; but such difficult questions cannot be particularly discussed, in this compendious view of these comprehensive prophecies.

SCOTT.

(4.) 'The second delineation, unrolled by the breaking of the seal, exhibits a fire-colored horse, 12:3. 9:17. Zech. 1:8. Take peace.] Rather, the peace of the earth, see on v. 1, 2. and to place in its stead hatred, variance, wrath, strife, bloodshed, (not of nations, but of "hethren and companions," among themselves, for such is the force of the Gr.) the effects of a fiery zeal, without knowledge and charity, the bond of peace: to this, had the pure, and loving, and unselfish Christianity degenerated in that age. [Perhaps the great sword denotes civil power, and nothing is more disastrous to the purity of the church than this union.] Shall we date this period from the close of the 2d century; when the rulers of the western church, and the wise and moderate Irenæus, were seen to interpose in tumults of this tendency, and to exhort the furious bishop of Rome to cultivate Christian peace? (Euseb.) The fiery, intolerant character which marks this seal, was indeed too visible in these transactions; but the hue from white to fire color, changed gradually. The persecuting hand of the common enemy, of the heathen still in power, restrained this factious spirit for a time; and although, previous to the Dioclesian persecution, in 302, there were shameful divisions among the Christians, which Euseb. mentions with a becoming mixture of indignation and tenderness, (Ecc. Hist. 3. 1.) yet the change cannot be deemed complete, so as to produce the full character of this 2d seal, till a later period. But, when the Roman empire became Christian; when a Christian emperor bore [that powerful] "sword;" when, relieved from the terrors of Pagan persecution, the Christians became possessed of civil influence, their animosities increased. Worldly prosperity is corruptive; and, instead of those halcyon days of peace and happiness, which the church promised to itself from the acquisition of power, a period succeeded from which history is seen to date its degeneracy and corruption; (see on last vs. of ch. 7.) at this time manifested in the mutual enmity and feuds of Christians; which were so notorious in the 4th century, that a contemporary author reports of them, (with some hyperbole, perhaps, for he was a Pagan,) that "the hatred of Christians to each other, exceeded the fury of wild beasts against men." Amm. Marcel. 22:5. This was a great change from the times of Tertullian, in the 2d cent.; when the Pagans said, "See, how these Christians love one another." Tertull. Apol. c. 39. It is a change powerfully expressed by fire-color succeeding to white. The contests for power conquer. As long as the church continues militant, Christ will be conquering; He conquers his enemies in his people, in the progressive work of sanctification; and He conquers them in the world, wicked men, some by bringing them to his foot, others by making them his footstool. Observe, From this seal opened, the successful progress of the Gospel of Christ in the world is a glorious sight. Whatever convulsions and revolutions happen in states and kingdoms, the kingdom of Christ shall be established and enlarged, in spite of all opposition.

V. 3-8. The next three seals give us a sad prospect of the great and desolating judgments with which God punishes those who either refuse or abuse the everlasting Gospel: some understand them of the persecutions that befel the church of Christ, and others of the destruction of the Jews; but they rather represent, more generally, God's terrible judgments, by which He avenges the quarrel of his covenant on those who make light of it.

1. Who this was, that sat on the red horse, whether Christ Himself, as Lord of hosts, or the instruments He raised up to conduct the war, is not clear; but this is certain,— those who will not submit to the bow of the Gospel, must expect to be cut in sunder by the sword of divine justice; for Jesus Christ rules and commands, not only in the kingdom of grace, but of providence; and the sword of war is a dreadful judgment.

2. The black horse signifies famine, and the pair of balances signify, that men must now eat their bread by weight, as threatened, Lev. 26:26. What follows in v. 6, has made some expositors think this was not a vision of famine, but of plenty; but if we consider the quantity of their measure, and the value of their penny, at the time of this prophecy, the objection will be removed; their measure was but a single quart, ['rather more,' Scott,] and their penny our sevenpence-halfpenny, and that is a large sum to give for a quart of wheat; however, it seems this famine, as all others, fell most severely on the poor; whereas the oil and the wine, which were dainties of the rich, were not hurt; but if bread, the staff of life, be broken, dainties will not supply the place of it. Here, observe, When a people loathe their spiritual food, God may justly deprive them of their daily bread. One judgment seldom comes alone, and the judgment of war natu-

and promotion among Christian bishops, and rulers, were not concluded without mutual slaughter; [see the sneering Gibbon;] and in the controversies occasioned by the schisms of the Donatists, and of the Arians, many thousands of Christians perished by the weapons of each other. See Mosheim, cent. 4, 5. The evil continued to increase until it produced a further change, from bad to worse, which will appear under the next seal.'

WOODH.

V. 5, 6. 'The black horse' was a proper emblem of calamity and mourning; and the balances in the hand of the rider denoted, that, in the times referred to, there would be a great scarcity of provisions; so that men would have their food weighed out to them, with great exactness, as it is done when any company is reduced to short allowance. Lev. 26:26. Note, Ez. 4:9-17. The voice, also, which proclaimed the price of corn, has the same meaning; though, to an English reader, it seems to denote the contrary.—Yet the orders given to the emblematical executioner of this sentence, to 'spare the oil and the wine,' may imply, that there should not be a total failure of the fruits of the earth. Perhaps the luxuries were not so much injured as the bread-corn. Gen. 43:11, 12.—This seal is supposed, by some expositors, to have reached from A. D. 138, to A. D. 193; though others state it differently. There is, however, no material disagreement between them; and there are accounts, in the history of those years, of long-continued scarcities, through the whole Roman empire; during which, all the care of the emperors, and their ministers, could only just prevent the horrors of entire famine.—This was another method, by which Christ fought against the persecutors of his church.

Woodh. tr. yoke, and refers it to slavery, and subjugation; as Gen. 27:40. Nah. 1:13, &c. ED.—In the N. T., zugos is used metaphorically, to signify the burden of slavery, 1 Tim. 6:1. and more especially to represent the burden some ceremonies enjoined by the law of Moses, from the observance of which the Christian "law of liberty," had delivered the converts. Ac. 15:10. Gal. 5:1. Ja. 1:25. 2:12. Col. 2:16. 1 Pet. 2:16. The same application of zugos, in the Greek fathers, and of jugum in the Latin, was by them continued. See Socrat., Euseb., Grabe, Augustin. From the history of the church, we learn, that attempts were made, at different times, to put a yoke of superstitious observances on the necks of the disciples; and every attempt seems to have made some little progress towards the system of [spiritual] slavery. As the stream of Christianity flowed further from its pure fountain, it became more and more corrupt; as centuries advanced, ignorance and superstition increased; and unauthorized mortifications and penances, rigorous fastings, vows of celibacy, monkish retirement and austerities, stylitism, the jargon and repetition of prayers not understood, tales of purgatory, pious frauds, and the worship of saints, relics, and images, took the place of pure and simple Christianity: till at length, the Book of God being laid aside for legendary tales, and the "traditions of men," all these corruptions were collected into a regular system of superstitious oppression, well known by the name of the Papal yoke. The Eastern church kept pace with the Western for some time, in the introduction of burdensome and unauthorized observances; and the Mahometan religion, derived from the corrupted Jewish and Christian, has imposed a similar kind of yoke on its numerous followers, in those extensive regions of the world where it prevails.'

(5, 6.) 'The proportion between the bread-corn, i. e. wheat, and barley was, it seems, the usual one. It is not agreed, if the command is, not to injure the wine and oil, or not to do wrong in [selling] them. The latter seems best, and so Mede, Daubuz, Jaspis, and Heintz. Perhaps it means, do not adulterate it. The four articles mentioned, then formed the main support of life.'

rally draws after it that of famine. The famine of bread is a terrible judgment; but the famine of the Word is more so, though careless sinners are not sensible of it.

3. Upon opening the fourth seal, there appears another horse, of a pale color; the name of the rider, Death, the king of terrors; the pestilence, which is death in its empire, death reigning, death on horseback, marching about, and making fresh conquests every hour. The attendants, or followers, of this king of terrors are,—hell, a state of eternal misery to all those who die in their sins; and, in times of such a general desolation, multitudes go down unprepared into the valley of destruction. It is an awful thought, and enough to make the whole world to

(6.) 'From Tacitus, and Mat. 20:2. a penny, (7½ pence,) [12 to 15 cents] appears to have been the daily wages of a laborer. From Herod., Diog. Laert., Hippocr., Athen., it seems the measure here was no more than was allowed to the slave for his daily food. What would become of families, when a man by his labors could gain no more, and that only of bread, than might suffice for his own subsistence?' DoddR.—'During the progress of this black horse, the necessities of life should be attainable, though at an excessive price, and the more costly commodities should not be injured. According to the tenor of prophetic language, these articles signified that food of religious knowledge, (Am. 8:11.) by which the souls of men are sustained unto everlasting life; such we are invited to buy, Is. 55:1. Comp. Rev. 3:18. But when the dark clouds of ignorance and superstition, denoted by the black horse, spread over the face of the Christian world, the knowledge and practice of true religion became scarce. Yet, during the long continuance of these dark times, the prophetic command has always been fulfilled, there always has been some spiritual food, however scanty the supply; and that invaluable repository of Divine knowledge, of spiritual wine and oil, the Word of God, has been accessible to some, and wonderfully preserved uninjured, and by the art of printing will thus be delivered to posterity.' WoodR.—A chenix, or measure of wheat, was just enough for the daily food of a poor family, [Herod. 7. 186.] and the price of it is here stated as a denarius, the whole amount of a day's wages. Mat. 20:2. But in times of plenty a denarius would usually purchase from 16 to 20 measures of wheat. In Cicero's day, 16, in Trajan's, 20. Expositors have written much upon this head. Cuninghame censures the expositions which would apply these seals to certain vicissitudes of no great moment in the secular affairs of the Roman empire, during the first three centuries. He asks, in terms which might be used in reference to other literal and individual applications of the symbols of this book, 'Was it then for the purpose of discovering to the church, the state of the Roman markets for corn and oil, or the efficiency of its police in apprehending thieves, that all these mighty preparations were made in heaven?' Vitringa, in reference to Mede, made similar remarks. 'This spiritual famine shall, notwithstanding, be accompanied with great fleshly pleasures and commodities, represented by wine and oil.—Diodati. He considers this seal to denote spiritual hunger, after the bread of life, which is the true and pure Word of God.' HENRY, abr. En.

V. 7, 8. The pale horse, on which Death rode as a terrific conqueror, followed by hell, (or the grave, and the state of departed souls,) was an apt emblem of the several divine judgments, which are afterwards enumerated; and through which, it is said, that 'power was given to death and hell,' over the fourth part of the earth; or a large proportion of its inhabitants, especially throughout the whole Roman empire. Some expositors make this seal to reach from A. D. 193, to A. D. 270; others include only 50 years of that time under it. However, within the shorter period, there were more than 20 Roman emperors, who for a time ruled with great power, and most of them with great tyranny and cruelty, as long as their dominion continued; there were also above 30 usurpers in different parts of the empire, who supported their claims by war, and perished with multitudes of their adherents. Amidst such intestine convulsions and fierce contests within the several provinces of the empire, 'death on his pale horse,' must have destroyed immense numbers with the sword. This universal war and confusion, by taking men off from the cultivation of the earth, and destroying the fruits of it when produced, naturally made way for famine; which grievously prevailed in every place. The scanty, low, and unwholesome diet, occasioned by hunger or famine, naturally introduced pestilence, which is often called death by the eastern writers; and the most learned men have declared, that so extensive and destructive a pestilence, as that which during this period wasted the empire for 15 years together, is tremble, that eternal damnation immediately follows on the death of an impenitent sinner. Observe, There is a natural as well as judicial connexion between one judgment and another: war is a wasting calamity, and draws scarcity and famine after it; and famine, not allowing men proper sustenance, and forcing them to take that which is unwholesome, often draws the pestilence after it. God's quiver is full of arrows; He is never at a loss for ways and means to punish a wicked people. In the book of his counsels He has prepared judgments for scorners, as well as mercy for returning sinners; threatenings against the wicked, as well as promises to the righteous; and our duty is to observe and believe the threatenings as well as the promises.

4. After the opening of these seals of approaching judgments, and the distinct account of them, we have this general observation, that God gave power to them, v. 8. that is, those instruments of his anger, or those judgments themselves; to these He gave power. And here to war, famine, and pestilence, is added, the beasts of the earth, another of God's sore judgments; Ezek. 14: 21. mentioned here last; because, when a nation is depopulated by the sword, famine, and pestilence, the small remnant that continued in a waste and howling wilderness, encourage the wild beasts to make head against them, and they become an easy prey. Others, by the beasts of the field, understand brutish, cruel, savage men, who, having divested themselves of all humanity, delight to be the instruments of the destruction of others.

V. 9—17. In the remaining part of this ch. we have the opening of the fifth and the sixth seals.

I. The fifth seal; no mention is made of any who called the apostle to make observation, either because the decorum of the vision was to be observed, and each of the four living creatures had discharged its duty of a monitor before; or because the events here opened lay out of the sight, and beyond the time, of the present ministers of the church; or because it does not contain a new prophecy of any future events, but rather opens a spring of support and consolation to those who had been, and still were, under great tribulation for the sake of Christ and the Gospel. Here observe, not met with in universal history. These desolations must also have given opportunity to wild beasts to increase on the residue of the inhabitants; and accordingly we read, that they were forced to wage war with wolves, lions, and tigers, and that many were devoured by them. Ez. 5:14—17. 14:13—21. SCOTT.—'One account records the entrance of 500 wolves at once into a depopulated city.' Bl. Comp. note, Jer. 5:6. Ed.—(3) Pale.] Chlōros. 3:7. 9:4. (3.) 'The period of the 4th seal is one of great slaughter and devastation, but not confined to the lives of men; these extend their destructive influence over whatever may tend to make life happy, making ravages on the spiritual lives of men. When, under the 2d seal, uncharitable controversies and ambitious animosities had banished that peace which true religion cannot fail to promote; and dark ignorance and superstition, and domineering priestcraft (under the 3d seal) had fixed a burdensome yoke on the necks of the disciples, and made pure Christian knowledge of difficult attainment, then greater evils naturally ensued. Ignorance became blind submission, and priestcraft advanced into civil tyranny. Thus the mystery of iniquity was completed, and the usurpation extended both over the lives and consciences of Christians. To profess pure religion became a crime. Severe and murderous laws were enacted against those who deviated from the standard of doctrine established by corrupt rulers. Whole nations of Christians, under the name of heretics, were subjugated or extirpated. Thus, under the auspices and direction of the professed ministers and rulers of the Christian church, death and hell were seen to devastate a great part of the Christian world, destroying the lives of men, both literally and spiritually, and rooting out the pure doctrines of the Gospel. The precise periods of these 4 seals, cannot be exactly ascertained, for the changes were gradual.—Pale.] Chlōros: here is a sublime climax, or seal of terrific imagery in the colors of the horses. From the application of the imagery of horses in Scripture (comp. Zech. chs. 1 and 6. Rev. 19: 11—17, &c.) it may appear, that a man on horseback, in scriptural vision, represents the going forth of some power divinely commissioned to effect changes upon earth; and that the character of the change is to be collected from the color of the horse; the red, denoting war and slaughter; the black, mourning and woe; the white, victorious innocency and blissful peace. The seals denote the progressive character of the Christian times, from its pure beginning, to its greatest corruption. It begins with pure white; then changes to fiery and vengeful; then to black, or mournful; and when we suppose that nothing more dreadful in color can appear, then comes another gradation still more ghastly and terrific, even this deadly pale, the livid, greenish hue of corruption. The number four implies universality or completion.' WOODR.

1. The sight this apostle saw at the opening of the fifth seal; a very affecting sight, v. 9. the souls of the martyrs under the altar; at the foot of the altar of incense, in the most holy place; in heaven, at the foot of Christ. Note, Persecutors can only kill the body, and God hath provided a good place in the better world for those who are faithful to death, and are not allowed a place any longer on earth. Holy martyrs are very near to Christ in heaven; they have the highest place there; not their own death, but the sacrifice of Christ, gives them reception, and a reward there; they do not wash their robes in their own blood, but in the blood of the Lamb. The cause they suffered in was, the Word of God, and the testimony they held; for believing the Word of God, and attesting or confessing the truth of it; this profession of their faith they held fast without wavering, even though they died for it. A noble cause;

V. 9—11. Under the altar.] Continual reference [is had] to the appearance of the divine glory in the sanctuary, and to the peculiarities of the Jewish worship; Is. 6:1—3. 'the souls of those persons, who had been slain' for believing and obeying the Word of God, and 'for the testimony which they' had borne to the truth of the Gospel,—these appeared as sacrifices, which had newly been offered; to show their fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, Note, 5:5—7. and the acceptableness of their faithfulness unto death, through his propitiatory oblation: for it is probable, that the altar of burnt-offering is intended; though some understand it of the golden altar for incense, within the sanctuary. These souls appear to have represented, not only such persons as had suffered martyrdom before the apostle had this vision; but the whole multitude, who were slain previous to the prophetic period referred to, beginning about A. D. 270. They however, with one consent and a loud

11 And white <sup>m</sup> robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest <sup>n</sup> yet for a little season, until <sup>o</sup> their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

12 And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great <sup>p</sup> earthquake; and the sun <sup>q</sup> became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood;

13 And the stars <sup>r</sup> of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her <sup>s</sup> untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.

14 And the heaven <sup>t</sup> departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every <sup>u</sup> mountain and island were moved out of their places:

15 And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves <sup>v</sup> in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains;

16 And said <sup>w</sup> to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb:

the best that any man can lay down his life for,—faith in God's Word, and a confession of that faith.

2. The cry he heard; it was a loud cry, and contains a humble expostulation about the long delay of avenging justice against their enemies, v. 10. Observe, Even the spirits of just men made perfect retain a proper resentment of the wrong they have sustained by their cruel enemies; though they die in charity, praying, as Christ did, that God would forgive them. They commit their cause to Him to whom vengeance belongeth, and are not for avenging themselves. There will be joy in heaven at the destruction of the implacable enemies of Christ, as well as at the conversion of other sinners. When Babylon falls, it will be said, Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her, Rev. 18: 20.

3. He observed the kind return made to this cry, v. 11. both what was given them, and what was said to them. There were given them white robes, the robes of victory and of honor; their present happiness was an abundant recompense of their past sufferings. It was said to them, they should be satisfied, easy in themselves, for it would not be long but the number of their fellow-sufferers should be fulfilled; this is a language rather suited to the imperfect state of the saints in this world, than to the perfection of their state in heaven; there is no impatience, no uneasiness, no need of admonition; but in this world there is great need of patience.

II. We have here the sixth seal opened, v. 12. Some refer this to the great revolutions in the empire in Constantine's time, the downfall of paganism; others, with great probability, to the destruction of Jerusalem, as an emblem of the general judgment, and destruction of the wicked, at the end of the world; and, indeed, the awful characters of this event are so much the same with those signs mentioned by our Savior, as foreboding the destruction of Jerusalem, that it hardly leaves any room for doubting but that the same thing is meant in both places; though some think that event was past already. See Mat. 24: 29, 30. Here observe,

1. The tremendous events that were hastening; several occurrences contribute to make that day and dispensation very dreadful: (1.) A great earthquake; it may be taken politically; the very foundations of the Jewish church and state would be terribly shaken, though they seemed to be as stable as the earth itself. (2.) The sun became black as sackcloth of hair; either naturally, by a total eclipse, or politically, by the fall of the chief rulers and governors of the land. (3.) The moon should become as blood; the inferior officers, or their military men, they should be all wallowing in their own blood. (4.) The stars of heaven should fall to the earth, v. 13. The stars may signify all the men of note and influence among them, though in lower spheres of activity; there should be a general desolation. (5.) The heaven should depart as a scroll, when it is rolled together. Their ecclesiastical state shall perish and be laid aside for ever. (6.) Every mountain and island shall be moved out of their places. The destruction of the Jewish nation should affect and affright all the nations round about, a judgment that should astonish all the world. This leads to,

2. The dread and terror that would seize on all sorts of men in that great and awful day, v. 15. Neither authority, nor grandeur, nor riches, nor valor, nor strength, would be able to support men at that time; yea, the very poor slaves, who, one would think, had nothing to fear, because they had nothing to lose, would be all in amazement at that day. Observe, The degree of their terror and astonishment; it should prevail so far as to make them like distracted, desperate men; they would be glad to be no more seen; yea, to have no longer any being. The cause of their terror was, the angry countenance of Him that sits on the throne, and the wrath of the Lamb. Observe, That which is matter of displeasure to Christ, is so to God; they are so entirely one. Though God be invisible, He can make the inhabitants of this world sensible of his awful frowns. Though Christ be a Lamb, yet voice, inquired of the Lord, as 'holy and faithful,' or 'the holy and the true One,' (Note, 3:7.) how long He would endure the provocations of the persecutors, before He proceeded to judge their cause, and avenge their blood on the inhabitants of the earth, by the subversion of the persecuting power of Pagan Rome. This was the language of their zeal for the honor of God, and their desire of the prevalence of the Gospel. 18: 20. Deut. 32:34, 35. Ps. 94:1—7. Rom. 12:17—21. The 'white robes given' to each of them denoted, that they were immediately admitted into a state of felicity, as accepted and holy: but they were required to 'rest,' and wait a short space for 'the avenging of their blood,' as there were many others of their brethren, who would suffer death in the same cause, before the purposes of God respecting the destruction of their persecutors were fulfilled. 7:13—17. 12:7—12. 18:20. 19:1—6. 'Mr. Lowman observes very well, that this representation seems much to favor the immediate happiness of departed saints, and hardly to consist with that uncomfortable opinion, the insensible state of departed souls, till after the resurrection.' Bp. Newton.—This seal seems to have been a prediction of the terrible persecution of the church, under Dioclesian, which reached much further, and was far more bloody, than any of those that had preceded it. The fury of it lasted for ten years, which was called by Christians, 'The Era of Martyrs;' but this seal is supposed by some expositors to relate to the whole time between A. D. 270, and 304.—Here also there are immaterial differences of opinion among learned men: and, as so many interesting events are hinted at in a few vs., it can scarcely be supposed that, after so many centuries, we should be able to determine these matters with exactness; especially as the historians of those times were uncommonly inaccurate and confused in their writings.

(9.) Altar.] 'Perhaps the brazen altar of burnt sacrifice, was pictured on the roll, and so unfolded when the 5th seal was broken.'

WOODH.

(10.) 'There seems no reason why this seal should be restricted to any particular body of martyrs of any particular period. All are to be avenged: and it may, perhaps, be most fitly understood to comprehend all the martyrs to the Christian cause, from the apostolical age to the happy time when such sufferings shall finally cease.'

Id.

(11.) 'Nothing could more encourage Christians to endure their sufferings with steady patience than this, that it was appointed of God, that a certain number of martyrs should be put to death, and that the season of their triumph was [as certainly] to succeed.'

DODD.

V. 12—14. The great earthquake, &c., was emblematical of extraordinary revolutions, in the civil and religious state of the world, attended with vast commotions of every kind, [and resulting in] the total subversion of the Pagan persecuting dominion, by the victories of Constantine, and by his accession to the imperial throne; and the entire and universal change, which took place at that time. 'The great lights of the heathen world, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were all eclipsed and obscured, the heathen emperors and Cæsars were slain, the heathen priests and augurs were extirpated, the heathen officers and magistrates were removed; the heathen temples were demolished, and their revenues were appropriated to better uses.' Bp. Newton.—M. R. i.—Is. 13: 9, 10. Jer. 4:19—27. Ez. 33:7, 8. Mat. 24:29—35. Such bold metaphorical descriptions of great revolutions abound in the prophecies of Scripture; for these events are emblems and anticipations of the end of the world, and the day of judgment: nor could any revolution be more properly represented by this language, than the entire and final subversion of the greatest fabric of Pagan idolatry, tyranny, and persecution, which ever existed on earth. 20:11—15. (12) Earthquake.] See on Mat. 8:24. The similitude of the figs, in a strong wind, falling from the fig-tree, is highly energetic.

SCOTT.

(12—17.) 'The earthquake, and other natural commotions, and phenomena, as they often denote revolutions and changes, so they are here generally supposed to mark the violent commotions, which agitated the empire, from the reign of Maximian, to that of Constantine. [See Scott.] Woodh. and Burton, however, suppose this vision to relate to the end of the world, and the final triumph of the Gospel over its enemies. Comp. Mat. 24:29. Prof. Lec is of opinion, that the whole manifestly relates to the progress of the persecutions, and the judgments, poured out and witnessed during the first ages of the church. Sackcloth.] The coarse hair-cloth, of a blackish color, then in common use.'

BLOOMF.

(14.) As they read their scrolls, by unrolling one end as they rolled up the other, (cut Jer.: end,) it would happen, that in the middle of the roll, if it was cut across, the parts would each curl over its respective roll. This consideration renders the simile peculiarly lively and magnificent.

Ed.

V. 15—17. This unexpected change would throw all the persecuting and opposing party into the utmost consternation and despair: and the apostle, in his vision, saw them all, even the slaves and freed-men, as well as the kings, captains, and great or rich men, endeavoring to shelter themselves in dens and caverns, and vehemently wishing to be crushed by rocks and mountains; if that might but cover them from the power and manifested presence of God, and from 'the wrath of the Lamb,' whose Gospel they had opposed, and whose servants they had persecuted. For the prevalence of Christianity, and the accession of a Christian emperor, would lead them to conclude with desperation, that Jesus was indeed the Lord; that the time was come when He would take full vengeance on his enemies; and that none could resist Him, escape from Him, or pacify Him. 9:6. Josh. 10:16—18. Is. 2:19—22. Hos. 10:7, 8. Luke 23:26—31. He can be angry, even to wrath, and the wrath of the Lamb is exceeding dreadful; for if the Redeemer, that appeases the wrath of God, Himself be our wrathful enemy, [through our rejection of his atonement,] where shall we have a friend to plead for us? They perish without remedy, who perish by the wrath of the Redeemer. As men have their day of opportunity, and their seasons of grace, so God has his day of righteous wrath; and when that day comes, the most stout-hearted sinners will not be able to stand before Him: all these terrors actually fell on the sinners in Judea and Jerusalem, in the day of their destruction; and they will all, in the utmost degree, fall on impenitent sinners, at the general judgment of the last day.

CHAP. VII. The things contained in this ch. come in after the opening of the 6 seals, which foretold great calamities in the world; and before the sound of the 7 trumpets, which gave notice of great corruptions arising in the church; between these comes in this comfortable ch. which secures the graces and comforts of the people of God in times of common calamity.

V. 1—3. By these winds, v. 1. we suppose are meant those errors and corruptions in religion which would occasion great trouble and mischief to the church of God: they are four, and contrary one to another,

PRACT. OBS. The ministers of the Gospel ought to call men's attention to the prophecies of Scripture, and to the events in Providence, which accomplish them.—Our prayers should continually be presented before 'the throne of grace,' that our exalted Redeemer may still 'go forth, conquering and to conquer.'—But He fights in another manner against the despisers of his salvation, and the opposers of his glory: He can raise up and employ sanguinary potentates, or insurgents, to execute his vengeance on his enemies, Mat. 22:1—10, and when He gives them power, and leaves them to their 'own hearts' lusts,' they soon execute multitudes to kill one another by 'the force of the sword.' He can also withhold the influences of the heavens, and restrain the earth from yielding its increase; and so visit the nations with distressing scarcity, and thus tended greatly to fill the church with hypocrites, which introduced a worldly spirit, and at length caused manifold evils: yet this prophecy fully proves, that real religion was at first greatly promoted by the advancement of a Christian emperor; and that it obtained an establishment in many places, which before had little regarded it.—I saw another Angel, even the great Angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, ascending up from the eastern coasts, where Jerusalem stood; who, by virtue of his Mediatorship, had in his hand that Seal, or mark of the living God, which in his eternal decree is set upon his elect, whereby they are sealed both to salvation in the end, and to a gracious protection till then: who did, by the mighty voice of his word, command these four angels, . . . saying, Hold your hands, &c.' (17.) 'Viringa considers, that the 6th seal foretells, that great commotions would suddenly arise, both in the empire of papal Rome, and in the other kingdoms and states of Europe,—that, in common with the 7th vial, it foretells the destruction of the antichristian empire. This was the opinion of several early writers. Daubuz applies it to the downfall of paganism. HENRY, abr.

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. This ch. is a continuation of the sixth seal. (Notes, 6:12—17. 8:1—6.)—The 'four angels, standing on the four corners of the earth,' and their 'restraining the winds,' that no destructive tempests might be excited by land or sea, is supposed to be an emblem of the tranquillity of the Roman empire, and of all nations, subsequent to Constantine's accession to the imperial throne, which was the more delightful, as it succeeded such long-continued and terrible convulsions and desolations.—At the same time 'another angel came up from the east.' This angel seems to have been an emblem of Christ Himself; for who else could have 'the seal of the living God,' even the Holy Spirit, by which his people are 'sealed unto the day of redemption?' 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Eph. 1:13, 14. 4:30—32.—By his Gospel, He came from the eastern nations, where his religion was first published; as the rising sun proceeds from the east to west: and He diffused that heavenly light to the western, or European, provinces of the empire, and accompanied it by his new-creating Spirit; and thus 'sealed' great numbers as 'the servants of God.' This great 'Angel of the covenant,' as one having sovereign authority, called to the other angels, to whom a commission had been given, to bring calamities on mankind by land and sea; ordering them not to execute it, till He and his ministers, as the instruments of his grace, had sealed the 'servants of God in the forehead;' that they might be evidently distinguished from others, and so be preserved during the approaching calamities. This signified, that great numbers would be baptized, and profess themselves disciples of Christ, during the happy tranquillity which followed Constantine's accession; and that very many would be really converted, and renewed to the image of God, by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit.—The Gospel was very extensively preached during this period, and immense multitudes embraced Christianity. The favor, indeed, shown to the converts to Christianity, in an indiscriminate and injudicious manner, induced numbers, from secular motives, to profess themselves Christians; or destructive famine, and death, when commissioned by Him, and pestilences, sweep away millions into the grave, and their eternal state; till at length the beasts of the earth seem to acquire the dominion of the desolated lands, and add to the miseries of the few remaining inhabitants. How mad must it then be for the potsherds of the earth to contend against his iron rod!—But let us be thankful for our exemption, in this highly favored land, from these dire calamities, and for our peace, liberty, plenty, and manifold advantages; and let the rich be reminded, even in times of comparative scarcity, to give more liberally to the relief of their poor neighbors, and needlessly spend much less on themselves. SCOTT.

and thus tended greatly to fill the church with hypocrites, which introduced a worldly spirit, and at length caused manifold evils: yet this prophecy fully proves, that real religion was at first greatly promoted by the advancement of a Christian emperor; and that it obtained an establishment in many places, which before had little regarded it.—I saw another Angel, even the great Angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, ascending up from the eastern coasts, where Jerusalem stood; who, by virtue of his Mediatorship, had in his hand that Seal, or mark of the living God, which in his eternal decree is set upon his elect, whereby they are sealed both to salvation in the end, and to a gracious protection till then: who did, by the mighty voice of his word, command these four angels, . . . saying, Hold your hands, &c.' V. 4—8. This account of the numbers sealed from the 12 tribes, cannot be understood in a literal sense; . . . the times of Constantine seem intended. 6:12—14. As therefore the tribes of Israel were numbered, after they were formed into a nation, so the numbers added to the church, in consequence of this establishment, were figuratively declared to be 144 thousand, or 12 times 12 thousand; a large definite number, probably, being put for an indefinite: and this being divided into 12 parts, one of them was assigned to each of the tribes of Israel; intimating, that these persons succeeded to their privileges, and occupied their place: for, I apprehend, the Gentile converts, as well as those of Israel, were intended, Note, 9—12. since none else are mentioned as having been sealed. The tribes are here arranged differently than in any other place. Judah is placed first, in honor of Christ, who sprang from him: Dan is wholly omitted, perhaps because idolatry was first publicly established by that tribe. Judg. 18: Others, however, think that the tribe of Dan had long before become nearly extinct: and, indeed, the tribe is not expressly mentioned in the genealogies contained in the first of the Chronicles. Levi is numbered with the rest: and Joseph is placed instead of Ephraim, while Manasseh is likewise continued. The order of primogeniture is neglected; nor is any regard shown

8 Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

9 After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands;

10 And cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.

11 And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, 12 Saying, Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

13 And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they?

14 And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.

Jews; more are the children of the desolate than of the married woman. 2. The Lord knows who are his, and He will keep them safe in times of dangerous temptation.

V. 9—12. Here we have the songs of saints and angels on this occasion; where observe,

1. The praises offered up by the saints, (as it seems to me, Gentile believers,) for the care of God in reserving so large a remnant of the Jews, and saving them from infidelity and destruction. Observe, (1.) Their posture; they stood before the throne, and before the Lord; before the Creator, and the Mediator. In acts of religious worship, we come nigh to God, and we must come by Christ; the throne of God would be inaccessible to sinners, were it not for a Mediator. (2.) Their habit; they were clothed with white robes, were invested with the robes of justification, holiness, and victory, and they had palms in their hands, as the conquerors used to appear with in triumphs; * such a glorious appearance will the faithful servants of God make at last, when they have fought the good fight of faith, and finished their course. (3.) Their employment; they cried with a loud voice, &c. This may be understood either as a hosannah, wishing well to the interest of God and Christ in the church, and in the world; or as a hallelujah, giving to God and the Lamb the praise of the great salvation; both the Father and the Son are joined together in these praises; the Father contrived this salvation, the Son purchased it; and they who enjoy it, must and will bless the Lord and the Lamb; and they will do it publicly, and with becoming fervor.

2. The song of the angels, v. 11, 12. Observe, (1.) Their station,—before the throne of God, attending on Him, and about the saints, ready to serve them. (2.) Their posture; very humble, and expressive of the greatest reverence; they fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God. Behold the most excellent of all the creatures, who never sinned, who are before Him continually, not only covering their faces, but falling down on their faces before the Lord! What humility, then, and what profound reverence, become us vile, frail creatures, when we come into the presence of God! (3.) Their praises; they con-presented to the praises of the saints, said their Amen thereto; there is in heaven a perfect harmony between the angels and saints; and then they added more of their own, saying, Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen. Here they acknowledge the glorious attributes of God,—his wisdom, his power, and his might,—declare that for these his divine perfections He ought to be blessed, and praised, and glorified, to all eternity; and then they confirm it by their Amen. We see what is the work of heaven, and we ought to begin it now, to get our hearts tuned for it, to be much in it, and to long for that world where our praises, as well as happiness, will be perfected.

V. 13—17. Here we have a description of the honor and happiness of those who have faithfully served the Lord Jesus Christ, and suffered for Him; where observe, 1. A question asked by one of the elders, for John's instruction. Now the question has two parts: What are these? and Whence came they? It seems to be spoken by way of admiration, as Cant. 3:6. The apostle tacitly acknowledges his own ignorance, in the answer, and sends to this elder for information; Thou knowest. Those who would gain knowledge, must not be ashamed to own their ignorance, nor to desire instruction from any able to give it. The elder informs; where notice, 1. The low and desolate state these now so arrayed had formerly been in; great tribulation, persecuted by men, tempted by Satan, sometimes troubled in their own spirits; they had suffered the spoiling of their goods, the imprisonment of their persons, yea, the loss of life itself. The way to heaven lies through many tribulations; but tribulation, when gone through well, will make heaven more welcome and more glorious, [exercising to that character, which is to be ours there.] 2. The means by which they had been prepared for the great honor and happiness they now enjoyed, v. 14. It is not the blood of the martyrs themselves, but the blood of the Lamb, that can wash away sin, and make the soul pure and clean in the sight of God; other blood stains; this only makes white and clean. 3. The blessedness to which they are now advanced, being thus prepared for needs hate something] they began to quarrel among themselves, and to persecute one another. Woodh.—Why will Christians prefer to carry scourges for one another, rather than the palm-branches of joyful victory over our common enemy? Ed.

(10.) 'It should be tr. "the salvation." Thus it expresses that peculiar deliverance, and state of safety, which this palm-bearing multitude of Gentile converts, together with the chosen Israelites, now experienced from the great tribulation. Woodh.—Some suppose, the 144,000 represent Jewish converts; the great multitude, Gentile believers.—See the general note. Guyse considers the 1st to be converts, both Jews and Gentiles; the 2d, the martyrs. Vitr. considers, that the full accomplishment is yet to come, as no period can be assigned when the destruction of Christ's enemies, and the exaltation of his servants in perfect purity and happiness, have borne a satisfactory resemblance to what is here depicted.' HENRY, abr.

V. 13—17. The scene, thus presented to the apostle's mind, related to events which did not occur till above 200 years afterwards, namely, in the time of Constantine: as he was, therefore, receiving prophetic information, one of the representatives of the universal church [to fix his attention] inquired of him, whether he knew who they were, thus 'arrayed in white robes,' or whence they came. And the apostle having respectfully replied, that he was persuaded the elder well knew, thus intimating his desire of instruction; he was shown, that 'these were persons who had come out of great tribulation.'—This could not be meant of the Gentiles, converted to Christianity after the accession of Constantine; for they had come out of no great tribulation, peculiar to them rather than others: and though it might be accommodated to the state of the church at large in those peaceful days, which had succeeded to a season of extreme tribulation; yet it far more aptly and emphatically represented the case of those multitudes, who had been 'faithful unto death,' amidst the harassing persecutions of the foregoing ages, 6:9—11. Acts 14:19—23. 1 Thes. 3:1—5. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.—Nothing on earth can fully answer to such language as this: and indeed the prosperity of the church at the time predicted very soon terminated as a dream; (Notes, 12.) and cannot be reasonably considered, as exclusively, or primarily, nor indeed at all intended, by this most energetic and rapturous language. But such a view of the immediate felicity of those, who followed Christ faithfully in the predicted season of persecution, was very proper to reconcile the minds of Christians to their trials, and to animate them to face death in its most terrifying forms. Accordingly, the church, during these times, seems to have studied this book more, and even to have understood this first part of (5—8.) Dan, early apostatizing, became a common receptacle of idolatry, and thus the means of corruption; therefore, it is thought, the tribe (as that of Ephraim, for a similar reason) is omitted. Levi is substituted, who, being dispersed among the other tribes as ministers, received no allotment in Canaan. But now, being to enter on the heavenly Canaan, where there is no temple, and all are priests to God; (21:22. v. 10.) the service of this tribe, as priests, is no longer needed; and therefore it resumes its ancient station among the brethren. WOODH.

V. 9—12. Many suppose the preceding vs. relate exclusively to the Jewish converts, who were at this time added to the church; and that these refer to the Gentiles who embraced the Gospel during the same period; and others explain them of the peace and prosperity of the church during those days. But it appears to me evident, that the happy estate of those, who had adhered to Christ during the preceding calamities, and had been 'faithful unto death,' was intended: for though they had been slain, or had otherwise been removed, before the favorable change took place; they were by this no losers, nay, exceedingly benefited; and the language of the subsequent verses is so energetic, that nothing short of heavenly felicity can answer to it. (Note, 13—17.)—A multitude so large, that no man could number it, collected from the several nations of the earth, known in those days, appeared to 'stand before the throne,' as accepted worshippers of God; and 'before the Lamb,' as his redeemed people. 5:8—10. 19:1—6. This view and interpretation give us enlarged conceptions of the success of the Gospel, during the first three centuries; and may encourage the hope, that vast numbers lived by obedient faith, and died in Christ, unknown to history; notwithstanding the lamentable account transmitted to us, of the heresies, contentions, and corruptions which prevailed at that early period. For these form by far the most prominent subjects in the ecclesiastical records of those times.—[As to their habit, and the concurrence of the angels in their praise, Scott writes as in Henry.] SCOTT.

(9.) These palm-bearers cannot denote that race of degenerate and nominal Christians in Constantine's times, of whom Bp. Newton says, 'though Constantine's success (the "little help") added much to the temporal prosperity, yet it contributed little to the spiritual graces and virtues of the Christians. It enlarged their revenues, and increased their endowments, but proved the fatal mean of corrupting the doctrine and relaxing the discipline of the church. No sooner were they delivered from heathen fury, than [for alas, it seems as if all of us must

CHAP. VIII.

1 At the opening of the seventh seal, 2 seven angels had seven trumpets given them. 6 Four of them sound their trumpets, and great plagues follow. 3 Another angel putteth incense to the prayers of the saints on the golden altar.

AND when he had opened the seventh <sup>a</sup> seal, there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.

2 And I saw the seven angels which stood <sup>b</sup> before God; and to them were given seven <sup>c</sup> trumpets.

3 And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should <sup>d</sup> offer it with the <sup>e</sup> prayers of all saints upon the golden <sup>f</sup> altar which was before the throne.

4 And the smoke of the <sup>g</sup> incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand.

5 And the angel took the censer, and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it <sup>h</sup> into the earth: and <sup>i</sup> there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an <sup>j</sup> earthquake.

6 And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound.

PRACT. OBS. The intervals of peace on earth are caused by a positive divine interposition, to restrain the furious [selfishness] of men, and the agency of Satan; which at all times naturally tend to confusion, discord, mischief, and misery.—When the Lord Jesus sees good to grant his church seasons of rest, and to raise up men endued with authority, to countenance and concur in promoting the Gospel; He commonly 'seals' many by his converting grace, 'unto the day of redemption;' Acts 9:31. But human depravity, and the artifices of Satan, often pervert peaceful and prosperous days into an occasion of negligence and hypocritical profession; and this makes way for the ministering angels, being again commissioned to bring calamities upon the earth.—It is encouraging to those, who are decidedly on the Lord's part in this evil world, to hear of the increase of 'the true Israel of God;' and they will pray Him to add to their numbers 'a hundred-fold more, how many soever they be;' and, though they, who offer these fervent prayers, may not live to witness this blessed change, they must exult to recollect what multitudes are gone before them to heaven; and what accessions are daily making to the number from all the nations of the earth: and what glorious times are coming, according to the sure word of prophecy.—Could we ascend into heaven, and inquire, 'who they are that are arrayed in white robes, and whence they came;' amidst ten thousand differences in other matters, we should learn, that every one of them had come out of sorrow, and out of sin; that they had all been in conflict and tribulation; and that they had all 'washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.'—Not one discordant voice will be heard in heaven for ever; nor could those who expect salvation in any other way, join the praises of that blessed world, or even say, Amen, to them.

it far better, than Christians in succeeding generations have generally done.—'With God is the fountain of life;' but it is 'the Lamb that was slain,' who 'leads sinners unto that fountain of living waters.' (Note, 22:1.)—(14) Washed, &c.] How could such an idea ever enter the human mind, as washing linen garments in blood, and so rendering them white; apart from the doctrine of the atonement, and the efficacy of faith in that atonement, to cleanse the soul from sin? 1:4—6. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. 1 John 1:5—7.

(14.) 'Such passages as this and 1:5. and 5:9. are so strong for the atonement of Christ, that they cannot be invaded.' GILPIN.

(17.) 'Divine prediction often sketches out in one prophecy, and then fills up the outline in another. Comp. those of Dan. The 6 seals may synchronize with the latest prophecies of Rev. and Christ's final coming.' WOODH.

NOTES. CHAP. VIII. V. 1—6. The last of the 7 seals contains under it far more than all the others; as it introduces, and indeed included that period which fell under the 7 trumpets. 'The placing of this circumstance [the silence and the other angel coming and having a censer, &c.] immediately before the sounding of the trumpets, suggests, that the subject of these prayers was the occasion of something to be called for by these trumpets; and what could this be, but that of the destruction of the Roman empire? It is plainly suggested, that the petition for some delay would be accepted; yet all further applications, on that head, are discouraged by a most significant emblem, the censer being cast away.' Whitaker. Ez. 27:1—8. 30:1—8. Lev. 10:1, 2. 16:11—14.

(1.) 'Is not the silence, to prepare for a change in the mode of exhibition and series of events? So of the change from 4 to 7 angels. Throughout the scenery of the trumpets, heaven is kept wholly distinct from the earth.' Woodh. 'Keith, with some others, considers that the 7th seal is manifestly of a different character from the 6 that preceded. He thinks, that the spiritual state of the world was described previous to the political; and that, as the outline of the former is contained in

it. They are happy, (1.) In their station, before the throne of God night and day, in that presence where there is fulness of joy. (2.) In their employment; for they serve God continually; heaven is a state of service, though not of suffering; of rest, but not of sloth; it is a praising, delightful rest. (3.) (5.) In being delivered from all sorrow, or occasion of it; God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. They have formerly had their sorrows, and shed many tears, both on account of sin and of affliction; but God Himself, with his own gentle and gracious hand, will wipe those tears away, and they shall return no more for ever; this should moderate the Christian's sorrow in his present state, and support him under all its troubles.

CHAP. VIII. We now come to the opening of the 7th seal, which introduced the sounding of the 7 trumpets; a direful scene now opens. Most expositors agree, that the 7 seals represent the interval between the apostle's time and the reign of Constantine, but that the seven trumpets are designed to represent the rise of antichrist, some time after the empire became Christian.

V. 1—6. In these vs. we have the prelude to the sounding of the trumpets in several parts: 1. The opening of the last seal; this was to introduce a new set of prophetic iconisms, images, and events. 2. A profound silence in heaven for the space of half an hour, which may be understood either, of the silence of peace, that for this time no complaints were sent up to the ear of the Lord God of sabaoth; or, of expectation; great things were on the wheel of Providence, and the church of God, both in heaven and earth, stood silent, as became them, to see what God was doing, Zech. 2:13. 3. The trumpets were delivered to the angels, who were to sound them. As the angels of the churches are to sound the trumpet of the Gospel, the angels of heaven are to sound the trumpet of Providence, and every one has his part given him. 4. To prepare for this, another angel must first offer incense, v. 3. very probably this other angel is the Lord Jesus, the High Priest of the church, here described in his sacerdotal office, having a golden censer, and much incense, a fulness of merit in his own glorious Person, and this incense He was to offer up, with the prayers of all the saints, upon the golden altar of his divine nature. Observe, All the saints are a praying people; and times of danger should be praying times; yet the prayers of the saints themselves stand in need of the incense and intercession of Christ to make them acceptable and effectual, and He has his incense, his censer, and his altar; so that no prayer, thus recommended, was ever denied audience and acceptance. These prayers, thus accepted in heaven, produced great changes on earth, in return to them; the same angel that in his censer offered up the prayers of the saints, in the same censer took of the fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth, and this presently caused strange commotions, voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake; these were the answers God gave to the prayers of the saints, and tokens of his anger against the world, and that He would do great things to avenge Himself and his people of their enemies; and now all things being thus prepared, the angels discharge their duty.

V. 7—13. Observe, I. The first angel

the first 6 seals, the 7th seal, under the 7 trumpets, begins to open up the latter. It does not follow, that what is recorded under each successive seal, can only refer to events that follow in order of time.' HENRY, abr.

(5.) 'Three earthquakes are mentioned in the Apocalypse:—1. Ch. 8:5. Cuninghame refers this to the downfall of paganism, in the time of Constantine. 2. Precedes the passing away of the second woe, and is identified with the period of the Reformation. 3. That of the day of wrath. 6:12—17. 11:18, 19. 16:18. The first shock of this he considers to be the French revolution, in 1792; but that its most tremendous concussions are yet future.' HENRY, abr. 'The scene is in heaven, to which John was called up, 4:1. and the earth is in view below. The significant action, here, prepares us for the kind of history to follow. The Christian worship and religion, pure and heavenly in its origin and nature, represented by the incense thus burning, when sent down to earth, and conflicting with the passions and worldly projects of sinful men, produces signal commotions, expressed in prophetic language, (here generally, afterwards particularized,) as our Lord Himself declared, that, in sending forth his holy religion to the earth, He had cast fire thereon, i. e. divisions and discords, Lu. 12:49.'

(6.) 'The best meaning given to these disputed trumpets, seems that of hostile attacks, and so Woodh., who thinks, that, throughout, the object is the same,—the pure Christian Church; and that the assailants are not only its infidel and acknowledged foes, but also those, its most formidable enemies, who, professing to belong to its body, have taught doctrines, and pursued measures, contrary to its purity, destructive of its peace, and almost of its existence, the heretics and antichristian corrupters. For in those visions of the trumpets whose meaning can be most accurately ascertained, as the 5, 6, and 7th, the church is evidently the object of assault. Woodh.' Bl. 'They designate, 1. Persecution in Judea; 2. the Pagan, designated by a burning mountain; 3. heresies, &c.; 4. the consequent failure, in part, of the light originally beaming from the Gospel.'

V. 7. The emblematical predictions, following the first 4 trumpets, gled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth: and the third part of trees <sup>1</sup> was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up.

8 And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain <sup>2</sup> burning with fire was cast into the <sup>3</sup> sea: and the third part of the sea became <sup>4</sup> blood;

9 And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died: and the third part of the ships were destroyed.

10 And the third angel sounded, and there fell <sup>5</sup> a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters:

sounded the first trumpet, and the events which followed were very dismal, v. 7. Here was a terrible storm, whether of heresies, a mixture of monstrous errors falling on the church, (for in that age Arianism prevailed,) or of war falling on the civil state, expositors are not agreed. Mr. Mede takes it to be meant of the Gothic inundation, that broke in on the empire in the year 395, the same year that Theodosius died, when the northern nations, under Alaric, the king of the Goths, brake in on the western parts of the empire. However, here we observe, (1.) It was a very terrible storm,—fire, and hail, and blood; a strange mixture! (2.) The limitation of it; it fell on the third part of the trees, and on the third part of the grass; that is, say some, on the third part of the clergy, and the third part of the laity; or, as others, who take it to fall on the civil state, on the third part of the great men, and on the third part of the common people; either on the Roman empire itself, which was a third part of the then known world, or on a third part of that empire. The most severe calamities have their bounds and limits set them by the great God.

2. The second angel sounded, and the alarm was followed, as in the first, with terrible events, v. 8. By this mountain some understand the leader or leaders of the heretics; others, as Mr. Mede, the city of Romè, which was five times sacked by the Goths and Vandals, within the compass of 137 years; first by Alaric, in the year 410, with great slaughter and cruelty. In these calamities, a third part of the people (called here the sea, or collection of waters) were destroyed: here was still a limitation to the third part, for, in the midst of judgment, God remembers mercy. This storm fell heavy upon the maritime and merchandising cities and countries of the Roman empire.

3. The third angel sounded, and the alarm had the like effects as before, v. 10. Some take this star to be a political star, some eminent governor, and they apply it to Augustulus, who was forced to resign the empire to Odoacer, in the year 480. Others, to be an ecclesiastical star, some eminent person in the church, compared to a burning lamp, and they fix it on Pelagius, who proved, about this time, a falling star, and greatly corrupted the churches of Christ. Observe, Where this star fell, and its effect; on a third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters, v. 10. turning those springs and streams into wormwood; either the laws, which are the springs of civil liberty, property, and safety, were poisoned by arbitrary power; or the doctrines of the Gospel, the principally related to the gradual, but complete subversion of the Roman empire, in the western part of the world; though this was connected with multiplied calamities in the eastern provinces, which are also implied. Constantine the Great built Constantinople, and made it his residence, and the metropolis of the empire; and, by a concurrence of circumstances some time after his death, that vast fabric, the Roman empire, was divided into two parts, governed by two distinct successions of emperors. But the western and eastern empires, when thus separated, were not wholly unconnected: so that the ruin of the western empire was attended by great convulsions in the eastern; and the subsequent subversion of the latter occasioned manifold evils in the countries, which had constituted the former. As therefore the events, which related to the two divisions of the empire, were thus involved with one another, it was proper that the predictions of them should be so likewise: yet the residue of the ch. primarily predicts the subversion of the western, and the next ch. that of the eastern empire. (Notes, 9.)—The calm, which followed Constantine's accession to the throne, did not last long: even the latter part of his life was far from being undisturbed; and after his death many bloody wars were waged within the empire, by his sons with each other, and other competitors, for the imperial authority; whilst the church was disturbed by various descriptions of heretics; and unnatural persecutions were raised, by men who called themselves Christians. These and other evils weakened both the church and the state; and after a time, the Huns and Goths from the northern regions of Europe, broke in upon the distracted empire, and made terrible ravages in many of its provinces. The latter events seem to have been especially intended by the storm of 'hail and fire mingled with blood,' by which a third part of the productions of the earth were destroyed; i. e. multitudes were killed, both high and low, grown persons and infants, through the whole Roman empire, which might be deemed a third part of the earth, as discovered at that time. (Ex. 9:22-25. M. R.)—This period is supposed by some approved expositors, to reach from A. D. 338, to 412: but others explain it principally of the incursions of the Goths under Alaric, who entered the empire A. D. 395; and after spreading desolation by fire and sword through the provinces, A. D. 410, took and plundered Rome, with circumstances of barbarity very correspondent to these emblems, as contemporary writers have testified: especially in that he slew without distinction, princes, nobles, priests, and people, and showed no mercy even to the tender infants; thus destroying 'the trees and the green grass,' or smaller vegetable productions, indiscriminately.—The first four trumpets describe the removal of that power, which, in the days of Paul, . . . prevented the development of "the man of sin;" namely, the western imperial dignity of Rome.' Faber.—'On the decease of Theodosius, that great prince, A. D. 395, the northern cloud, which had been so long gathering, discharged itself. He died in the month of January, and, before the end of the same year, the Gothic nation was in arms.—The barriers of the Danube were thrown open; the savage warriors of Scythia issued from their forests; and the uncommon severity of the winter, (the season in which natural hail and snow are generated,) allowed the poet to remark, that they rolled their ponderous wagons over the broad and icy back of the indignant river. The fertile fields of Phœcis and Bœotia were covered with a deluge of barbarians, who massacred the males, of an age to bear arms, and drove away the beautiful females, with the spoil and cattle of the flaming villages.' Gibbon.—I have adopted the language of the historian. Unconscious that he was bearing his testimony to the truth of prophecy, he has used the same allegorical language, as that employed by St. John. The correspondence of nations, says he, 'was in that age so imperfect and precarious, that the revolutions of the N. might escape the knowledge of the court of Ravenna; till the dark cloud, which was collected along the coasts of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon the banks of the upper Danube.' Faber.—The nature of this publication must exclude most of the quotations, which might be made from Gibbon, the elegant and infidel historian of the decline of the Roman empire: but he has certainly, without intending it, shown the exact completion of these prophecies, in many instances.—Different opinions prevail, as to the duration of the events, predicted by the sounding of the first trumpet; but it cannot be expected, that these topics, which, after all, very slightly affect the main subject, should be here particularly noticed. Some think, that all the calamities brought on the empire, by the northern invaders, and especially those of Attila, mentioned in the ensuing note, were intended by the general language of this v.; though other eminent expositors place a part of them under the second trumpet.

(7.) 'The land, (or earth,) as opposed to the sea, frequently signifies the holy land, the people of Israel; while the Gentiles, especially those of the W., are spoken of by the word sea. Is. ch. 24. Gen. 10:5. Mat. 12:21, &c. Between these, there was early a marked line of distinction. See Gal., also Ac. 4:7. Rom. 15:10, 11. Upon the Christian Israelites, therefore, we may suppose, came the storm of hail, fire, and blood; i. e. persecutions even unto death.' Woodh. Bl. inserts, 'and a third of the earth was burnt up.'

(7-12.) Recent foreign contrs. say, 'in all this, the extreme calamity simply is meant, in an ornamented and amplified diction;' but this course, properly adds Bl., too common with them, though it saves much trouble, in general, tends to anything but real and sound knowledge; only summarily despatching matters we are unable to explain. By the trees, Woodh. understands, genuine Christians, Is. 61:3. Eph. 3:17. many of them (a third, i. e. a considerable part) destroyed by the fire of persecution: by green grass, Mk. 4:17. those Christians who make a fair show, but in time of persecution fall away. Heresies, and their consequences, darkness and ignorance, he thinks meant in the rest of this ch.; which Bl. thinks less probable than other views. Id.

V. 8, 9. 'A great burning mountain' is an emblem of a mighty destructive warrior, and has been so used by the most celebrated poets. Jer. 51:25. The Roman empire, with its vast multitude of people and nations, might be aptly compared to the sea. (17:15.) This 'great mountain, burning with fire,' therefore, being 'cast into the sea,' with the effects produced by it, represented, most emphatically, the irruption of the barbarous nations, under ferocious leaders, into the Roman empire, and their shedding of the blood of immense multitudes, and destroying the cities, or desolating the country with fire and sword. After Alaric, with his Goths, had finished his depredations, Attila, at the head of a vast army of Huns, ravaged the empire during the space of 14 years, destroying all before him, in the most barbarous manner; nor did any part of the empire wholly escape his fury. These events seem to have been principally intended; but we may include under this trumpet the various calamities, which befel the empire from A. D. 412, to 450. If these devastations under Attila from the N., belong to the first trumpet, those under Genserick, king of the Vandals, from Africa, to the S. must be here intended. (Note, 10, 11.)—But, whether Attila or Genserick were meant, it is manifest, that the 'third part of the sea turned into blood,' is the emblem of the Roman empire, supposed to contain a third part of the world; and the burning mountain must consequently mean the conqueror, who produced these effects, and not the conquered; else in the same v., there are two emblems of the latter, and none of the former. (Notes, 16:3-7. Ex. 7:15-21.)

V. 10, 11. The 'great star falling from heaven,' is explained by some, of the Arian and Pelagian heresies, and the contests and persecutions connected with them. And, no doubt, such events might very aptly be represented by 'the falling of a star,' and the church was miserably corrupted, and deformed by heresy, during that period. Ex. 15:22-24. 2 Ks. 2:19-22.—Yet the series of the prophecy favors the interpretation of those, who explain these vs. to predict the continuation of those calamities, which subverted the empire. An eminent prince, suddenly appearing in the heart of the empire, and conspicuous even in the mischiefs which he occasioned, might be aptly represented by 'a great star,' or luminous meteor, shooting 'from heaven, and burning as a lamp.' The name 'Wormwood,' and the effect of its falling on the waters, denoted the further desolations of the empire, and the ruin of the remaining comforts, which were left to the relics of the miserable inhabitants; who were so harassed and afflicted, that they could not seek for the necessary support of life, without exposing themselves to the fury of the invaders. Judg. 5:11. Lam. 5:3-10. Thus the imbittering and poisoning of the rivers and fountains, completed the former judgment of turning the sea into blood.—Accordingly, very soon after Attila's retreat, Genserick unexpectedly invaded the empire with 300,000 Vandals and Moors from Africa; besieged and took Rome, and abandoned that city to the cruelty, avarice, and licentiousness of his troops; and by this success he so weakened the empire, that it was soon after subverted. As this assault was made at the very source of the Roman power and prosperity, it might on this account likewise be represented, as poisoning

11 And the name of the star is called <sup>a</sup> Wormwood; and the third part of the waters became <sup>r</sup> wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

12 And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun <sup>s</sup> was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise.

13 And I beheld, and heard an angel flying <sup>t</sup> through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabitants of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound.

PRACT. OBS. The intervals of peace, which the church has hitherto enjoyed, have commonly been of short continuance.—Amidst the confusion occasioned by the vices of mankind, we should rejoice that 'the Lord reigneth'; and that the prayers of all true believers, being presented through the meritorious intercession of our great High Priest, will surely be accepted and answered.—While the present wrath of God and of the Lamb, through those executioners of vengeance who mean not so, fills countries with misery, destroys the wretched inhabitants, the rivers and fountains of waters.—Genserick was also a bigoted Arian, and a cruel persecutor of the orthodox Christians; and in this sense, too, he poisoned the fountains. These events occurred between A. D. 450, and 456. SCOTT.

10, 11. 'A star, in prophetic language, signifies a prince, or eminent leader,—a leader in doctrine, Num. 24:14. Mat. 2:2. Rev. 2:28. 22:16. 1:16. Such an one falling from heaven, as did Satan, (Lu. 10:18. 2 Pet. 2:4. Jude 6. and Rev. 12:4. 9:1—12. when he and his fallen angels are thus symbolized,) corrupts the third part of the rivers and fountains of waters; i. e. the streams and sources of pure doctrine, thus expressed by our Lord, Jn. 4:10. &c. 7:37—39. The corruption of pure doctrine and introduction of heretical tenets are commonly attributed in Scripture to Satan and his angels, (Mat. 13:29. 2 Cor. 11:14, 15. Eph. 2:2. 2 Th. 2:9. 1 Tim. 5:15.) and the corrupting doctrine, producing heresies, is expressed by the metaphors wormwood, gall, bitterness, (De. 29:18. Am. 5:7. 6:12. Ac. 8:23.) and the death there described is spiritual. Note, 3:1.—Under this trumpet, therefore, we seem to obtain a general description of those corruptions, which, at the instigation of Satan, were seen to invade and subvert a great part of the Christian church by the preaching of splendid heretics. Such, in the early times, were Simon, Menander, Cerinthus, &c. The corruption of Christianity produced Gothic darkness and superstition; and no greater calamity than the corruption, rejection, and loss of true and saving religion, can happen to man. Antichrist, already come when this vision was seen, (1 Jn. 2:18, 22. 4:3. 2 Jn. 7. beginning to work, 2 Th. 2:7. waxing worse and worse, 2 Tim. 3:13.) now the warfare comes (ch. 9.) to be exhibited more openly, will soon stand confessed.' WOODH.

V. 12. Under the 4th trumpet, the sun, moon, and stars, or the great luminaries of the Roman empire, were eclipsed and darkened: (Notes, 6:12—14. Mat. 24:29—31.) for the third part, though spoken of the luminaries, or the time of their shining, seems still to refer to the extent of the empire, as containing one third of the then known world. While the splendor of the eastern empire was greatly tarnished, and it shone but with a feeble and almost expiring light; that of the western was gradually extinguished. 'Genserick left it in a weak and desperate condition; it struggled hard, and as it were gasped for breath, during 8 short and turbulent reigns, for the space of 20 years, till at length it expired, A. D. 476, under Momyllus, who was, in derision, called Augustulus, or the diminutive Augustus.' Bp. Newton. Still, however, though the Roman sun was extinguished, its subordinate luminaries faintly shone, while the senate and consuls continued. But, after several other changes, at length, A. D. 566, the whole form of the ancient government was subverted, and Rome itself was reduced, from being the empress of the world, to be a poor dukedom, tributary to the Exarch of Ravenna.—The events of above 200 years are here predicted in 6 vs.; events peculiarly important in themselves, and in their consequences, yet recorded by historians in the most disorderly and intricate manner. However therefore it may suit the design of those, who confine their labor to this one part of Scripture, to enter into particulars, or to argue either for or against any interpretation, it cannot fall in with the design of a practical exposition of the whole Word of God. The author observes, with satisfaction, that the interpreters agree in the grand outline; and even the testimony of infidels, when writing the history of these times, demonstrates the exact accomplishment of the prophecy.—'I have now accomplished the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, from the fortunate age of Trajan and the Antonines, to its springs of spiritual life, refreshment, and vigor, were so corrupted and imbittered by a mixture of dangercous errors, that the souls of men found their ruin where they sought for their refreshment.

4. The fourth angel sounded, and the alarm was followed with further calamities. Observe, (1.) The nature of this calamity,—darkness; it fell on the great luminaries of the heaven, that gave light to the world,—the sun, and the moon, and the stars; either the guides and governors of the church, or of the state, who are placed in higher orbs than the people, and are to dispense light and benign influences to them. (2.) The limitation; it was confined to a third part of these luminaries; there was some light of both, but it was only a third part of what they had before. Without determining what is matter of controversy in these points among learned men, we rather choose to make these plain and practical remarks: [1.] Where the Gospel comes to a people, and is but coldly received, and has not its proper effects on their hearts and lives, it is usually followed with dreadful judgments. [2.] God warns men of his judgments before He sends them; so that if a people be surprised, it is their own fault. [3.] The anger of God against a people makes dreadful work among them; imbitters all their comforts, makes even life itself bitter and burdensome. [4.] God does not in this world stir up all his wrath, but sets bounds to the most terrible judgments. [5.] Corruption of doctrine and worship in the church, are themselves great judgments, and the usual causes and tokens of other judgments coming on a people.

5. Before the other three trumpets are sounded, here is solemn warning given to the world, how terrible the calamities would be, that should follow them, and how miserable those times and places would be, on which they fell, v. 13. Here are three woes, to show how much the calamities coming should exceed those that had been already, or to hint how every one of the three succeeding trumpets should introduce its particular and distinct calamity. If less judgments do not take effect, but the church and the world grow worse under them, they must expect greater; and God will be known by the judgments that He executes.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—12. Upon the sounding of this trumpet, the things to be observed are, 1. A star falling from heaven to the earth. Some think this star represents some eminent bishop in the Christian church; but who this is, expositors do not agree. Some understand it of Boniface, the 3d bishop of and imbitters and poisons all the comforts of life, till the greatest prosperity is totally darkened and extinguished, and all ranks and orders of men involved in one common and dire calamity; the messengers of the Lord are ordered to proclaim aloud, in all the world, that still more dreadful woes are in reserve for all the impenitent 'workers of iniquity'; for what are all temporal evils, compared with 'the destruction of body and soul in hell?' SCOTT.

utter extinction in the west, about 5 centuries after the Christian era. At that unhappy period, the Saxons fiercely struggled with the natives for the possession of Britain; Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and the Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms of the Suevo and Burgundinus; Africa was exposed to the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and to the savage insults of the Moors; Rome and Italy, as far as the banks of the Danube, were afflicted by an army of barbarian mercenaries, whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the reign of Theodorick the Ostrogoth. All the subjects of the empire, who, by the use of the Latin language, more particularly deserved the name and privileges of Romans, were oppressed by the disgrace and calamities of foreign conquest; and the victorious nations of Germany established a new system of manners and government, in the western countries of Europe.' Gibbon.—Can there now be the shadow of a doubt, concerning the exact accomplishment of these compeudious prophecies, some hundreds of years after they were written? And who can then hesitate to say, that John wrote by the inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning? SCOTT.

V. 13. Angel. Bl. reads, eagle, aitou; put for 'angel like an eagle.' Midst of heaven. Rather, between the heavens and the earth, in the sky. So Woodh. and Bl. 'Under the first 4 trumpets, which have their beginning from this period, the storm increases, (says Woodh.) and under the last 3, it advances to its maturity, and produces the most special and desolating effects, by 3 distinct explosions. The 3 wars correspond to the last 3 trumpets, which, or the war-trumpets, are generally regarded as predicting the miserable state of the church in the dark ages. See also Bp. Newton's Bl. Ed. 'Keith says, comtrs. with considerable variance in the details, are mostly of one mind, that the first 4 trumpets denote the successive events which caused the downfall of Rome, and the 5th and 6th characterize the Saracen and Turkish power. Authority here, in some measure, supersedes the necessity of lengthened discussion, and few could elucidate the texts more clearly, or expound them more fully, than has been done by the skeptical philosopher, Gibbon! Keith follows other writers in extracting largely from the "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," and notices the manner in which all the industry and genius of Gibbon were unconsciously devoted to the task, of showing the form in which a portion of the revelation of Jesus Christ was developed. He who strove to show, that the Gospel was propagated by secondary causes, has himself proved, by the toil of 20 years, and by numbers of accumulated facts, that such causes hold but a subordinate rank even in the revolutions of earthly kingdoms! To the purposes of the Most High, the labors of skeptics, as well as the ravages of heathens, may all be made alike subservient. And they who, following Gibbon, would consign the work that was of God to the sole agency of secondary causes, and think that the Gospel of his Son was the device of human wisdom, and its propagation through the world the mere effect of human means, may look to the result of all this skeptic's labors, which fix him for ever as a commentator on the Apocalypse!' HENRY, abr.

NOTES. CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. (Note, 8:10, 11.) There can scarcely remain a doubt, that these vs. predict the rise and progress of Mohammed [the great destroyer of idols, and asserter of God's unity] and his successors, as ruling over the Arabians or Saracens. Early in the 7th century, (about A. D. 606—609,) Mohammed began to aver a very extraordinary intercourse with God; declaring, that the angel Gabriel was frequently sent to him, to teach a religion, which he was to propagate

2 And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened <sup>c</sup> by reason of the smoke of the pit.

3 And there came out of the smoke locusts <sup>d</sup> upon the earth: and unto them was given power, as the scorpions <sup>e</sup> of the earth have power.

4 And it was commanded them <sup>f</sup> that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal <sup>g</sup> of God in their foreheads.

5 And to them it was given that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months: and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man.

6 And in those days shall men <sup>h</sup> seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.

7 And the shapes <sup>i</sup> of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were <sup>j</sup> crowns like gold, and their faces <sup>k</sup> were as the faces of men.

8 And they had hair as the hair of women, and their teeth <sup>l</sup> were as the teeth of lions.

Rome, who assumed the title of universal bishop, by the favor of the emperor Phocas, who, being a usurper and tyrant in the state, allowed Boniface to be so in the church, as the reward of his flattery. 2. To this fallen star was given the key of the bottomless pit. Having now ceased to be a minister of Christ, he becomes the antichrist, the minister of the devil, and his turnkey, to let loose the powers of hell against the churches of Christ. 3. Upon the opening of the bottomless pit there arose a great smoke, which darkened the sun and the air. The devils are the powers of darkness, hell is the place of darkness. The devil carries on his designs by blinding the eyes of men, by extinguishing light and knowledge, and promoting ignorance and error; he first deceives, then destroys; wretched souls follow him in the dark, or they durst not follow him. 4. Out of this dark smoke there came a swarm of locusts, one of the plagues of Egypt, the devil's emissaries headed by antichrist, all the rout and rabble of antichristian orders, to promote superstition, idolatry, error, and cruelty; and these had, by the just permission of God, power to hurt those who had not the mark of God in their foreheads. 5. The hurt they were to do to them was not a bodily, but a spiritual hurt; they should not, in a military way, destroy all by fire and sword; the trees and the grass should be untouched, and those they hurt should not be slain; it should not be a persecution, but a secret poison and infection in their souls, which should rob them of their purity, and afterward of their peace. 6. They had no power so much as to hurt those who had the seal of God in their foreheads. God's electing, effectual, distinguishing grace will preserve his people from total and final apostasy. 7. The power given to these factors for hell is limited in point of time,—five months, a certain season, and but short, though how short we cannot tell: gospel-

in the world, being an improvement and a perfecting both of the religion of Moses and of Jesus, as at first delivered, and a reformation of them from subsequent perversions and corruptions. His fabled journey to heaven was announced some yrs. after. He pretended, that he had been predicted in the books of Moses; but that the Jews had expunged these predictions. He also declared, that Jesus had foretold his coming, under the name of Ahmed, which signifies Paraklētōs, very illustrious, and is nearly allied to Mohammed. (It is supposed that he mistook Paraklētōs, the Comforter, for Periklētōs, very illustrious.) These pretences are here, as it is generally agreed, described by 'a star falling from the heaven to the earth;' and the emblem is the more appropriate, because he shone with a very conspicuous, though pestiferous light. The key given to him, to 'open the bottomless pit,' or the abyss of hell, was a very suitable emblem of the power and influence God was pleased to permit him to acquire, for the propagation of his satanical delusions. 3:7. For this most artful, politic, and prosperous impostor gradually acquired such ascendancy among the Arabians, or Saracens, to whom he belonged, that they not only received his religious system, but enlisted under his banner, and he led them forth to conquest, that they might by this method compel others to receive his doctrine. In this enterprise, he and his successors were so prosperous, that the light of Christianity was obscured; and many nations, where once it had shone, were almost totally darkened, and infected with this smoke from the abyss. Or, since the emblem of 'a star' marks out the ministers of Christianity; (Note, 1:12—20.) and so cannot apply to Mohammed: and since the apostate Nestorian monk, Sergius, or Bahcira, cannot on account of his obscurity, be meant, as some have supposed, if 'the fallen star,' &c. means some agent distinct from Mohammed, who was his forerunner, as I conceive it does; I should fix on the western corrupter of Christianity, whose 'mystery of iniquity' had been long working, but burst forth almost at the same time with the imposture of Mohammed. 2 Thes. 2:3—7. The worship of images, saints, and angels, prayers for the dead, and many other of the corruptions of popery, had at this time made very great progress in Christendom. These corruptions, of which the bishop and church of Rome were the source, centre, or principal support, evidently prepared the way for Mohammed, in connexion with the wickedness of the professors and ministers of Christianity; and furnished him with his most plausible pretences; and so the 'fallen star,' the western antichrist, (if that name may for brevity's sake be used,) opened the door for Mohammed and his imposture, i. e. for the eastern antichrist. It appears clearly, that not an individual, no, not Mohammed, as considered apart from the Caliphs his successors, is meant, either by 'the fallen star,' or 'the angel of the abyss;' but a succession of men, or associated bodies of men, carrying on from generation to generation the same design. And, as the corrupters of Christianity made way for the imposture of Mohammed, and the apostasy which it occasioned; who can more properly be designated by 'the star fallen from heaven to earth,' 'and opening the abyss,' than they? (See Faber, Vol. II. 29—33.)—The Christians of the 7th century relapsed into a semblance of Paganism; their public and private vows were addressed to the relics and images, that disgraced the temples of the east. The throne of the Almighty was darkened by a crowd of martyrs, and saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration; and the Collyridian heretics, who flourished in the fruitful soil of Arabia, invested the Virgin with the name and honors of a goddess. Gibbon.—(1) Bottomless pit.] Gr. The pit, or well, of the abyss. 11. 11:7. 17:8. 20:1, 3. Luke 8:31. Gen. 1:2. Ps. 106:9. Sept.

(1.) Bottomless pit.] That part of Hades or hell, called Gehenna, the place of prison and punishment for wicked angels and men. This key, its Master (1:18.) commits to him for a time, for a special purpose only.

V. 3—5. 'Out of the smoke' above mentioned, 'came locusts;' i. e. great armies of Arabians, or Saracens, were raised, by means of Mohammed's imposture, to spread desolations through the nations. Ex. 10:6, 13. Joel 1:4—7. 2:4, 5, 7—9, 18—20. They resembled locusts in their numbers, and they came from the same regions, whence the largest swarms of those destructive insects have in all ages arisen. Locusts are said to be bred in pits and caverns, and these proceeded from 'the smoke, which came out of the bottomless pit.' Yet, at the same time, they also resembled scorpions, the sting of which gives extreme pain, and often proves mortal. Thus, whilst locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, yet do not hurt the bodies of men; these mystical locusts were commanded not 'to hurt the grass,' or other vegetable productions; but only 'those men, who had not the seal of God upon their foreheads; and it is remarkable, that the Saracen armies were expressly laid under a similar injunction.—When Yezed was marching with his army to invade Syria, Abuheker charged him with this, among other orders, Destroy no palm trees, nor burn any fields of corn; cut down no fruit-trees, nor do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat.' Ep. Newton. Corrupt and hypocritical professors of Christianity were especially meant by 'those men, who had not the seal of God in their foreheads;' which fully proves, that something wholly distinct from outward baptism, and exclusively belonging to true Christians, is denoted by that emblem. 6:5, 6. 7:1—3.—Now, it is well known, that the Saracens extended their conquests principally in those countries, where the worship of saints and angels, and other corruptions of Christianity, prevailed; whilst the places where religion was preserved more pure, were sheltered from their fury; and, no doubt, God permitted this scourge to come on the nations, where his Gospel was perverted, for their correction or punishment.—It was also predicted, that they would be restrained from killing those, whom they were commissioned to torment; but as immense multitudes were slain by these cruel victors, this cannot with propriety be interpreted literally; and it evidently means, that they would be empowered durably to ravage, harass, and disturb the nations and the church; but not utterly to destroy them.—'They might kill them as individuals, but still they should not kill them as a political body, as a state, or empire.' Bp. Newton.—Accordingly, they miserably desolated and oppressed, both the Greek and Latin churches, and the nations in which they were established, but they could not totally extirpate them; they repeatedly besieged Constantinople, but were always repulsed; they even plundered Rome, but they could not make themselves permanently masters of it; they took from the eastern empire many of its richest provinces, but they could not utterly subvert it.—Moreover, it was predicted, that they should distress and torment mankind, during 'five months,' according to the term of life, which naturalists assign to locusts (10). These months consisting of 30 days, and each day denoting a year, amount to 150 years; and Mohammed first began publicly to propagate his imposture, A. D. 612; and A. D. 762, (just 150 years afterwards,) the city of Bagdad was builded, the Saracens ceased from their ravages, and became a settled people; they made no more rapid conquests, and obtained no further accession to their power, which thenceforth began to decline. They then ceased to be locusts; though this 'woe-trumpet' continued much longer, as it will presently be seen.—These invaders speedily conquered Palestine, Syria, Armenia, almost all Asia Minor, Persia, India, Egypt, Nubia, Barbary, Spain, Portugal, part of Italy, and the principal islands in the Mediterranean sea.

(3.) Locusts.] See a full account of these in Rob. Calm. Eo.

(5.) Five months.] With allusion, it is supposed, to the very period of locusts, which are hatched in spring, and die at the end of summer. Bl.—Not kill.] 'The whole description is highly metaphorical, and so, as it may reasonably appear, is this death. Why not here as well as at 11:7—9, &c. The persons who suffer under this plague, do not die spiritually. They lose not altogether their life in Christ, whose name they profess, although they have renounced his purer doctrines and laws: they may yet repent, and return to Him and live. But the horrible superstitions they adopt, under the influence of their hellish teachers, take away from them the comforts of pure Christianity, and render the religion that is left, though it may perchance be nominally Christian, a torment, from which they wish to be relieved, but in vain.' Woodh., who differs from others as to these 'locusts.'

V. 7—10. The shape of these figurative 'locusts,' was next described. Now the Arabians were remarkable for their skill in horsemanship, and their chief force lay in cavalry. Joel 2:1—6. The 'crowns on their heads like gold,' may denote the turbans, which the Arabians have always worn; or it may refer to the many kingdoms they subjected to their dominion. They had 'faces, like men,' but they wore their hair like women, plaited, or flowing down their backs; and the Arabians are known to have done this. The 'teeth, as of lions,' which are ascribed to them, represented their strength and fury to de-

9 And they had breastplates, as it were breastplates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of many horses running to battle.

10 And they had tails like unto scorpions, and there were stings in their tails: and their power was to hurt men five months.

11 And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon.

12 One woe is past; and, behold, there come two woes more hereafter.

13 And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God, seasons have their limits, and times of seduction a limit too. 8. Though short, it would be very sharp, inasmuch, that those who were made to feel the malignity of this poison in their consciences, would be weary of their lives, v. 6. 9. These locusts were of a monstrous size and shape, v. 7, 8, &c. They were equipped for their work like horses prepared to battle; had crowns like gold on their heads, indicative of assumed authority and seeming victory; had the show of wisdom and sagacity, the faces of men, though the spirit of devils; had all the allurements of seeming beauty, to ensnare and defile the minds of men, hair like women; their way of worship was very gaudy and ornamental: though they appeared with the tenderness of women, they had the teeth of lions, were really cruel; they had the defence and protection of earthly powers, breastplates of iron; they made a mighty noise in the world, from one country to another, like that of an army with chariots and horses; at first they soothed and flattered, but there was a sting in their tails; the cup of their abominations, though luscious at first, would at length bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder. The king and commander of this hellish squadron is here described as an angel; so he was by nature, once an angel of heaven; and he is an angel still, but a fallen angel, fallen into the bottomless pit, vastly large, and out of which there is no recovery. In these infernal regions he is a sort of prince and governor, and has the powers of darkness under his rule and command. His true name is Abaddon, Apollyon, a destroyer, for that is his successful business, in which he takes a horrid, hellish pleasure; about this destroying work he sends out his emissaries and armies to destroy the souls of men. And now here we have the end of one woe; and where one ends, another begins.

V. 13—21. I. The preface, v. 13, 14. The power of the church's enemies is restrained, till God gives the word to have them turned loose. When nations are ripe for punishment, those instruments of God's anger, before restrained, are now let loose stroy; whilst their 'breastplates of iron,' [in which their artists had great skill,] showed their care to protect themselves, by defensive armor, i. e. by the most effectual public measures. The sound of their wings figured the fury with which they assailed their enemies, and the rapidity of their conquests. But though they devoured and caused desolations, like locusts, yet the principal mischief which they did was effected by their tails, in which they had 'stings like those of scorpions;' for, wherever they extended their conquests, they left behind them the poison of their abominable religion; so that the consequences of their victories were far more mischievous, than the slaughter made by them. Sc.

(7.) Faces of men. Ignatius, who wrote at the time the Gnostic heresy began to prevail, calls these deceivers thēria anthrōpomorpha, wild beasts, under the appearance of men. 'Such invaders, led on by an evil angel, (probably Satan,) from the depths of hell, must have for their object the Christian church, the heritage of Christ. If they assail by force of arms, how can the sealed escape? Under such circumstances, the faithful undergo their share of common calamity, but from a pestilential heresy they might and would be secure. Their principles and practice, and the seal of God, would save them. We collect from Scripture, that such heresies were pre-ordained to try and prove the Christians, 1 Cor. 11:19. And we find early writers, who plainly refer this to the first great host of corrupters who overspread the Christian church.' WOODH.

(7—10.) 'Niebuhr remarks, "an Arab of the desert, near Bassorah, informed of a singular comparison of the locust with other animals. The terrible locust of Rev. 9. not then occurring to me, I regarded the comparison as a jest of the Bedouin Arab, and paid no attention to it, till it was repeated by another from Bagdad. It was thus:—he compared the locust's head to that of a horse; its breast to that of a lion; its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion; its horns, (antennæ,) I think, to the locks of hair of a virgin, &c. The Italians call them cavallette, little horses; and the Germans, Heupferde.' Robinson's Calmet. Ed.

(10.) 'The face in its perfection is peculiar to man, the tail to brutes: the brutal part is employed to overthrow pure religion, by the indulgence of brutal passions. Sheltered under the Gnostic doctrines, the most loose and debasing morality prevailed in a great part of the world, professedly Christian.' WOODH.

V. 11. The king over these locusts, who was 'the angel of the abyss,' or a messenger from the abyss, may signify their Caliphs in succession, who were the chief priests of their religion, the commanders of their armies, and their emperors. The name of this king, even 'the destroyer,' (for so the word means in both languages,) was peculiarly suitable to a succession of rulers, who murdered both the bodies and souls of men, by the same malignant expeditions, as they seemed to be Satan the first murderer's vicegerents and visible representatives upon earth.—Every circumstance of this emblematical prediction so exactly accords to the Saracens, and so little suits the church or hierarchy of Rome, or any of their religious orders, (who gained their advantage by priestcraft, not by arms,) that there can be no propriety in attempting to explain it of them, especially as they are described with sufficient precision in what follows. Prophecies have a determinate meaning, and by giving loose to a lively imagination, to find distant resemblances, we are more like to perplex, than to satisfy the inquirer. SCOTT.

(11.) 'Woodh. considers, that the prophetic representation of the locusts, was probably fulfilled by the first general and extensive apostasy, that of the Gnostics. He enters into the particulars, showing their fulfillment in some striking instances. [See note, end of ch.] [but with less success than usual, says BL.] Horsley considers, that the apocalyptic locusts represent heretics, not soldiers. The generality of the commentators, however, apply the 5th trumpet to the Saracens, restricting the 6th to the Turks. Woodh. considers, that the 6th includes the ravages of Mohammedism generally. A few of the commentators refer these trumpets to the monastic orders, but almost all the writers of the middle ages, and many in the reformed churches, understood the swarms of locusts as denoting swarms of heretics. Mede seems to have been the first expositor of note who interpreted the 5th trumpet of Mohammed. Hutcheson would still apply it to the pope.' HENRY, abr.

V. 12. After the apostle had seen these things, he was informed, that 'one woe was past, and two' others were coming.—'This is added, not only to distinguish the woes, and to mark more strongly each period, but also to suggest, that some time will elapse between this first woe of the Arabian locusts, and the next of the Euphratean horsemen.' Bp. Newton. 13—15. It also serves to fix the order of time, in respect of the predicted events. SCOTT.

V. 13—15. The 'voice from the horns of the altar,' on which incense used to be burned, strongly indicated, that the judgments about to be predicted, were appointed to punish men for corrupting the Gospel, and so turning it into 'the savor of death' and condemnation. 2:1—6. 2 Cor. 2:14—17.—After the 6th angel had sounded his trumpet, he was ordered to 'loose the 4 angels, who had been bound near the Euphrates;' which was done accordingly. This is explained, by the most approved interpreters, according to the emblematical style of the prophecy, to be a prediction, that the Turks, or Othmans, who had hitherto been restrained beyond the Euphrates, would be released from that restraint, and proceed to make conquests to the W. of that river. The only material objection to this interpretation is drawn from the distance of time, which intervened between the events before predicted, and the victorious invasions of the Turks. But this is readily answered, by observing, that 'the 3 woe-trumpets' must necessarily take in all the intervening time, between the subversion of the western empire, and the destruction of the heath, which is yet to be expected. Note, 11:13, 14. The Saracens continued to possess, though they did not extend, their dominions, till the Turks supplanted them, and all this time properly belongs to the 1st woe-trumpet. Indeed, no other events can be found in history, satisfactorily correspondent to the discoveries made after this 2d woe-trumpet; nor any other, which will not leave a far greater distance, between it and the 3d woe-trumpet, than this interpretation leaves between the 1st and the 2d. (Note, 11:15—18.)—The Turks pouring into Persia, and the regions bordering on the Euphrates, in the 11th century, established 4 sultanies, or kingdoms, in those parts: but they were prevented from making further conquests; especially by the Croisades, or religious wars, waged in that and the 2 following centuries, by the western Christians, who attempted to wrest Palestine out of the hands of the infidels. But when these ruinous projects were finally abandoned, the '4 angels which had been bound in the Euphrates,' who were emblems of these 4 sultanies, 'were loosed.' Then the Turks, uniting together, began their ravages and victories; and made great havoc among the inhabitants of that part of the world, which had constituted the Roman empire, and which we have often read of, as 'the third part of men.' (Note, 8:7.) The western empire had been broken to pieces under the first 4 trumpets, (Notes, 8:) the eastern had been nearly ruined under the 5th; and under the 6th it was finally subverted. The Turks conquered all the countries, which had belonged to it. A. D. 1453 they took Constantinople, and thus brought to an end the whole Imperial power, which originally belonged to Rome.—These powers were prepared for a certain fixed time, which, being computed by a year for each day, according to the prophetic manner, and 12 months, of 30 days each, being allowed to the year here mentioned, i. e. 360 days, or years; 30 more being added for the month, and 1 for the day; the whole amounts to 391 years and 15 days. Now the first conquest of the Turks over the Christians took place, A. D. 1281; and the last success, by which they extended their dominions, was A. D. 1672; being exactly 391 years from the one to the other. So that one of their historians (Prince Cantemir) here divides his narrative, calling the former part 'The growth of the Othman Empire,' the latter, 'The decay of the Othman Empire.' Since that period, they have had little success in any of their wars; and their power is so much weakened and straitened at present, by the rival power of Russia, that it is not at all probable, they will ever recover their ascendancy, or renew their conquests. Had we records of these events sufficiently exact, we should no doubt find, that the half hour, or 15 days, was fixed with the same punctuality by the Spirit of prophecy.—Though the term of their 'slaying the 3d part of men, or that during which they would extend their ravages and conquests, was predicted; yet that of the duration of their empire was not; but it will end after the sounding of the third woe-trumpet. (11:14.)—'Dr. Lloyd, . . . bishop of Worcester, who has now for above twenty years, been studying the Revelations with an amazing diligence and exactness, had long before this year said, The peace between the Turks and the papal Christians, was certainly to be made in the year 1693, which he made out thus; the 4 angels mentioned in . . . Rev. that were bound in the river Euphrates, which he expounds to be the captains of the Turkish forces, that till then were subject to the sultan at Babylon, were to be loosed, and freed from that yoke, and set up for themselves. And these were prepared to slay the third part of men,

15 And the four angels were loosed, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to slay the third part of men.

16 And the number of the army of the horsemen were two hundred thousand thousand: and I heard the number of them.

17 And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions: and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke, and brimstone.

18 By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths.

19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.

20 And the rest of the men, which were not killed by these plagues, yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood: which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk:

on them, v. 14. The instruments God makes use of to punish a people, may sometimes lie at a great distance from them, so that no danger may be apprehended from them. These four messengers of divine judgment lay bound in the river Euphrates, a great way from the European nations. Here, the Turkish power had its rise, which seems to be the story of this vision.

II. The vision itself, v. 15, 16. The time of their military operations and executions is limited to an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year. Prophetic characters of time are hardly to be understood by us; but in general the time is fixed to an hour, when it shall begin, and when it shall end; and how far the execution shall prevail, even to a third part of the inhabitants of the earth. The army to execute this great commission, is mustered, and the number of horsemen found; but we are left to guess what the infantry must be. In general, it tells us, the armies of the Mahometan empire should be vastly great; and so it is certain they were. We have their formidable equipage and appearance, v. 17. horses fierce, like lions, and eager for the battle; riders clad in bright and costly armor, with all the ensigns of martial courage, zeal, and resolution. They make vast havoc and desolation in the Roman empire, now become antichristian; a third part were killed. The artillery, by which they made such slaughter, is described by fire, smoke, and brimstone, issuing out of the mouths of their horses, and stings in their tails. Mr. Mede's opinion is, that this is a prediction of great guns, those instruments of cruelty, which make such destruction: he observes, These were first used by the Turks at the siege of Constantinople, and, being new and strange, were very terrible, and did great execution. However, here seems to be an allusion to what is mentioned in the former vision, that, as antichrist had his forces of a spiritual nature, like scorpions, poisoning the minds of men with error and idolatry; so the Turks, who were raised up to punish the antichristian apostasy, had their scorpions and their stings too, to hurt and kill their bodies, who had been the murderers of so many souls. Lastly, Observe the impetuosity of the antichristian generation under these dreadful judgments, v. 20. the rest of the men who were not killed, repented not, they still persisted in those sins for which God was so severely punishing them: Their idolatry; they would not cast away their images: Their murders, v. 21. committed on the saints and servants of Christ. Popery is a bloody religion, and seems resolved to continue such. Their sorceries; they have their charms, and magic arts, and rites in exorcism, and other things. Their fornication; they allow both spiritual and carnal impurity, and promote it in themselves and others. Their thefts; they have, by unjust for an hour, a day, a month, and a year. He reckons the year, in St. John, as the Julian year of 365 days: a month is 30 of these days, and a day makes one: which, added to the former number makes 396. Now, he proves, from historians, that Ottoman came, and began his conquests at Prouse, in the year 1302; to which the former number, in which they were to slay the third part of men, being added, it must end in the year 1698. And though the historians do not mark the hour, or the 12th part of the day, or year; yet he is confident, if that ever is known, that the prophecy will be found, in that, to be punctually accomplished. After this, he thinks, their time of hurting the papal Christians is at an end. They may, indeed, still do mischief to the Muscovites, or persecute their own Christian subjects, but they can do no more hurt to the papalists. Bp. Burnet's Hist. of his own Time.—In several subordinate particulars, this statement differs from that above given; which seems to be the more exact, both as to the beginning of the Othman's successes, and the close of them; and also of the method by which the time should be computed. Yet the grand outline of interpretation is the same: and, considering the date of Bishop Lloyd's conclusions, which preceded the final successes of the Othmans, but which have, for substance, been verified for much above 100 years, they may justly be considered as extraordinary; and as an important proof of the true meaning of the prophecy, and of its exact accomplishment. (Note, 16:12-16.) SCOTT.

Bound.] I. e. not permitted to move in the execution of the commission, till a certain hour, day, month, year, when the iniquity of the men should be ripe for such a punishment. The decree was full, and not a horn of the altar left on which to make an expiation for its reversal.' WOODH.

V. 16. The number of the army of horsemen was declared to be 200,000,000, twice ten thousand times ten thousand; i. e. an immense multitude, a very large definite number being put for an indefinite. (Note, 5:11-14.) Accordingly, the Turks brought vast armies into the field, often to the amount of 4, 5, 6, or 700,000 men, chiefly cavalry: and when the whole multitude of those is considered, who were employed in this manner during the conquests of 391 years, we shall see the propriety of the apostle's strong prophetic language. SCOTT.

V. 17-19. The apostle likewise saw both 'the horses and their riders,' in his vision, as having 'breastplates of fire, hyacinth, and brimstone;' which may be considered as representing the scarlet, blue, and yellow colors, for which they have always been remarkable. The horses' heads, like those of lions, denoted their strength, courage, and fierceness: and 'the fire, smoke, and brimstone, which issued out of their mouths, and killed the third part of men,' appears to me an evident and most astonishing prediction of the use of gunpowder and of artillery, which were first invented about this period, and which the Turks employed with great success in their wars, especially in the siege of Constantinople; when immensely large guns were used, so that one of them is said to have carried a stone of 300 pounds weight. By these, the walls of that city were at length battered down, which made way for the final destruction of that empire.—These tremendous conquerors, before whom desolation marched, and from whose mouths 'fire, and smoke, and brimstone issued,' not only slew men in battle, when they faced them; but they had tails like serpents, with heads on them, with which they hurt men, as by an envenomed bite. That is, the Othmans or Turks left behind them, wherever they went, the same poisonous and ruinous religion, which the Saracens had done before them; and this proved more durably mischievous than their most bloody conquests. So that the remains of the Greek church, and of Christianity in those countries, were almost wholly extirpated; and Mohammedism became universally prevalent, and, indeed, continues so to this day, in that part of the world, in which the Gospel had been for a long time most signally successful. Sc. (18, 19.) Mouths.] 'Indicating doctrine, Is. 11:4. 49:2. Rev. 2:16. 13:2, 5. 12:15, 16. 16:13. So that corrupt and blasphemous doctrine joins with armies in this warfare. Rev. 19:20. 21:8. As it issues from brutes, we infer, that the doctrine is founded, not so much on rational arguments, as on promises of animal gratifications, which is the motive of beasts. The tail, too, in prophetic Scripture, denotes baseness, degradation, and subjection to impure passions, Is. 9:15. Deut. 28:13. Rev. 12:4.' WOODH.

V. 20, 21. 'The rest of the men,' who were not destroyed, or compelled to become Mohammedans, by the above mentioned calamities, did not repent of their evil works. The Latin or Roman church, which escaped this destruction, still persisted in the idolatrous worship of demons, or angels, and departed saints, real or fictitious, by which devils are virtually worshipped; (Notes, Dan. 11:38. 1 Tim. 4:1-5.) in their stupid adoration of senseless images, for which they have no better plea to use than the Pagans had; in their 'murders,' massacres, and bloody wars with heretics, so called, and their execrable persecutions; in their 'sorceries,' or pretended revelations and miracles: and in 'their fornication;' forbidding marriage, yet conniving at concubinage in the clergy; binding numbers by vows to a single life, and yet licensing brothels by public authority of the Pope, in Rome itself: and in 'their thefts,' or those exactions and impositions, by which they fraudulently, oppressively, and iniquitously drew immense treasures from the nations. (Notes, 13:11-17. 16:10, 11. 17:1-6. The eastern church, in which many corruptions first prevailed, was punished by the first woe of the Saracens; and as this did not bring them to repentance, the second woe of the Turks or Othmans completed its ruin. But the western church, not repenting of her abominations, will at length be overwhelmed with the third woe. For the reformation from popery, and all that has hitherto taken place in those western regions, has amounted only to the 'two witnesses,' (Note, 11:3-6.) protesting against the prevailing abominations: and the prevalence of infidelity, skepticism, and heresy, in proportion to the supposed decline of popery and superstition, gives no just room to suppose, that matters are very much improved in the western church. In this skeptical, profane, licentious, and superficial age, indeed, Satan has evidently changed his ground; but the scriptural Christian will readily perceive, that he has, hitherto, in great measure, maintained it.—The persevering idolatry in the remains of the Greek church and elsewhere, and the iniquity of professed Christians, notwithstanding the desolations made among them by the Saracens and Turks, renders the prophecy more circumstantial, and the exact accomplishment of it more wonderful. The very things which infidels urge, as objections to the divine original of Christianity, are expressly predicted in the N. T. and demonstrate its divine inspiration. SCOTT.

(20, 21.) 'The sins are: 1. worship of daimonia, daemons, shown by Vitr. &c. to be fictitious gods, and deified mortals; 2. idols; 3. all manner of impurity, injustice, and immorality, under the scriptural designations of "murders, sorceries, fornication, and thefts." This was not the character of the Christian man in the first 3 centuries. The degeneracy began then, but was of slow procedure. The low estate of the church in temporal enjoyment, and its exposure to frequent and severe persecutions, preserved it, in a considerable degree, from the intrusion of the

PRACT. OBS. The Lord [punishes] the abuse of spiritual advantages, by spiritual judgments, leaving the word of the Gospel to be withdrawn, or corrupted, by the artifices of Satan; because men would not walk in the light, while they enjoyed it. 'A fallen star,' some apostate, endowed with abilities and possessed of influence, often proves Satan's instrument in blinding and deceiving mankind. This judgment, however, would for the present be little regarded, if other visitations were not connected with it; but, sooner or later, the prevalence of false religion against the truth of Christ will make way for such calamities on guilty nations, as may render life itself a burden, and death the only apparent and desired relief.—As we ought to 'fear Him, who is able to destroy worldly, who afterwards made it subservient to their ambition. And in the two centuries preceding, the lamentable change from divine knowledge to ignorance, and from purity to corruption, was gradual, so that one cannot fairly apply a general character of so deep a dye to the Christian church, before the 6th cent.; but at the latter part of this, and beginning of the 7th, the measure of this iniquity came to its full.—And at this time history records a dreadful invasion of the Christian world, by numerous armies assailing it at once, by corrupt, blasphemous doctrines, and by the terror of their arms; and with such amazing success, as to cut off, from the hope and comfort of Christianity, and from the communion of the church, so large a body of Christians as may fairly be accounted one third, yet leaving the remaining parts idolatrous, impure, and unrepentant.—But as Mohammedism enlarged, the Christian powers made corresponding acquisitions in the West.' WOODH.

NOTES. CHAP. X. V. 1. In the conclusion of the former ch., the apostle had received some intimations, concerning the pernicious corruptions of the western church, and other professed Christians, during the period of the two preceding trumpets: but before he was made acquainted with the events which would follow the sounding of the 7th trumpet, he was shown something more of the state of that church, in the ages previous to this grand event. This mighty Angel must be either Christ Himself, or an emblematical display of his glory. SCOTT.

(1.) 'In 8:13. 3 grand woes, 3 distinct periods of successful attack upon the church by the antichristian powers, are announced. The 1st of these takes place immediately, and in 9:12. is said to be past, and the 2d follows: but this, though it begins, like the first, with an hostile invasion, does not end in like manner. No period (as in the 1st woe of 150 years) is assigned for its continuance; and when the description of the invasion is finished, no similar notice is given that the woe is ended. On the contrary, it seems to continue till the 7th trumpet sounds, (11:14.) when it is declared to be past. The whole prophecy had now begun to appear as drawing to its close, for the 7th and last trumpet was expected. But a new and enlarging scene opens under the remains of this 6th trumpet, and before the end of the 2d woe. The famous period of 42 months, or 1260 days, is here presented to view; the usurped dominion of the Mahomedans continues with it. But there is another antichristian usurpation, belonging to the same period, which is now to be prefigured.—Angel.] This appearance was pronounced by Sir W. Jones, to equal in sublimity any description to be found in the inspired writers, and to be far superior to anything of the kind produced by human composition. This messenger has now a new commission; it is another angel, not the Son of God, for He is already upon the scene in his emblem of the Lamb of God, on the great Father's throne, where He continues even to ch. 14: and before the throne is the Holy Spirit, 4:5. It is now generally allowed, that the prophecies of the little book belong in a great measure to the 6th trumpet. See Vitr.' WOODH.

V. 2—4. The Angel, thus introduced, held in his hand 'a little book,' as containing the Revelation of the purposes of God, which he was about to communicate to his servant. This was distinct from the larger book before mentioned, being a kind of appendix or codicil to it. (Note, 5:1—4.) Or it might be one of the 7 parts of that book, which, as some think, might each be called 'a little book.' It had been sealed, but appeared as having been opened: and contained a part of 'the book before spoken of,' though thus introduced separately, to call and fix the attention. At least, it perfectly coincided with the contents of it. Several respectable interpreters suppose this little book to have contained all the following parts of 'the Revelation;' and thus they make it much greater than all the rest of the book, of which Christ opened the seals; containing (as some of them suppose) all which should take place after the sounding of the 7th trumpet; whereas, the former part of the next ch. and all the two following chs. at least, belong to the 6th trumpet. These are objections against that arrangement, to which I means, heaped together vast wealth, to the injury and impoverishing of families, cities, princes, and nations. These are the flagrant crimes of antichrist and his agents; and though God has revealed his wrath from heaven against them, they are obstinate, hardened, and impenitent, and judicially so, for they must be destroyed. From this sixth trumpet learn, 1. God can make one enemy of the church to be a scourge and plague to another. 2. He who is the Lord of hosts, has vast armies at his command, to serve his own purposes. 3. The most formidable powers have limits set them, which they cannot transgress. 4. When God's judgments are in the earth, He expects the inhabitants thereof should repent of sin, and learn righteousness. 5. Impenitency under divine judgments is an iniquity that will be the ruin of sinners; for where God judges He will overcome.

CHAP. X. This ch. is an introduction to the latter part of the prophecies of this book. Whether what is contained between this and the sounding of the 7th trumpet, ch. 11:15. be a distinct prophecy from the other, or only a more general account of some of the principal things included in the other, is disputed by our curious inquirers into these abstruse writings.

V. 1—7. Here we have an account of another vision the apostle was favored with, between the sounding of the 6th and of the 7th trumpet. And we observe,

1. The person principally concerned in communicating this discovery to John,—an angel from heaven, another mighty angel, so set forth as would induce one to think it could be no other than our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. For, He was clothed with a cloud; He veils his glory, and his dispensations; A rainbow was upon his head; He is always mindful of his covenant; and when his conduct is most mysterious, yet it is perfectly just and faithful. His face was as the sun, all bright, and full of lustre and majesty, ch. 1:16. His feet were as pillars of fire; all his ways, both of grace and providence, are pure and steady.

2. His station and posture; his right foot on the sea, and his left on the earth; to show the absolute power and dominion He had over the world. And He held in his hand a both body and soul in hell,' far more 'than them that can only kill the body;' so those destroyers are most to be dreaded, who act as 'angels of the bottomless pit,' and vicegerents of Satan, by diffusing pernicious heresies and impostures, contrary to the pure doctrine of Christ. For that grand deceiver, which, 'transformed into an angel of light,' and his ministers, when they appear to be teachers of righteousness, do far more mischief to mankind, than the most barbarous and successful warriors could ever accomplish; but he who murders at once both the souls and bodies of men, most completely merits the title of Abaddon, Apollyon, the Destroyer. SCOTT.

could never find a satisfactory answer: besides, the great book would end abruptly in the middle of the 6th trumpet; and the same subject would be as abruptly taken up in 'the little book.' It therefore appears to me, that this little book contained no more, than the former part of the next ch.; (Notes, 11:1—14.) which was an important appendix to ch. 9. as it gives a general account of the state of the western church, and all connected with it, during the period of the 5th and 6th trumpets. Then the former subject proceeds, the 7th trumpet is sounded, and a compendious view is given of the subsequent events to the end of the world. (11:15—18.) After this, the second part of the book is introduced; (11:19.) and the apostle is shown a great variety of events, tending to explain those, which had before been predicted, in a more summary manner, but chiefly relative to the state of the church, as the former part had been to those which concerned the empire. This arrangement which is nearly the same with that adopted by Bp. Newton, makes no material alteration in the plan of the celebrated Mr. Mede, and those who have followed him; while it avoids the difficulty of making the little book by far the largest, and the necessity of dividing the 6th trumpet between the two books. Still, every event is referred to the times, to which, according to the synchronisms of that able and laborious writer, it belongs, and which are evidently deduced, not from vague hypotheses, but from the internal construction of the prophecy itself. And the observation of another learned writer, Bp. Hurd, stands equally good: 'The knowledge of this order is a great restraint on the fancy of an expositor, who is not now at liberty to apply the prophecies to events of any time to which they may appear to suit; but to events only falling within that time, to which they belong in the course of this predetermined method: and if to this restriction we add another, which arises from the necessity of applying not one, but many prophecies, to the same time; we can hardly conceive how an interpretation should keep clear of all these impediments, and make its way through so many interfering checks, unless it were the true one. Just as when a lock (to use Mr. Mede's allusion) is composed of many and intricate wards; the key that easily turns within them, and opens the lock, can be that only which properly belongs to it.'—Since I first wrote these remarks, expositors have arisen, (especially the pious and learned Mr. Faber,) who suppose, that the little book contained the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th chs. of Rev. But, after very much consideration, I feel constrained to dissent from this opinion, however respectably supported. (1.) Because it makes the little book, or codicil, bear a too great proportion to the whole prophecy. The prophetic chs. properly speaking, are only 12; namely, the 6th, 8th, 9th, 11th, to the 14th inclusive; and the 16th to the 20th inclusive; for the 7th, 10th, and 15th, contain not much explicit prediction; and the last two chapters, succeeding, as it appears to me, the day of judgment, are rather descriptive of the heavenly state, than prophetic, in the ordinary sense of the word. Now the four chapters assigned to the little book, not being very short, yet crowded with most important predictions, contain at least a third of the whole prophecy; which is more than can properly be assigned to 'the little book.' (2.) The 11th ch. evidently carries on the prediction, in a general manner, to the millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Note, 11:15—18.) Now, the succeeding chs. to the 20th, plainly treat of times previous to the millennium. The prophet must, therefore, somewhere go back, to take a more particular view of his subject, than he at first gave: but no place can be assigned for this, so satisfactorily, as the close of ch. 11. The course of predicted events cannot be successive, in those chs.; therefore some of them must be coincident. (3.) No interpretation of the former vs. of ch. 12. gives the least satisfaction, except that which recalls the reader's attention to the events, which took place when Pagan persecution terminated, the Roman emperors professed Christianity; and further corruptions, calamities, and persecutions, sprang from that very source, which seemed to little book opened, probably the same before sealed, but now opened, and gradually fulfilled by Him.

3. His awful voice, v. 3. a voice as echoed by seven thunders, seven solemn and terrible ways of discovering the mind of God.

4. The prohibition given to the apostle, that he should not publish, but conceal, what he had learned from the seven thunders, v. 4. the time was not yet come.

5. The solemn oath taken by this mighty angel; He lifted up his hand to heaven, and sware by Him that liveth for ever; by Himself, as God often has done; or by God, as God, to whom He, as Lord, Redeemer, and Ruler of the world, now appeals. The matter of the oath was, there shall be time no longer; either, (1.) There shall be now no longer delay in fulfilling the predictions of this book, than till the last angel should sound; then everything should be put into speedy execution, v. 7. Or, (2.) When this mystery of God is finished, time itself shall be no more, as being the measure of things mutable, but all things shall be at length for ever fixed, and so time itself swallowed up in eternity.

V. 8-11. Here, 1. The apostle is charged by the same voice from heaven, to go and take the little book out of the hands of that mighty angel mentioned before; and then, by the Angel Himself, to eat the book; hinting to the apostle, that, before he should publish what he had discovered, he must more thoroughly digest the predictions, and be in himself suitably affected with them.

2. We have an account of the taste and relish this little book would have, at first, while in his mouth, sweet. All persons feel a pleasure in looking into future events, and in having them foretold; and all good men love to receive a word from God, of what import soever it be. But when this book of prophecy was more thoroughly digested by the apostle, the contents would be bitter; these were things so awful and terrible, such grievous persecutions of the people of God, and such desolation made in the earth, that the foresight and foreknowledge of them would not be pleasant, but painful to the mind of the apostle: thus was Ezekiel's prophecy to him, ch. 3: 3.

3. The apostle's discharge of the duty he was called to, v. 10. He took, ate, and found as was told him. It becomes God's servants to digest, in their own souls, the messages they bring to others in his name, and to be suitably affected therewith themselves; also, to deliver every message with which they are charged, whether pleasing or displeasing to men.

4. The apostle is made to know, that this book of prophecy was not given merely to gratify his own curiosity, or to affect him with pleasure or pain, but to be communicated to the world; here his prophetic commission seems to be renewed, and he is ordered to prepare for another embassy, to convey those declarations of the mind and will of God, which are of great importance to all the world, and to the highest and greatest men in the world, and such should be read and recorded in many languages;

PRACT. OBS. The divine Surety of the new covenant, who 'purchased the church with his own blood,' manages all things in heaven and earth with uncontrollable authority.—The final salvation of the righteous, and the final prevalence of true religion on earth, are engaged for by the same unfailing Word of the Lord; and, though 'the time shall not be yet,' we have solid ground to conclude, that 'the sounding of the 7th trumpet' is near at hand, when glorious scenes will be exhibited. Very soon, however, to us, 'time shall be no more;' but, if we are believers, a happy eternity will follow; and we shall look down from heaven, to behold and rejoice in the triumphs of Christ, and his cause on earth. SCOTT.

promise far happier days. I therefore am most decidedly of opinion, that 'the little book' contains only the first 14 vs. of the next ch. to the close of the 8th trumpet; being coincident, as to the state of things in the W., with that of the eastern empire, as predicted in ch. 9. I am not, however, unwilling to concede, that the following vs., to the close of the 18th, may be assigned to it, as a general pre-intimation of the final success of that cause, which had so long been trampled under foot. Several objections to this interpretation will be obviated as we proceed. The mighty Angel, above described, 'set his right foot on the sea, and his left on the dry land,' to denote his sovereign authority over the whole terraqueous globe; and perhaps intimating his determination of spreading the Gospel through every part of it: and he demanded attention with a loud voice like the roaring of a lion; to show the power and terror of his word to his obstinate enemies. After this 7 thunders were heard, which, in the most majestic manner, uttered intelligible voices: these either related to matters proper for the apostle to know, but not proper to be published; or else they are coincident with some things, which are afterwards more clearly revealed. They were, however, ordered to be sealed up, and it does not become us to inquire any farther concerning them. (2) Little book.] 8, 9, 10. 'A very little book.'—(3) Roareth.] It is used without distinction, of a lion, an ox, a camel, or an ass.' Leigh. SCOTT.

(2.) Little.] Not as to its contents, but so that it might be eaten, and digested spiritually; unsealed, 5:9. probably a part of the larger sealed book, for it comes under the yet unemptied seals. It may be the same with Dan. 12:4, 9. The scene is in heaven, the earth being visible below, extended as a plain, and containing the divisions before marked of land, sea, and rivers. The right foot's being placed on the sea, seems to intimate, that (as before the eastern, so now) the western nations, or Gentiles, are to be a principal object of the remaining prophecy, under this trumpet.' Woodh.—'There is much difference of opinion as to the contents of this little book. Most commentators suppose that it contained a part of the prophecies of the Apocalypse. Some suppose it one of the 7 parts of the sealed book, others that it contained all the rest of the apocalyptic visions. Faber thinks the contents were ch. 11 to 14. Scott considers it included only ch. 11. 1-14. Others have thought, that the little book did not contain any of the apocalyptic prophecies, but was itself an emblem.' HENRY, abr.

(4.) 'All we can fairly collect from the transaction is this, that there are great events in history, and probably relating to the Christian church, which are not made the subject of open prophecy.' WOODH.

V 5-7. Time no longer: or, as it may be rendered, 'the time should not be yet;' i. e. the time of those glorious things, with which 'the mystery of God would be finished.' Further delays must be expected: till at length, in 'the lays of the 7th angel,' after he had begun to sound his trumpet, that would be accomplished, according to the predictions of former prophets; namely, as it may be supposed from the subsequent part of the book, in the destruction of every opposing power, and the universal prevalence of true religion, which would continue, with [698] little interruption, to the consummation of all things, and so terminate in the eternal state. (Notes, 11:15-13. 18;-20.) But before those events began to take place, other preparatory transactions must occur; and this solemn declaration seems to have been intended to teach Christians, in the intervening ages, to wait with patience, and to expect a happy event of the calamities of the church, though the time of it seem long delayed. (Notes, Dan. 7:9-14, 23-27, 8:13, 14, 12:5-13.)—If we adhere to our tr. the meaning must be, that all the subsequent events, to the end of time, would fall under the period of the 7th trumpet.—(7) Declared.] Proclaimed the Gospel, referring to the glad tidings of the millennium. V. 8-11. Ez. 3:1-3, 12-15. The apostle, by publishing the contents of this little book, and the rest of the predictions he was about to receive, has indeed 'prophesied before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings,' and does so to this very day, in all the languages into which the Scriptures have been, or shall be, translated; and in all the countries in which they are circulated. (10.) 'Forbes supposes the little book is the Scriptures, and its being open, denotes the bold and powerful preaching of the Word. It is open for that clear understanding of holy Scripture which now Christ should bring; whereas, in antichrist's darkness, the same was buried in ignorance, it being held a capital crime for common laymen to read the Scripture in the vulgar tongue. Quesnel refers v. 9. to the understanding the truths of the Divine Word. Keith considers this vision as pointing to the Reformation. The open book he refers to the Bible. And that the translation or opening of it, especially of the N. T., unfolding the precepts of Jesus, and the doctrines of the Gospel, gave a character to the time, which, in respect to the widely extended diffusion of the Scriptures by the then recent art of printing, the days of the apostles scarcely equalled. The Gospel, as a book, may be said to have been for the first time open to the world. The 7 thunders he considers to be, 7 wars which succeeded the Reformation, and which fill up the chasm after it, till the pouring out the vials of the wrath of God. But it is at least useless to speculate upon a point which the Divine Word expressly states is not to be investigated. When the apostle tasted the good Word of God, and knew the meaning of the descent of the angel, it was sweet to this, indeed, is the case; we have them in our language, and are all obliged to attend to them, humbly to inquire into the meaning of them, and firmly to believe that everything shall have its accomplishment in the proper time; and when the prophecies are fulfilled, the sense and truth of them will appear, and the omniscience, power, and faithfulness of the great God will be adored.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. This prophetic passage about measuring the temple, is a plain reference to what we find in Ezekiel's vision, Ez. 40:3, &c. Observe,

1. How much was to be measured. (1.) The temple; the gospel-church in general. (2.) The altar. That which was the place of the most solemn acts of worship, may be put for religious worship in general; whether the church has the true altars, whether they take Christ for their Altar, and whether the Altar be in the holiest; that is, whether they worship God in the Spirit and in truth. (3.) The worshippers, too, must be measured; whether they make God's glory their end, and his Word their rule; whether they come to God with suitable affections, and whether their conversation be as becomes the Gospel.

2. What was not to be measured, v. 2. The court without the temple. Why was not the outer court mentioned? This was no part of the temple, according to the model either of Solomon or Zerubbabel, therefore God would have no regard to it. Both that and the city were trodden under foot 42 months: which some would have to be, the whole time of the reign of antichrist. They who worship in the outer court, are either such as worship in a false manner, or with hypocritical hearts; and these are rejected of God, and will be found among his enemies. From the whole, observe, God will have a temple and an altar in the world, till the end of time. The holy city, the visible church, is very much trampled on in the world; but the desolations are for a limited, short time, and she shall be delivered out of all her troubles.

V. 3—13. In this time of treading down, God has reserved to Him his faithful witnesses, who will not fail to attest the truth of his Word and worship, and the excellency of his ways. Here, observe,

1. The number of these witnesses; small, yet sufficient: many will own Christ in prosperity, who will desert Him in persecution; one witness, when the cause is on trial, is worth many at other times: sufficient; in the mouth of two, every cause shall be established: these, some think, are Enoch and Elias, who are to return to the earth for a time: others, the church of the believing Jews, and that of the Gentiles: they should rather seem, God's eminent faithful ministers, who shall not only continue to profess, but to preach the Gospel, in the worst of times.

2. The time of their prophesying, or bearing their testimony for Christ, 1260 days, i. e. (as many think) to the period of the reign of antichrist; and if the beginning of his heart; yet when he knew the ungodly rancor, murderous wars, and fierce animosity which would follow, grief succeeded to his joy,—his heart was bitter, was afflicted.

(11.) Mede infers, that the apostle is about to go again over the same period he had before discoursed of, giving an account of the state of the church as he had done of the empire; but the new descriptions and new events to which they refer, which follow, may be sufficient to explain the expression.

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. It has before been supposed, that the former part of this ch. exhibits the contents of the little book; (Notes, 10-2-4.) which represents the state of the western church, during the two preceding woe-trumpets, and before the sounding of the 7th trumpet (15); and this fixes the chronology of it.—The discoveries of this little book are related under emblematical appearances and actions, as before. The scene is the temple; and 'a reed,' like a 'measuring rod,' being given to the apostle, he was ordered to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers in the inner court. (Notes, Ex. 27:9—19. Ez. 40:3.) This denoted that, in the predicted period, there would be a small number, whose doctrine, worship, and behavior, would bear measuring by the Word of God; and that these only would be acceptable, interior worshippers; whereas, 'the outer court' being left, by express command, unmeasured, and 'given unto the Gentiles,' emphatically showed, that the greatest number of professed Christians would be formal, superstitious, and idolatrous worshippers; Christians only in name, but Gentiles in wickedness, and even in idolatry. The 'holy city' also, being 'trodden under foot' by them, implied that the church at large, and its most lucrative and eminent places, would be filled with idolaters, infidels, and hypocrites, and that true Christians would be oppressed in a grievous manner. The duration of these evil times was fixed to 42 months, or 1260 days, which, by prophetic computation, are so many years. (Notes, Dan. 7:23—27. 8:9—14. 12:5—13.) The whole of Daniel's prophecies should be compared with the subsequent parts of this book, as the same events and dates are intended in both; and this gives a measure of certainty to the interpretation. Daniel also fixes these events to the remains of the fourth monarchy, after it was broken to pieces, and formed ten kingdoms; and this determines the geography of them, especially to the western empire, which was properly the seat of that monarchy. So that the outlines, both of the time and place, to which these prophecies belonged, are unalterably determined, by the prophets themselves; nor can the accomplishment of them be referred to any other times or places, without doing the most manifest violence to them in both respects. Indeed, the prophecies of Daniel, and those of the apostle, when properly explained, and compared with each other and with their accomplishment, constitute the fullest imaginable demonstration of the truth of the Scripture. But demonstration itself cannot convince those, who will not bestow due pains to examine it.—The beginning of these 1260 years must be placed subsequent to the first four trumpets, on the subversion of the Western empire, which was completed A. D. 566. This made way for the pope, in process of time, to acquire a vast accession of ecclesiastical dominion. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3—7.) He became universal bishop, A. D. 606; and was fully established as a temporal prince, A. D. 756. Did we know exactly at what time to date the beginning of the 1260 years, we might show with certainty when they would terminate; but this would not consist with that wise obscurity, which always, in some respects, rests on prophecies, before they are fulfilled. Till the event, therefore, shall explain this matter, it must be left undetermined; but perhaps the beginning of the rise and of the fall of this antichristian tyranny, and the completion of them, may both be at the distance of 1260 years from each other; as in more than one way the Babylonish captivity lasted 70 years. (Notes, 2 K. 21:1, 8—16. Ezra 1:1—4. Dan. 1:1, 2.) The beginning, however, of these years cannot well be fixed sooner than A. D. 606, nor later than A. D. 756. It is, indeed, far from probable, that the beginning fell so late as this; but that it did not much precede 606, will, I think, afterwards appear. (Note, 7—12.)—Measuring the servants of God, is equivalent to sealing them.—The unmeasured tenants of the outer court, and the unsealed men throughout the Roman empire, are alike the votaries of the apostasy; while they that were measured, and they that were sealed, are the saints who refused to be partakers of his abominations.

(1, 2.) And the angel stood.] 'The best authorities (from the most authentic MSS.) reject these words from the text. The temple of God, after the coming of the Messiah, and the rejection of the Jews, is the Christian church, (1 Cor. 3:16. 2 Cor. 6:15. 1 Tim. 3:16. Heb. passim.) The altar represents the worship therein duly performed; and by those who dwell therein, we must understand the true worshippers. And by comparing Ez. 40:3, 4. and Zech. 2:1—5. with this passage, we may deduce, that, by such appointed mensuration, the places measured are appropriated to the worship of God. Tread under foot.] This tr. would require kat-patēsousi, but the Gr. is simply patēsousi, which means tread, i. e. by frequenting, for the purpose of worship; so the Sept. in Is. 1:12. 25:10. Ps. 65:4. not trample in contempt. And we learn from history, that the treading of the Gentiles in the Christian church, though marked with ignorance and superstition, has not been vindictive or contemptuous. [But see Bloomf.]

V. 3—6. It would be tedious even to mention the conjectural explanations, which have been given of this prophecy concerning the witnesses; but they generally and notoriously violate the apostle's rule; (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:20, 21.) not proceeding on a large and comprehensive view of the subject, but confining the interpretation to private, and comparatively little events. A 'king,' in prophetic language, commonly means a succession of monarchs: a 'witness,' therefore, must be explained by the same rule; and not individuals, but a succession of men, who, during the period referred to, bore testimony to the truth, must be intended by the prophecy. 'Two witnesses' were mentioned, because one was insufficient for the legal proof of any fact. (Notes, Deut. 17:2—7. v. 6. 19:15—21. v. 15.) For these 'witnesses' would be as few as could suffice to attest the true Gospel, and to enter a public protest against the antichristian perversions of it: perhaps Moses and Aaron, Elijah and Elisha, and the apostles and 70 disciples, sent forth 'two and two,' might be alluded to. All real Christians, who boldly professed their religion, may be considered as uniting in this testimony; yet ministers, and especially bold and zealous men, who attempted reformation, were 'the witnesses' primarily intended. The Angel before mentioned (1), even the Lord Jesus, declared, that He would 'give them power,' or authority, 'to prophesy,' during the assigned time; yet 'in sackcloth,' as expressive of their afflicted, persecuted state, and of their deep concern and sorrow of heart, on account of the abominations against which they protested.—It has been shown, by many writers, that, during the darkest ages of popery, men were raised up, who bore a decided testimony against the prevailing corruptions of the Roman church, and for the leading doctrines of the Gospel. It was, indeed, the interest and the constant practice of their opponents, to silence their testimony, to blacken their characters, or to destroy them as heretics; yet, after all their endeavors to suppress, misrepresent, and mutilate their writings, enough remains to show, that Christ had a remnant of faithful witnesses and disciples, through all the ages intended, even to this day. From the 8th to the 11th century inclusive, we find accounts of individuals, or collective bodies, who, under the brand of heresy, and in the face of persecution, evidently held, and openly professed, the great doctrines of salvation by faith in Christ, and through his mediation, merits, and grace; and protested against the abuses of popery; and these, who just prevented the total darkness of that gloomy period, could by no means be extirpated. On the contrary, they continued to increase in many places: in the valleys of Piedmont, especially, vast multitudes were collected, and called Waldenses and Albigenses, who were evidently Calvinists, (to speak in modern language,) more or less moderate, and consistent in their views; and their lives were generally exemplary, as some of the

that interval could be ascertained, this number of prophetic days, taking a day for a year, would give us a prospect when the end shall be.

3. Their habit and posture; they prophesied in sackcloth, as those that are deeply affected with the low and distressed state of the churches and interest of Christ in the world.

4. How they were supported and supplied during the discharge of their great and hard work; they stood before the God of the whole earth, and He gave them power to prophecy, made them like Zerubbabel and Joshua, the two olive-trees and candlestick in the vision of Zechariah, ch. 4:3, &c. gave them the oil of holy zeal, courage, strength, and comfort; oil, not only in their lamps, but in their vessels; habits of spiritual life, light, and zeal.

5. Their security and defence during the time of their prophesying, v. 5. Some think, this alludes to Elias's calling for fire from heaven, to consume the captains and their companies that came to seize him, 2 Kings 1:12. God promised the prophet Jeremiah, ch. 5:14. Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people shall be wood, and it shall devour them. By their praying and preaching, and courage in suffering, they shall gall and wound the very hearts and consciences of many of their persecutors, who shall go away self-condemned, and be even terrors to themselves; like Pashur, at the words of Jeremiah, ch. 20:4.

6. The slaying of the witnesses, to make their testimony more strong; they must seal it with their blood. Observe, (1.) The time when they shall be killed; when they have finished their testimony. Some think it ought to be rendered, when they were about to finish their testimony; when they had prophesied in sackcloth the greatest part of the 1260 years, then they should feel the last effect of antichristian malice. (2.) The enemy that should overcome and slay them; the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit. Antichrist, the great instrument of the devil, should make war against them, not only with the arms of subtle and sophistical learning, but chiefly with open force and violence; and God would permit his enemies to prevail against his witnesses for a time. (3.) The barbarous usage of these slain witnesses; the malice of their enemies was not satiated with their blood and death, but pursued even their dead bodies. They would

papists themselves have allowed. These subsisted during the 12th and 13th, and the following centuries, though they were persecuted with such unrelenting fury, and pursued with such cruel and destructive wars, that, in France alone, a million of them are computed to have been slain, for the sole crime of protesting against the tyranny of the pope, and the corruptions of the church of Rome! They, however, continued to 'prophesy in sackcloth;' and, when driven from Piedmont, they settled in other places, propagated their religion, and prepared the way for the Reformation. Connected with them, and agreed in their leading doctrines, and in opposition to the church of Rome, were the Lollards in England; and the Bohemians, from among whom arose John Huss and Jerom of Prague, who were burnt in the 15th century, by the council of Constance. Multitudes embraced the doctrines of the Gospel in different places, during those times, and professed or preached it at the hazard of their lives; and great numbers were burnt or put to death in the most cruel manner, for so doing.—'The visible assemblies of the Paulicians, or Albigens were extinguished by fire and sword; and the bleeding remnant escaped by flight, concealment, or Catholic conformity. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world. In the state, in the church, and even in the cloister, a latent succession was preserved of the disciples of Paul, who protested against the tyranny of Rome, embraced the Bible as the rule of faith, and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology. The struggles of Wickliff in England, and of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual; but the names of Zuinglius, Luther, and Calvin, are pronounced with gratitude, as the deliverers of nations!' Gibbon.—How striking a testimony is here given, by an enemy of Christianity, to the fulfillment of prophecy! Gibbon, writing an involuntary comment on St. John! Cuninghame. At length Luther arose, and the Reformation took place; since which time, the same testimony for the truth of Christ, and against the errors of antichrist, has been maintained. Nor does it appear, that the term is yet expired; for 'they shall prophesy 1260 days clothed in sackcloth.' The term of their 'prophesying in sackcloth,' before they 'are slain and rise again,' (Note, 7—12.) must extend through the whole of the 42 months, and cannot terminate till these are ended. This is wonderfully overlooked by many expositors, who inconsistently suppose the witnesses to have finished their 'testimony in sackcloth,' and, having been slain, to have risen again, at a time, when, by their own computation, the 1260 years were not closed. The witnesses are not, indeed, at present exposed to such terrible sufferings, as in former times; but those scenes may be repeated before long, for what any man can foreknow; and they have abundant cause 'to prophesy in sackcloth,' on account of the declined state of religion even in the Protestant churches.—However, though men despised and hated the witnesses, they were in reality 'the two olive-trees,' endued with spiritual gifts and grace, that, through their instrumentality, others, also, might receive 'the anction from the Holy One;' and 'the two candlesticks,' to hold forth the light of divine truth in this benighted world; they stood to minister, with acceptance, 'before the God of the earth,' the Proprietor and Governor of all mankind; and were the champions, as it were, of his cause, and the heralds of his glory, in the countries where they lived. (Notes, 1:12—20. Zech. 4:2, 3, 11—14.) Moreover, if any man, being enraged by their testimony, and emboldened by their apparent weakness, should attempt to injure them, 'fire proceedeth from their mouths, and devoureth their enemies,' who would in this manner be slain; that is, the Lord would certainly plead and avenge their cause, and resent the injuries done to them, as done against Himself. (Notes, Zech. 2:6—9. Acts 9:3—6.) Their warnings and instructions would tend to the condemnation of those, who hated them on that account; the denunciations of divine vengeance, uttered by them, would infallibly be accomplished; and even their prayers would be answered in judgments on those, who persisted in their enmity. For, in this respect, they would have power, like Elijah, 'to shut heaven, and to restrain the rain from falling,' during 'the three years and a half' of their prophesying; (Notes, 1 K. 17:1. Jam. 5:16—18.) or to prevent blessings coming from above on those, who rejected their testimony, and persecuted them for it; as well as to 'turn the waters into blood,' or to inflict all other plagues at their pleasure, as Moses did upon the Egyptians. (Notes, Ex. 7:15—25.) That is, they would have as great an interest in heaven, as the most eminent of the prophets; and God would as surely punish these nations, princes, or persons, who injured them, as He did those who had formerly oppressed his people, or murdered his messengers.

(3.) 'I will give unto my two witnesses that they may prophesy.'

SCHOLEFIELD.

(3, 4.) 'The true spiritual church of Christ, or collective body of the faithful, is here presented to our view, under 3 different emblems. 1. That of 2 witnesses prophesying in sackcloth, the garb of mourning, during the period of 1260 days, and testifying against the general corruption and degeneracy of the professing church. 2. Under the symbol of the 2 candlesticks, as holding forth the light of truth to a world involved in spiritual darkness. 3. As two olive trees, to denote the abundant supplies of the Holy Spirit, at all times given to the true church. The meaning of the whole passage seems to be, that in the midst of the general corruption of the visible church, God would raise up a small number of faithful men, a truly spiritual church, who should witness for the truth, during the whole 1260 days, which is the same as the 42 months, when the Gentiles were to occupy the holy city.—Cuninghame. This is the view of many of the old commentators, but Faber adopts that of Bp. Lloyd, that the Waldenses and Albigenses are specially meant, and their slaughter in 1685. Viringa, Fleming, and others, thought that interpretation worthy of attention.—The number "two" does not relate to their number, but to their witness-bearing; two being the number God ordained as sufficient to establish evidence. We must not think any particular church intended here.—Pool's Annotations.

(4.) God's 'Rather, Lord, Kurios.'
V. 7—12. When these witnesses 'shall have finished,' or 'shall be about to finish,' their testimony; 'the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit,' i. e. the persecuting power, which will afterwards be more fully described, (Notes, 13:1—7. 17:7, 8.) shall fight against them, and 'kill them.' Many private interpretations (for so they appear to me) have been given of this passage, as if it related to the martyrdom of individuals, or partial persecutions, in past times; and some strangely imagine, that it only denotes the constant persecution of true Christians, through the whole period of 1260 years; I cannot, however, but think, that it relates to events yet future; and the fulfilment of it must be nearly at the same time, as the sounding of the 7th trumpet.—'The great city,' in the street of which the dead bodies of the witnesses shall lie unburied, does not seem to mean either Rome or Jerusalem literally; but Jerusalem mystically; i. e. the professing church of God, as possessed by Gentiles (2); and so become the rival of 'Sodom' in lewdness; or of 'Egypt' in cruelty to the children of God; and of 'Jerusalem' at the time when Christ was there crucified, in general enmity to Him, and his cause. Yet the arrangement of the prophecy in other respects shows, that the countries, which belonged to the church of Rome, when at the height of its power, and most prosperous in its rage 'for crucifying our Lord afresh' in his people, were principally intended; and indeed it is worthy of notice, that though our Lord personally was crucified at Jerusalem, it was by the authority of the Roman emperor, when Judea was a province of that empire. Present appearances, indeed, in some degree may seem to favor the opinion, that this general and successful war of the beast against the witnesses of Christ, will be conducted under another form, and other pretences, and perhaps by other instruments and means, than former assaults have been. Papal persecutors were often concealed infidels; and infidels concealed under any other mask, and so opposing vital Christianity within the same district, may perhaps equally answer to the prediction; for the peculiar opinions of this antichristian power are not here specified, and the apostle elsewhere speaks of antichrist as one, who opposes the doctrine, the authority, or glory of Christ. (Notes, 1 John 2:18—25. 4:1—3.) The prevalence of infidelity in different forms, throughout Europe, and the zeal, with which principles of that tendency are everywhere propagated, when contrasted with the declining state of popish superstition, renders it not wholly improbable, that 'the beast' may change his ground and method of attack, before he thus prevails against the witnesses; for that time approaches; though popery itself is far more deeply rooted in a vast proportion of professed Christians, than is generally supposed; and seems at present (1815) greatly prevailing against open infidelity, nay, I fear, nominal Protestantism. [Now, 1838, the case is greatly altered, and appears more in accordance with the suggestion of the author in the preceding paragraph. Ep.] It likewise

9 And they of the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations, shall see their dead bodies three days and an half, and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in <sup>v</sup> graves.

10 And they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry, and shall send gifts one to another; because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth.

11 And after three days and an half the Spirit <sup>v</sup> of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them.

12 And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a <sup>x</sup> cloud; and their enemies <sup>y</sup> beheld them.

appears from the prediction, that the temporary victory of this enemy over the truth will be so entire, throughout the extent of the western church, that there will be scarcely any open profession or preaching of the true Gospel, or steady opposition to the prevailing antichristianity, in all that part of the world; so that the different nations of Europe, and others as connected with them, will have nothing to do, but to contemplate and insult <sup>v</sup> over the dead bodies of the witnesses, which they will not suffer to be buried. This may signify, that they will revile and deride all those, who before had professed and preached the truth; and thus preserve them from oblivion, by exposing them to ignominy. At the same time, they will use the customary methods of mutual congratulation on an event, which they deem so joyful; supposing that they have at last finally extirpated a race of men, whose examples, doctrines, warnings, and reproofs, alarmed and disquieted their minds, and prevented them from proceeding, without disturbance, in their ungodliness and iniquity. (Notes, Judg. 16:23-31. Mic. 7:8-10. Mat. 27:39-44. John 7:3-10.) But the 'triumphing of these wicked men' shall be short; for 'after three days and a half,' prophetically computed, the witnesses shall rise again from the dead, to the great consternation of their insulting murderers. I. e. the Lord will speedily raise up a competent number of witnesses, to stand up for his pure Gospel; to the terror of its opposers, who hoped that it was finally extirpated. (Note, 20:4-6.) Nay, these witnesses will be called by 'a voice from heaven, to ascend thither,' which they will accordingly do, in the sight of their enemies. I. e. the apparent extirpation of genuine Christianity in the western church, (the bounds of which are considered in their largest dimensions; for all true protestants are only 'witnesses' for the truth, within the dominions of the beast,) will make way for more glorious times, when the ministers and professors of the Gospel shall be far more zealous, honored, and prospered, than before; even as the ascension of Christ to glory was subsequent to his death and resurrection, and preparatory to the success of the Gospel. [Does not the present state of Mohammedism, popery, and infidelity, respectively, strikingly correspond to the representation in this paragraph? Ed.] The outline of the above interpretation was given in the first edition of this work; and since that time, during 24 years, the author has had abundant opportunity of reconsidering his interpretation; and of comparing it with those of many other commentators, and with events which have occurred in Providence. He must, however, still avow his full conviction, that the transactions, predicted under the emblems of these vs., have not hitherto taken place.—It is generally agreed, that this ch. coincides in time with ch. 9.; (Notes, 9.) and that the state of the church, and of the nations in the western empire is here predicted, as that of the eastern empire had before been. The whole testimony, therefore, against idolatry and popery, in the ten kingdoms, during 'the 1260 years,' must be intended; and till that testimony is generally suppressed, the witnesses are not slain. The triumphs of the persecutors, in Germany, Bohemia, Spain, or Italy, did not amount to anything, which can, with the least propriety, be called 'the slaying of the witnesses;' so long as a public testimony against papal corruptions, and for the true Gospel, was borne in any other parts of the western empire.—However we explain the expression, 'when they shall have finished their testimony,' we must make it agree with this part of the prediction; 'they shall prophesy 1260 days, clothed in sackcloth.' Now, if the witnesses were slain at the council of Constance, or by the total ruin of the league at Smalcalde, or at any of the times, which different expositors fix upon, it inevitably follows, that they prophesied one, two, or three, 'hundred days in sackcloth' less than the predicted period, except any will say, that they 'prophesied in sackcloth,' after their resurrection and ascension into heaven.—The different opinions of eminently learned and able men on the subject, and the extreme difficulty which they all seem to find, in making one part of their interpretations consistent with the others, are powerful arguments in my mind, that they have not fact and truth to bear them out.—The fulfilment of the prophecy seems to me indispensably to require the following particulars: 1st. The general suppression of the public testimony for the truth, and against the grosser perversions of Christianity, in doctrine and worship, throughout all the kingdoms of the western empire; but no such general suppression has taken place, especially in the latter ages of the period in question. 2dly. The open, avowed, and general triumph of enemies, however distinguished; as if the hated cause of true Christianity were finally ruined; but this has never yet been the case, throughout the ten kingdoms, however a part, and comparatively a small part, vainly exulted in some of them. 3dly. The very speedy and unexpected 'revival of the witnesses; and the immediate, general, and extraordinary triumphs of the Gospel, in all those countries, where it was supposed to be extirpated. Whether this will be, as some with much probability think, the last persecution before the millennium, the event must determine; but the war of the beast against the witnesses, is surely a widely different thing, from the war of Christ against the persecutors, which, I apprehend, is meant by the pouring out of the vials, at the opening of the 7th trumpet. (Notes, 16.) During the former, the enemy triumphs, and 'the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth,' till slain; during the latter, the witnesses and their cause triumph, and their enemies are destroyed by tremendous judgments. Yet these distinct events have, by some respectable expositors, been apparently confounded.—The death and resurrection of the witnesses, whatever events may be intended thereby, happen, as we learn from the concluding clause of the above passage, before the end of the second woe, and before the coming of the third woe. Cunninghame. Had this writer, in company with many others, forgot v. 3. when he wrote this, and when he dates the slaying of the witnesses A. D. 1546? Were the 1260 days of 'their prophesying in sackcloth' terminated at that time? Or from what year does he date the beginning of the 1260 years? Certainly this calculation dates it from A. D. 286; earlier, by several centuries, than the date hitherto, by almost general consent, assigned to it; or by himself in other places. (Notes, 1, 2. Dan. 7:23-27. 8:13, 14. 12:5-9.) Indeed, it makes it precede the times of Constantine. (Note, 14:3-6.)—If the slaying of the witnesses be future, it is of vast importance that Christians should be aware of it, and act accordingly. It does not follow, from the suppression of the public testimony, viz. the general silencing of faithful ministers, and inhibiting the public administration of ordinances, in the purity and simplicity of Christian worship, through the ten kingdoms, that there will be no true Christianity in those kingdoms. Nay, it is not improbable, that the prevalence of true Christianity will provoke this persecution; that there will be thousands, and tens, nay hundreds of thousands, who secretly, at the hazard of their lives, will meet together, for the worship of God; that books, previously circulated, containing clear and practical religious instruction, will in a very great degree supply the want of public ordinances, during this short interruption; that the persecution itself, and the suppression of the testimony, will so show the odiousness of the persecutors, and the excellency of true Christians, as, by the divine blessing, exceedingly to multiply real believers, during the interdiction; and, in short, that the means previously used, nay, the seed which we are now sowing, may be abundantly prospered, in bringing forward the glorious times which shall succeed this event. The term of three years and a half, according to the prophetic calculation of the days, in which the testimony shall be suppressed, and the energy and success with which it shall then burst forth, from the ashes under which it had been smothered, and this, through all the ten kingdoms, appear to me to give an astonishing interest to this view of the subject; as well as most animating motives, now to sow to the utmost that seed, which will then produce the glorious harvest. In many other cases, we should 'rejoice with trembling;' but in this, while we cannot but tremble, at the prospect before us, we should tremble with rejoicing. Like the believer's death, it will be a dark and painful entrance on scenes inexpressibly delightful; and the approach of it, if perceived, will assure the intelligent Christian, that the final triumphs of the church are at hand, even at the door.—In what way the accomplishment will take place, the event must show; and it is in vain to argue against the improbability of it; for the dispensations of Providence commonly subvert all our preconceptions of probability.—It should also be noted, that this exceedingly depressed state of real Christianity seems only to relate to the western church exclusively; and probably in America, in Africa, in the East Indies, or other parts of Asia, there may be very flourishing churches at the same time.

7. The resurrection of these witnesses, and the consequences thereof. Observe, (1.) The time of their rising again; after they had lain dead three days and a half, v. 11. a short time, in comparison of that in which they had prophesied. God's witnesses may be slain, but they shall rise again; not in their persons, till the general resurrection; but in their successors. God will revive his work, when it seems to be dead in the world. (2.) The power by which they were raised; The spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood on their feet. The Spirit of life from God quickens, shall quicken, his dying interest in the world. (3.) The effect of this on their enemies; Great fear fell upon them. The reviving of God's work and witnesses will strike terror into the souls of his enemies. Where there is guilt there is fear; and a persecuting spirit, though cruel, is not a courageous, but a cowardly spirit. Herod feared John the Baptist.

8. The ascension of the witnesses into heaven, and the consequences thereof, v. 12, 13. (1.) By heaven, understand, either some more eminent station in the church, the kingdom of grace in this world, or a high place in the kingdom of glory above. The former seems to be the meaning; They ascend to heaven in a cloud, in a figurative, not in a literal sense, and their enemies saw them. (2.) The consequences of their ascension; a mighty shock and convulsion in the antichristian empire, and the fall of a tenth part of the city. Some refer this to the beginning of the reformation from popery; when many princes and states fell off from their

'Of the 3 scenes of fire, rain, and blood, the 1st may be deemed essentially (spiritually) fulfilled, if the enemies of the witnesses, and of their pure religion, are in many instances dismayed, confounded, frustrated, and subdued by the heavenly words of their mouth. The 2d, if the rain from heaven, which, spiritually interpreted, is the blessing from heaven upon the growth of true religion generally in the world, (Ps. 68:9. 72:6. Is. 55:10. Hos. 6:1. Ez. 34:26. Heb. 6:7.) is suspended during their prophecy. The 3d, if, in the contest, the enemies subjection to Rome; all the western world felt a great concussion, the antichristian interest received a great blow, and lost a great deal of ground and interest, [1.] By the sword of war, which was then drawn; and many of those who fought under the banner of antichrist, were slain by it. [2.] By the sword of the Spirit; The fear of God fell upon many. They were convinced of their errors, superstition, and idolatry; and, by true repentance, and embracing the truth, they gave glory to the God of heaven. Thus, when God's work and witnesses revive, the devil's work and witnesses fall before Him.

V. 14—19. We have here the sounding of the 7th and last trumpet. Observe the effects and consequences.

1. Loud and joyful acclamations of the saints and angels in heaven. Observe, The manner and matter of their adorations; they rose from their seats, and fell on their faces, and worshipped God; they did it with reverence and humility. They thankfully recognise the right of our God and Savior, to rule and reign over all the world, v. 15. They give Him thanks because He had asserted his rights, exerted his power, and so turned his title into possession. They rejoice that this his reign shall never end, and that all enemies shall be put under his feet.

2. Angry resentments in the world, at these just appearances and actings of the power of God, v. 18. The nations were angry; not only had been so, but were so still. It was a time when God was taking a just revenge on the enemies of his people, and beginning to reward his people's faithful services and sufferings; and their enemies could not bear it, they fretted against God, and so increased their guilt, and hastened their destruction.

3. The opening of the temple of God in heaven. By this may be meant, that here is now a more free communication between heaven and earth; but it rather seems to intend the church of God on earth, a heavenly temple. It is an allusion to the various circumstances of things in the time of the first temple; under idolatrous and wicked princes, it was shut up and neglected; but under religious and reforming princes, opened and frequented. So, during the power of antichrist, the temple of God seemed to be shut up, and was so in a great degree; but now it was opened again. At this opening of it, Observe,

(1.) What was seen there; the ark of God's testament. As, before Josiah's time, the law of God had been lost, but was then found; so, in the reign of antichrist, God's law was made void by their traditions and decrees; the Scriptures were locked up from the people, and they must not look into these divine oracles; now they are opened, now they are brought to the views of all. This was an unspeakable and invaluable privilege; and this, like the ark of the testament, was a token of the presence of God returned to his people, and his favor toward them in Jesus Christ, the Propitiation.

(2.) What was heard and felt there; Lightnings, voices, thunderings, an earthquake, and great hail. The great blessing of the Reformation was attended with very awful providences; and by terrible things in righteousness God would answer those prayers that were presented in his holy temple, now opened. All the great revolutions of the world are concerted in heaven, and are the answers of the prayers of the saints.

PRACT. OBS. The Lord measures his professed worshippers by the rule of his Word, and weighs them in his balance. His ministers must also use the same standard; for mere nominal professors are accounted Gentiles before God; and 'the holy city' has frequently been trodden under foot by such enemies of the Lord, in the habit of worshippers!—Indeed, for many ages, a small number of 'witnesses, prophesying in sackcloth,' have appeared on the part of Christ and the truth; whilst multitudes, in great splendor and power, have been rucked on the side of antichrist, in one form or another. But it is most honorable to unite with these witnesses, however few, despised, or persecuted they may be; and to enter a public protest, connected with a holy and exemplary conduct, against the prevailing corruptions of the age and place in which we live. Yet we cannot obtain this honor, without courage, self-denial, and patience. Many woes await the impenitent in this world; but the most dreadful woe will, as it were, cause all the rest to be forgotten; and it will arrive quickly. For the 7th angel shall sound; and the inhabitants of heaven will rejoice, because 'the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and He shall reign for ever.' At present, prayer for that blessed revolution in the state of the world, is the duty of all real Christians; but shortly, they will be called to join in songs of loud thanksgiving, and humble adoration, 'to the Lord God Almighty, who is, and was, and is to come.' Oh may the name of our heavenly Father be thus hallowed; may his kingdom thus come, and may his will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.

of the witnesses, instead of the peaceful enjoyment expected to accrue from their apparent destruction, behold their tenets, and the open profession of them, revive with power irresistible.' Woodh. Ed. 'Mede considers, that the slaughter of the witnesses can only be referred to about the end of the 1260 days, and that it will not be such as to extinguish the persons, or whole materials, of the reformed churches, but only the public fabric of the Reformation.'

V. 13, 14. Immediately after the events, intended by the resurrection and 'ascension of the witnesses,' some terrible judgment will befall a large part of the antichristian city, in which they were slain and lay unhuried, especially some one of the ten kingdoms; which will destroy a great number of persons, and so alarm others, as to tend to their conversion, and to 'the glory of God' in it.—The original expression, 'seven thousand names of men,' Note, Acts 1:15. induces many to think, that this refers to the degradation and destruction of the most renowned and powerful supporters of the papal antichrist; but the event alone can determine the precise meaning of this. Thus the 2d woe, or the 6th trumpet will terminate; and behold, the 3d woe will speedily approach.—Whether the revolutions and desolations in France, and on the Continent, during the last 20 years, are specially meant, (as some expositors confidently decide,) our descendants will be more competent to determine, than we are. But if the whole, concerning the slaying of the witnesses, be yet unfulfilled, as I decidedly think, that cannot be.—(13) Same hour. The destruction implied in this v. must be coincident with the ascension of the witnesses, at the very same time, or when the prophecy is fulfilled.

V. 15—18. 'The little book' has been shown to contain such extensive and important predictions, as abundantly to account for the solemnity with which it was delivered to the apostle. (Note, 10:2—4.) If this be not addressed to Christ personally, (as some think,) it must be allowed to include Him, as One with the Father and the Holy Spirit, in the Unity of the Godhead. (Note, 1:3, 8—11.) What follows, is explained by some persons, to relate to the execution of the wrath of God on the nations before the millennium, (Notes, 18: 19: 20:4—6.) but others suppose it to refer to the temporary opposition raised against the Gospel, after the millennium, and just before the general resurrection, and the final judgment. (Notes, 20:7—10.) The account, however, in this place is very brief; for it will be explained and dilated on afterwards, in several chs.; and perhaps both events are comprehensively hinted at. (M. R. a, b.—Notes, Dan. 2:34, 35, 44, 45. 7:9—14, 19—27.)—'Thus we are arrived at the consummation of all things, through a series of prophecies, extending from the apostle's days to the end of the world. This series has been the clue to conduct us in our interpretation of these prophecies: and though some of them may be dark and obscure, considered in themselves, yet they receive light and illustration from others, preceding and following. Altogether they are, as it were, a chain of prophecies, whereof one link depends on and supports another. If any parts remain yet obscure and unsatisfactory, they may, perhaps, be cleared up, by what the apostle has added by way of explanation.

(15.) 'Vitrina and others trace an analogy between the effects of the seals and the siege of Jericho: as that city fell after 7 times sounding a trumpet, which 7th time of sounding was made up of 7 blasts; so they consider, that the mystical Babylon, the great oppressing city of these days, is to fall at the sound of the 7th trumpet, which contains the pouring-out of the 7 vials. Thus the 7th trumpet may be considered as sounding at the 1st vial, as well as at the last.'

HENRY, abr.

(17.) Arè to come. 'Bl. marks this clause as doubtful.' Eo.

(19.) 'Lowman considers, that the word rendered "judged," is rather to be understood to mean a vindication of the cause of the martyrs for the Christian religion, by some act of providence in its favor. It is frequently used in this sense, and, according to the order of the prophecies, the general judgment was not till afterwards.'

HENRY, abr.

V. 19. This v. introduces a new subject, and should have been placed at the beginning of the next ch. (Notes, 4:1—3. 15:5—8. 16:17—21. Is. 6:1—4.) The scene of the vision was laid at the temple, which was so far opened, that 'the ark of the covenant' became visible: this denoted, that further discoveries were about to be made, relating to the interior parts of religion; for the preceding chs. chiefly referred to the affairs of the empire, and the external concerns of the church. 'The lightnings, and voices, and thunderings,' were tokens of the special divine presence; and emblems of the terrible judgments, which were about to be revealed. (M. R. q. v.) The next ch. seems to go back to the primitive ages of the church; and we must pass a second time through many of the succeeding periods as before: though principally with relation to the times of the 5 last trumpets, called the woe-trumpets. (Note, 12:1, 2.)

1 A woman clothed with the sun travaileth. 4 The great red dragon standeth before her, ready to devour her child. 6 When she was delivered she fleeth into the wilderness. 7 Michael and his angels fight with the dragon, and prevail. 13 The dragon being cast down into the earth persecuteth the woman.

AND there appeared a great <sup>a</sup> wonder in heaven; a woman <sup>b</sup> clothed with the <sup>c</sup> sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars:

2 And she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered.

3 And there appeared another <sup>a</sup> wonder in heaven; and behold a great red <sup>d</sup> dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads.

4 And his tail <sup>e</sup> drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born.

5 And <sup>f</sup> she brought forth a man child, who <sup>g</sup> was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne.

CHAP. XII. It is generally agreed by the most learned expositors, that the narrative we have in this and the two following chs., from the sounding of the 7th trumpet to the opening of the vials, is not a prediction of things to come, but rather a recapitulation and representation of things past; which, as God would have the apostle to foresee while that they were past, that he might have a more perfect idea of them in his mind, and might observe the agreement between the prophecy and that Providence that is always fulfilling the Scriptures. In this ch., we have an account of the contest between the church and antichrist; the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent.

V. 1—11. Here we see that early prophecy, Gen. 3: 15. eminently fulfilled. Observe,

I. The attempts of Satan and his agents to prevent the increase of the church, by devouring her offspring as soon as it was born; of this we have a very lively description in the most proper images.

1. The church is represented, (1.) As a woman, the weaker part of the world, but the spouse of Christ, and the mother of the saints. (2.) As clothed with the sun, the imputed righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Sun of righteousness. (3.) As having the moon under her feet; that is, the world; her heart and hope set not on sublimary things, but on heaven; [or, as Scott, 'to denote her superiority to the reflected and feebler light of the Mosaic dispensation.'] (4.) As having on her head a crown of 12 stars, i. e. the doctrine of the Gospel, preached by the 12 apostles, which is a crown of glory to all true believers. (5.) As in travail, crying out, and pained to be delivered; desirous that what was begun in the conviction of sinners, might end in their conversion; [or, as in Scott, it seems to be, 'an emblem of the afflicted state of the church in the first three centuries.']

2. The grand enemy of the church is represented, (1.) As a great red dragon; a dragon, for strength and terror; a red dragon, for fierceness and enmity. (2.) As having 7 heads, i. e. placed on 7 hills, as Rome was; therefore probably pagan Rome is meant. (3.) As having ten horns, divided into ten provinces, as the Roman empire was by Augustus Cesar. (4.) As having 7 crowns upon his heads, which is after expounded to be 7 kings, ch. 17: 10. (5.) As drawing with his tail a third part of the stars in heaven, and casting them down to the earth; turning the ministers and professors of the Christian religion out of their places and privileges, and making them as weak and useless as he could; [or, as in Scott, it 'represented the power of the Romans, which had cast down the princes of one third part of the earth, and reduced their countries to subjection, 8: 7.'] (6.) As standing before the woman, to devour her child as soon as it should be born; very vigilant to crush the Christian religion in its birth, and entirely to prevent the growth and continuance of it in the world.

II. The unsuccessfulness of these attempts against the church; for, 1. She was safely delivered of a man child, v. 5. by which some understand Christ, others Constantine; but others, with greater propriety, a race of true believers, strong and united, resembling Christ, and designed, under Him, to rule the nations with a rod of iron; i. e. to judge the world by their doctrine and lives now, and as assessors with Christ at the great day. 2. Care was taken of this child; it was caught up to God, and to his throne;

NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1, 2. The prophecies of this book, as it appears to me, naturally divide themselves into two parts; the second of which begins with the last v. of the preceding ch.: though some begin it with v. 1 of this ch. So that we are here brought back to the primitive ages of the church; though they are far more briefly mentioned, than those are which followed. Inattention to this circumstance has occasioned much perplexity, in many attempts to explain these predictions: for if we do not keep hold of the clue, which has properly been called the internal geography and chronology of the book, imagination will rove at large; and supposed allusions to detached events, in different ages and places, will disjoint the interpretation, and render the whole ambiguous and suspicious. (2) Pained.] 9:5. 14:10. 20:10. Mat. 3:29. 2 Pet. 2:8. The word shows the extreme sufferings, or tortures, by which the faith and patience of the church were proved, previously to her deliverance, especially immediately before it.

(1.) 'The sounding of the 7th trumpet has now prepared us to expect a figurative exhibition of that great conflict and victory, by which the Christian church will at length be placed in security from her enemies. To describe this, in all its parts, and to enable us to understand the conflict, by ascertaining the combatants, the Holy Spirit begins the figurative history from the earliest times of the church; and past events are represented in the same allegory, which is continued to foretell those which are to come. 'The church (arrayed in pure and heavenly light) was placed upon earth in her infant form, when it pleased God to bless with religion our first parents.'

V. 3—5. 'Red,' purple, or scarlet, was the distinguishing color of the Roman emperors, consuls, and generals; even as it has been since of the popes and cardinals. (Note, 17:3—5.) 'The 7 crowns on the dragon's heads,' and not '10 crowns on his horns,' showed, that the whole power was yet vested in the emperors and senate, at Rome; and not, as afterwards, in the monarchs of the 10 kingdoms. This circumstance, which many have not observed, precisely fixes the date of the prophecy, and undeniably proves, that it related to the pagan emperors, and not to the antichristian power afterwards mentioned. (Note, 13:1.)—The Roman emperors and magistrates jealously watched the progress of Christianity from the first, and harassed the church with constant persecutions.—But, at length, the woman was delivered of a male child. During the time of the persecuting emperors, the church was greatly increased; until one sprang from her, who ascended the imperial throne, being appointed to be the vicegerent of Christ, in ruling the nations, and crushing the enemies of the Gospel, 'as with a rod of iron.' (Notes, 2: 21—23. 6:12—17. Ps. 2:7—9.) Thus the offspring of the church, even Christians in general; and Constantine, with the Christian emperors, who succeeded him in particular, escaped the rage of the red dragon; and the latter was exalted to very great honor and authority, under the immediate protection, and by the special favor of God.—New trials, however, awaited the woman; ... the termination of pagan persecution made way for those events, which at length terminated in the antichristian power, the continuance of which was fixed to 1260 years. (Notes, 11:1—14. 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) But God had provided a place where He would sustain the church when the time arrived; and her flight into the wilderness is here mentioned by way of anticipation.—This interpretation has been objected to, because v. 6. is supposed to be introduced by anticipation: but, in fact, it is manifest, that the apostle thus introduces it; else, why does he resume it, with some additional circumstances, after several vs. predicting most important events? (14) Yet even then, the church is represented only as prepared to fly, not as yet actually fled.—The author has before shown his decided opinion,—and stated his reasons for it, that 'the little book'—contained no more than part of 11 ch.: that the slaying of the witnesses is yet future: and that the concluding part of the preceding ch., to the end of v. 18. brings the series of predicted events to the millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (Notes, 10: 11.) If, then, this and the following chs. relate, as undoubtedly they do, to events preceding the millennium; the sacred writer must in some place go back, and resume his subject: and no part can be selected, in which this can so naturally be fixed, as the last v. of the preceding ch., which introduces the beginning of this.—'We would also divide the Revelation into two parts; or rather the book so divides itself. For the former part proceeds, as we have seen, in a regular and successive series, from the apostle's days to the consummation of all things. Nothing can be added, but it must fall somewhere or other within the compass of this period; it must be a resumption of the same subjects: and this latter part may most properly be considered as an enlargement and illustration of the former. Several things, which before were only touched upon, required to be more copiously handled, and placed in a stronger light. It was said, that 'the beast should make war against the witnesses, and overcome them.' and who or what the beast is, we may reasonably conjecture; but the apostle himself will more surely explain. The transactions of the 7th trumpet are all summed up and comprised in a few vs.; but we shall see the particulars branched out and enlarged on into as many chs. In short, this latter part is designed, as a supplement to the former, to complete what was deficient, to explain what was dubious, to illustrate what was obscure: and as the former described more the destinies of the Roman empire, so this latter relates to the fates of the Christian church.' Bp. Newton.—Nothing more fully confirms my opinion, that Bp. Newton's outline is the true interpretation, than the dissatisfaction which permanently rests on my mind, after carefully considering those expositions, which have been substituted in the place of it. While objections are stated, I hesitate, not at once perceiving how they can be answered; but when the interpretation, substituted in its place, has excited my attention, still more insuperable objections crowd on my mind.—'The man child is the mystic Word of God, which is described as the Son of the church, because it is the incorruptible seed, from which all true believers are born.' Faber. The 'mystic Word,' according to this statement, is in fact the parent, not the son, of the church: but waiving this, if the respectable writer, here cited, could not make out his system, without having recourse to so indefinite and allegorical an interpretation, of an event evidently most important in the prophecy, I cannot but conclude, that his plan of interpretation is, in this respect, erroneous: and I must give that of Bp. Newton the decided preference. Most certainly, the subversion of the pagan persecuting Roman empire, and that of the immense ancient system of idolatry, as supported by all the genius, influence, and power of Greece and Rome, was no inconsiderable event, in the prophetic history of the Christian church; and, had it not been specially and prominently marked, it might have been thought an extraordinary omission. (Note, 6:11—14.) Whatever the character of Constantine or that of his successors was, the revolution was wonderful, and indeed one of the most extraordinary recorded in universal history. (Note, Zech. 8:20—23.) The whole pagan system was cast down from its 'heaven,' its authority and persecuting domination; and the ruler, or rulers, of the nations professed Christianity, and protected the church. Subsequent corruptions, terminating in still more dire and destructive persecutions, indeed followed, and are particularly foretold: but surely,

6 And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there <sup>h</sup> a thousand two hundred and threescore days.

7 And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels,

8 And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven.

9 And the great dragon was cast out, that old <sup>i</sup> serpent, called the <sup>j</sup> Devil, and <sup>k</sup> Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.

10 And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now <sup>l</sup> is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night.

11 And they overcame <sup>m</sup> him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives <sup>n</sup> unto the death.

12 Therefore <sup>o</sup> rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe <sup>p</sup> to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because <sup>q</sup> he knoweth that he hath but a short time.

i. e. taken into his special, powerful, and immediate protection. The Christian religion has been from its infancy the special care of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. 3. Care was taken of the mother as well as of the child, v. 6. She fled into the wilderness, a place prepared, both for her safety and her sustenance; the church was in an obscure state, dispersed; and this proved her security, through the care of divine Providence; this her obscure and private state was for a limited time, not to continue always.

III. The attempts of the dragon not only prove unsuccessful against the church, but fatal to his own interests; for, upon his endeavor to devour the man child, he engaged all the powers of heaven against him, v. 7. heaven will espouse the quarrel of the church. Here observe, 1. The seat of this war,—in heaven; in the church, the kingdom of heaven on earth. 2. The parties,—Michael and his angels, on one side; and the dragon and his angels, on the other; Christ, the great Angel of the covenant, and his faithful followers; and Satan and all his instruments. 3. The success of the battle: there was a great struggle, but the victory fell to Christ and his church, and the dragon and his angels were cast out; the pagan idolatry, which was worshipping devils, was extirpated out of the empire in the time of Constantine. 4. The triumphant song that was composed, and used on this occasion, v. 10, 11. Here observe,

(1.) How the Conqueror is adored; Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ; Now God has showed Himself to be a mighty God; now Christ has showed Himself to be a strong and mighty Savior.

(2.) How the conquered enemy is described; [1.] By his malice; as the accuser of the brethren, he accused them before their God night and day; continually bringing in indictments and accusations against them, whether true or false; thus he accused Job, and thus he accused Joshua the high priest, Zech. 3: 1. [2.] By his disappointment and defeat, he, and all his accusations, are cast out, the indictments quashed, and the accuser turned out of the court, with just indignation.

(3.) How the victory was gained; the servants of God overcame Satan, By the blood of the Lamb, as the meritorious cause; By the word of their testimony, as the great instrument; the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God; by a resolute, powerful preaching of the everlasting Gospel, by their courage and patience in sufferings; when the love of life stood in competition with their loyalty to Christ, they could give up their lives; and this their courage and zeal helped to confound their enemies, to convince many of the spectators, to confirm the souls of the faithful, and so contributed greatly to this victory.

it is natural to suppose, that the prophet, if indeed he resumed his subject, to give a more particular account of the periods which he had compendiously mentioned, should go back to the first ages, and, in a few words, mark the deliverance of the church from pagan persecution, and the revolution in the empire from pagan to Christian. I by no means think, with Bp. Newton, that Galerius, or any personal enemy to Constantine, is meant, by the red or fiery dragon; but the whole pagan authority and influence, instigated by the devil, (as the papal power and influence afterwards was,) and seeking the destruction of Christianity, and of the Christian rulers and princes who supported it. So that we may understand as literally, as we choose, the language concerning 'the old dragon'; only remembering, that he 'works in' and by 'the children of disobedience.' (Notes, Eph. 2:1, 2. 1 John 4:4—6. 5:19.)—Christians are spoken of, as exercising the authority of Christ, and ruling the nations with a rod of iron: (2:27.) it can therefore be no objection, that the same allusion is made, in respect of the first Christian emperors, under whom the most entire revolution, from persecuting idolatry, in full domination, to the establishment of Christianity, as the religion of the Roman empire, took place.—Some commentators, indeed, would interpret this man child to be Christ Himself; but this cannot be meant, for He was born of the church of Israel, not of the Christian church; nor is He ever spoken of as 'the Son of the church,' but rather as the Husband, or even the Father of it. (Notes, Ps. 22:30, 31. Is. 9:6, 7. 53:9, 10. 54:1, 5. 59:20, 21. John 3:27—36.) The apostle also spake as a prophet, not as a historian; therefore, events, future to him, must exclusively be intended. (3) Red.] 6:4. Fiery red.] Red like fire, Mat. 16:2. 3.—Dragon.] Drakōn. 4, 7, 9, 13, 16, 17. 13:2, 4, 11. 16:13. 20:2. (Notes, Is. 27:1. 51:9, 11. Jer. 51:34—37. Ez. 30:3—5.) The largest and most terrible of the species of serpents.—(5) Man child.] A son, a male. This repetition of the same idea seems to imply the vigor and manliness, so to speak, of this son of the church.

(5) Man child.] 'Allwood makes this to be the English.' Ed. (6) 'Wilderness denotes a place of habitation scanty of sustenance, where food miraculously given is necessary for support of life; but where such support, united with the correction which is the effect of a desolate and perilous situation, produces excellent fruits of religious improvement. Is. 41:17—20. Ez. 20:35—39. Hos. 2:14—20. Mat. 4: 1—11. Thus the church was 40 years in the wilderness of Sinai; and fled again to the wilderness with Elijah. 1 K. 17: 13.' Woodn.

V. 7—12. The events here foretold, preceded, and made way for the flight of the church into the wilderness; (Note, 13—17.) and therefore cannot possibly mean the Reformation, which took place many ages after that event. The strenuous and combined efforts of the pagans against the establishment of Christianity, and the destruction of their idolatrous worship, was, as I apprehend, represented by 'the dragon and his angels' warring in heaven against 'Michael and his angels;' perhaps with some reference to the expulsion of Satan and his adherents from heaven, on their original apostasy. (Luke 10:17—20. John 12:27—33. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) Michael may represent Christ; (Marg. Ref. u;) and 'the Devil, and Satan,' the old slanderer, adversary, and murderer of mankind, was the invisible commander of the opposite army. The former employed as his instruments Christian magistrates, faithful ministers, and believers, as well as holy angels; the latter fought by persecuting emperors, such as Julian the apostate, idolatrous priests, and heathen philosophers. (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) The total defeat of Satan was represented, by the devil being cast out of heaven: for, by the power of idolatrous emperors and magistrates, he had maintained that false religion, by which he had deceived all the world, and seduced them to be his subjects and worshippers; but, by the subversion of that authority, and the subsequent demolition of idolatry, he was cast down from his dignity, as 'god and prince of this world,' for a time and in a measure. When the pagan emperors were dethroned, Satan's angels were cast out with him: for both the instruments and ministers of idolatry were laid aside, and even their very idols were destroyed with contempt and execration.—It is remarkable, that Constantine himself, and others of his time, describe these events under the same image of the dethroning of the dragon. 'Moreover, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace-gate, with a cross over his head; and under his feet, the great enemy of mankind, (who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants,) in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midst of its body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea.' Bp. Newton. This shows, how Christians then understood the prophecy; and, no doubt, they rightly interpreted it.—Upon this great victory, the apostle heard songs of praise in heaven; because 'salvation and strength were come,' the church was delivered from persecution, and its friends advanced to authority; the kingdom of God was openly established, and the power of his anointed Son most gloriously displayed. (Note, 19:1—6.) But this victory was not ascribed to the sword of war, which was only a subordinate mean, when matters were brought to a crisis: for it was acquired through the merit and efficacy of the atoning sacrifice of Christ, by faith in his blood, and a bold and holy profession of his Gospel; and if Christians had continued to fight with these weapons, and such as these, their victories would have been more numerous and glorious, and the effects of them more durable. But at the same time a woe was denounced on the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, or the nations in general; because the devil, and his dethroned agents, would not rest in their disgraced condition: though idolatry was suppressed, it was not destroyed, and its partisans would surely excite fresh commotions.—(9) His angels, &c.] Note, Mat. 25:41—46.—(12) A short time.] This is made an objection to interpreting the prophecy of the ruin of pagan idolatry: but any limited time is short, compared with the eternal doom awaiting the great enemy of the church and all its coadjutors.—They who interpret it of the Reformation, strangely forget, that the dragon had, at the time of his being cast out, 'the crowns on his seven heads,' and not on his ten horns: (Notes, 3—6. 13:1.) and that this event preceded the 1260 years of the church's abode in the wilderness. (9) That old serpent called the devil.] 20:2. 2 Cor. 11:3. A learned commentator has lately endeavored to prove, that the animal, by which the devil deceived Eve, was an ape, or some animal of the ape species.—It is, however, evident, that the Hebrew word, used Gen. 3:1. never means an ape, in the O. T. The Arabic word, adduced, is, indeed, one name of the devil; and some words, from the same root, signify an ape; but they also signify a lion, a wild cow, or any animal, with a peculiar kind of nose. (Richardson's Arabic, Persian, and English Dict.)—Wavering this, however, are we to suppose, that the inspired writers of the N. T. kept up, by express words, when not quoting from the Sept. the false opinion, derived from that version, that Satan deceived Eve, as conceived in a serpent, when in fact he was concealed in an ape? Is this our reverence for the words of the living God!—(10) Now.] Arti. Mat. 3:15. 26:29. Hitherto. 'Hitherto the Lord has helped us.' (Note, 1 S. 7:12.)—The church, and all her friends, might praise God, very properly, for deliverance from pagan persecution, though other trials still awaited her.

SCOTT. (7—13.) 'This passage should be read as in a parenthesis, because it is plainly no part of the prophecy, but of a date far prior to the history related therein, such as is alluded to in Jude 6, and 2 Pet. 2:4; for v. 6. and 14. contain the same matter, and give the same information, showing the junction to be complete. It is a warfare or rebellion, of which Satan was the leader in heaven, whence, being expelled, he attempts to pursue the same course on earth.—He made use of the Roman empire, its 13 And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child.

14 And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent.

15 And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood.

V. 12—17. We have here an account of this war, so happily finished in heaven, or in the church, as it was again renewed and carried on in the wilderness, the place to which the church was fled, and where she had been for some time secured by the special care of her God and Savior. Observe,

I. The warning given of the distress and calamity that should fall upon the inhabitants of the world in general, through the wrath and rage of the devil. His malice is chiefly bent against the servants of God, yet he is an enemy and hater of mankind as such; and, being defeated in his designs against the church, he is resolved to give all the disturbance he can to the world in general, v. 12.

II. His second attempt on the church, now in the wilderness, v. 13. Observe,

1. The care God had taken of his church; he had conveyed her, as on eagles' wings, into a place of safety provided for her, where she was to continue for a certain space of time; couched in prophetic characters, taken from Dan. 7: 25.

2. The continual malice of the dragon against the church; her obscurity could not altogether protect her; the old, subtle serpent, which at first lurked in paradise, now follows the church into the wilderness, and casts out a flood of water after her, to carry her away. This is thought to be meant of a flood of error and heresy, which was breathed by Arius, Nestorius, Pelagius, and many more, by which the church of God was in danger of being overwhelmed and carried away. The church of God is in more danger from heretics, than from persecapital city, and kingdoms, as instruments of his successful attack on the Christian church.

(12.) The inhabitants.] Bl. rejects these words.

V. 13—17. While the idolatrous party, who were the agents of the devil, were constrained to submit to the power of Christian rulers, they still persisted in their persecuting enmity to the church, and tried various methods of re-establishing their ancient worship. Several attempts were made of this kind, during the reign of Constantine. Julian, afterwards the apostate, left no method untried, by which he could hope to effect it. He endeavored to hinder the liberal education of the Christians, that their ignorance might expose them to contempt, and render them incapable of defending or propagating their religion; he employed writers, of great learning and ingenuity, to ridicule, revile, and reason against Christianity: he excited Arian princes to persecute their orthodox subjects; and in many other ways he attempted to undermine the cause of Christ. At the same time, the devil, and his agents, prevailed to corrupt the church with manifold heresies, to deform it with various scandals, and to rend it in pieces with fierce contentions; and these evils grew worse and worse, during the period of the first 4 trumpets. (Notes, 8.) Thus the way was preparing for the erection of another idolatrous, persecuting power, which will be shortly considered. In the mean time, 'two wings, as of a great eagle, were given to the woman; that she might be ready to fly to her place in the wilderness, when the time came. (Note, Ex. 19:4.) These are supposed by some writers to refer to the eastern and western empires, the standard of which was an eagle, and the protection afforded by them was the means of preservation to the church, till the prefixed time of her obscurity arrived. In the midst of the preceding convulsions and heresies, the church was, as it were, preparing to flee away to her retreat, from the fury of her opposers: where she was at length to be nourished, 'for a time, and times, and half a time,' or 3½ years, 42 months, or 1260 days; but her flight was not completed, till the establishment of the antichristian power spoken of in the next ch. (Notes, 13:1.) Her continuance in the wilderness, therefore, exactly accords to the time during which the 'two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth;' both relate to the same events, and both began and must end together. (Note, 11:3—6.) If the beginning of this term of time be fixed, A. D. 606, it will terminate A. D. 1866; and, whatever dates 'the slaying of the witnesses' earlier than that time, removes proportionably backward the commencement of this term. (Note, 3—6.) If this event took place in 1546, as Mr. Faber and Mr. Cunningham suppose; then, beyond all controversy, the 1260 years began about A. D. 286; yet Mr. C. afterwards dates them A. D. 533. I do not presume to say, when it began; but consistency is essentially requisite in our interpretations. (Note, 11:1,2.)—To prevent the escape of the woman, 'the dragon cast out of his mouth a flood of water,' to carry her away. This is explained by many expositors, with great propriety, of the inundation of the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other barbarous nations, by which the western empire was overwhelmed: (Notes, 8:) for it is known, that the strenuous adherents to paganism encouraged these irruptions, in hopes of subverting Christianity by their means; and no doubt Satan expected to overwhelm the church, when idolaters overturned the empire. But the event proved entirely contrary to all their expectations. 'The earth helped the woman, and swallowed up the flood;' the victorious barbarians united themselves to the vanquished Romans, and formed one people with them, in the several provinces of the empire; they even embraced, in form, at least, the Christian religion. Ungodly men, of various descriptions, from regard to their secular interests, protected the church amidst these convulsions: and the subversion and dismembering of the western empire did not at all help the cause of idolatry; nay, it tended to the propagation of Christianity!—But the dragon-being disappointed in this attempt, was the more enraged, and took another method of making war against true Christians, as 'the seed of the church.' (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) These were but 'a remnant;' for superstitions and heresies of various kinds, and corruptions, had long before this increased exceedingly, which afforded the enemy his opportunity for the assault and success predicted in the next ch.—If the plan of interpretation, before laid down, be well grounded, these verses must, as has been stated, predict the events which made way for the establishment of the persecuting domination of nominal Christians; the flight of the church into the wilderness, and the prophesying of the witnesses in sackcloth, during 1260 days. The particulars of these latter events are predicted in the two following chs; with several things relating to the approach and earnestness of the church's delivery, and the destruction of her grand enemy. In ch. 15: there is a solemn pause, as introductory to the subsequent events; and then the prediction proceeds, in regular order, to the millennium, the day of judgment, and the heavenly world. Thus, from the beginning of this ch. where the prophet resumes his subject, a series of events, succeeding to each other, is predicted; and every part casts light on all that which precedes or follows. But, if the predictions of these vs. be referred to any part of the 1260 years, or to the end of them; this order is, as it appears to me, without necessity, and without proof, disturbed and deranged; and, indeed, an entirely new interpretation of all the subsequent chs., showing that they relate to future events, seems indispensably necessary to preserve the consistency of the interpretation.—As I am fully persuaded, that the transactions predicted in the next two chs. (the concluding part of ch. 14: alone excepted) are already fulfilled, I must adhere to the outlines of Bp. Newton's interpretation, in preference to later systems. Scott.

(13, 14.) The following is a new and reasonable view, in the main, of this important escape of pure principles to a new world of trial, action, and triumph: for the colonization of America may be regarded, as the most important event since the Christian era.

'Satan, in the events of the antecedent vs., found himself and his legions cast out, by the Reformation, from the symbolic heaven of high prosperity in the Romish church, to the earth of open opposition to Christ. This forced upon him a keen conviction, that his remaining time on earth was short: and he therefore sets himself to invent new forms of opposition. And his infernal court soon gave birth to that most detestable order, the Jesuits, who proved powerful supporters of the sinking popery. This code of imposition, was the masterpiece of the kingdom of darkness, till the deeper scheme of illuminism arose, as copied from it with vast improvements, and having infidelity, instead of popery, for its latent object. By the aid of the dragon, he now instigated new and horrid persecution; to which the first v. of our text alludes. He 'persecuted the woman,' the Protestant church [see Scott]. Her flight followed, v. 14., 1000 years after her being depressed to a wilderness state, at the rise of popery. The account of the duration of the 2d flight, must be elliptically expressed. It is as though the writer had said, thus flew to her new retreat, for the 1260 years, i. e. the remaining part of that well known period: for this flight is near the close of this noted period. And we find language similar, as to the 1260 years, in Dan. 12:6. Rev. 13:5.

'What then was this 2d flight?—Suppose a new continent had been lately discovered, where these Protestants were thus persecuted; a continent [nearly uninhabited, and in all the wildness of nature] far from the face of the old papal, Roman earth; a wilderness 9000 miles in length, embracing all the climes, fertilities of soil, beautiful varieties, and natural conveniences, desirable for the habitation of the greatest, and most happy people on earth. Suppose it to have been put into the minds of the best of the Protestants, under their cruel persecutions, [from temporal power united with spiritual, the beast and the dragon,] to flee over a vast ocean, to form their settlement in this new world, in order to find a peaceful asylum for the rights of conscience, and the rights of man. Suppose them entering on the flight, and, by the signal protection of heaven, safely reaching that far distant continent. Suppose God then protects them, increases them, and causes them to become an [active], great, and renowned nation; [having the freest intercourse with every corner of the globe;] established in the enjoyment of [a church separated from civil power,] the rights of conscience, and civil liberty, [setting examples of reform to nations.] Suppose their descendants soon to multiply into a great nation, to become the [hope of the oppressed] of all other nations, and to bid fair to be [a] great mean of the conversion and bliss of the world. Suppose the church of Christ there to flourish far beyond all other churches on earth, and to form there a seat for the commencement of the special showers of the Spirit of grace in the last days, and to seem to be clearly destined to give a new and correct model to the whole militant church of Christ. Let these things be supposed, and then let the question be asked, What and whither is the second flight of the woman in Rev.? Would you not immediately point to this new region of the church, and say, thither was her flight, and there is her gracious lodgment, assigned by propitious heaven? This is all reality, as the American [branch of Christ's] church can testify.' The above is from the 'Key to the Rev.' in 36 lectures, by Rev. Ethan Smith; which see, for his arguments, since they cannot be quoted here, for want of space. Ed.

It was currently said, by the pious in England, at the time New England was settled, that 'God had sifted three kingdoms to plant his wheat in America.' See this proved in 'Bancroft's History of the U. S.' where will be seen the other principles (of free trade in New York, of civil liberty in Virginia, toleration in Maryland, the peace principle in Pennsylvania, &c.) which colonized N. America. Id.

No other considerable place remains on the globe where a second effort [in the cause of social progress] can [ever] be made under like auspices. Id.

Could so vast an event [of this kind] be overlooked? and, too, when things far less interesting are detailed in Rev.? Edwards was confident (see his Hist. of Redemption), that the churches in America must have a place among the prophecies. And we have, in one of his volumes, a labor of 7 pages, to find something in the prophecies clearly alluding to it. But he, and all others, strangely failed of fixing their eye upon our text as a striking prediction of it. Rev. 12: which sketches the course of the most interesting events, for the part of the Christian era antecedent to the millennium, is the part of this book where this prediction might be expected. And it is found in the very part of this ch. where it might have been expected;—an event following and occasioned by the persecution which followed the Reformation in the 16th century. Fix

16 And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth.

17 And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

t Ge. 3:15.

PRACT. OBS. True Christians, being of heavenly birth, and expecting a heavenly felicity, have 'put on Christ,' are 'clothed in his righteousness,' irradiated by his light, beautified by his image, and taught to put earthly things beneath their feet; and they deem it their honor to profess, adorn, and recommend the doctrine of the holy apostles. All who are thus minded should pray fervently, and labor diligently, in their several places, for the increase, prosperity, and purity of the church;

your eye, then, as I attempted to do, on the places and time when the Puritans were driven to extremities by the persecutions of Jesuits, [a church with temporal power,] and other enemies of the pure, evangelical truth; and see to what region the body of the best of that people, did in fact flee from the face of the papal dragon, [and those who exerted the spiritual, selfish tyranny denoted by dragonism,] in some far distant realm. And this great event, then occurring, does most fully accord with the prediction in our text. "The church of the exiles," says Mather, "were driven out into the horrible wilderness, merely for being well-wishers to the Reformation. . . . Our Lord Jesus Christ carried some thousands of reformers into the retirements of the American desert, that He might give a specimen of good things to which He would have his people elsewhere aspire and rise;" [and their European brethren often looked to them for counsel and example in spiritual matters, as the annals of those times fully show, their sufferings for truth having made them clear-sighted in it. "Out of small beginnings," said the pilgrim Bradford, "great things have been produced; and as one candle may light a thousand, so the light here kindled hath shone to many, yea, in some sort to our whole nation."] "This is, at last, the spot of the earth, which the Lord of heaven spied out, for the seat of such transactions as require to be noted in history. Here it was, that our Lord intended a resting-place for the reformed church." And that great observer of divine Providence, adds, "193 ships were employed in their passing the perils of the seas, in the accomplishment of this renowned settlement; and but one miscarried." E. SMITH.

Three several attempts of French Catholics were ineffectually made to settle Massachusetts Bay; and at last the natives were cleared off by Providence, to give room for the Plymouth colony. 'Had New England,' remarks Bancroft, 'been colonized immediately on the discovery of the American continent, the old English constitutions would have been planted under the powerful influence of the Roman Catholic religion; had the settlement been made under Elizabeth, it would have been before activity of the popular mind in religion had conducted to a corresponding activity of mind in politics. . . . Who will venture to measure the consequences of actions, by the apparent humility or the remoteness of their origin? [The kingdom of God, the great theme of prophecy, cometh not, indeed, with observation.] The mysterious influence of that Power which enchains the destinies of states, overruling the decisions of sovereigns, and the forethought of statesmen, often deduces the greatest events from the least commanding causes. A Genoese adventurer, discovering America, changed the commerce of the world; an obscure German, inventing the printing press, rendered possible the universal diffusion of increased intelligence; an Augustine monk, denouncing indulgences, introduced a schism in religion, and changed the foundations of European politics; a young French refugee, skilled alike in theology and civil law, in the duties of magistrates, and the dialectics of religious controversy, entering the republic of Geneva, and conforming its ecclesiastical discipline to the principles of republican simplicity, established a party of which Englishmen became members, and New England the asylum. The enfranchisement of the mind, from religious despotism, led directly to inquiries into the nature of civil government; and the doctrines of popular liberty, which sheltered their infancy in the wilderness of the newly-discovered continent, within the short space of two centuries, have infused themselves into the life-blood of every rising state, from Labrador to Chili, have erected outposts on the Oregon, and in Liberia, and, making a proselyte of enlightened France, have disturbed all the ancient governments of Europe, by awakening the public mind to resistless action, from the shores of Portugal to the palaces of the czars.' Bancroft.

'A church in the West, then, was to be planted, to commence the millennium. . . . Great is our debt of gratitude to God! Surely, then, such a people should attempt, by prayers, alms, and all their talents and influence, great things in behalf of the kingdom of the Redeemer. Great things are to be accomplished for the "conversion of the world," [at last acknowledged as the comprehensive aim of the Christian.] And great should be the zeal, piety, faithfulness, and perseverance of the seed of the woman here, to have a most exalted agency in the great work of salvation at this momentous period.' E. SMITH.

(14.) 'This prophecy shows, that the true church of Christ would be invisible, as a community, for a period of 1260 days; and during all that time a harlot, pretending to be the spouse of Jesus Christ, was to propagate her idolatries successfully and extensively throughout the world. The several Protestant churches, having no connexion with each other in government ordinances, like the ancient church, constitute only individual members of the universal church, which, as a body politic, is as invisible now as it was in the tenth century. Fraser.' HENRY, abr. 'This is the same narration with v. 6. varied only by the difference of mood and tense.'

(15.) Flood.] Rev. E. Smith refers this to 'that masterpiece of infidelity, first known to the world under the name of Illuminism; the system of Voltaire, Weishaupt, &c. Their dependence was on poisoning contors; and heresies are as certainly from the devil, as open force and violence.

3. The reasonable help provided for the church in this dangerous juncture, v. 16. Some think, we are to understand the swarms of Goths and Vandals that invaded the Roman empire, and found work for the Arian rulers, who otherwise would have been as furious persecutors as the pagan had been, and had exercised great cruelties already.

4. The devil, being thus defeated in his designs on the universal church, now turns his rage against particular persons and places; his malice against the woman pushes him on to make war with the remnant of her seed. Some think hereby are meant the Albigenses, who were first by Dioclesian driven up into barren and mountainous places, and afterward cruelly murdered by popish rage and power, for several generations; and for no other reason, than, because they kept the commandments of God, and held the testimony of Jesus Christ.

and ministers should especially abound in these holy employments. For the devil and his instruments are vigilant, united, hold, and unwearyed, in their efforts to destroy the religion of Christ; and too generally the 'kingdoms of the world' have been seduced into their service; surely, then, the servants of God ought not to be timid, heartless, [disunited,] or negligent, in opposing their designs! SCOTT.

the sentiments of mankind, obtaining the management of the means of education, of governments, and of armies, to promote their designs. They managed the French revolution. Its professed object was to render the human race happy, by freeing them from all restraints upon their lusts and passions. But the real object of this horrid scheme was cautiously concealed from their candidates, and men of the lower orders of their system; and it was gradually revealed to candidates for the higher degrees, as it was found they could endure it without alarm. They labored with sly intrigue to fill, with men of their own order, all places of trust and of interest.' The attempt was made, and is now making, in this country, it is thought; and certainly, where opinion has such free scope, it becomes the church here to know these serpent devices, and to pray God to enlighten their minds, and warm their hearts with pure principles and godly affections; directing them how best to meet the wiles of the adversary,—with whom a fearful struggle is yet to be had! Ed.

(16.) The earth helped the woman.] 'In the W. division of the Roman empire allotted to Constantine Chlorus, the father of Constantine, the Christians obtained an earlier respite from the severities of this persecution [by the heathen emperors, and those opposed to Constantine's succession] than in the other divisions, in consequence of which they had greatly increased in estimation and influence, at the time when Constantine succeeded to that throne; (Euseb. de Martyr. Pal. c. 3;) and, being joined by those who had taken shelter among the barbarians, they formed a large, united, and resolute body, which it was the interest of the new emperor, now saluted as such by his army, to conciliate and attach; such an edict in their favor followed this transaction; and a standard of the cross was carried before his victorious army. But whether this conduct of Constantine, which delivered the Christians from apparent destruction, was the result of his political interest only, or of a miraculous vision of a cross, followed by a dream, in which Christ exhorted him to this measure; whether it was of earthly or heavenly production, has been a subject of historical debate, from that time to this. (See it ably and candidly discussed by Mosheim, and his learned translator.) I will avow myself satisfied on this head, by a perusal of Eusebius's "Life of Constantine." This was written by a Christian bishop, and is professedly a panegyric, at the beginning of which the writer announces, that he will omit the mention of the greater part of his actions, confining his narration to those which lead to piety and virtue. Yet it is very extraordinary, that, in this narration, we very seldom meet with any examples of the emperor's faith in Christ, or of such virtues as are accounted purely Christian, and these only in the latter period of his life. And referring to the edicts, speeches, and letters of the emperor,—a man supposed to have been favored with personal communication from Christ,—we are surprised, at the rare mention of his Savior's name; though he frequently magnifies, with great piety and zeal, the only supreme God, in opposition to the pagan deities. So that his religion appears, at the time of his supposed conversion, to be that of Deism, with little or no addition of Christian belief. But, is this consistent with the profession of one who had formed his religion on a miraculous intercourse with the Redeemer? Or, can we suppose otherwise than that he made this profession to be believed by others, though he had no conviction of it himself? This will account for his deferring the sacrament of baptism to the latest period of his life, when it is not improbable that he may have died a convert to the faith. His own words, addressed to the bishops, will show that, before that period, he had not accounted himself a true member of the church. (b. 4. c. 62.) Here is sufficient proof, that the relief of the Christians, from the overwhelming violence of imperial persecution, was the result rather of earthly politics, than immediate heavenly interference, and that, in this respect, it has fulfilled that part of prophecy now under our consideration. The arch-fiend, thus foiled in his attempts against the church, renews the war against the remnant of the woman's seed, as will be detailed in the ensuing chapters.' WOODH.

(17.) 'As this alludes to things future, time will best unfold them.' SMITH.—Popery is a system in which science and ignorance, refinement and barbarism, wisdom and stupidity, taste and animalism, mistaken zeal and malignant enmity, may sanctoriously pour out their virulence against the Gospel, and cry, Hosanna, while they go out to shed the blood of the saints. And though by revolutions it has been shaken, and compelled by motives of policy to cease a little from blood, not a principle of this system has been abandoned. All the wiles of ages past are put in requisition now, to heal the fatal wounds the beast has received, and to render the system still more powerful and terrific. The heaven is in secret and open operation in this country; and the quick action of the beast to the touch of the spear in Palestine, shows, that he is neither dead nor asleep. And, considering the civilization, wealth, and science, which the system comprehends, it is from popery, that the Gospel is destined to experience the last and most determined resistance.' BICKNER.—Bloomf. rejects (17) the word 'Christou,' and marks 'tou' as doubtful. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. XIII. V. 1. The apostle saw a savage 'beast,' i. e. a tyrannical, idolatrous, and persecuting power, springing up out of the commotions which took place in the world. All interpreters agree, that the Roman empire, in one form or other, was here intended: and papists, continuing such, must contend, though against the most conclusive evidence which can be imagined, that pagan Rome was meant. But Rome pagan had existed many hundred years, when the apostle had this vision, and yet he saw 'the rise of this beast.'—It may indeed be said, that Daniel, in vision, saw the rise of the Babylonian empire, though the rise of it preceded his prophecy; (Notes, Dan. 7:1-3.) so that, this circumstance alone may not be altogether conclusive in the argument: but the reign of this beast, during 1260 years, from whatever period it be dated, must be conclusive; for the pagan Roman empire, properly speaking, did not continue 300 years, from the time when this prophecy was delivered, and the very last remains of it were subverted in about 400 years. Indeed, the whole time, from the building of Rome, to the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was considerably less than 1100 years; and even to Augustulus, the last emperor, A. D. 476, i. e. from its birth to its death, it lasted at the most only 1228 years; and for the first 5 or 600 years of this term, the Romans had not the smallest concern in anything, which respected the church of God. It is therefore absolutely certain, that the Roman power, as professing Christianity, and not that of pagan Rome, is meant. The dragon, before mentioned, had '7 crowns on his heads,' but this 'beast has 10 crowns on his horns.' (Note, 12:3-6.) This plainly showed, that a revolution would take place before the time predicted should arrive, and that the dominion would be removed from the imperial city, and divided among 10 kingdoms.—The 7 heads had indeed lost their crowns, but they had preserved, or acquired, a name, or names, 'of blasphemy.' Dan. 2:40-43. 7:6-8, 19-27. 8:9-12. Imperial Rome was often called the 'eternal city,' and the 'goddess of the earth,' with other blasphemous titles; and altars, temples, and sacrifices were assigned to her, as a deity; and it will appear in the sequel, how anti-Christian Rome, after the loss of the imperial dignity, obtained or resumed similar names of blasphemy. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:3, 4.—Out of the sea.) 11:7. Notes, 17:7, 8. Dan. 7:23.

V. 2-4. This beast was the same with Daniel's fourth beast, the same empire, but in one special form; for 'the dragon had now given his power, throne, and great authority,' to the beast. The dragon may here mean, either the devil, or his vicegerent, the idolatrous Roman empire. (Notes, 12:3-12.) So that, when another idolatrous persecuting power had succeeded to that of the heathen emperors, then 'the dragon' had transferred his dominion to 'the beast,' or the devil had appointed another vicegerent; and all the world knows, that this accords to the history of the Roman empire, pagan and papal.—The project of re-establishing the old idolatry having failed, a new species was invented; saints and angels succeeded to gods and demi-gods, and persecution was the mean employed for supporting it. (Note, 12:13-17.) 'The head of the beast, wounded to death,' represented the entire subversion of the imperial authority in the time of Augustulus, or when Rome became a dukedom to the Exarchate of Ravenna. (8:12.) Five of the heads of the beast, or the dragon, (for in this respect they are the same,) were superseded, before the apostle's time, namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes, but, at the time above mentioned, the sixth received a deadly wound. (Note, 17:9-14.) It was, however, afterwards healed, by the revival of the imperial name and dignity, in the person of Charlemagne, or Charles the Great, who was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 800; and this head subsisted ever since in the emperors of Germany, or of 'the holy Roman empire,' till subverted by recent revolutions. For the emperor of Austria, doubtless by constraint, has resigned the title; and the present ruler of France (1813) has usurped it for a season. But many things seem now (1815) to be reverting

CHAP. XIII. We have, in this ch., a further discovery and description of the church's enemies; not other enemies than are mentioned before, but described after another manner, that the methods of their enmity may more fully appear. They are represented as two beasts. By the first some understand Rome pagan, and by the second, Rome papal; but others understand Rome papal to be represented by both; by the first in its secular power, by the second in its ecclesiastical.

V. 1-10. We have here an account of the rise, figure, and progress of the first beast; and observe,

1. From what situation the apostle saw this monster; though probably still in a rapture, he seemed to himself to stand on the seashore, in the island Patmos, but whether in the body, or out of the body, he could not tell.

2. Whence this beast came,—out of the sea; yet, by the description, it should be more like a land monster; but the more monstrous everything about it was, the more proper an emblem it would be to set forth the mystery of iniquity and tyranny.

3. The form and shape of this beast; it was for the most part like a leopard, but its feet were like the feet of a bear, and its mouth as the mouth of a lion; it had seven heads, and ten horns, and upon its heads the name of blasphemy; a most horrid, hideous monster! In some part of this description here seems to be an allusion to Daniel's vision of the four beasts, which represented the four monarchies, Dan. 7: 1-3, &c. This beast was a sort of composition of those three, lion, bear, and leopard, with the fierceness, strength, and swiftness of them all; the seven heads and the ten horns seem to design its several powers; the ten crowns, its tributary princes; the word blasphemy on its forehead, proclaims its direct enmity and opposition to the glory of God, by promoting idolatry.

4. The source and spring of his authority,—the dragon; he was set up by the devil, and supported by him to do his work, and promote his interest; he lent him all the assistance he could.

5. A dangerous wound given him, and yet unexpectedly healed, v. 3. Some think, by this wounded head we are to understand the abolishing of pagan idolatry; and by the healing of the wound, the introducing of the popish idolatry, the same in substance with the former, only in a new dress, and which as effectually answers the devil's design as that did.

6. The honor and worship paid to this infernal monster; all the world wondered after the beast, they all admired his power, and policy, and success, and they worshipped the dragon that gave power to the beast, and they worshipped the beast, they paid honor and subjection to the devil and his instruments, and thought there was no power able to withstand them; so great were the darkness, degeneracy, and madness of the world!

7. How he exercised his infernal power, and policy; he had a mouth speaking great things, and blasphemies; he blasphemed God, the name of God, the tabernacle of God, and into their former channel; and it is too early to judge how this revolution may terminate. After Charles had been thus proclaimed emperor, the temporal and ecclesiastical rulers mutually strengthening each other, the Roman power became again formidable, and 'all the world,' or all the earth, was astonished to behold that empire revived, which seemed to be totally extinct; so that a superstitious and idolatrous obedience was rendered to this temporal authority, as engaged to support the ecclesiastical tyranny of the Romish church. Thus they virtually 'worshipped the dragon, who gave his power to the beast;' by submitting, without reserve, to the same idolatrous, persecuting power as before, only in another form; and they 'worshipped the beast' as one, who never had his equal on earth, or in heaven, and who would surely crush all that presumed to oppose him. Thus the old idolatry was fully re-established, with new names; and the worship of idols, or creatures, is in effect worshipping the devil.—Some explain 'the deadly wound,' inflicted on one head of the beast, to mean the revolution which took place, when Christian emperors succeeded the pagan, persecuting emperors, and the healing of this deadly wound, the subsequent establishment of another idolatrous, persecuting power, bearing the Christian name. The two interpretations agree in the grand outline, and the nature of this work precludes the particular consideration of subordinate questions.

(2.) 'We must look out for the beast, to find him by the properties of his nature, and by the effects of his government upon earth. The beast, or brutal nature of the life of man, is what the dragon exalts and empowers with all his might, as his vicegerent, to have dominion over the inhabitants of the earth, for by this nature only he can have access now to us, and power over us. The general properties of this nature, as here personified, are, to be led without reason, by mere sense, to satisfy the sensual imaginations and lusts of the flesh, and to do all by British violence and force, and to destroy all that opposes its selfish will. The government this nature affects is absolute, to have all in subjection to its will: so it rules over others, as men rule over beasts, guiding them by mere sensual and imaginary inducements, which have no relation to the will of God. [Notes, Jude 10. 1 John 5:4.] How many rulers have made these properties of their way to be their glory, is apparent. But the lamb-like nature of the [renewed] life of man, and the way of government suitable thereto, is what Christ, as spiritual, exalts in the societies of men.' Durie.

(3.) His deadly wound was healed. 'The Christian leaders, [when the head of Daniel's 4th beast, become John's persecuting power, was snitten by Constantine's accession,] seizing, too eagerly, the power and riches of the world, and ensnared in the temptation, contributed most effectually to heal the deadly wound of the beast; they restored him again to life and to power; to a power tenfold more dangerous than before, when a corrupt administration of civil tyranny began to be supported, and abetted, by ecclesiastical authority: under which new form he became an object of wonder, and of worship, to the deluded inhabitants of the world.' Woodh. Let those, then, who would mite church and state, be warned from it, for they do the work of the beast. Ed.

(4.) 'Whoever, to attain worldly eminence, relinquishes his trust in God, and deviates from the path of the divine laws, withdraws his allegiance from God, and transfers it to the devil. Mat. 4:8, 9.' Woodh.

V. 5-7. To this monstrous, savage beast 'was given a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies.—It will soon be stated as the author's opinion, that the ecclesiastical power of Rome was the agent, and the pope the speaking image of this beast; (Notes, 11-17.) and every one knows what blasphemous and enormous claims of 'His Holiness,' 'Infallibility, Sovereign of kings and kingdoms,' 'Christ's vicegerent on earth,' yea, 'God upon earth,' have been spoken by this mouth of the beast. Power also, or authority, even the secular empire, was given him, to continue, or rather to practise, or to prosper in his undertak-blasphemies; and power was given unto him to <sup>k</sup>continue 'forty and two months.

6 And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his <sup>m</sup>tabernacle, and them that <sup>n</sup>dwell in heaven.

7 And it was given unto him to make war <sup>o</sup>with the saints, and to overcome them: and power <sup>p</sup>was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations.

8 And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book <sup>q</sup>of life of the Lamb slain from <sup>r</sup>the foundation of the world.

9 If any man have an ear, let him hear.

10 He <sup>s</sup>that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he <sup>t</sup>that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the <sup>u</sup>patience and the faith of the saints.

11 And I beheld another <sup>v</sup>beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon.

all them that dwell in heaven; and he made war with the saints, and overcame them, and gained a sort of universal empire in the world. His malice was principally levelled at the God of heaven, and his heavenly attendance; at God, in making images of Him that is invisible, and in worshipping them [and setting self in God's place]; at the tabernacle of God, that is, say some, at the human nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, in which God dwells as in a tabernacle; this is dishonored by their doctrine of transubstantiation, that will not suffer his body to be a true body, and will put it in the power of every priest to prepare a body for Christ; and against them that dwell in heaven, the glorified saints, by putting them into the place of the pagan demons, and praying to them; which they are so far from being pleased with, that they truly judge themselves wronged and dishonored by it. Thus the malice of the devil shows itself against heaven, and the blessed inhabitants of heaven; these are above the reach of his power; all he can do, is, to blaspheme them; but the saints on earth are more exposed to his cruelty, and he sometimes is permitted to triumph over them, and trample upon them.

8. The limitation of the devil's power and success, and that both as to time and persons. (1.) Time; his reign is to continue 42 months, v. 5. suitable to the other prophetic characters of the reign of antichrist. (2.) Persons; it will be only those whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life. Christ had a chosen remnant, redeemed by his blood, recorded in his book, sealed by his Spirit; and though the devil and antichrist might overcome their bodily strength, and take away the natural life, they could never conquer their souls, nor prevail with them to forsake their Savior, and revolt to his enemies.

9. We have a demand of attention to what is here discovered of the great sufferings and troubles of the church; and an assurance given, that when God has accomplished his work on mount Zion, his refining work, then He will turn his hand against the enemies of his people, and they who have killed with the sword, shall themselves fall by the sword, v. 10. and they who led the people of God into captivity, shall themselves be made captives. Here now is that which will be proper exercise for the patience and faith of the saints; patience under the prospect of so great sufferings, and faith in the prospect of so glorious a deliverance.

V. 11—18. Those who think the first beast signifies Rome pagan, by this second understand Rome papal; those that understand the first beast of the secular power of the papacy, take the second to intend its spiritual and ecclesiastical powers, which act under the disguise of religion and charity to the souls of men.

1. All agree it must be some great impostor, who, under a pretence of religion, shall deceive the souls of men: the papists would have it to be Apollonius Tyaneus; but Dr. More fixes it on the ecclesiastical powers of the papacy. The pope shows the horns of a lamb, pretends to be the vicar of Christ on earth, and so to be vested with his power and authority; but his speech betrays him; for he gives forth those false doctrines, and cruel decrees, which show him to belong to the dragon, and not to the Lamb.

2. The power he exercises; all the power of the former beast, v. 12. he promotes the same interest, pursues the same design in substance, which is, to draw men off from worshipping the true God, to worship those who by nature are no gods, and subject the souls and consciences of men to the [selfish] will and authority of men, in opposition to the [love and] will of God; this design is

ings, for 42 months, or 1260 years. Some copies read, 'make war' (7); and no doubt that is included. This term coincides exactly with that during which 'the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth.' (Notes, 11:3—12.) This beast would, during this period, 'open his mouth in blasphemies against God;' combining with the ecclesiastical power in its usurpations, and in encroaching on the peculiar honors and prerogatives of God Himself. 'He would blaspheme the name of God,' by requiring all men, at the instigation of the ecclesiastical power, to render that worship to creatures, which belongs to God alone, 'and his tabernacle,' or true Christians, by stigmatizing, anathematizing, and murdering them, as heretics; 'and them that dwell in heaven,' by scandalizing angels and departed saints, as if they sacrilegiously sought and were pleased with the idolatrous worship rendered to them, and by ascribing to the saints a variety of ridiculous actions, which they never did. (Note, 18:20.) It was also 'given to the beast to wage war against the saints, and to overcome them;' and no computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the Gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the church of Rome. 1,000,000 of the poor Waldenses perished in France; 900,000 orthodox Christians were slain, in less than 30 years after the institution of the Jesuits; the duke of Alva boasted of having put 36,000 to death in the Netherlands, by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years; and the Inquisition destroyed by various tortures 150,000 Christians, within 50 years. These are a few specimens, and but a few, of those which history has recorded; but the total amount will never be known, till 'the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.' (Note, Is. 26:20, 21.) These were put to death by the secular arm; by that power, of which the empire was the head, and which subsisted in ten kingdoms; for the persecuting, ecclesiastical power, condescended to employ kings and emperors, as the executioners of its murderous decrees!—Mr. Faber has here very justly pointed out an inaccuracy in Bp. Newton, who seems to confound this beast, or the secular empire, in all the ten kingdoms, with the little horn predicted by Daniel, which accords to the second beast, afterwards mentioned. (Note, 11:12.) Yet, as the secular power executed the persecuting decrees of the ecclesiastical, and gave its power to that beast; the things, stated by Bp. Newton as accomplishments of this prophecy, were evidently such; though he has not, with his usual accuracy, marked the manner in which this took place. (Notes, Dan. 7:7, 8, 23—27. 11:36.)

(5.) 'Whitaker and others fully expose these blasphemies. Doddridge says, they must have very little acquaintance with the blasphemous titles assumed or admitted by the popes, who discern not in them a very remarkable illustration of this circumstance of the prophecy.' HENRY, abr.—Bl. marks 'war,' as probably spurious.

V. 8—10. By the means above mentioned, the beast maintained his dominion over the inhabitants of the western world, and, indeed, in many other places; and all worshipped him, by the most abject submission of body, soul, and conscience, except 'the remnant according to the election of grace,' (Note, Rom 11:1—6.) 'whose names were written in the book of life,' belonging to 'the Lamb that had been slain, from the foundation of the world.'—It is not, indeed, quite clear, whether Christ be here said to 'have been slain from the foundation of the world;' i. e. in the purpose of God, and the efficacy of his blood to the salvation of all believers; or whether the names of the persons spoken of were 'written in the book of life, from the foundation of the world,' as the elect of God: but the language is in a parallel text more explicit. (17:8.—Notes, 20:11—15. 21:22—27. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)—This prophecy was of that importance, to the encouragement and direction of believers, during 'the reign of the beast,' as well as for the due understanding of the greatest part of this book, that the attention of every one was especially called to it. (Notes, 2:10, 11. Mat. 13:9.—Marg. Ref. f.) For the persecutors would assuredly be destroyed, in the same manner as they had destroyed others: (Notes, 17:—19;) yet here would be the trial of 'the faith and patience of the saints;' to bear up under such complicated dangers and sufferings, and of so long continuance, beyond the example of all former times; and to persevere in faith and obedience through them.—Faith and patience would be more wanted by the saints, and have more to try and exercise them, and for a longer time, than in any other persecution whatever.

(10.) Kilieth, &c.] See this exemplified in the sufferings and death of the most noted persecutors, by Dr. Jortin, in his Remarks on Eccl. Hist. vol. 3. pp. 246—322.

V. 11, 12. This second 'beast' did not come up out of the sea, or from winds and tumults, as the first did; (Note, 1.) but 'out of the earth,' silently and gradually, as plants spring up: (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) and it 'had horns like unto a lamb;' denoting that it was a spiritual dominion, professedly derived from Christ, and exercised in a gentle manner. It was, therefore, the emblem of the Roman hierarchy; and his two horns have, very probably, been supposed to signify the regular and secular clergy of that church: as the other 'beast' was the emblem of the temporal authority exercised in the ten kingdoms of the empire, in support of that spiritual tyranny. The second beast is elsewhere called 'the false prophet' (16:13. 19:20.) which abundantly confirms this interpretation. 'In the language of symbols, horns are kingdoms; consequently the horns of an ecclesiastical beast must be ecclesiastical kingdoms. Now I know not what idea we can annex to an ecclesiastical kingdom, subservient to the head of an ecclesiastical empire, except that of a regularly organized body of ecclesiasties, subject primarily to their own immediate superior, and ultimately to the head of the whole empire.' Faber. Thus the regular clergy, or the different orders of monks, are subject each to the principal of his order, who himself is subject to the church and bishop of Rome: and, in like manner, the secular clergy, or parochial ministers and others connected with them, are subject primarily to their ordinary, or diocesan bishop; he, to the archbishop, primate, metropolitan, or patriarch; but all to the church and bishop of Rome. And, as they are enjoined celibacy, this subjection, and their devotedness to the common cause of that church, are most entire and efficacious.—But though the beast 'had two horns, like a lamb,' yet 'he spake as a dragon,' or with all the tyranny and cruelty of the persecuting Roman emperors. (Note, 12:3—6.) And the high claims of authority, and the pre-emptory commands, menaces, and decisions of the Roman hierarchy, are well known. The second 'beast' is likewise the minister, adviser, or agent, of the first beast, and 'exerciseth all his power before him.' Accordingly, the different orders of monks, as well as the secular clergy of Rome, have always possessed immense influence in the affairs of the kings and nations, belonging to that communion: their principal ministers of state have generally been cardinals, or other ecclesiastics: the magistrate has been engaged to use his sword to enforce their decrees, or execute their sentences against heretics; and bloody wars, without number, have been waged in support of their antichristian domination. In return for these services, they 'cause the earth etics to dwell in their countries, or to make any bargains, use any trades, or bear any civil offices; which is a very clear interpretation of this prophecy.

4. We have here the number of the beast, given in such a manner, as shows the infinite wisdom of God, and will sufficiently exercise all the wisdom and accuracy of men; The number is the number of a man, computed after the usual manner among men, and it is 666. Whether this be the number of the errors and heresies that are contained in popery, or rather, as others, the number of the years from its rise to its fall, is not certain, much less what that period is, which is described by these prophetic numbers; the most admired dissertation on this intricate subject, is that of Dr. Potter, where the curious may find sufficient entertainment: it seems to me to be one of those seasons which God has reserved in his own power; only this we know,—God has written Mene, Tekel, on all his enemies; He has numbered their days, and they shall be finished; but his own kingdom shall endure for ever.

PRACT. OBS. The enemies of the church carry on their designs, under a variety of odious and terrifying forms: but if it will answer their purpose better, they appear as gentle 'lambs,' in order that, when they have opportunity, they may speak 'as dragons,' and 'lord it over God's heritage' with cruel tyranny. (Notes, Mat. 7:15—20. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) They have commonly possessed great power; and when any of the heads of this Leviathan seemed to be broken in pieces, they have been again healed; and in another form they, even to this day, return to the combat.—Ungodly priests, and tyrannical rulers, support each other's usurpations, iniquities, exactions, and oppressions, whilst the one by war, or cruel executions, destroy all opposers; and the other deceive or terrify men by lying miracles, false doctrines, anathemas, and ecclesiastical censures. But all these evils should be considered as illustrative of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart, (Note, Jer. 17:9, 10.) and as endearing to us the love of God in Christ Jesus. The review ought also to make us thankful for our civil and religious liberties, in this highly favored land. SCOTT.

both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed, &c.' It is indeed argued, that the original should be rendered, 'made an image to the beast, or for his use;' and not of him: but instances may be brought from the Greek writers of exactly similar expressions, where the meaning is indisputably according to our tr. of this passage. Indeed, if a literal image, or literal images, be meant; and yet the beasts are not supposed to be literal beasts, or the horns to be literal horns; this blending of the literal with the figurative, in the same prophecy, is not only contrary to the rules of sound interpretation, but a direct violation of that laid down by the respectable writer, who has adopted this interpretation. 'The whole book, excepting those few passages which are avowedly descriptive, must be understood either literally throughout, or figuratively throughout: otherwise it will be impossible to ascertain the meaning designed to be conveyed.' Faber. On the other hand, if the pope be really this image, the language is both natural, and extremely expressive; and it has been fully verified in numerous instances, by papal interdicts, excommunications, and similar measures. The objections of late brought against this interpretation, have led me to perceive, that, if preceding expositors could have foreseen, what their successors would have objected to their statement, they would have expressed themselves more cautiously and accurately; but they have produced no hesitation as to the meaning of the emblem.—It is true, that the pope may be considered as, in some sense, the head also of the two-horned beast: yet, that beast continues to exist, when there is no pope; and the cardinals, as representing the whole ecclesiastical power, are, during that vacancy, the head of the beast; and in that character they create the pope, to be the image both of the secular and the ecclesiastical idolatrous persecuting power, the representative of the whole. He does not derive his dominion from any hereditary right, or from popular election, or from regal appointment; but he is the creature of the Romish clergy: yet, being created by them, he is the object of their worship, and exercises, or at least claims a right to exercise, absolute authority over both them and the kings of the earth. Indeed, this claim was long generally admitted by the ten horns of the beast, though in some instances it was disputed. (Notes, 17:9—13.) This seems sufficient for the purpose, and, amidst so many emblems, it could hardly be supposed, that no shadow of coincidence should appear.—It may be observed, that when the first, or secular beast is represented, as making war with the saints, and overcoming them; it is nowhere said, that the second, or ecclesiastical beast, should do more than cause them to be killed. The little horn has always worn out the saints, by delivering them over to the secular arm, not by slaying them himself. The inquisitors, with a disgusting affectation of lamb-like meekness, are wont to beseech the civil magistrates to show mercy to those unfortunate victims, whom they themselves have given up to be consigned to the flames.' Faber. (Note, 5—7.)—There are various other interpretations, by different writers, of several things in these chs., chiefly explaining them of recent events in France; but, not judging any of them either well grounded, or even supported by probable arguments, I did not think it needful to introduce them in this work. The books, written expressly on the subject, must be referred to: and, in general, the writers succeed better in attempting to refute each other's interpretation, than in establishing their own; where they materially differ from the expositors, who wrote before these late transactions.—Mr. Cumingham, if I rightly understand him, supposes the corrupt church itself to be the image; as formed by the joint consent of the clergy and laity: but of what is the corrupt church the image? It cannot be the image of the beast, or the secular idolatrous persecuting power, (Notes, 1—7.) as this image is expressly said to be (11); nor, as it appears to me, of anything, except itself, or of those who made it, who are nearly or quite the same persons. 'It was a common fashion in St. John's time, for every heathen god to have a particular society or fraternity belonging to him: and the way of admitting any into these fraternities was: 1. By giving him some hieroglyphic mark in the head, or forehead, [cuts, Deut. 32:5. Ps. 18:5.] which was accounted sacred to that particular god; as that of an ivy-leaf to . . . the fraternity of Bacchus: 2. By sealing themselves with the name of that god: and, 3. with that number which the Greek letters of their name did make up.' Grotius, in Cressener. I suppose, the name of their idols. Slaves also were generally branded with the name of their owners. SCOTT. Animals sacred to the Hindoo god Siva, are marked with his trident, or branded with the Tamul letter S; some have the weapons of their gods. Cows that belong to a Pandaram, have a figure like that annexed. The heathens print marks on their bodies (by puncturing the skin), so as to represent birds, trees, and the gods they worship.

(14.) 'The image of the beast, which is to be worshipped, seems to be that absolute greatness which the second beast attributes to itself, and exercises over the subjects of the first beast in his presence, as v. 12.

He sets up a way of government, as absolute as that of the first beast, who is, in conformity thereto, to establish it; and has power, by the first beast's permission, to give life to the image of his absoluteness, and to give the exercising of his power into the hands of the second beast, to make his power give sentence of death, and to cause sentence to be executed against all that would not acknowledge his authority. Durie. HENRY, abr. 'The image of the beast, we apprehend to be a counterpart of that system of idolatry and intolerance which prevailed in ancient Rome. To this system, popery has given life, and caused it to speak so loud, that all were compelled to obey its power. Hutcheson. Any tyrannous spirit of ecclesiastical dominion, conforms to the description; let us be warned from thus uniting beast and dragon, a selfish spiritual, and a jesuitical temporal power. Ed.

(14, 15.) 'To make an image to the beast, whose deadly wound was healed, would be, to give visibility and authority to his worship, or to require implicit obedience to his commands. To give life unto an image is, to convert it into a living agent; and so this image is said to speak and to act, and with such effect, as to cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast, should be destroyed. To worship the image of the beast, implies deference and subjection to those things which stamp the character of the picture, and render it the image of the beast.'

A. FULLER.

(15.) Worship.] 'What less was the humiliating practice of princes and nobles leading the horses on which these ecclesiastical tyrants were mounted, or the yet more degrading custom of kissing the caliph's sleeve (daily, by all the nobles), or the feet of the Roman pontiff?'

WOMER.

(17.) Forbes says, 'All that follow antichrist have his name, but in diverse manner. Some have the character thereof, that is, the name, imprinted, and are his proper goods, as having his brand and mark. Some have his name, yet so as they have not his mark, who have not learned the deepness of Satan, neither are antichrist's sworn bondmen. And some have but the number of his name,—are not his sworn, marked slaves, but are counted to be so, and are numbered amongst his. He desires to have all men in one of these sorts, and within these who have the number of his name, both the other sorts are included.' HENRY, abr. Or.] This word Ed. rejects.

V. 12. Mention having been made of 'the number of the beast,' or that 'of his name,' the apostle next proposed to men's consideration the number itself; introducing it by saying, 'Here is wisdom,' or intimating, that the discovery of the name of the beast from the number, would be a proof of a man's discernment. 'Let him,' therefore, 'that hath understanding, count the number of the beast;' who then shall censure or ridicule those who attempt to do it? (Note, 1:3.) For it was 'the number of a man,' either such a number as men use, or a number implying in it the name, title, or distinguishing characteristic 'of a man.' Now the Greek word Lateinos signifies the Latin man; or the man of Latium, from which city the Romans derived their original and their language; and this word, according to the genuine orthography, contains, in numerical letters, exactly the 'number 666.' The church of Rome is properly the Latin church, and they use the Latin language in everything. The beast, therefore, or the authority exercised through the ten kingdoms in support of that church, of which the pope is the living image, may well be called LATEINOS. But, though the apostle wrote in Greek, he yet used a few Hebrew names in this book; so we may perhaps think he alluded to a name in that language; and it is most astonishing, that the word Romiith in Hebrew, which answers to Lateinos, signifying Roman, contains in numerical letters exactly 666. Nor can any other two words be produced from two different languages, which so nearly agree together in meaning, and exactly stand for the same number in numerical letters; the coincidence is really most surprising. As John could only refer to the Greek or the Hebrew language in this matter; and as the number of the name of the Latin man, or the Roman, in both languages is exactly the number of the beast; I see no occasion to doubt, either about the beast or his number, especially as Irenaeus, in the second century, put the same construction on it.—Romiith is indeed feminine; but it may signify either the Roman church, or kingdom, the Heb. words for both which are feminine. The word Latinus, or Lateinos, is, however, in all respects by far the most satisfactory, notwithstanding this coincidence.—'No name, though it may possibly comprehend the number 666, can be the name of the beast, unless it equally answers in every other particular to the prophetic description of that name.—Lateinos is at once the name of a man, (the ancient king of Latium, whence Rome had its origin,) the title of an empire, and the distinguishing appellation of every individual in that empire; and when the sum of its numerical letters is taken in the Greek language, . . . it amounts to 666. On these grounds, then, I do not hesitate to assert, that Latinus, and nothing but Latinus, is the name of the beast; for in no other word, descriptive of the re-

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. 1. Here we have one of the most pleasing sights that can be viewed in this world,—the Lord Jesus Christ at the head of his faithful adherents and attendants.

Mount Zion is the gospel-church. Christ is with his church, in the midst of her, therefore she is not consumed. Here Christ appears as the true paschal Lamb, to show that his mediatorial government is the fruit of his sufferings, and the cause of his people's safety and fidelity.

2. His people appear very honorably: (1.) In numbers, they are many, even all who were saved. (2.) Their distinguishing badge; the name of God written in their foreheads: they made a bold and open profession of their faith in God and Christ; and this being followed by suitable actings, they are known and approved. (3.) Their congratulations and songs of praise, which were peculiar to the redeemed, v. 3. their praises were loud as the thunder, or as the voice of many waters; melodious, as of harpers; heavenly, before the throne of God; and a secret to others; none could learn it. (4.) Their character and description: 'They are described, [1.] By their chastity and purity; they had not defiled themselves, either with corporal or spiritual adultery; they had kept themselves clean from the abominations of the antichristian generation. [2.] By their loyalty and steadfast adherence to Christ; they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goes. [3.] By their former designation to this honor, v. 4. Here is plain evidence of a special redemption; redeeming mercy distinguished them from others; they were his choice ones, eminent in every grace, and the earnest of many more who should be followers of them, as they were of Christ. [4.] By their universal integrity and conscientiousness, v. 5. they were freely pardoned in Christ; this is the happy remnant who attend on the Lord Jesus as their Head and Lord; He is glorified in them, and they in Him.

V. 6—12. In this part of the ch. we have three angels or messengers sent from heaven, to give notice of the fall of Babylon, and of those things that were antecedent and consequent to that great event.

1. The first angel was sent on an errand antecedent to it, and that was, to preach the everlasting Gospel, v. 6, 7. Observe, The Gospel is everlasting; is so in its nature, and shall be so in its consequences. It is a work fit for an angel, to preach this everlasting Gospel; such is the dignity and difficulty of that work! Yet we have this treasure in earthen vessels. The everlasting Gospel is of great concern to all the world, every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. It is the great mean by which men are brought to fear God, and to give glory to Him. When vived temporal beast, or the papal Roman empire, can such a fatal concurrence of circumstances be found? Faber.—The mark of the beast is the sign of the cross, used in endless superstitions, and even idolatries. S.

(18.) 'From the definition of antichrist, 1 John 4:3, it appears, that the antichrist cannot be a man, or a single person, but a moral body; which, in the time of the apostles, had begun to constitute itself by the side of, and along with the mystical body of Christ; and which, from that time, began to exist in the world, of which the apostle said, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work;" which has existed till our times; which exists at present, well grown and robust, and which, in the end, will let itself be seen in the world, perfect and entire in all its parts, when the mystery of iniquity is entirely accomplished.—Ben Ezra.'—Although himself a Romanist and a Jesuit, Ben Ezra considers that the beast with two horns is the Romish priesthood.' HENRY, abr.—'The common method of interpretation has been that of ascertaining names, which contain the numeral letters of the Greek alphabet, amounting to the number 666. But this method of calculation has fallen into discredit, by the fact, resulting from experience, that there is no end to the multitude of names, which may be thus composed. "Scarcely has a single controversy started up to which this number may not be applied," and it may reasonably be doubted, whether the true mode of calculation has yet been discovered. No conjecture is such as to flash conviction on the mind like truth.' WOODH.

NOTES. CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. The apostle, having been shown the foregoing particulars concerning papal Rome, the antichristian secular and ecclesiastical domination of the Beast, and its image, with all idolatry and tyranny connected with them; had next a vision of the true 'church in the wilderness,' during the same period: which had special reference to the darkest times, previous to the dawning of the Reformation. The 144,000 seems a mystical number, the 12 patriarchs multiplied by the 12 apostles, and both multiplied by a thousand; as if the 144 were leaders of thousands; so that there was a considerable number of true Israelites, and of those who held the apostle's doctrine, and marched under their banner, in the most degenerate times; being the successors of that remnant, which was found, in the first three centuries, during the persecutions of the heathen emperors. (7:9—17. Rom. 11:1—6.) As the worshippers of the beast 'were marked with his name and number;' (Notē, 13:13—17.) so these disciples of Christ had 'the name of his Father' written in legible characters on their foreheads.—It is evident from history, that there were such persons, in the darkest times, who ventured and laid down their lives for the truth and worship of the Gospel. Indeed, these were the same as the two witnesses during the times in which they lived, only represented under another emblem. (Notes, 11:1—14.)—The new song was sung in the presence of the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers, 4:6—8. and none could learn it, but the redeemed. (Note, 2:17.) For, as it related immediately to redemption; the proud, the impenitent, the unbelieving, and the carnal, could not understand the nature or the glory of this subject: nor could angels join in it, not being 'redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb;' though they unite in worshipping Him, as worthy to receive all honor and blessing. 5:11—14.—The antichristian church at an early period discouraged and reviled marriage, enjoined celibacy on priests, immured numbers of both sexes in convents, extolled virginity as almost essential to piety and purity, and ranked its virgins with the saints and martyrs of the primitive times. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) But these unnatural restrictions, and attempts to introduce a kind of life on earth, which, in general, only suits the inhabitants of heaven, made way, not only for exorbitant, spiritual pride, but also for the most unnatural and detestable licentiousness, and for crimes too horrid to be specified: and at the same time, the church was polluted with the most manifest and abominable idolatry, or spiritual fornication. (Notes, 17:1—6.) But, says the apostle by the Spirit of prophecy, these true Christians 'are they who are not defiled with women.' 'Marriage being honorable in all, and the bed undefiled,' the clause may be understood in the literal sense, and also figuratively: 'For,' says he, 'they are virgins,' even such as the Scripture commends, who are espoused to Christ, and unfeignedly love Him, who are faithful and obedient to Him; and, deeming themselves his alone and wholly, wait for the completion of their sacred union with Him; and in the mean time prefer suffering and death to the spiritual fornication and adultery to which all others are given up. (Notes, 19:1—6. Cant. 1:3. 2 Cor. 11:1—6.) They, therefore, 'followed Him, whithersoever he went,' through persecutions and tribulations, into obscurity, or into prisons, with self-denial, obedient faith, and patient hope; 'taking up their cross,' and copying his example of meekness, purity, and love. (Notes, John 10:26—31. 12:23—26.) These were the persons, 'who had been redeemed from among men,' being actually interested in the atonement of Christ; and they were consecrated to God 'as first-fruits,' (for whose sake He spared others,) and to the Lamb, 'as purified unto Him, to be his peculiar people, zealous of good works.' (Notes, Tit. 2:14.) They were not hypocrites, but upright in their repentance, faith, and love. 'By these 144,000, I understand peculiarly the depressed church in the wilderness, previous to the time of the Reformation; for history sufficiently demonstrates, that there have been, in every age, some faithful worshippers, who consented not to the general apostasy, but who prophesied, although in sackcloth, against its abominations.' Faber.—They who object to this, saying, that the church was then in a depressed state, but here exulting and triumphing with joyful praises, seem to forget the Christian's motto, 'sorrowful, but always rejoicing.' 'We glory in tribulations also,' &c. (Notes, Is. 24:13—15. Rom. 5:3—5. 8:32—39.)—Zion [shone,] as indeed a conspicuous place in the church; but not like the celebrated cities of Greece and Rome. It is very obscure, and little noticed in profane history. SCOTT.

(3.) Bl. rejects 'as it were.'

(5.) Bl. rejects 'before the throne of God.'

V. 6, 7. It is generally admitted, by the best interpreters, that the three angels, introduced in these and the following vs. were emblematical heralds of the progressive reformation from popery. Some explain the proclamation of the 1st angel, of the 9th, 10th, or 11th centuries; and no doubt there were, even then, princes, and bishops, and councils, who struggled against the worship of images, and the other grosser abominations of the church of Rome. Yet they generally concurred in supporting the dominion of the beast; though they were earnest that it should be exercised in a different manner as to some particulars. Such, however, as were real Christians, and entered a proper protest against the prevailing corruptions of the church, whether in the imperial palace, or in the conclave, (if that was ever done,) may properly be ranked in the number mentioned in the preceding vs.; for these evidently relate to a later and more public and general protestation. Others, however, seem to fix the time of their accomplishment too late; and so leave a large vacant space in the series of predicted events; and then crowd too many into the remaining periods. We may, therefore, I apprehend, interpret this 'first angel,' messenger, or herald, to be an emblem of those who first publicly erected the standard of reformation, and who contended for 'the everlasting Gospel' of Christ, in opposition to all the innovations and usurpations of the beast, his image, and the false prophet. This honor seems to belong to the Waldenses and Albigenses, who had the true Gospel among them; avowed its everlasting obligation and excellency; opposed it to the authority of popes, councils, and persecuting princes; declared the pope to be antichrist; and propagated their doctrines with zeal and success, and multiplied into a vast number of churches. And, after immense slaughter had been made of them by persecutions and bloody wars, the residue still retained their tenets, and,

7 Saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters.

8 And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication.

q Is. 21:9. Je. 51:7, 8. c. 18:2,3.

idolatry creeps into the churches of God, it is by the preaching of the Gospel, attended by the power of the Holy Spirit, that men are turned from idols to serve the living God, as the Creator of the heaven and the earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters, v. 7. To worship any God beside Him who created the world, is idolatry.

2. The second angel follows the other, and proclaims the actual fall of Babylon. The preaching of the everlasting Gospel had shaken the foundations of antichristianism in the world, and hastened its downfall. By Babylon is generally understood Rome, which was before called Sodom and Egypt, for wickedness and cruelty; and is now first called Babylon, for her pride and idolatry. Her crimes are recited as the just cause of her destruction.

3. A third angel follows the other two, and gives warning to all of that divine vengeance which would overtake all those that obstinately adhered to the antichristian interest, after God had thus proclaimed its downfall, v. 9, 10. If after this, any should persist in their idolatry, professing subjection to the beast, and promoting his cause, they must expect to drink deep of the wine of the wrath of God; they shall be for ever miserable in soul and body; Jesus Christ shall inflict this punishment on them, and the holy angels shall behold it, and approve of it. Idolatry, both pagan and papist, is a damning sin in its own nature, and will prove fatal to those who persist in it, after fair warning given by the word of Providence; they who refuse to come out of Babylon, when thus called, and resolve to partake of her sins, must receive of her plagues; and the guilt and ruin of such incorrigible idolaters will serve to set forth the excellency of the patience and obedience of the saints; these graces shall be rewarded with salvation and glory; when the treachery and rebellion of others shall be punished with ev-

being dispersed into other countries, they rapidly carried 'the everlasting Gospel' with them; as an angel, a messenger of peace to men, flying through the midst of heaven; so that the Lollards in England, and the Bohemians in Bohemia, and the adjacent regions, and many others in different places, seem to have principally learned the Gospel from them; nay, the Reformation itself appears to have sprung from the seed which they sowed, and watered with rivers of their blood. So exact was the prophecy, that they had 'the everlasting Gospel to preach to the inhabitants of the earth!' (Note, 11:3-6.) They also loudly called on men to fear and glorify God, as the hour of his judgment was at hand; and to worship the Creator of all things, as revealed in the Gospel, by refusing to join the worship of idols, and that of the beast and his image. (Notes, 19:9, 10. Acts 14:11-18. 17:22-29.)—Some respectable commentators explain these vs. of Luther, almost exclusively; and suppose, that many things, in his situation, character, and testimony, remarkably answered to it. I cannot, however, think, that the previous public testimonies against the beast are wholly passed over, or that an individual, however illustrious, occupies so conspicuous a station in this concise prophecy. But I am much farther from being convinced, that more modern events, or the present zeal for missions, is meant; because the testimony of the angel, or messenger, was evidently borne against popery, not heathen idolatry; and the worship of saints and angels, and of images of God, is as real idolatry, as that of the pagans.—It is objected, that the reformers did not 'preach to every nation, kindred, and tongue;' and it may be answered, that neither did the apostles, in the strict, literal import of the words; (Col. 1:6, 23.) nor have any others to this day. But it was the doctrine and desire of the reformers, that the Gospel should be preached throughout the earth.—The angel 'had the everlasting Gospel.' This is, by Mr. Cuninghame, supposed to be the book containing the Gospel, and he seems principally to explain it of the British and Foreign Bible Society.—Far be it from me to withhold or deduct from the honor justly due to that Society; when, by the astonishing success of atheists and infidels, 'the enemy came in like a flood,' 'the Spirit of God has' surprisingly 'lifted up a standard against him;' and the Bible Society has been honored, in this, as in no small degree THE STANDARD-BEARER. But we must not interpret prophecy by our partialities, or even most legitimate affectations; and the order of events, in the whole arrangement of the prophecy, requires a far different interpretation.

SCOTT.

(6.) 'What an interesting scene is opening upon earth! It is more than 30 years (1826) since Christians in Great Britain awoke, and that little island now bestows more than a million of dollars upon strangers. It is 14 years since New England broke her slumbers, and now the mass of her (Christian) population, seems drenched in the missionary spirit. I saw the day cover the plains of Europe. I saw the westward traveling light, spread itself over the eastern states. Nine years ago, I saw the rays of morning tip the Presbyterian horizon. I saw the dawn blush deeper and deeper. Already the influence of heaven has dropped upon the wilderness, and changed the war-whoop to notes of praise. Many prophets and kings desired to see this day. One spirit has seized the Christian world, to send the Gospel to all the nations. Missionary and Bible Societies have risen so rapidly, that, in contemplating them, we are "like them that dream." They have accomplished wonders. On the burning sands of Africa, where Christian feet never trod, there is the holy band of missionaries, struggling amidst dangers and death, to lead the sable sons of Ethiopia to stretch out their hands to God. On the plains of Hindostan, a consecrated host are translating the SS. into more than 30 different languages. On the borders of China, they have produced a version, which will give the oracles of God to one quarter of the population of the globe. In the southern islands, a nation is born in a day. From the hill of Zion,—from the top of Calvary,—they are freighted every caravan of pilgrims with Bibles, for all the countries of the east. Certainly the angel has begun his flight.'

GRIFFIN.

The circumstances attending the production of the specimen of Japanese writing (from the farthest verge of the earth), given on the colored page, opposite, deserve commemoration, and will be regarded as appropriate to the missionary text, we are now considering. When about two days' sail from Jeddo, Dr. Parker, a beloved Missionary, who recently accompanied Mr. Gutzlaff and his seven Japanese pupils on their benevolent, but perilous and abortive errand to that capital, addressed a letter to the Ed. He stated that, having mentioned to Mr. G. the fact, that a female association existed in Boston, formed for the purpose of seeking the conversion of Japan to Christ, he proposed giving the information to their Japanese fellow-passengers. It was done, and produced the annexed letter, with their signatures. The letter is written in the Herakana alphabet. The signatures have, besides, the explanation in the Katkana. As the translation given is perfectly literal, the meaning is also given in ordinary English. No friend of God, and of man, can read this Macedonian call without emotion, nor, it is hoped, without some renewed excitement and exertion in behalf of evangelical missions. God grant, that its design and object be speedily answered, in the opening of Japan to the Gospel of Christ!

Mr. Gutzlaff, as is well known, had translated into Japanese, by the aid of these men, and caused to be printed, the Gospel of John; a copy of which is in the hands of the Ed.

(6, 7.) See E. Smith's Key, &c. pp. 247—254. 'The progress of the Reformation seems here prefigured.' Woodh.—'Especially that most desirable part yet to come;' when the missionary spirit, which has so long slumbered among protestants, shall be aroused in every church, and every individual. And, thanks be to God! it is now waking up,—the angel is now on the wings of every wind, and many a ship is bearing angels, messengers, or missionaries, to 'kindreds, and tongues, and peoples;' and into many a language is the Gospel translated, and many a press is scattering its precious seed. 'May every ship that leaves the crowded ports of Christendom, bear these messengers, and this message, to the two thirds of our race yet in heathen darkness! See Rev. Dr. Cogswell's 'Harbinger of the Millennium.'

V. 9. If we explain the first angel, as the herald of the dawning of the Reformation, in the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries, we may properly explain this of the Bohemians and others in the 15th, who were their genuine offspring and successors. Some of these persons, with still greater confidence and vehemence, than the Albigenses, declared Rome to be mystical Babylon, and the pope and church there to be antichrist; and they endured severe persecutions for these protestations, and for their profession of the Gospel. John Huss and Jerom of Prague, especially, were perfidiously and cruelly burned by the council of Constance; which council was, in fact, the united power of the whole antichristian host. These heralds announced the fall of mystical Babylon, as the ancient prophets had done that of literal Babylon, long before the event. (Notes, Is. 21:6—9. Jer. 50:2, 3. 51:7—9.) Neither was this doom more certain, than it would be just; as she had corrupted and intoxicated the nations, not only with her love-potions, as a seducing harlot, but by the wine of the wrath of her fornications, terrifying men into idolatry by fierce persecutions. (Notes, 17:1—6. Jer. 25:15—26. 51:7.) As Rome was mentioned under the name and emblem of a Gentile city, so her idolatry was called fornication rather than adultery; as it generally is in Scripture, when committed by the professed worshippers of God. (17:2.)—Bp. Newton explains this v. of the Waldenses, and the foregoing vs. of more ancient events; on the contrary, Mr. Faber interprets those vs. of Luther, and this of Calvin and his associates. This, however, seems to me, to render individuals far too prominent in so concise a prophecy. Nor should I have mentioned the names of John Huss and Jerom of Prague, except as they were the mouth, or voice, of a very large body of men, delivering its testimony in the most public manner conceivable, and sealing it by martyrdom.—Still, I observe, that the grand outlines are clear: and commentators in general are agreed about them; so that the subordinate differences of opinion do not affect the main argument.—Some, indeed, would explain this v. of future times, because Babylon is not yet totally fallen; but this deranges the whole plan of interpretation, adopted by the ablest expositors, which is the only clue that can lead us through its mazes; and this would introduce perplexity and uncertainty. Nothing is more common, in prophecies, than for future events, as absolutely determined, to be spoken of in the present or past time; and the same words were spoken of literal Babylon, long before her destruction. (Marg. Ref. h.)—The clue that has principally conducted me through both parts of the Revelation, is following the series of history, and the successive order of events. After the description of the two beasts, secular and ecclesiastical, whose power was established, according to my hypothesis, in the 8th century, but, according to most commentators, much sooner; there would be a very large chasm, without the prediction of any memorable event, if these prophecies relate to the time immediately preceding the fall of antichrist, and the millennium.—What a long interval would there be without erlasting destruction, then it will be said, to the honor of the faithful, (v. 12.) Here is the patience of the saints; you have before seen their patience exercised, now you see it rewarded.

V. 13—20. Here we have the vision of the harvest and vintage, introduced with a solemn preface.

1. What it principally intended, is, to show the blessedness of all the faithful saints and servants of God, both in death and after death; Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth, &c. Here observe, The description of those that are, and shall be, blessed; such as die in the Lord, either die in the cause of Christ, or rather die in a state of vital union with Christ, such as are found in Christ when death comes. The demonstration of this blessedness is,—they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them. They are blessed in their rest, they rest from all sin, temptation, sorrow, and persecution. They are blessed in their recompense, their works do not go before them, as their title, or purchase, but they follow them, as their evidence of having lived and died in the Lord; and the memory of them will be pleasant. They are happy in the time of their dying; they have lived to see the cause of God reviving, the peace of the church returning, and the wrath of God falling on their idolatrous, cruel enemies; such times are good times to die in; they have Simeon's desire. And all this is ratified and confirmed by the testimony of the Spirit witnessing with their spirits, and with the written Word.

II. The vision itself,—a harvest and a vintage.

1. A harvest, v. 14, 15, an emblem that sometimes signifies the cutting down of the wicked, when ripe for ruin, by the judg-any prophecy; and how thick would the events follow afterwards! For all the particulars . . . to the end of ch. 19: must be fulfilled before the millennium.' Bp. Newton.—It is also worthy of notice, that about the era above mentioned, the opinion began to be publicly avowed, by several persons, that the church, court, and city of Rome, were Babylon, and so inevitably doomed to destruction.

(8.) BL marks 'the city,' and 'of the wrath,' as doubtful. Ep.

V. 9—11. This third angel, and his proclamation 'with a loud voice,' may be explained of Luther, and his loud, rough, and vehement protestation against the idolatries of the church and bishop of Rome, and that whole antichristian fabric; yet we must also take in all his coadjutors and successors, and all the effects of this combined and persevering protestation, to this day, and even beyond it. His voice, with that of those who were raised up in divers countries to join him, and to follow up the assault, was indeed very 'loud.' They attacked the beast with far more vehemence, than any who went before had done. They not only declared him to be antichrist; but they carried their researches into the idolatries, iniquities, and impostures of the whole papal system, and showed that it was utterly incompatible with the religion of the Scriptures, and founded in ignorance, usurpation, avarice, and hypocrisy; and they insisted strongly on the necessity of separating from so corrupt a church; holdly retorting the charge of heresy and schism, which the popish party brought against them, and fully proving it against their opponents. Thus they induced whole nations to cast off all regard to the church of Rome, and engaged vast multitudes to protest against popery, as a damnable religion, not only in the persecuting tyrants who imposed it, but in all who, even from dread of persecution, or from more corrupt motives, conformed to it; and this was exactly the purport of the third angel's proclamation. They loudly insisted on it, that all who adhered, with a blind and devoted attachment, to the beast and his image; (Notes, 13:11—17.) professing their abominable doctrines, conforming to their idolatries, and impostures of the whole papal system, and reducing their principles to practice, (being intoxicated with 'the wine of the wrath of her fornications,') would drink of the unmingled wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation. (Notes, 16:17—21. Ps. 75:8. Is. 51:17—20. Jer. 25:15—17.) Yea, that they would be tormented with fire and brimstone, or be cast into hell, to be tormented in that flame; that this would be 'in the presence of the holy angels,' who would applaud the justice of their punishment; 'and in the presence of the Lamb,' who would pronounce and execute the sentence on them, for their opposition to his Gospel, and for giving his mediatorial glory to saints and angels; and 'that the smoke of their torment would ascend up for ever and ever.' The words tr. 'for ever and ever,' are the most energetic which are found in the whole Greek language, to signify eternity, and seem incapable of any other meaning. (Note, 7:9—12.) The passage, therefore, evidently predicts the clear and strong manner, in which these reformers would protest and argue against purgatory; and insist on it, that the wicked will be 'tormented in hell for ever;' and a subsequent v. evidently opposes the same doctrine, by showing the immediate happiness of believers after death, (Note, 12, 13.)—Every one, who is at all conversant with the writings of the reformers and their successors, knows that they generally declared, without hesitation, that popery was a damnable religion. Mr. Hooper, in Queen Elizabeth's time, brought himself into suspicion, and was engaged in a controversy, because he asserted, with much caution, and many distinctions, that papists might be saved; and, whatever contempt may be cast on their bigotry, in this day of false candor, liberality, and disregard to the Scriptures, it is worthy of serious consideration, whether this passage do not warrant by far the greatest part of what these reformers advanced on that subject; though they might not always exactly distinguish between those 'who hated the light,' and those whose eyes were too weak to endure its effulgence, when it broke in on them all at once.—To explain this most energetic passage, (which beyond doubt predicts a general and most awful protestation against the leading tenets of popery as damnable, in all who embrace and adhere to them, as well as in the inventors and imposers of them,) to signify any testimony, or protest made in a single kingdom, as for instance in England, seems to me a total departure from the grand scale, on which these prophecies should be interpreted; and as in all respects inadmissible. Nor can any temporal judgments on collective bodies, be the fulfilment of the awful denunciation, which evidently relates to individuals, and to each individual who is guilty; and if words can convey the idea of eternal punishment, it is here denounced. (Marg. Ref. p.—t.—Notes. 19:17—21. 20:7—10, 11—15. Mat. 25:41—46.)—It may also be very well worth inquiring, whether there be not some remains of the papal superstition and corruption, even in protestant churches? And how far they, whose grand object it seems to be, to contend most, and most vehemently, not to say virulently, for that which admits of the least scriptural proof, or no scriptural proof, keep at a proper distance from this tremendous warning.

(10.) 'A third angel proclaims just and eternal vengeance upon those who "worship the beast;" who, knowing their duty and allegiance to God, sacrifice them to their worldly views and interests. The wine which is at first strong of itself, unmingled, (akraton;) has no diluting liquor put to it to reduce its strength, as was common in the eastern nations of antiquity. But, 2dly, it is kekermasmenon, rendered still stronger by the mixture of powerful intoxicating ingredients; as Is. 51:17—23. Ps. 75:8, &c.'

V. 12. BL rejects 'here are,' also 'unto me,' v. 13.

V. 13. This v. has much perplexed many commentators, in respect of its prophetic meaning and connexion: but, on the plan we are now pursuing, nothing can be more obvious. The doctrine of purgatory, with indulgences, human merits to be sold by the church, masses, and prayers for the dead; was one principle source of wealth, influence, and authority to the clergy of the church of Rome. This also first stirred up the spirit of Luther, who began his attack by protesting against these atrocious practices: and, by examining the Scriptures, he and his followers established it as a certain truth, in the judgment of immense multitudes, that there was no such place as purgatory; but that the wicked, when they die, go directly to hell, and believers immediately enter heaven. Now what words could more aptly predict this change in the sentiments of a large proportion of professed Christians, than these do? It is evident, from the internal chronology of the book, and from the series of predicted events, that the Reformation was here intended; and the apostle was ordered to write, just in this place, (probably he knew not on what account,) 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth:' i. e. from this period believers will generally understand that enouraging truth; and not have to encounter the fears of purgatory, or to apprehend a delay of their felicity, when seized with the agonies of death, or called to suffer martyrdom for Christ's sake. Indeed, it is an undeniable fact, that the expectation of immediate happiness, was the joy and support of those numbers, who were burned alive, or otherwise cruelly martyred, during those times.—This 'voice from heaven' was attested by an internal suggestion of the Holy Spirit, who assured the apostle, that believers rested after death from all their labors and sufferings, and consequently could have no purgatory to fear; and that their works followed them, to prove the sincerity of their faith, and to ensure a gracious reward. (Notes, Mat. 25:34—40. Rom. 2:7—11. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Marg. Ref. f.—13) Rest ] 11. Note, Heb. 4:3—11.—To explain this of any state of the church on earth, is doing the greatest violence imaginable to the words of the apostle.—'Dying in the Lord,' and being immediately happy, must refer to individuals, and to another world. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—8. Phil. 1:21—26.)

V. 14—20. Thus far we have generally proceeded, by the guidance of past events, and considerable satisfaction seems to have been obtained in explaining these prophecies; but here, I apprehend, that direction almost wholly fails us. This supposition is confirmed by the evident inability of expositors to make any regular and consistent application of the subsequent chs., except as coincident with those things which have been already considered. Under this persuasion, of which further reasons will be afterwards assigned, I shall not obtrude mere conjectures on the reader, nor attempt to pry into 'things not seen as yet.' Hitherto, in general, the ground has seemed good, and the road in a measure plain; and I have felt some confidence, as well as used caution, in the progress: but caution must be almost my only companion and monitor in what now remains: for the country is unknown, and no

16 And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped.

17 And another angel came out of the temple which is in heaven, he also having a sharp sickle.

18 And another angel came out from the altar, which had power over fire: and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, <sup>c</sup>Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe.

19 And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast it into the great wine-press <sup>d</sup> of the wrath of God.

PRACT. OBS. The Lord reserves a remnant to Himself in the worst of times, who dissent from the prevailing idolatries and abominations; who profess his truth and bear his image; who sing the praises of redeeming grace, in strains which none else can learn.—May it be our prayer, our endeavor, yea, our ambition, to be found in this honorable company! If we have a good hope, that we are thus distinguished; we ought to do everything in our power, as well as beseech the Lord continually, that faithful ministers, like beneficent angels, 'flying through the midst of heaven,' may carry 'the everlasting Gospel,' and preach it to 'all people, nations, and languages;' that so sinners may fear and glorify God; and turn from all their idols and iniquities, to worship the guide is to be found, who understands anything with certainty concerning the road. The exact and surprising fulfilment of many and complicated predictions, through the course of about 1700 years, has been shown; which is a real demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures; but we must bequeath to posterity the satisfaction of understanding, and being filled with adoring wonder at witnessing the accomplishment of the remainder. The prophecy has been evidently traced down to the Reformation; and this may include all, which has intervened to this day, or shall intervene, till 'the slaying of the witnesses,' and their resurrection; if these events be, as I firmly believe, yet future. (Notes, 11:7—14.) Whether the events here predicted precede or follow the sounding of the 7th trumpet, or the 3d woe-trumpet, I cannot absolutely determine; but they seem evidently to relate to the fall of popery; and perhaps give a succinct intimation of what is more fully predicted in the next and following chs. (Notes, 16:—19:—) The preceding judgments and transactions not having produced a voluntary and effectual reformation in the kingdom of the beast; the iniquity of the nations of which it is constituted is filled up, and they become ripe for judgments. (Notes, Gen. 15:16. Zech. 5:5—11. Mat. 23:29—39. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) These judgments are emblematically described as a harvest and a vintage: and, as the latter succeeds to the former in the course of nature, so it is subsequent to it in the prophecy, and will be by far the most terrible. (Note, Joel 3:9—17.)—Christ appeared to the apostle in vision, 'like unto the Son of Man,' in human nature; on 'a white cloud,' the emblem of his holy, righteous, and mysterious dispensations; his 'golden crown' signifies his supereminent authority, and 'his sharp sickle' his terrible vengeance on his enemies. 'The angel out of the temple' may signify the ministers of the Gospel, as employed to announce the approach of these judgments: and 'the second angel coming out of the temple,' to reap the vintage, may represent some executioner, or succession of executioners, of the wrath of Christ on the opposers of his authority: while the third angel from the altar, who had power over fire, giving orders to the second angel to reap the vintage, implies, that these judgments would constitute a sacrifice to divine justice, and consume, as with fire, those who had despised or perverted the atoning sacrifice of Christ. (Notes, 8:1—6. Ez. 9:1—7.) The 'casting of the vintage into the wine-press of God's wrath,' and the 'treading of it without the city,' (as being no part of the true church,) can only be explained by the event. (Note, 11:1, 2.) But it is remarkable, that 1600 furlongs, or 200 miles, is exactly the length of the papal dominions in Italy; and probably these will be deluged with blood, in a most awful manner, which is represented by language tremendously hyperbolical. (Notes, Is. 34: 6:3:1—6. Jer. 51:33. Mat. 13:36—43.)—Some expositors, who have written since this interpretation was first made, (A. D. 1791,) decide with confidence, that the bloody scenes, lately exhibited in France and on the Continent, are the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning 'the harvest;' though the vintage may be yet future; nor do I at all doubt, posterity will clearly see, that these events began to accomplish the prediction. I cannot however think, either that at so early a stage we are capable of determining on the subject; or that a more general and almost universal display of divine vengeance, on all en angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath <sup>a</sup> of God.

2 And I saw as it were a sea <sup>b</sup> of glass mingled with <sup>c</sup> fire; and them that had gotten the victory over <sup>d</sup> the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps <sup>e</sup> of God.

ments of God; and sometimes the gathering in of the righteous, when ripe for heaven, by the mercy of God. This seems rather to represent God's judgments against the wicked.

2. A vintage, v. 17. Some think these two are only different emblems of the same judgment; others, that they refer to distinct events of Providence before the end of all things. But here we are left to doubtful conjectures; perhaps this great event has not yet had its accomplishment, but the vision is for an appointed time; and, therefore, though it may seem to tarry, we are to wait for it.

CHAP. XV. Hitherto, according to the judgment of very eminent expositors, God had represented to his servant John the state of the church under the pagan powers, in the six seals opened; its state under the papal powers, in the vision of the six trumpets that began to sound on the opening of the seventh seal; then a more general and brief account of its past, present, and future state, in the little book, &c. Now He proceeds to show him how antichrist should be destroyed, in the vision of the seven vials.

This ch. contains an awful introduction or preparation for the pouring out of the vials; in which we have, 1. A sight of those angels in heaven, who were to have the execution of this great work, and with what acclamations of joy the heavenly hosts applauded the great design, v. 1—5. 2. A sight of these angels coming out of heaven, to receive those vials which they were to pour out, and the great commotions that this caused in the world, v. 5. &c.

V. 1—4. The work they had to do was, to finish the destruction of antichrist. The spectators and witnesses of this their commission were,—all that had gotten the victory over the beast, &c. The sea of glass represents this world, as some think, a brittle thing, that shall be broken to pieces; or, as others, the gospel-covenant, alluding to the brazen sea in the temple, in which the priests were to wash; or, as others, the Red Sea, that stood, as it were congealed, while the Israelites went through; and the pillar of fire reflecting light on the waters, they would seem to have fire mingled with them; and this to show, that the fire of God's wrath against Pharaoh and his horses should dissolve the congealed waters, and destroy great Creator, and to wait for his Son from heaven, who shall speedily come to be our Judge. These events faith anticipates, as if they were already accomplished. The modern quietus of a purgatory, after the day of judgment, is as destitute of scriptural foundation, as the purgatory before that awful season, which is maintained by the church of Rome; and they who die in their sins, will too late find, that the punishment of hell will endure 'for ever and ever.' 'Here then is the patience of the saints,' to venture or suffer anything, in 'obeying the commandments of God,' and professing 'the faith of Jesus;' may God bestow this patience on us, that we may be ready, should times of persecution overtake us!

the kingdoms of the beast, (those perhaps excepted, but those only, who have fallen and decidedly cast off its dominion,) is intended by the harvest; as well as still more tremendous scenes by 'the vintage.' 19:17—21. Ps. 149:7—9. Ez. 39:1—20. Mic. 7:14—17. SCOTT.

(18.) 'The symbolical reaping of the harvest, appears to signify the gathering together the elect: see Mat. 24:31. The action of reaping is, in the gospels, more than once used as a symbol of the gathering in of Christ's elect, but not of the execution of Divine judgments, while the vintage everywhere in the prophetic writings is used as a symbol of the wrath of God.—Cuninghame. Herein he takes this view with Sir I. Newton and Horsley. Pareus says, the harvest shall not only gather the wheat out of the Lord's field into the garner, but also burn the tares that are gathered. But the vintage shall cast and tread all the grapes in the lake of God's wrath. Therefore, by the vintage, the punishment of the wicked seems only to be represented.—The bare reaping of the corn, which is a good fruit, seems to denote no more than the separation of it from the earth.—Daubuz. / So Gill.' HENRY, abr.

NOTES. CHAP. XV. V. 1—4. This ch. introduces the 7 vials, all of which fall under the 7th trumpet, as the 7 trumpets were included under the 7th seal: for they contain 'the 7 last plagues,' in which the wrath of God is filled up, or accomplished, on the persecuting idolatrous power, assuming, and disgracing, beyond expression, the sacred name of CHRISTIAN. These plagues must, therefore, be coincident with the last woe-trumpet, in great measure at least. (Note, 11:15—18.) The 2d part of this prophecy, has been traced from the latter years of the 6th trumpet, to the Reformation, nay, to the present era; and, to go back into former ages, to find out events which may answer to the subsequent predictions, deranges the whole plan of the book, and reduces the interpretation to ambiguity and uncertainty. Our key has hitherto opened the most intricate wards of these predictions, without violence; i. e. as far as to the latter part of the 8th trumpet: but no writer, as it appears to me, has yet (A. D. 1815) succeeded in what follows. For the commencement of it is, according to my view, precisely the time in which we live; as appears from a due consideration of the 1260 years of the reign of the beast.—Different computations, indeed, have been made of the period, when these years will end: yet none seem to have proved that they will terminate more early than A. D. 1840: while many think they will not end till A. D. 2000. But, whether sooner or later, it seems probable, that the time is not arrived: and, therefore, that 'the pouring out of the vials' has not yet begun.—Some indeed, of late, have fixed the beginning of this period (the 1260 days) to A. D. 533; when the emperor Justinian issued certain edicts, acknowledging and supporting the pope, or the bishop of Rome, head of the whole church: and thus they compute, that they terminated A. D. 1792, the era of the French revolution.—If they be correct, of which I presume not to judge, then the pouring out of the vials has indeed begun: but they, who shall live at the latter end of this century, or the beginning of the next, will, I have little doubt, know, that it has but just begun.—The apostle had mentioned great woes, which would come under the 3 last trumpets: 12:13. 13:7. 14:19, 20. yet when the 7th trumpet was sounded, he mentioned, almost exclusively, the happy effects of it, to

3 And they sing the song of Moses 'the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints.

4 Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest.

5 And after that I looked, and behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened:

6 And the seven angels came out of the temple, having the seven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breasts girded with golden girdles.

7 And one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials, full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever.

8 And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.

them thereby; to which there seems to be an allusion, by their singing the song of Moses; in which they extol the greatness of God's works, and the justice and truth of his ways, both in delivering his people, and destroying their enemies; while they call on all nations to render unto God the fear, glory, and worship, which were due to such a discovery of his truth and justice, v. 4. Who shall not fear Thee?

V. 5-8. Here we have a sight of these angels coming out of heaven to execute their commission, v. 5. Allusion is had to the holiest of all, in the tabernacle and temple, where was the mercy-seat, covering the ark of the testimony, where the high priest made intercession, and God communed with his people, and heard their prayers. By this we may understand how, in the judgments God was now about to execute on the antichristian interest, He was fulfilling the prophecies and promises of his Word and covenant, which was there always before Him, and of which He was ever mindful; that in this work He was answering the prayers of the people, which were offered to Him by their great High Priest; that He was herein avenging the quarrel of his own Son, and our Savior, Jesus Christ, whose offices and authority had been usurped, his name dishonored, and the great designs of his death opposed, by antichrist and his adherents; and, finally, that He was opening a wider door of liberty for his people to worship Him in numerous, solemn assemblies, without the fear of their enemies. Observe,

1. How they are equipped and prepared for their work; they were clothed with pure and white linen, and had their breasts girded with golden girdles, v. 6. This was the habit of the high priests when they went in to inquire of God, and came out with an answer from Him; this showed that these angels were acting in all things under the divine appointment and direction, and that they were going to prepare a sacrifice to the Lord, called the supper of the great God, ch. 19:17. Their artillery, by which they were to do this great execution, was seven vials filled with the wrath of God; the meanest creature, but much more an angel, when armed with the anger of God, will be too hard for any man in the world. This wrath of God was not to be poured out all at once, but was divided into seven parts, which should successively fall on the antichristian party. Now from whence did the angels receive these vials? From one of the four living creatures, one of the ministers of the true church, i. e. in answer to the prayers of the ministers and people of God, and to avenge their cause, in which the angels are willingly employed.

2. The impressions these things made on all who stood near the temple; all were, as it were, wrapped up in clouds of smoke, which filled the temple, from the glorious and powerful presence of God; so that no man was able to enter into the temple, till the work was finished. The interests of antichrist were so interwoven with the civil interests of the nations, that he could not be destroyed without giving a great shock to all the world; and the people of God would have but little rest and leisure to assemble themselves before Him, while this great work was doing; for the present, their sabbaths would be interrupted, ordinances of public worship intermitted, and all thrown into a general confusion. God Himself was now preaching to the church, and to all the world, by terrible things in righteousness; but when this work was done, then the churches would have rest, the temple would be opened and the solemn assemblies gathered, edified, and multiplied. The greatest deliverances of the church are brought about by awful and astonishing steps of Providence.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1-7. We had, in the foregoing ch., great and solemn preparation made for the pouring out of the vials on antichristianism; now, we have the performance of that work. Where, observe,

I. That though everything was made ready before, yet nothing was to be put in execution without an immediate, positive order from God; and this He gave out of the temple, answering the prayers of his people, and avenging their quarrel.

PRACT. OBS. The fuller knowledge we acquire concerning the wonderful works of God, the more zealously we shall celebrate his infinite greatness and excellency, as 'the Lord God Almighty,' the Creator and Ruler of all worlds: but his title of Emmanuel, the 'King of saints,' will peculiarly endear Him to us. May 'all nations,' therefore, 'come and worship before Him,' and accept of his salvation! This prayer will be answered, when his tabernacle shall be opened, the executioners of his vengeance on obstinate rebels shall have executed their commission, and the seven vials have been poured out. In the mean time, let us adore his justice and truth, and not dare to object to his deep designs: for when we shall witness the completion of the whole, we shall see Him perfectly glorious both in mercy and in judgment. SCOTT.

the end of time, without speaking particularly about the woes. (Note, 11:15-18.) But here he resumes that subject, and prophetically shows what woes would follow the sounding of that trumpet. Nothing is more important, in explaining prophecies, than to determine, as far as we can, which events are past, and which are to come: under this conviction, I must proceed to consider what follows, in general, as in futurity; and shall, therefore, not detail any of the interpretations, or conjectures, which have been made of them, with relation to past events; because I cannot myself find any satisfaction from them.—The 'sea of glass, mingled with fire,' (Note, 4:6-8.) is very differently explained: but, as the persons referred to, stood upon it, we cannot so well understand it of the Fountain, in which they had washed away their sins. Perhaps it was emblematical of the tempestuous times, during which believers then lived; the slippery and fragile nature of their standing, considered in itself, and the fiery trials which they endured. Some think that epi (tr. on) may be tr. at: and that being 'mingled with fire,' denotes the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Mat. 3:11, 12. Sc.

(2.) 'This glassy sea has been already displayed as standing before the throne of God, (4:6.) where it was seen to represent the purifying blood of the Redeemer; the price of human redemption, in which alone the vestments can be washed white; by which alone the Christian can be presented pure before God. But the Redeemer has two characters, conformably to his offices on earth; the one of meekness, in which He came to suffer; the other, of exaltation, in which He returns to reign, and to pour out vengeance on his enemies. We are now arrived at that point of the prophetic history, in which his vengeance begins to be poured out. We therefore see the glassy sea mingled with fire; its waves flashing flame; symbolically expressive of anger and vengeance.' Woodh. Bl. marks 'over his mark,' as doubtful; and, with Scholefield, tr. by the sea. Ed.

V. 5-8. (Note, 11:19.) The appearance of glory above the mercy-seat in the most holy place, 'the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven,' was an emblem of the appearance of God in heaven as reconciled to sinners, through Jesus Christ. 'The 7 angels,' coming forth thence, showed, that these judgments would be executed on the enemies of the church, in mercy to the people of God; while the white clothing and golden girdles, worn by these ministers of vengeance, represented their holiness, and the righteousness and excellency of these awful dispensations. 'The living creature,' I of the 4, an emblem of the gospel-ministry, (Note, 4:6-8.) giving the vials to the angels, implied, that the preaching of the truth would be instrumental in bringing the judgments, which were written, upon antichristian opposers: and the temple being filled with smoke, showed the darkness of those dispensations, and the horror, which would envelope the enemies of God, whilst these plagues were executing. (Notes, Ex. 40:34, 35. Lev. 3:22-24. 1 K. 8:10-14. 2 Chr. 5:12-14.)—It is also highly probable, that the same judgments, by which the antichristian power, and other enemies of the church, shall be destroyed, will be employed to purify even the less corrupt parts of it: and in proportion to the degree in which unscriptural usages are contended for and imposed, or scriptural truths and duties are neglected, even professed protestant churches will drink of the cup. (Notes, Is. 59:1-2.) 'God will purify his church by such signal judgments, as shall arouse the attention of the whole world.' Bp. Horsley. So that the happy estate of the true church, as perhaps implied by 'entering into the temple,' will not commence, till, by the same awful dispensations, obstinate enemies shall be destroyed; and lukewarm, superstitious, or formal Christians, shall be purified. Thus whatever is antiscritptural or unscriptural in every company being purged away, the whole, brought to purity, unity, and spirituality, in worship, discipline, doctrine, and practice, shall be firmly established. Zeph. 3:9-17. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The angels were next ordered, by a voice from the temple, to pour out the contents of 'the vials,' censers, or cups, which they had received; and which were emblems of 'the wrath of God' to be poured out on the antichristian empire, and on all who adhered to it; and, indeed, on all the opposers of pure Christianity.—As the first 4 trumpets were so many stages in the destruction of the eastern empire, and the 5th and 6th showed the extinction of the eastern western empire, and the 7th showed the gradual desolation of the Roman church, empire: so these vials mark the gradual desolation of the Roman church, and the antichristian tyranny of the kingdoms which support it: the one being the pagan, idolatrous persecuting power; the other, the papal, idolatrous persecuting power, the beast to whom the dragon had given his seat and empire. (Note, 13:2-4.) This circumstance occasions a similarity of some of the vials to the trumpets. Whether 'the noisome and grievous sore,' produced by the pouring out of the first vial, is to be understood literally, with respect to terrible pestilences, or in a figurative meaning, the event must determine. But the plague will be peculiar to the avowed and devoted adherents of the beast and his image; which

2 And the first went, and poured out his vial upon the <sup>b</sup> earth; and there fell a noisome and grievous <sup>c</sup> sore upon the men which had the mark <sup>d</sup> of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

3 And the second angel poured out his vial upon the <sup>e</sup> sea; and it became as the blood <sup>f</sup> of a dead man: and every living soul died in the sea.

4 And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of <sup>g</sup> waters; and they became blood.

5 And I heard the angel of the waters say, Thou art <sup>h</sup> righteous, O Lord, which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus.

6 For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and <sup>i</sup> thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God Almighty, <sup>j</sup> true and righteous are thy judgments.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial upon the <sup>k</sup> sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with <sup>l</sup> fire.

9 And men were <sup>m</sup> scorched with great heat, and blasphemed <sup>n</sup> the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: and <sup>o</sup> they repented not, to give him glory.

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat <sup>p</sup> of the beast; and his kingdom was full of <sup>q</sup> darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain, seems to be intended of the others, though not so expressly mentioned. (M. R.)—Mr. Faber, without hesitation, interprets this plague, of the atheistical spirit, which has long secretly pervaded the nations, adhering to the Roman church; and which broke out so extensively and fatally about the time of the French revolution. I am by no means disposed to argue against this interpretation: yet I am not able to adopt it, as a probable opinion; even if 'the pouring out of the vials' may, in the order of the predicted events, be allowed to begin at so early a period; which seems to me inadmissible. Many others, besides devoted papists, were involved in the effects of this atheism and infidelity: but the predicted judgment is stated as selecting them for its exclusive objects.

(2.) 'The vials probably date from the 7th trumpet, which contains them. It is a general fault to accumulate, on the first 4 vials, too great a weight of particular interpretation; whereas, as the symbols are, so should the interpretation be, general.'

V. 3—7. (Note, 8:8—11.) 'Seas, rivers, and fountains,' turned into blood, are proper emblems of vast slaughter and devastation. Yet 'the angel of the waters,' who was appointed to preside over them, or to be 'a ministering spirit' in these dispensations, celebrated the justice of the eternal Lord, who had determined to punish, with such calamities, the blood-thirsty murderers of saints and prophets; and in appointing them, as it were, 'blood to drink.' (Notes, 17:3—6. 18:20. 19:1—6. Ex. 1:22. 7:21—23.) And another angel, 'from under the altar,' (Note, 6:9—11.) as speaking in the name of the holy martyrs, concurred in these praises; and also declared the truth of 'the Lord God Almighty,' in thus fulfilling his ancient predictions, and his promises to his church.—If the events here predicted be still future, the fulfilment of the prophecy alone can clearly explain it. Mr. Faber, however, interprets the whole passage, of the bloody transactions in France and on the continent, which have occurred during these last 20 years. I presume not to decide, whether his opinion be well grounded or not; yet I object to it for these reasons: 1st. The stage, on which these tragedies have been acted, seems by no means large enough for the completion of the prophecy. France, and the countries connected with it, form only part of the kingdom of the beast; and several countries belonging to it, have hitherto been little affected by these sanguinary measures, though, perhaps, they may ere long be involved in them: in fact, many, since the time when this was first written, have been, though not in that degree, or to that

Some of the best of men, as Moses and Jeremiah, did not so readily comply with the call of God to their work; but angels excel not only in strength, but in a readiness to do his will. We are taught to pray, that the will of God may be done on earth as in heaven.

And now we enter on a series of very terrible dispensations of Providence; of which it is difficult to give the certain meaning, or to make the particular application. But in the general we may observe,

1. An allusion, here, to several of the plagues of Egypt, such as turning their waters into blood, and smiting them with boils and sores. Their sins were alike, and so were their punishments.

2. A plain reference to the seven trumpets, which represented the gradual rise of antichrist; learn, hence, that the fall of the church's enemies shall bear some resemblance to their rise; and that God can bring them down in such ways as they chose to exalt themselves.

3. This gradual fall of the antichristian interest shall be universal. Everything that anyways belonged to them, or could be serviceable to them, their earth, air, sea, rivers, cities, all are consigned over to ruin, all accursed for the sake of the wickedness of that people. Thus the creation groans and suffers through the sins of men.

(1.) The first angel poured out his vial on the earth, v. 2. i. e. say some, on the common people; others, on the body of the Romish clergy, who were the basis of the papacy, and of an earthly spirit, all carrying on earthly designs. The effect was, noisome and grievous sores on all who had the mark of the beast. This sore, some think, signifies some of the first appearances of Providence against their state and interest, which gave them great uneasiness, as it discovered their inward distemper, and was a token of further evil; the plague-tokens appeared.

(2.) The second angel, who poured out his vial on the sea, v. 3. i. e. say some, on the jurisdiction and dominion of the papacy; others, on the whole system of their religion, false doctrines, corrupt glosses, superstitious rites, idolatrous worship, pardons, indulgences, a great conflux of wicked inventions and institutions, by which they maintain a trade and traffic advantageous to themselves, but injurious to all who deal with them. The effect was, it turned the sea into blood, as the blood of a dead man, and every living soul died in the sea. God discovered not only the vanity and falsehood of their religion, but the pernicious and deadly nature of it,—that the souls of men were poisoned by that which was pretended to be the sure means of their salvation.

(3.) The next angel poured out his vial on the rivers and fountains of waters; i. e. say some very learned men, on their emissaries, and especially the Jesuits, who, like streams, conveyed the venom and poison of their errors and idolatries from the spring-head through the earth. The effect was, it turned them into blood; some think, it stirred up Christian princes to take a just revenge on them that had been the great incendiaries of the world, and had occasioned the shedding of the blood of armies, and of martyrs: the following doxology favors this sense, v. 5, 6. The instrument that God makes use of in this work, is called the angel of the waters, who extols the righteousness of God in this retaliation, They have shed the blood of thy saints, and Thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy: to which another angel answered by full consent, v. 7.

V. 8—11. The work goes on in the appointed order.

The fourth angel poured out his vial on the sun; i. e. say some, on some eminent prince, of popish communion, who should renounce their false religion a little before its utter downfall; some expect it will be the German emperor. The consequence will be, that sun, which before cherished them with benign influences, shall now grow hot, and scorch them. Princes shall use their power and authority to suppress them; which yet would be so far from bringing them to repentance, that it should cause them to curse God and their king, and look upward, throwing out their blasphemous speeches against the God of heaven; they were hardened to their ruin.

The fifth angel poured out his vial on the seat of the beast; on Rome itself, the mystical Babylon, the head of the antichristian empire. The effect was, the whole kingdom of the beast was full of darkness and distress; that very city, which was the seat of their policy, the source of all their learning, and all their pomp and pleasure, is now become a source of darkness, pain, and an-extent, which the prophecy seems to require. 2dly. The term, since the commencement of the French revolution seems too short, to answer to the idea, excited by this prophecy, of the judgments to be inflicted: when it is considered, in how few vs. the most interesting events perhaps of 2 or 300 years are comprehended. 3dly. I doubt, whether the time for the pouring out of the vials is arrived; and whether it will arrive, till after the middle of this century.—It seems, however, still more improper to suppose all the 7 vials coincident, and all as having been begun already to be poured.

(3.) Bl. rejects 'living;' also 'Lord,' at v. 5. Ed.
(7.) Another out of. Bl. marks these words as doubtful. Id.
V. 8, 9. (Note, 8:12.) Whether burning seasons, producing drought and famine, or some other judgment, figuratively described by the scorching heat of the sun, be intended, the event must show. These vs. are interpreted by Mr. Faber, to mean the present tyranny of the ruler of France, over that nation, and the other kingdoms of the beast, on the continent. Not being disposed to controvert this interpretation, and much less to subscribe to it, I only again observe that, in my view, our posterity, at the end of this century, will be more competent judges of this subject, than we can be. SCOTT.

(9.) 'Divine judgments alone, do not reclaim ungodly men. But their hardening effect on men left to themselves, and given up to suffer them without remedy, is strikingly represented in this text. They produce no godly sorrow,—no repentance unto life; but rather increase the enmity of the heart against God. The conscience is convinced of his righteousness, but the heart is enraged to greater madness. This must be the effect of the curse of the law in hell, where the hope of the ungodly is turned into endless despair.'

V. 10, 11. This predicts some great calamity to Rome itself, yet of such a nature as will darken the whole antichristian empire. (Notes, 18:2) But it will only excite the sufferers to more horrid blasphemies, and more desperate defiance of God.—Interpreters of these prophecies in general allow, that this vial is not yet poured out; and this is a sufficient reason, why a commentator should decline giving any conjecture, in what manner so compendious and so obscure a prediction will be fulfilled. When fulfilled, it will cease to be obscure. SCOTT.

(10.) 'The throne of the beast is the seat of diabolical artifice and antichristian iniquity; and wheresoever these are arrayed against the kingdom of Christ, there is to be seen a portion of the kingdom of the 11 And blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds.

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.

13 And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet.

14 For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.

15 Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

16 And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.

guish. Darkness was one of the plagues of Egypt, and it is opposed to lustre and honor, and so forebodes the contempt and scorn to which the antichristian interest should be exposed.

V. 12—16. The sixth angel poured out his vial on the great river Euphrates. Some take it literally, for the place where the Turkish power and empire begun: and they think this is a prophecy of the destruction of the Turkish monarchy and [delusion], which they suppose will be effected about the same time with that of the papacy, as another antichrist, and that thereby a way shall be made for the conveniency of the Jews, those princes of the east. Others take it for the river Tiber; for, as Rome is mystical Babylon, Tiber is mystical Euphrates. And when Rome is destroyed, her river and merchandise must suffer with her.

But what did this vial produce? 1. The drying up of the river, which furnished the city with wealth, provisions, and all sorts of accommodations. 2. A way prepared for the kings of the east. The idolatry of the church of Rome had been a great hindrance, both to the conversion of the Jews, who have been long cured of their inclination to idols, and of the Gentiles, who are hardened in their idolatry, by seeing that which so much symbolizes with it, among those called Christians. It is therefore very probable, that the downfall of popery, removing these obstructions, will open a way for both the Jews and other eastern nations to come into the church of Christ. And if we suppose that Mohammedism shall fall at the same time, there will be still a more open communication between the western and eastern nations, which may facilitate the conversion of the Jews, and of the fulness of the Gentiles. And when this work of God appears, and is about to be accomplished, no wonder if it occasion another consequence, which is, 3. The last effort of the great dragon; he is resolved to have another push for it, that, if possible, he may retrieve the ruinous posture of his affairs in the world. He is now rallying his forces, re-collecting all his spirits, to make one desperate sally before all be lost. This is occasioned by the pouring out of the sixth vial.

Here, observe, 1. The instruments he makes use of to engage the powers of the earth in his cause,—three unclean spirits like frogs, one out of the dragon's, another out of the beast's, and a third out of the false prophet's mouth. Hell, the secular power of antichrist, and the ecclesiastical, all combined to send their several instruments, furnished with hellish malice, with worldly policy, and with religious falsehood and deceit; and these should muster up the devil's forces for a decisive battle.

2. The means these instruments would use to engage the powers of the earth in this war,—they should work pretended miracles; the old stratagem of him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness, 2 Thess. 2: 9, 10. Some think, that, a little before the fall of antichrist, the popish pretence of power to work miracles will be revived, and will very much amuse and deceive the world.

3. The field of battle,—a place called Armageddon; i. e. say some, the mount of Megiddo, near to which, by a stream issuing from thence, Barak overcame Sisera, and all the kings in alliance with him, Judges 5: 19. And in the valley of Megiddo Josiah was slain. This place had been famous for two events of a very different nature, the first very happy for the church of God, the latter very unhappy; but it should now be the field of the last battle in which the church shall be engaged, and she shall be victorious. This battle required time to prepare for it, and therefore the further account of it is suspended till we come to ch. 19: 19, 20.

4. The warning God gives of this great and decisive trial, to engage his people to prepare for it, v. 15. It would be sudden and unexpected; therefore, Christians should be clothed, and armed, and ready for it, that they might not be surprised and ashamed. When God's cause comes to be tried, and beast; and commensurate with his power and authority are his throne and sceptre. It is difficult, therefore, to fix upon any local and permanent station for the throne of this tyrannical power, which extends over all people, ch. 13: 8. At some eras, and in some particular places, the spirit and power of tyranny, cruelty, and oppression, have been peculiarly prominent. And the eastern apostasy is subjected to the same power, as the western.

WOODH. V. 12—16. If the river Euphrates is here to be understood literally, some eastern nation or nations may be expected to invade Europe, or to meet the forces of the antichristian power, in the western parts of Asia, perhaps in Palestine, as the executioner of the Lord's vengeance on the kingdom of the beast. (Notes, Ps. 149: 7—9. Is. 34: 6: 3: 1—6. Ez. 38: 39: Dan. 2: 44, 45. 7: 9—12. 11: 40—45. Mic. 5: 10—15. 7: 14—17. Zech. 14: 12—19.) But as Rome is mystical Babylon, and as Babylon stood on the river Euphrates, and was both enriched and protected by it: perhaps we may understand, by the drying up of the Euphrates, such an enfeebling of the power of Rome, and increase of that of its enemies, as shall embolden and excite the nations to attack her. These events, however, will threaten the destruction of that whole kingdom and domination: so that 'three unclean spirits, like frogs, will come out of the mouth of the dragon,' as representing Satan, who gave his power to the beast; 'out of the mouth of the beast,' or antichristian empire; and 'out of that of the false prophet,' or the antichristian church and clergy. (Notes, 13: 1—12.) That is, emissaries, commissioned by them, and instigated by unclean spirits, being loathsome, and croaking, and intruding themselves into every place, to the mischief of all, (Note, Ez. 3: 1—6.) will go forth to promote idolatry, pretending to work miracles in support of their doctrine; and to collect 'the kings of the earth, and of the whole world,' even all in every place who favor that design, that they may make one united effort against the cause of God; and thus they will be 'gathered for the battle of the great day,' in which the Almighty God intends to destroy them.—Some have imagined these three mystical frogs, to be the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Jesuits; and the description given of them would agree well enough with the character of those Janizaries of the church of Rome: but the predicted events must fall much later than the founding of those orders; and Satan will no doubt be able to excite men of the same stamp, for similar services with those performed by them in former ages.—These will be times of great temptation; and therefore Christ, by his apostle, called on his professed servants, to expect his sudden coming, and 'to watch,' that they might retain and be found in the garments of salvation, and not 'walk naked,' and so be put to shame, as apostates or hypocrites: for the blessing would belong only to the watchful. This parenthesis interrupts the prediction; which proceeds to show, that He, even the Lord, gathered together the kings of the earth, in his righteous providence, to a place called Armageddon, or the mountain of destruction, with reference to Megiddo. (Judg. 5: 19. 2 K. 23: 29, 30. Note, Joel 3: 9—17.)—The coincidence between this prophecy, and those referred to in the notes, as unfulfilled prophecies in the O. T., is worthy of special notice, by all, who would patiently investigate the true meaning of them, and not run away with hasty, and crude, and partial, though plausible interpretations, grounded on incidental resemblances.—(14) False prophet.] The same as the second or two-horned beast. (Note, 13: 11, 12.) SCOTT.

(12.) 'Vitr. brings many arguments to show, that "the kings from the rising of the sun," do not mean the Jews, either converted or unconverted. Pareus, and J. Edwards, are among those who apply this vial to the destruction of the mystical Babylon. Fleming considers, that, as the 6th trumpet brought the Turks from beyond the Euphrates, so the 6th vial exhausts their power, as the means and way to prepare and dispose the eastern kings and kingdoms to renounce their heathenish and Mohammedan errors, and to receive Christianity.' Henry, abr. Beyond the Euphrates, E., is an immense extent of nations and tribes. As the power of the Persians is nearly effete, many have looked for 'the kings of the East' to the next nation, directly E., the bold, enterprising, and powerful Afghans, thought to be the descendants of the 10 lost tribes. The Jews have retained their peculiar and striking physiognomy to the present day, and certainly the cut (from colored page, ch. 14.) Elphinstone's Caubul) of one of the Afghann nation, has a peculiarly Jewish physiognomy, and patriarchal bearing. ED.

(13.) Three . . frogs.] 'That from the mouth of the dragon, (the devil.) means a general spirit of licentiousness, either in sentiment or practice, or both,—any or all kinds of blasphemy, and abomination. That from the mouth of the beast, is the scheme of infidelity, known by the name of illumination; which is the beast from the bottomless pit, full of the names of blasphemy. And the spirit from the mouth of the false prophet, is popery in its falling state in Europe, since the afore-noted revolution in France. Agents and subtle efforts from these three sources, the devil will seek to perfect, and to bring into operation. This he may be expected to do in America; and thence to give a new impulse to them over the world. The church in our States, has much to fear from these three systems of infidelity.' E. Smith. (13) Dragon . . beast . . false prophet.] 'The first is the author of all [spiritual] wickedness; the second, under his direction, is the inflicter of all political misery,—of tyranny, injustice, oppression, slavery, and cruelty, under every form of government, whether despotic or republican, and at all times of the world. The third is the hypocritical arch-minister of religion, [of whatever sect.] which he first corrupts and debases, and then derives from it a sanction for all the wickedness devised and perpetrated [for] himself and his coadjutors.' WOODH.

(14.) B. marks 'of the earth' and 'of the,' as doubtful. ED. (16.) 'This war shall take the world, as the siege of Jerusalem took the Jews, by surprise. It is announced by the same terms, see Mat. 24: 42, 43. Yet, as in the instance of the siege, it will be no surprise but to the negligent, the adherents of the idolatrous church, and the general worldly and irreligious portion of mankind. To those whose eyes are fixed in humility upon the signs of the great coming, there will be, in the circumstances of the times, warning sufficient, if not to enable them to anticipate the precise steps by which the universal convulsion will arrive, at least to ascertain its approach, and to feel the solemn necessity of preparing by a renewed spirit, by a purer morality, and more anxious study of the Gospel, for a trial in which all the earth has of strength or greatness will be utterly shaken. Croly.' HENRY, abr.

17 And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done.

18 And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great.

19 And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath.

20 And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found.

21 And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

his battles to be fought, all his people should be ready to stand up for his interest, and be faithful and valiant in his service.

V. 17—21. Here we have an account of the 7th and last angel pouring forth his vial on the air, on the prince of the power of the air, i. e. the devil. His powers were restrained, his policies confounded, he was bound in God's chain, the sword of God was on his eye and on his arm. He had used all possible means to preserve the antichristian interest, and to prevent the fall of Babylon; but now here is a vial poured out on his kingdom, and he is not able to support his tottering cause any longer.

The effect was, 1. A thankful voice from heaven, pronouncing that now the work was done. The church triumphant in heaven saw it, and rejoiced; the church militant on earth saw it, and became triumphant. It is finished. 2. A mighty commotion on the earth,—an earthquake, so great as never was before, shaking the very centre; and this ushered in by the usual concomitant of thunder and lightnings. 3. The fall of Babylon, which was divided into three parts, called the cities of the nations, v. 19. having had rule over the nations, and taken in the idolatry of the nations, incorporating into her religion something of the Jewish, something of the pagan, and something of the Christian religion, and so was three cities in one. And this downfall extended further than to the seat of antichrist; it reached from the centre to the circumference; and every island, and every mountain, that seemed by nature and situation the most secured, were carried away in the deluge of this ruin.

The antichristian party were affected with it also; though it fell on them as a dreadful storm, as if the stones of the city, tossed up into the air, came down on their heads, like hail stones of a talent weight each, yet, so far from repenting, they blasphemed that God who thus punished them. Here was a dreadful plague of the heart, a spiritual judgment more dreadful and destructive than all the rest. Observe, 1. The greatest calamities that can befall men, will not bring them to repentance without the grace of God working with them. 2. Those that are not made better by the judgments of God, are always the worse for them. 3. To be hardened in sin and enmity against God by his righteous judgments, is a certain token of utter destruction.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1—6. Here we have a new vision, not as to matter, for that is contemporary with what came under the last three vials; but as to manner of description, &c.

1. The apostle is invited to view what was to be represented, v. 1. Here is a name of great infamy, that of one that is married, and has been false to her husband's bed; she had been a prostitute to the kings of the earth, whom she had intoxicated with the wine of her fornication.

2. The appearance she made was gay and gaudy, like such sort of creatures, v. 4. Here were all the allurements of worldly

PRACT. OBS. How infatuated must men be, to set at defiance the power of God, who can fight against them by such varied means, and with such irresistible weapons! No wonder that angels, who witness or execute his vengeance on the implacable haters of God, of Christ, and of holiness, loudly celebrate the praises of his justice and truth; and adore his awful dispensations, when He brings on bloody persecutors the tortures, which they had inflicted on his saints and prophets. But 'the heart' of man is so 'desperately wicked,' that the most complicated miseries will never induce any one to repent, without the special, preventing grace of God: nay, if men are left to themselves, they will 'blaspheme the name of God,' even in the intervals of 'gnawing their tongues with pain!' It is vain, therefore, to expect that purgatory, or hell-fire, will ever bring men to glorify God in true repentance, or in any sense purge away their sins. Hell itself is filled with blasphemies, determined and horrid, in proportion to the degree of its torments: and they are as ignorant of the history of human nature, as of the Bible and of their own hearts, who do not know, that the more men suffer, and the more plainly they see the hand of God in their sufferings, the more furiously they often rage against Him. Let then sinners now seek repentance from Christ, and the grace of the Holy Spirit; or they will hereafter have the anguish and horror of an unhumiliated, impenitent, and desperate heart, burning with enmity against God, as well as tortured by the fire of his indignation; and thus augmenting guilt and misery to all eternity. SCOTT.

V. 17—21. How this [of the hail stones] is to be understood, the event must show. (Note, 11:15—13.)—It would be very easy to give an opinion, or to quote from those who have done this: but the author would refer the reader to those, who have purposely written on the subject. It is however clear, beyond doubt, that convulsions, revolutions, and the wreck of nations, to a degree and extent never hitherto witnessed or recorded, are yet to be expected, before 'the mystery of God is finished.'—The opinion, also, that the land of Canaan will be the stage, on which the last grand conflict shall be decided, is highly probable: (Notes, 20:7—10. Ez. 38:9—23. Dan. 11:40—45.) but whether that country, or the papal dominions, be meant, by the 1609 furlongs, to be drenched with blood, must be left undecided. (Note, 14:14—20.) The dimensions may suit either one or the other: and it is not certain, whether particular dreadful judgments, on the immediate seat of the beast, or tremendous vengeance on all his remaining adherents, be there foretold.—It may be observed, by some readers, that I have not at all noticed the interpretations of those, who consider several of the vials as long since poured out. This has resulted from a full conviction, that these interpretations are absolutely inconsistent with the chronology of the prophecy, and the whole clue which must direct us in expounding it; and that they are altogether unsatisfactory, even as insulated accommodations. The opinion of those, who explain the former of the vials of recent events, which have occurred within these last 20 years, whether well grounded or not, may be allowed to be consistent with the chronology of the book, and with these vials, containing a prediction of 'the last plagues.' (Notes, 15:1—4.) The grand question to be decided, in this respect, relates to the sounding of the 7th trumpet. If that event be past, the vials have begun to be poured out; if it be future, none of them have been poured out. For it seems to me clear, that as the 7th seal includes all the 7 trumpets; so the 7th trumpet includes all the 7 vials. Nor do I think it possible for human sagacity to determine, till some considerable time has elapsed, at what precise period events of such immense magnitude, as those here predicted, began to be accomplished. SCOTT.

(17.) 'No scheme for applying the vials, as yet offered, appears to be satisfactory. Interpreters usually have applied them to the times in which they have lived, and each has been more successful in pointing out the errors of others, than in making a satisfactory arrangement. These effusions are now generally applied more or less to events connected with the French revolution. Hutcheson distributes them as follows: 1. The Reformation. 2. Wars consequent on the Reformation to 1790. 3. French revolution. 4. The sum of despotism. 5. The reaction in a struggle for civil and religious liberty. 6. The defection of the kingdoms of the pope. 7. Final overthrow of the western apostasy. The course pursued by Woodh. to view the pouring forth of the vials, as the commencing, continued, and universal punishment of the followers of antichrist, without attempting any minute application, seems at present the only safe course for the commentator.' HENRY, abr.

(20.) 'Mountains, in a spiritual sense, are strongholds of antichristian idolatry; the islands or isles of the sea, represent the heathen nations of the Western [European] world.' WOODH.

(21.) 'Men.' 'The men, as it should be tr. here and elsewhere.' ID.

NOTES. CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. This chapter contains a digression from the main subject, and a kind of parenthesis in the course of the prophecy; to show more precisely what was meant by 'great Babylon,' the ruin of which had been so tremendously predicted. (Note, 16:17—21.) No one can doubt, but Rome is meant in this ch., nay, the most zealous papists allow it; and indeed, it would not have been made so undeniable by being expressly named, as it is by this description. The only question then, is, whether Rome pagan, or Rome papal is meant. But pagan Rome never seduced the kings of the earth to join in her idolatries, she never intoxicated the inhabitants 'with the wine of her fornication;' she subdued and ruled them with an iron rod, and not by artifices and blandishments; she left them in general to their ancient usages and worship; nay, she imported the idols and vices of the conquered nations, and thus became fatally corrupted. Even when the Roman emperors persecuted the Christians, they did it rather from a desire of crushing innovations, which threatened, as they supposed, the peace of the state, connected with enmity against God, and truth, and holiness, than from zeal for any particular form of idolatry. On the other hand, it is well known, by what subtle insinuations, and politic management, 'with all the deceivableness of unrighteousness,' Rome papal, without any adequate temporal force, has obtained and preserved an ascendancy over kings and nations: attaching them to her usurped dominion in blind submission, and inducing them to conform to her idolatries, and corruptions of Christianity. So that the authority of powerful kings, and the forces of mighty nations, have repeatedly been employed in defence of her tyranny; and multitudes have been intoxicated, and infuriated, by their zeal for that church, to murder their unoffending neighbors, by tens of thousands, and at the same time to enslave, weaken, and impoverish themselves! 9—14. 14:8. 18:1—3. Jer. 51:7. SCOTT.

(2.) 'Hurd shows why this term, and not that of adultery, is here used, and points out papal Rome, contrary to those who would assume that the lighter term denotes pagan Rome. The emblem is Babylon, a pagan idolatrous city, which never entered into any close contract with Jehovah. That city being noted as the first of idolatrous cities, was the fittest to be an emblem of the enormous guilt and extensive influence of idolatrous Rome. Pagan idolatry also is, for the most part, exposed by the ancient prophets, under the term of lying vanities. Hurd fully

2 With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

3 So he carried me away in the Spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns.

4 And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication.

5 And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.

6 And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.

7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns.

8 The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.

9 And here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.

10 And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space.

honor and riches, pomp and pride, suited to sensual and worldly minds.

3. Her principal seat and residence,—upon the beast that had 7 heads and 10 horns; i. e. Rome, the city on 7 hills, infamous for idolatry, tyranny, and blasphemy.

4. Her name, which was written on her forehead. It was the custom of impudent harlots to hang out signs, with [impure emblems, and] their names, that all might know what they were. Now, in this, observe, (1.) She is named from her place of residence, Babylon the great. But that we might not take it for the old Babylon, literally so called, we are told there is a mystery in the name; it is some other great city resembling the old Babylon. (2.) She is named from her infamous way and practice; not only a harlot, but a mother of harlots; breeding, and training them up to idolatry, and all sorts of lewdness and wickedness; the parent and nurse of all false religion and filthy conversation.

5. Her diet; she satiated herself with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus. She drank their blood with such greediness, that she intoxicated herself with it; it was so pleasant to her, that she could not tell when she had enough of it: satiated, but never satisfied.

V. 7—13. Here we have the mystery of this vision explained: but it is so explained, as still to need further explanation. 1. This beast was, and is not, and yet is; i. e. it was a seat of idolatry and persecution; and is not, i. e. not in the ancient form, which was pagan; and yet it is, it is truly the seat of idolatry and tyranny, though of another sort and form. It ascends out of the bottomless pit; idolatry and cruelty are the issue and product of hell, and it shall return thither, and go into perdition. 2. This beast has 7 heads, which have a double signification.

meets the objections of Romanists, and shows that the terms here used are especially applicable to papal Rome.

HENRY, abr.
 V. 3—5. The angel then carried John, 'in the Spirit,' (i. e. being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he seemed to himself to be conveyed,) 'into the wilderness;' for the antichristian tyranny and seductions had reduced the church into a most desolate state, and made it like a desert. (Notes, 12:13—17.) There he saw 'a woman seated on a scarlet-colored beast.' This 'woman' was the emblem of the church of Rome, and 'the beast' was the emblem of the temporal power, by which it has been supported, and the latter was 'full of names of blasphemy,' which we have had repeated occasions to mention. (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—7. 2 Thes. 2:3, 4.) 'The 7 heads and 10 horns' are afterwards explained. (Notes, 7—14. 12:3—6. 13:1.) The woman was 'arrayed in purple and scarlet-color;' for these have always been the distinguishing colors of popes and cardinals, as well as of the Roman emperors and senators; nay, by a kind of infatuation, the mules and horses on which they rode, have been covered with scarlet cloth; as if they were determined to answer this description, and even literally to ride on a scarlet-colored beast!—'The woman' was also most superbly decorated with gold and jewels; and who can, in adequate language, describe the pride, splendor, and magnificence of the church of Rome, in her vestments and ornaments of every kind? Even papists have gloried in the superiority of their church in this species of magnificence, above ancient Rome when at the height of her prosperity. This appears in all things relating to their public worship, and in the papal court, even beyond what can be conceived; and external pomp attaches carnal men to a religion, which excessively interests and gratifies them, and may even be said to intoxicate them; whilst they despise the simplicity of spiritual worship.—This is beyond description, and as much surpassed my expectation, as other sights have generally fallen short of it. Silver can scarce find an admittance; and gold itself looks but poorly, among such an incredible number of precious stones.' Addison.—In the woman's hand, likewise, there 'was a golden cup full of abominations;' this alludes to the practice of harlots, in inflaming their paramours with love potions; and represents the various fascinating allurements, the impostures, delusions, promises of impunity, indulgences, absolutions, with hopes of worldly interest and preferment, by which that church has always obtained and preserved her influence, and seduced men to join in her spiritual fornication, the other abominations of her corrupt worship, and the unholiness connected with it. (Notes, 18:4—9. 19:1—6.) [How many poor young men of talents, have been thus seduced even from Protestantism, and in countries boasting of light! Ed.] This name [the woman's] was 'Mystery, Babylon the Great.' Her religion was 'a mystery of iniquity,' (Notes, 2 Thes. 2:5—7. 1 Tim. 3:16.) and she herself was mystically 'Babylon the Great.'—Now there was nothing in pagan Rome, to which this title was more proper, than to any other city; nor would it have been anything very mysterious to have substituted one pagan city for another; but it was indeed a 'great mystery,' that the professed metropolis of the Christian church should be another Babylon, in idolatry, iniquity, and cruelty to the people of God; and her very title of 'the Roman Catholic,' or universal 'church,' entitles her to the name of 'Mystery, Babylon the Great.' She affects, indeed, the character of 'our holy mother, the church;' but she is in fact, 'the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth;' the inventor, source, promoter, and principal example, of idolatries, and all kinds of abominable abuses and perversions of Christianity, with which the nations of the earth have been corrupted.—It is asserted by writers of good authority, that, before the Reformation, the word mystery was written in letters of gold, on the front of the pope's mitre; but the fact has been controverted, and, therefore, though the affirmative evidence vastly preponderates, we cannot be absolutely certain of it.
 SCOTT.

V. 6. The woman was as notorious for cruelty and persecution, as for idolatry and profligacy; and the apostle saw her 'drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus.' (Notes, 16:3—7. 18:20. Don. 7:19—27.) In this respect Rome pagan and Rome papal were both criminal; but the latter has probably slain more thousands, than the former did individuals, and the apostle would not have been greatly astonished to see a heathen city persecuting Christians, having witnessed and experienced such persecutions during many years, before he had this vision; but that a city, professedly Christian, and the metropolis of the Christian church, should thus wanton and riot in the blood of the saints, might well excite his highest amazement. 'All this is very plain; but papists wonder by what figure of speech heretics are called "saints," and rebels against the pope, "martyrs of Jesus."'

 BP. HURD.

V. 7, 8. Lest any one should mistake or hesitate concerning the meaning of these emblems, the angel became the interpreter of the vision. As the apostle had seen and heard very much on the same subject before, the angel inquired into the reason of his excessive amazement; (Notes, 12:3—6. 13:1—17.) and he then showed to him 'the mystery of the woman, riding on the beast.' A beast is the emblem of an idolatrous and oppressive empire; the Roman empire was 'the beast' under the pagan emperors; it ceased to be so, when it became Christian, with reference to which the angel says, by way of anticipation, 'It is not.' Yet it would afterwards 'ascend out of the abyss;' i. e. when the antichristian empire became idolatrous and persecuting, and the dragon gave his power to the beast, it seemed to arise out of the sea, the tempestuous state of the nations, but it was in fact from hell, being Satan's grand scheme for opposing the Gospel: (Notes, 9:1, 2. 11:7—12. 13:1—4.) and therefore after a time it would go into perdition, and be destroyed finally and for ever.—'The empire was idolatrous under the heathen emperors, and then ceased to be so under the Christian emperors, and then became idolatrous again under the Roman pontiffs, and hath so continued ever since.—But in this last form it shall go into perdition: it shall not, as it did before, cease for a time, and revive again, but shall be destroyed for ever.' BP. NEWTON. (Note, Dan. 7:9—14, 23—27. 11:44, 45.) In the mean while, however, it is foretold, it would deceive into a stupid admiration, and blind submission, 'all the inhabitants of the earth,' within the sphere of its influence, except the remnant of the elect. (Note, 13:8—10.) (8) Shall ascend. Is about to ascend. This determines the rise of the beast to a period subsequent to the prediction being delivered, and consequently Rome pagan cannot be meant, for that had risen long before.

(8.) Not written, &c. 'This expression shows, that this revival of a persecuting power, should be greatly owing to some members of the church itself who had lost the spirit and temper of true Christianity, and were led by what they thought their worldly interests.'
 LOWMAN.

V. 9—14. Seven mountains. This is the well-known situation of Rome; Constantinople is also built on 7 hills, but they are comparatively obscure, and no other mark of the beast answers to it. For 'the seven heads' of the beast had another enigmatical meaning, and signified seven 'kings,' or successions of rulers, according to the usual prophetic meaning of the word 'kings.' Some explain the 7th. of the Christian emperors; but their power must either be included in the sixth head; or it could not be a head of the beast at all, not being idolatrous. Others explain it of the Exarch of Ravenna, the deputy of the emperor of the East, under which government this proud city, Rome, continued as a dukedom for above a hundred years. Others explain it of the usurpations of the pope, before he became a temporal prince, or the prescribed '1260 years' of the reign of the beast had entered; but that of the Exarch of Ravenna seems most clear. Many other interpretations have been given, and especially the dominion of Charlemagne and his successors, during several generations, has been fixed upon. In general, however, it related to the intervening space between the subversion of the empire, and the establishment of papal tyranny; during which time

11 And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition.

12 And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast.

13 These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast.

14 These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful.

15 And he saith unto me, The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues.

16 And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire.

17 For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled.

18 And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

(1.) Seven mountains,—the seven hills on which Rome stands; and (2.) Seven kings,—seven sorts of government. Rome was governed by kings, consuls, tribunes, decemviri, dictators; emperors who were pagan, and emperors who were Christian; five of these were extinct when this prophecy was written; one was then in being, i. e. the pagan emperor; and the other, i. e. the Christian emperor, was yet to come, v. 10. This beast, the papacy, makes an 8th governor, and sets up idolatry again. 3. This beast had ten horns; which are said to be ten kings which have, as yet, received no kingdoms; as yet, i. e. as some, shall not rise up till the Roman empire be broken in pieces; or, as others, shall not rise up till near the end of antichrist's reign, and so shall reign but as it were one hour with her, but shall for that time be very unanimous and very zealous in that interest, and entirely devoted to it, divesting themselves of their prerogatives and revenues, (things so dear to princes,) out of an unaccountable fondness for the papacy.

V. 14-18. Here we have some account of the downfall of Babylon, to be more fully described in the following chapter.

PRACT. OBS. The Lord takes pleasure in satisfying his people, concerning the reasons and equity of his judgments on his enemies; that they may not be intimidated by the severity of them, or fail to adore and praise Him on that account.—Great prosperity, pomp, and splendor, commonly feed the pride and lusts of the human heart; yet they form no security against divine vengeance.—Those who allure or tempt others to sin, must expect more aggravated punishment, in proportion to the degree of the mischief done by them.—The worst abominations, idolatries, filthinesses, cruelties, and blasphemies, have been perpetrated within the professing church: and a magnificent religion, [arrogating political power, &c.] adorned with purple, and decked with gold and jewels, is generally antichristian. But 'the golden im-

Rome was under the temporal jurisdiction of the Exarch of Ravenna, and the spiritual rule of the pope, who had already introduced the worship of saints and images, and many other gross abuses. If this he reckoned a distinct form of government, then the beast, as it subsisted when the woman sat on it, was 'the eighth,' but, if it is deemed too inconsiderable to be reckoned a distinct head, 'he was one of the 7;' but, whether the 7th or the 8th, he would be the last form of government in that idolatrous empire; and 'goeth into perdition.' 'The beast, therefore, on which the woman rideth, is the Roman government in its last form; and this, all must acknowledge, is papal, not imperial.' Bp. Newton. For the last head was the only one, which existed when the woman sat on the beast, and was therefore spoken of as the beast itself.—'The ten horns' (which seem to have all grown on the last head) were 'ten kings,' or successions of kings; who had 'received no kingdom' when John had this vision; but they would 'receive power as kings one hour with the beast,' or at the same time, and for the same period. This points out the division of the Roman empire into ten distinct kingdoms, yet all united in one design to support the idolatry of the church of Rome; and it is wholly incompatible with pagan Rome. They might be kings; but they were not horns of the beast, till they embraced that religion, and both strengthened the hands of the pope and church of Rome, and were strengthened by them. 'These were contemporary, not successive princes, as the 7 kings before mentioned were; and, notwithstanding the continual interference of their several political interests and measures, and their contests in other things, they were 'of one mind to give their power to the beast,' implicitly submitting to that idolatrous religion; defending its tyranny and usurpations; and enduring its exorbitant exactions; and obeying its mandates to make war, in opposing the cause of Christ, and in order to extirpate his disciples. But it was predicted, that they would all be finally defeated in that war, by 'the Lamb of God;' as He is 'Lord of lords, and King of kings,' as many vain mortals have affected to call themselves; (Notes, 1 Kings 20:1. Ezra 7:12. Dan. 2:37.) and his followers are effectually called to enlist under his standard, in consequence of his special choice of them; and therefore they are true believers, faithful to his cause, and to their own engagements. (Notes, 19:11-21. Mat. 22:11-14.) SCOTT.

(12.) 'When the Roman empire declined, under the invasions of the Goths, and other barbarians, ten kingdoms arose, which are enumerated by different writers. Though much varied in respect to the people of which they were composed, their number has been nearly the same; and, on an average, in the long course of 1400 years, reaching to our times, the number ten would be found to predominate. Considering the changes to which all nations are exposed, and which have prevailed in other quarters of the globe, it is, indeed, a wonder, that the ten European kingdoms should subsist as they have done. Their character and designation has been exactly fulfilled. They have imbibed the doctrines of the harlot, and have executed her bloody decrees. But the time seems already to have dawned, when they shall perform their appointed part in her downfall and disgrace. Woodh.—Are not the annals of age, or 'golden cup,' in the hand of Babylon and her daughters, will reconcile most men to 'the mysteries of iniquity' connected with it; and make them willingly swallow down the wine of their fornications; and even induce them to join in making themselves 'drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus.' (Notes, Dan. 3:1-12.) Let all then beware of a splendid, a lucrative, or a fashionable religion: let us avoid 'the mysteries of iniquity,' and study diligently 'the great mystery of godliness;' that we may learn humility, simplicity, self-denial, and gratitude, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth, by the side of the well at Sychar, in the garden of Gethsemane, and on mount Golgotha: for the more we resemble Christ, the less shall we be liable to be deceived by antichrist. V. 15-18. The angel next explained to the apostle 'the many waters, on which the woman sat,' in regal dignity. Four distinct words, all in the plural number, aptly describe the extensive dominion of the church of Rome, not only over those within the territories belonging to the papacy, but over all the kingdoms of that communion, and in their remote dependencies, in the East Indies, in South America, and other places. Indeed, the pope has claimed the right over all nations, to dispose of crowns, and depose princes, at his pleasure, as if he were 'Lord of lords, and King of kings!' and the very titles of 'universal bishop,' and 'the Roman Catholic church,' fully accord to this description. This, however, will not always be the case; for the 'ten horns,' or kingdoms, which once exalted and supported the ecclesiastical tyranny, will at length 'hate, desolate,' strip, devour, and destroy it. [Even Austria is beginning afresh to confiscate church property. Ed.] Most of them will be the principal instruments in the destruction of popery, and the ruin of Rome itself; though some will lament over these events. (Note, 18: 9, 10.)—How far some late revolutions may lead to this crisis we cannot tell, but present appearances render it not improbable, that the last victory of the beast over the witnesses of Christ, will be obtained in some other way, than directly by papal delusions. Yet these appearances are continually changing. (Note, 11:7-12.) God has so influenced the hearts of these kings, by his power over them, and by the dispensations of his providence, that they fulfilled his will, or did those things, without intending it, which He had purposed and predicted. (Notes, Ezra 1:1-4. Ps. 105:23-25. Ez. 14:9-11. 38:10. 2 Thes. 2: 10-12.) Thus they had agreed together to 'give their kingdom to the beast;' to make him, as it were, their liege lord; and to reign over others, only in order to render them subservient to him. But they will at length better understand their own interest, and their duty to God and their subjects, than thus any longer to prostitute their power.—To terminate the description of the woman, who sat on this symbolical beast, she was declared to be 'that great city, which reigned over the kings of the earth,' when John had his vision; and everybody must know Rome to be that city. Indeed, this was the avowed object, aim, and ambition of Rome, from its foundation; and, in different ways, it has accomplished its purpose, with little interruption, even to this present time.—(16) Eat her flesh. (Notes, Job 31:29-32. Ps. 27:1-3. Dan. 7:5.)—Burn her. The punishment of a priest's daughter, who committed whoredom. (Note, Lev. 21:9.)—(17) Put it in her heart. Marg. Ref. c.—Until, &c. With what frequent repetition is this idea brought before the reader; the 'counsel of the Lord shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure!' (Notes, Ps. 33:10-12. 19:21. Is. 14:24-27. 46:10, 11. Dan. 4:34-37. Mat. 26:21-24. Acts 2:22-24. 4:23-28. Eph. 1:9-12. 3:9-12.)

AND after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory.

who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning, hardened to do so; and it was of God, that afterward their hearts were turned against the whore, to hate her, and to make her desolate and naked, and to eat her flesh, and burn her with fire; they shall at length see their folly, and how they have been bewitched and enslaved by the papacy, and, out of a just resentment, shall not only fall off from Rome, but shall be made the instruments of God's providence in her destruction.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1-3. The downfall and destruction of Babylon form an event so fully determined in the counsels of God, and of such consequence to his interests and glory, that the visions and predictions concerning it are repeated.

1. Here is another angel sent from heaven, attended with great power and lustre, v. 1. He had not only light in himself, to discern the truth of his own prediction, but to inform and enlighten the world about that great event; and not only light to discern it, but power to accomplish it.

2. This angel publishes the fall of Babylon, as a thing already come to pass; and this he does with a mighty strong voice, that all might hear, and see how well he was pleased to be the messenger of such tidings. Here seems to be an allusion to the prediction of the fall of pagan Babylon, Is. 21:9. where the word is repeated, as here, — is fallen, is fallen. Some have thought a double fall is hereby intended, first her apostasy, and then her ruin; and they think the words immediately following favor their opinion, v. 2. But this is also borrowed from Is. 21:9. and seems to describe, not so much her sin of entertaining idols, which are truly called devils, as her punishment; it being a common notion, that unclean spirits, as well as your ominous and hateful birds, used to haunt a city or house that lay in its ruins.

3. The reason of this ruin is declared; for so God is pleased to do, especially in those dispensations of Providence that are most awful and tremendous. The wickedness of Babylon had been very great; for she had not only forsaken the true God herself, and set up idols, but had, with great art and industry, drawn all sorts of men into the spiritual adultery, and by her wealth and luxury had retained them in her interest, v. 3.

V. 4-8. Here is fair warning given to all that expect mercy from God, that they should not only come out of her, but be assisting in her destruction, v. 4, 5. Here observe, 1. God may have a people even in Babylon, some who belong to the election of grace. 2. God's people shall be called out of Babylon, and called effectually. 3. Those that are resolved to partake with wicked men in their sins, must receive of their plagues. 4. When the sins of a people reach up to heaven, the wrath of God will reach down to the earth. 5. Though private revenge is forbidden, yet God will have his people act under Him, when called to it, in pulling down his and their inveterate and implacable enemies, v. 6. 6. God will proportion the punishment of sinners to the measure of their wickedness, pride, and security, v. 7. 7. When destruction comes on a people suddenly, the surprise is a great aggravation of their misery, v. 8.

V. 9-19. Here we have a doleful lamentation made by Babylon's friends, for her fall; observe,

1. The mourners, who they are; those who had been bewitched by her fornication, sharers in her sensual pleasures, and gainers by her wealth and trade, v. 9. whom she had flattered into idolatry, by allowing them to be arbitrary and tyrannical over their subjects, while they were obsequious to her; and the merchants, i. e. those who trafficked with her for indulgences, pardons, dispensations, and preferments; these will mourn, because by this craft they got their wealth.

2. The manner of their mourning; (1.)

NOTES. CHAP. XVIII. V. 1-3. (Note, 16:17-21.) After the apostle had been certified who 'Babylon the Great' was, and what she had done, he had the vision of her destruction continued. 'Another angel,' distinct from those who 'poured out the vials,' came down from heaven, possessing great power, and illuminating the earth with his glory. This was either Christ Himself, or an emblematical representation of his coming to destroy his enemies, and to diffuse the light of his Gospel through all nations; to which events the language naturally directs our thoughts. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8-12.) He therefore repeatedly proclaimed 'with a strong voice,' which all might hear, and which implied great power and authority, that 'Babylon the Great is fallen,' totally and finally. (Notes, 14:8. Is. 21:6-9.) It was become not only desolate, but a kind of hell upon earth. Some think, that the words may refer to the discoveries which will then be made, of the diabolical ambition, impostures, lies, murder, and horrible uncleanness, with which the city is filled, under the mask of religion; but the expressions are figurative, and borrowed from the O. T. (Notes, Is. 13:19-22. 34:9-17. Jer. 51:61-64.) It is most manifest, that no desolations have hitherto left Rome in this condition; unless any choose to say, that it hath been the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird, ever since popes and cardinals have made it their residence: for, unless this be admitted, it must be manifest to all men, that the prophecy is not yet fulfilled.—To the reasons before assigned for the ruin of this city, it is here added, that 'the merchants of the earth are waxed rich, through the abundance of her delicacies.' Her outward magnificence, luxury, and excess, have proved a source of immense wealth to vast multitudes; and the various arts, trades, manufactures, and species of commerce, which flourish by means of her pompous religion, have always helped to support it: for 'by that craft vast multitudes have their wealth.' Painting, sculpture, architecture, music, and all the fine arts, have also met with the most ample encouragement, and been cultivated, in the greatest perfection, in that splendid church. (Notes, 18:3-5. Acts 19:23-31. P. O. 21-31.) But the spiritual merchandise, by which unnumbered multitudes have wickedly lived in affluence, and enjoyed abundant delicacies, by the sins and follies of mankind, seem principally intended.

(1.) Bl. reads, 'and he cried with a strong voice.'
 V. 4-8. As Lot was called forth out of Sodom, before it was destroyed by fire and brimstone; (Notes, Gen. 19:14-22, 27-29.) so the people of God are directed, by a voice from heaven, to come out of Babylon before her fall. (Notes, Is. 52:11, 12. Jer. 50:7. 8. 51:6, 7, 45, 46.) This summons concerns all persons in every age. Those who believe in Christ, and 'worship God in the Spirit,' should separate from so corrupt a church, and from all others which copy her example of idolatry, persecution, cruelty, and tyranny; and avoid 'being partakers of her sins,' even if they have renounced her communion: or else they may expect to be involved in her plagues. (Note, 14:9-11.) As Rome has never hitherto been 'utterly burned with fire,' it is undeniable that events yet in futurity are predicted.

V. 9, 10. Some of the kings, who had previously supported the church of Rome, will adhere to her, even when the rest of them will unite in destroying her; (Note, 17:15-18.) and they will lament her fall, having been bigoted to her idolatries, and having lived in more abundant and excessive luxury and magnificence, through their alliance with her. They will, therefore, bewail at a distance, beholding 'the smoke of her burning' and torment, without being able to quench the one, or relieve the other: so that they must either at length renounce her, or share her doom. (Notes, 11-19. Ez. 23:16-23.) In this situation they will say, 'Alas! alas!' Or, 'Woe! woe!' for this will be the third woe before mentioned. (Note, 11:13, 14.) Not that the fall of Rome will terminate that woe; (though it will end with the pouring out of the 7th vial, and its immediate consequences;) for the events predicted in the following ch. will form a very considerable part of it. Nor is there any satisfactory proof, though it has generally been supposed, that the 2d woe-trumpet will end in the destruction of the Ottoman empire. (Note, 9:13-21.) On the contrary, it may perhaps subsist, in an enfeebled state, till after the fall of the western antichrist. This may be one grand mean of the national conversion of the Jews; and their restoration to their own land may produce the subversion of the Ottoman empire, the destruction of the Mohammedan delusion, and the calling of the other Gentiles. (Notes, Ez. 38: 39. Dan. 11:40-45.)—We ought not indeed to be confident in such matters; yet the arrangement of this and the two following chs. seems to favor the supposition: as the destruction of all Christ's implacable enemies, the conversion of the nations, and the binding of Satan, are predicted in order, after the fall of Rome. 19: 20:1-3.

24 And the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the <sup>ah</sup>bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: for thy merchants <sup>ai</sup>were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries <sup>aj</sup>were all nations deceived.

They stood afar off; even Babylon's friends will stand at a distance from her fall; though they had been partakers with her in her sins, and in her sinful pleasures and profits, they were unwilling to bear a share in her plagues. (2.) They made a grievous outcry,—Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city! (3.) They wept, and cast dust upon their heads, v. 19. The pleasures of sin are but for a season, and will end in dismal sorrow.

3. What was the cause of their mourning; not their sin, but their punishment. They did not lament their fall into idolatry, and luxury, and persecution, but their fall into ruin; the loss of their traffic, and of their wealth and power. The spirit of antichrist is a [selfish,] worldly spirit, and their sorrow a mere worldly sorrow; they do not lament for the anger of God, that was now fallen on them, but for the loss of their outward comforts. We have a large schedule and inventory of the wealth and merchandise of this city, all which was suddenly lost, v. 12, 13, and lost irrecoverably, v. 14. The church of God may fall for a time; but she shall rise again: but the fall of Babylon will be an utter overthrow, like that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Godly sorrow is some support under affliction, but mere worldly sorrow adds to the calamity.

V. 20—24. We have here an account of the joy and triumph there was both in heaven and earth at the irrecoverable fall of Babylon: while her own people were bewailing her, the servants of God are called to rejoice over her, v. 20. Here observe, How universal this joy would be, how just and reasonable; and that, because the fall of Babylon was an act of God's vindictive justice, and irrecoverable; and of this they were assured by a remarkable token, v. 21. An angel from heaven takes up a stone like a great millstone, and casts it into the sea, saying, Thus shall Babylon be thrown down with violence, and be found no more at all; the

V. 11—19. (17:3—5. Ez. 26: 27:12—25.) This lamentation of these 'merchants' over Rome, coincides in many respects with that of the merchants over Tyre. The various articles of commerce enumerated do not require particular consideration: the whole is calculated to convey, in the most impressive manner imaginable, some idea of the splendor, luxury, excess, and self-indulgence of all kinds, which have so long triumphed in the powerful, magnificent, elegant, luxurious, and licentious metropolis of popery; and which have always enriched a vast number of individuals, in different ways, by impoverishing the nations belonging to that communion. Neither is it requisite to accommodate the various particulars, to the several kinds of spiritual merchandise, by which the popes, cardinals, bishops, abbots, priests, and other retainers, have been enriched, at the expense of the people. These are indeed evidently alluded to; when not only 'slaves,' but 'the souls of men,' are mentioned as articles of commerce; which is, beyond comparison, the most infamous of all traffics that the demon of avarice ever devised; even almost infinitely more atrocious, than the infamous slave-trade. Yet, alas, it is very far from uncommon. The sale of indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, masses, and bulls, has always enriched the Romish clergy and their dependents, to the deceiving and destroying of the souls of millions; and thus 'by feigned words, they made merchandise of them;' nor has the management of church-preferments, and many other things, been any better than trafficking in souls; and it would be highly gratifying to Protestants, if we could say, that this merchandise has been peculiar to the Roman antichrist, and exclusively their guilt; and that none among us were 'partakers of their sins.' (Note, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—12. Note, Mat. 21:12, 13. P. O. 12—16.) In general, however, all this will at length come to nothing, and no man will 'buy the merchandise' of Rome any more: but all who have shared the gains of her commerce, temporal or spiritual, will stand afar off, for fear of her torment, and 'behold the smoke of her burning,' as that of Sodom was seen at a distance. (Gen. 19:28. Notes, Deut. 29:20—25. Is. 34:9—15. Dan. 7:9, 14.)—Probably, the destruction of Rome will be finished by some immediate judgment of God; and the nature of the soil in the vicinity, [where some geologists assert, that the crust of the earth, which incloses the central fire, is thinnest; see Cordier. Ep.] the frequent eruptions of subterraneous fires, and terrible earthquakes, which have often occurred, seem to point out the method: the combustibles are provided, and the train is already laid; there only wants the 'breath of the Almighty' to kindle it. (Note, Is. 30:33.)

(12.) Fine linen. 'Bussos; perhaps cotton. Silk was then a rare and dear commodity. See its history in Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of Roman Empire," ch. 40.' Woodh. Thyine wood. The cut, in the opposite column, shows the tree meant: it is thirty feet high, with horizontal branches, crossing each other at right angles: its hard, durable wood receives a fine polish.

(17.) It rejects 'the company.'

V. 20. While united numbers whose hopes of further gains will be gone, or whose vain confidence in superstition and idolatry will be ruined, shall lament most dolefully, and with anguish and trembling of heart, over the fall of Rome; the inhabitants of 'heaven,' and especially the 'holy apostles and prophets,' are called on to rejoice over it: as God had 'avenged them' on that idolatrous and persecuting city; as well as made way for the preaching of his Gospel to all nations. (Notes, 6: 9—11. 12:7—12. 16:4—7.)—It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that 'the apostles,' who are idolatrously honored at Rome, and daily worshipped, should be specially mentioned as rejoicing in her fall; as if 'avenged them' on her, for the dishonor cast on their characters, while it vindicated the glory of God. (Note, 13:5—7.)—There could be no reason why Christians should rejoice in the judgments inflicted on ancient Rome, by the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other idolatrous nations; for the Christians were peculiarly sufferers in those calamities. The judgments on papal Rome must therefore be exclusively intended. SCOTT.

V. 21—24. As a stone was tied to a book, and cast into the Euphrates, by Seraiah, in token of literal Babylon's fall; (Note, Jer. 51:61—61.) so 'a mighty angel' here cast a large millstone into the sea, to represent the violence of mystical Babylon's fall, and to show that she would never rise again. This event is further illustrated by varied emphatical expressions taken from the ancient prophets. (Notes, Is. 34:3—15. Jer. 25:10, 53:10, 11. Marg. Ref. c—g.)—But Rome is still standing, and flourishing, and is honored by many nations, as the metropolis of the Christian world; she still resounds with singers and musicians; she still excels in arts, which serve to pomp and luxury; she still abounds with candles, and lamps, and torches, burning even by day, as well as by night; and consequently this prophecy hath not been, but remains yet to be fulfilled.' Bp. Newton. Her merchants being said to be 'the great men of the earth,' in connexion with 'all nations being deceived by her sorceries,' plainly refers to the infamous traffic before mentioned. (21) No more at all. 11. 14. 22, 23. These repeated, varied, and emphatical negatives, should not pass unnoticed. (Notes, Is. 13:18—22. 14:21—23.) Of what other city, literal Babylon alone excepted, is such decisive language used, concerning its absolute and final destruction?

(23.) 'Fire, in prophetic language, implies utter destruction: Rome is Babylon; in a spiritual sense it is that she is to be burned and consumed in her corruption, superstition, and usurped dominion; not her buildings.' WOODIT.

Concluding Note. 'The denunciation of the judgment of Babylon, contained in the speech of the angel, and continued in the heavenly voice, seems principally intended for the support and comfort of the poor, persecuted Christian church, during the high zenith of the antichristian usurpation. To answer this purpose the more effectually, almost every part of the prophecy is taken from the prophetic denunciations of the O. T., against Babylon, Tyre, &c., which were known to be literally fulfilled. No other method could afford such perfect confidence to those, who, in the new Babylon, clearly discovered (and this happened in the 12th century as to papal Rome) the tyranny and wickedness of the old one.'

24 And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth.

1 God is praised in heaven for judging the great whore, and avenging the blood of his saints. 7 The marriage of the Lamb. 10 The angel will not be worshipped. 17 The fowls called to the great slaughter.

AND after these things I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia; Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God:

2 For true and righteous are his judgments: for he hath judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand.

3 And again they said, Alleluia. And her smoke rose up for ever and ever.

4 And the four and twenty elders and the four beasts fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying, Amen; Alleluia.

5 And a voice came out of the throne, saying, Praise our God all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great.

6 And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

7 Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.

8 And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints.

place should be no longer habitable by man, no work should be done there, no comfort enjoyed, no light seen there, but utter darkness and desolation, as the reward of her great wickedness; first, in deceiving the nations with her sorceries, and, secondly, in destroying and murdering those whom she could not deceive, v. 24. Such abominable sins deserved so great a ruin.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—4. The fall of Babylon being fixed and declared irrecoverable, in the foregoing ch., this begins with a holy triumph over her, in pursuance to the order there given, ch. 18: 20. They now gladly answer the call; and here you have, 1. The form of their thanksgiving, in that heavenly and most comprehensive word, Alleluia, praise ye the Lord; with this they begin, with this they go on, and with this they end, v. 4. their prayers are now turned into praises, their hosannas end in alleluias. 2. The matter of their thanksgiving; they praise Him for the truth of his Word, and the righteousness of his providential conduct, especially in this great event,—the ruin of Babylon, v. 2. 3. The effect of these their praises; when the angels and saints cried Alleluia, her fire burned more fiercely, and her smoke ascended for ever and ever, v. 3. The surest way to have our deliverances continued and completed, is, to give God the glory of what He has done for us. 4. The blessed harmony between the angels and the saints in this triumphant song, v. 4. the churches and their ministers take the melodious sound from the angels, and repeat it; falling down, and worshipping God, they cry, Amen, Alleluia.

PRACT. OBS. When collective bodies are ripe for vengeance, their sins will be punished in this world; but individuals are reserved unto 'the wrath to come.'—Alas! too often, injustice, oppression, fraud, avarice, or excessive indulgence, are connected with extensive commerce; and to number 'the persons of men,' with oxen, asses, sheep, and horses, as the stock of a farm, or with bales of goods, as the cargo of a ship, is no doubt a most detestable and antichristian practice, fit only for 'Babylon the Great.' Yet even this, cruel, unrighteous, and hateful as it is, must not be considered as the worst traffic, even of this our land: for the souls of men are traded for by those, who take the cure of them for the sake of the emolument, and the abundance of the delicacies obtained by it; and then either leave them to perish in ignorance, or poison them by heresy, or lead them on the road to hell by a profligate example; strenuously, and by every calumny, if stronger means are withheld, opposing all, who attempt to prevent the dire effects of their vile conduct. Many of these spiritual wickednesses, and this merchandise of souls, by feigned words, equivocating subscriptions and declarations, nay, worshipping God in expressions, which are avowedly deemed false by those who use them, and all this 'for filthy lucre's sake,' will be found, under different forms, even in the protestant churches: and perhaps no denomination is quite free from the guilt of rendering religious profession, and sacred functions, subservient to worldly interest, credit, ease, and indulgence. These are the remains of the antichristianity derived from Rome, which most need protesting against and removing; in these things we ought to 'come out and separate from Babylon,' if we would not partake of her plagues. Compared with such evils, a posture, a garb, or a ceremony, through perhaps inconvenient in itself, and derived from Rome, is scarcely worth noticing: yet bigotry exerts itself principally the other way; and externals are decried against with great warmth, while the spiritual pride, avarice, worldly indulgence, and intolerance of Rome are not so much disliked! But the vengeance of heaven is coming on Rome, not for gestures, garbs, and ceremonies, though multiplied, ridiculous, and of bad consequence in themselves; but for idolatry, ambition, oppression, cruelty to the people of God; imposture, avarice, licentiousness, and spiritual tyranny. But we must needs go out of the world, and the church too, if we renounce every religious society, because some of the members or leaders of it are criminal in such matters. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. XIX. V. 1—6. The repeated use of the word 'Alleluia,' or Hallelujah, which is Heb. (Ps. 106:1. 149:) is supposed by some persons to be an intimation, that the Jews will be converted about the time of the destruction of Rome; and, whatever may be thought of this, it is exceedingly probable that the accomplishment of the N. T. prophecies, in this respect, will be one principal mean of effecting that happy change, if it have not previously taken place. Sc.

V. 7, 8. Christ is the Bridegroom of his ransomed church; this sacred union will be fully completed in heaven; but the beginning of the glorious millennium may be considered as a remarkable celebration of his espousals on earth. (Notes, 21:1—4, 9—21. Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 1:2. 3:11. John 3:27—36. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27.) All that has hitherto been done seems to be merely an introduction to that happy era, when innumerable multitudes will be converted all over the earth, and the state of the church will greatly resemble heaven itself. Then 'the marriage of the Lamb' will come; and his espoused church, being purified from heresies, divisions, and antichristian corruptions, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice, will be 'made ready,' and meet to be publicly owned by Him, as his delight and his beloved. Then to her it will be granted to 'be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white,' or pure and shining, 'which is the righteousness of the saints.' The word is plural, and some would render it, 'the righteous acts of the saints;' but the word raiment, in this meaning, seems generally to signify, either the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, or the image of Christ renewed in them, by the sanctification of the Spirit, of which their righteous acts are effects and evidences; and indeed both senses may here be intended. (Notes, 7:13—17. Rom. 13:11—14. Gal. 3:26—29. 'That is, those good works, which are the certain evidences of a living faith.' SCOTT.)

Beza. (8.) 'This fine linen is both pure and bright. Pure, in regard of justification, because it presents us unblamable and unprovable before God, free from any spots or blot. Bright, in respect of the glory which it brings a man, both before God, who makes us heirs of his eternal kingdom, because of this purity of his love, which is made ours, as also before men, to whom it shows forth our adoption by those most goodly and glistering fruits thereof, which it makes to offer themselves readily to the view of men, by means of the Holy Ghost working together with us, and within us. And see how distinctly the Holy Ghost speaks in this place; for He saith, not that the justifications of the saints are fine linen, but contrarily, that fine linen are the justifications, and that not of the wicked, as a man is, when he is first converted to God, but of the saints; i. e. all justifications, even of those in whom piety most shines forth, flow not from a man's self, and from inherent matters of his own, but abide in the outward garment that comes unto him from without, namely, in Christ and his righteousness, whom we put in us by faith alone. It is a plain and manswerable place of Scripture, to confirm the doctrine of justification by faith only. And because of the double proof and evidence of our justification, one before God by faith, in which respect Christ is the white linen of the saints, another before men by the works of sanctification, therefore the Holy Ghost uses the word justifications in the plural, so to comprise in one word what was declared by two, pure and bright. For the works of holiness, if taken as they are office, though not in nature; I, as an angel and messenger of God, have the testimony of Jesus, a charge to be a witness for Him, and to testify concerning Him; and thou, as an apostle, having the Spirit of prophecy, hast the same testimony to give in; therefore we are in this brethren, and fellow-servants. He directs him to the true and only Object of religious worship; and that is, God; 'Worship God, and Him alone.' This fully condemns the practice, both of the papists in worshipping the elements of bread and wine, and saints and angels; and the practice of the Socinians and Arians, who do not believe that Christ is truly and by nature God, and yet pay Him religious worship; [the Socinians of the present age are not generally chargeable with this inconsistency;] and this shows what wretched fig-leaves all their evasions and excuses are, which they offer in their own vindication; they stand hereby convicted of idolatry by a messenger from heaven.

V. 11—21. No sooner was the marriage solemnized between Christ and his church, by the conversion of the Jews, than the glorious Head and Husband of the church is called out to a new expedition; which seems to be the great battle that was to be fought at Armageddon, foretold ch. 16: 16. Observe,

1. The description of the great Commander; his empire is in heaven: and He is again described as sitting on a white horse, to show the equity of the cause, and certainty of success: in his attributes He is faithful and true: his armor is a vesture dipt in blood: either his own blood, by which He purchased this mediatorial power; or the blood of his enemies, over whom He has always prevailed. His name is The Word of God,—a name none fully knows but Himself: only this we know, that this Word was God manifest in the flesh: but his perfections are incomprehensible by any creature.

2. The army He commands, v. 14. very large, made up of many armies: angels and saints followed, resembling Him in their armor of purity and righteousness; chosen, called, and faithful.

3. The weapons of his warfare,—a sharp sword proceeding from his mouth, v. 15. either the threatenings of the written Word, or rather, his word of command, calling on his followers to take a just revenge on his and their enemies, who are now put into the wine-press of the wrath of God, to be trodden under foot by Him.

4. The ensigns of his authority, his coat of arms,—a name written on his vesture and thigh, King of kings, and Lord of lords: asserting his authority and power, and the cause of the quarrel, v. 16.

5. An invitation given to the fowls of heaven, that they should come and see the battle, and share in the spoil and pillage of the field, v. 17, 18. intimating, that this great, decisive engagement should leave the enemies of the church a feast for the birds of prey, and that all the world should have cause to rejoice in the issue of it.

6. The battle joined; the enemy falls on with great fury, headed by the beast, and the kings of the earth: the powers of earth and hell gathered, to make their utmost effort, v. 19.

7. The victory gained by the great and glorious Head of the church; the beast and the false prophet, the leaders of the army, these are taken and cast into the burning lake, made incapable of molesting the church of God any more; and their followers, whether officers or common soldiers, are given up to military execution, and made a feast for the fowls of heaven. Though the divine vengeance will chiefly fall on the beast, and the false prophet, yet it will be no excuse to those who fight under their banner, that they only followed their leaders, and obeyed their command; since they would fight for them, they must fall and perish with them. Be wise NOW, therefore, O ye kings, be instructed, ye rulers of the earth; kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, Ps. 2: 10, 12.

CHAP. XX. This ch. is thought by some, to be the darkest part of all this prophecy: it is very probable the things contained in it are not yet accomplished; therefore, it is

PRACT. OBS. All heaven resounds with the high praises of God, whenever He executes his true and righteous judgments on those who corrupt the earth with pernicious principles and ungodly practices, and when He avenges the blood of his servants on their persecutors. Who then are they, that throw out insinuations, or openly speak of cruelty and tyranny, on hearing of these 'righteous judgments,' but rebels, who blasphemously take part with the enemies of God, and plead against his dealings towards them? Let all beware of every approach to such impiety and presumption; for 'the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.'—As 'justice and judgment are the basis of his throne,' the earth has cause to tremble; but, as it is established in mercy, also, the penitent may rejoice in hope. (Notes, Ps. 97:1—7. 99:1—3.)—If created angels are so severed from the righteousness of faith, are not pure; or if the righteousness of faith be considered apart from works of holiness, it is not bright or shining forth; for it is hidden within, far from the eyes of men.

V. 9, 10. An angel, either he from whom the voice is supposed to have come (5), or rather the angel who interpreted the foregoing vision, (17:7.) informed the apostle on this occasion, that those persons would be happy, in a peculiar manner and degree, who were 'invited to the marriage-supper of the Lamb.' (Mat. 22:1—14. Luke 14:15—24.) This seems especially to refer to the more abundant grace and consolation, that Christians will receive in those happy days which are coming. See.

glorious, as to surprise even the aged apostle into a purposed adoration; how glorious must the Lord of angels be! And if the highest of holy creatures greatly fear, and decidedly refuse, undue honor, how humbly should we sinful worms of the earth behave ourselves!—It behooves us to rejoice, and praise the Lord, when opposing tyrants are crushed, and false prophets are put to silence in darkness; and we should not scruple to add, 'So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.' Nevertheless, it is our part to aim at more peaceful and gentle victories; and, by our prayers, example, and improvement of talents, to seek the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of the souls even of our most cruel enemies and persecutors; while we constantly declare, that, 'except they repent, they will all likewise perish.'

V. 17—21. The 'angel standing in the sun,' emblematically denoted, that the predicted judgments would be rendered conspicuous to all the world, and his proclamation showed the immense slaughter which would be made of the enemies of God. To this place may be referred Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog; as the subsequent visions seem to relate to the millennium; (Notes, 20:7—10. Ez. 38:—48:.) for the total ruin of the eastern antichrist, and of all the opposers of the Gospel in Asia and elsewhere, seems to be intimately connected with the fall of the western antichrist.—Though Rome, 'the seat of the beast,' was destroyed, yet 'the beast' himself is supposed still to subsist: for the spirit of antichrist will survive that antichristian city.—'The false prophet' evidently denotes the same power, before designated as 'the two-horned beast'; and this effectually confirms the interpretation which has been given of that great enemy of God and his church.

wiser to content ourselves with general observations, than to be positive and particular in our explications.

V. 1—3. We have here a prophecy of the binding of Satan for a certain term of time, in which he should have much less power, and the church much more peace than before. Observe, 1. To whom this work of binding Satan is committed,—to an angel from heaven, very probably no other than the Lord Jesus Christ; the description of him will hardly agree with any other. 2. The means He uses in this work, a chain, and a key; a great chain to bind Satan, and the key of the prison in which he was to be confined. 3. The execution of this work, v. 2, 3. Neither the strength of the dragon, nor the subtlety of the serpent, was sufficient to rescue him. And He cast him down with force, and with a just vengeance, to his own place and prison, from which he had been permitted to break out, and disturb the churches, and deceive the nations; now he is brought back, and there laid in chains. He is shut up, and a seal set upon him; and Christ's lock and seal even the devils themselves cannot break open. We have the term of this confinement of Satan,—a thousand years; after which, he was to be loosed again for a little season. The church should have a considerable time of peace and prosperity, but all her trials were not yet over.

V. 4—6. We have here an account of the reign of the saints for the same time Satan continued bound; and here, observe, 1. Who they were, that received such honor,—those who had suffered for Christ, and all who had faithfully adhered to Him, not receiving the mark of the beast, nor worshipping his image; all who had kept themselves clear of pagan and papal idolatry. 2. The honor bestowed on them; (1.) They were raised from the dead, and restored to life, either literally, or figuratively; they were in a civil and political sense dead, and had a political resurrection; their liberties and privileges were revived and restored. (2.) Thrones, and NOTES. CHAP. XX. V. 2—5. 'Jones and Park have made good observations on the happy state to which the world may attain on the prevalence of true religion. Even the cessation of war, oppression, and misrule, with their attendant miseries, would have limited influence, in comparison with the wide diffusion of happiness which would ensue, from the improvements in private life, from the banishment of vice, ambition, and idleness; litigation and crime ceasing, and kindness and brotherly-love prevailing. This note cannot be closed more appropriately than in the words of Bp. Hall—"Oh, blessed Savior, what strange variety of conceits do I find concerning thy thousand years' reign! What riddles are there in that prophecy which no human tongue can read! Where to fix the beginning of that marvellous millenary, and where the end, and what manner of reign it shall be,—whether temporal or spiritual, on earth or in heaven, undergoes as many constructions as there are pens that have undertaken it; and yet when all is done, I see thine apostle speaks only of the souls of the martyrs reigning so long with Thee, not of thy reigning so long on earth with these martyrs. How busy are the tongues of men,—how are their brains taken up with the indeterminable construction of this enigmatical truth, when, in the mean time, the care of thy spiritual reign in their hearts is neglected.'" HENRY, abr.

V. 4—6. I am induced to understand it figuratively, by the following considerations: 1st. The whole book is enigmatical, and full of emblems: so that a literal exposition would often imply absurdity: and the interpreter's business and skill consists principally in explaining emblems, or hieroglyphics. A succession of kings is constantly spoken of, as if they were individually the same persons: the two witnesses who were slain, were raised again, and ascended into heaven; when others were sent forth of the same spirit, and to bear the same testimony with greater encouragement and success. (Notes, 11:3—14.) Rome is called Egypt, Sodom, Jerusalem, Babylon; and, in short, this is the style and manner of the whole prophecy, which no man could possibly explain on any other principle. As, therefore, the Jews expected Elijah to come personally, and knew him not when he came mystically, in John the Baptist; (Notes, Mat. 17:10—13. Luke 1:11—17.) so, I apprehend, many Christians, and men of the utmost respectability for piety and learning, have fallen into the same mistake, in expecting a literal and personal resurrection of the martyrs, at the opening of the millennium; and they would not know them at first, when they arose, (as the witnesses did,) in a numerous race of Christians, resembling them in all their most eminent graces. 2dly. It is unaccountable, that 'the souls' of the persons raised should be exclusively mentioned, if the literal resurrection of their bodies was meant: for this rather implies, according to the enigmatical style of the book, that their souls re-animated other bodies; i. e. they appeared to live again, in Christians of the same spirit. (Note, 6:9—11.) 3dly. Some have imagined, that the resurrection of all the righteous will precede the millennium; because 'the dead in Christ will rise first.' (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—23.) But what do they suppose the state of the earth will be during that period? Will no inhabitants dwell on earth except the risen saints? Or will all the other inhabitants be wicked? Or, being righteous, will they not die? Or, if they die, will there be three resurrections; one, of the righteous before the millennium, and another of the righteous after it, and one of the wicked? These questions are not easily resolved on that hypothesis: yet, till they are satisfactorily resolved, the sentiment is wholly inadmissible. The resurrection is always spoken of, as one grand event, occurring nearly at the same time; except, that the righteous will be first raised, and so be prepared to sit with Christ in judgment on the wicked: and it is implied in every one of those declarations, that all the dead in Christ will rise together, before the living shall be changed. (Notes, John 5:28,29. 1 Cor. 15:20—23. 1 Thes. 4:13—14.) 4thly. We cannot conceive, that it could add to the felicity of those, who, being absent from the body, are present with the Lord, (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:1—3. Phil. 1:21—26.) to come again to dwell on the earth; which must be in some degree a scene of pain, suffering, imperfection, and death, till the present state of things is fully ended: and this will not be till the general resurrection; as it sufficiently appears from the loosing of Satan, and the effects of it, after the millennium. (Note, 7—10.) 5thly. This is the only place, in which anything like such a literal resurrection, previous to the end of the world, is intimated; whereas, there are numerous prophecies of an universal prevalence and triumph of true religion throughout the earth. Now, is it most reasonable, to interpret so many plain predictions by one expression in this enigmatical book; or, to explain that one expression by the many clear predictions, which give another view of it? Or, why should the literal sense be here insisted on, when in so many places it must, in that case, be departed from? But why speak of the literal sense? I cannot see, how the resurrection of souls can literally mean the resurrection of bodies. Now, if the resurrection here spoken of be not a literal, but a figurative resurrection; the same reasons lead us to conclude, that Christ will not come down from heaven personally to reign on earth; but that He will reign spiritually in the prevalence of his Gospel, and by his Holy Spirit in the hearts of men in general. The Scriptures speak of his 'sitting on the right hand of God' in heaven, till He shall come again to judge the world. (Notes, 1:7. Mat. 25:31—33. Acts 1:9—12. 3:19—21. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Heb. 9:27,28.) Observe, that, in the last quotation, the coming of Christ to judge the world, is expressly called 'the second time,' but on the supposition which we combat, his coming to judgment will be the third time. The expressions concerning his coming to destroy Jerusalem, (Notes, Mat. 24:29—31. Mark 13:24—31.) and those that relate to his presence with, and coming to, his people, are stronger than any here used; yet no good expositor interprets them of his personal presence as Man, in the primary meaning of them. (Notes, Jn. 14:18—24.)—Some expositors compute the thousand years, after the same manner, as the 'three years and a half,' or '1260 days,' have been reckoned, each day to signify a year; which would extend this happy period, to 360,000 years at least: this, however, seems so much beyond all proportion to the past duration of the world, and so different from all the views elsewhere given of the speedy approach of the day of judgment, that it is not generally regarded. So that, on the whole, we may expect, that a thousand years will follow the final destruction of all the [selfish,] anti-christian, idolatrous, persecuting powers; during which, pure Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and universal holiness, will be diffused all over the earth; and that all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, superstition, heresy, false religion, injustice, fraud, oppression, cruelty, war, murder, intemperance, licentiousness, with all other evils, which now harass and desolate the earth, will be restrained by the omnipotent operation of the Holy Spirit; and that godliness, righteousness, peace, truth, purity, and love, will render the earth in some measure like heaven itself.—Hitherto, the depravity of human nature, and the malignant agency of apostate angels, have been illustrated and displayed, in the state of the world: and the inefficacy of all human inventions, and even of 'the Word of truth,' without the new-creating 'Spirit of truth,' to remedy these evils, has been demonstrated, in opposition to man's proud reasonings. The event of the trial has shown, that nothing, but the power of God Himself, can prevent men from listening to the temptations of fallen angels; or from despising, opposing, neglecting, or perverting, the Gospel of salvation itself. But at length the Lord will arise; by the almighty power of his providence, He will confine fallen angels; and by the omnipotent operation of his Spirit, He will new-create fallen men, generally all over the earth: and then repentance, faith, and holiness, will as certainly prevail, as impenitence, unbelief, and unholiness now do. Still, however, Christianity will be the religion of sinners, and there will be defects and sins in believers, and, doubtless, some unconverted persons, for a short part of their lives, at least: for men will be made holy by regeneration, not born holy: and, therefore, they will still continue liable to many natural evils, and to death. Yet that measure of righteousness, which such a prevalence of true Christianity must produce, will immensely lessen the quantity, even of natural evil.—We may easily perceive, what a variety of dreadful pains, diseases, and other grievous calamities, must cease, were all men true and consistent Christians. All the evils of public and private contention will be terminated: domestic, relative, and social felicity must be exceedingly enhanced. Industry in useful things, with frugality and temperance, would prevent that pinching poverty and distress, which now render multitudes wretched: and a greater fertility of the earth may reasonably be expected; according to the former fruitfulness of Canaan, contrasted with its present sterility. Every man will then [love his neighbor as himself, and] try to alleviate, instead of adding to, the unavoidable sorrows of all around him; nor shall they hurt or destroy in all the holy mountain' of God. The hope of glory, the prospects of a happy meeting in heaven, and the abundant consolations of the Holy Spirit, will render sickness, death, and the loss of beloved friends, far more tolerable

5 But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection.

6 Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

7 And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison,

8 And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, <sup>k</sup> Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea.

9 And <sup>m</sup> they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them.

10 And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake <sup>n</sup> of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

power of judgment were given to them; they were possessed of great honor, interest, and authority; I suppose, rather of a spiritual, than of a secular nature. (3.) They reigned with Christ 1000 years, in his spiritual and heavenly kingdom, in a glorious conformity to Him in wisdom, righteousness, and holiness, beyond what had been known before in the world; this is called the first resurrection. As for the wicked, they shall not be raised up, and restored to their power again till Satan be let loose; this may be called a resurrection, as the conversion of the Jews is said to be life from the dead. 3. The happiness of these servants of God is declared. (1.) They are blessed and holy, v. 6. None can be blessed but they that are holy; and all that are holy shall be blessed. These were holy, as a sort of first-fruits to God in this spiritual resurrection, and, as such, blessed by Him. (2.) They are seeured from the power of the second death; this is the death of the soul, eternal separation from God. The Lord grant we may never know what it is by experience! They who have had experience of a spiritual resurrection, are saved from the power of the second death.

V. 7—10. Here we have an account of the return of the church's troubles, and another mighty conflict, very sharp, but short and decisive. Satan's last efforts seem to be the greatest; the power now permitted to him, more unlimited than before, v. 8. We need not be too inquisitive as to what particular powers are meant by Gog and Magog, since the army was gathered from all parts of the world. The camp of the saints about, and the beloved city, is the spiritual Jerusalem, in which the most precious interests of the people of God are lodged. The army of the saints is described as drawn forth out of the city, and lying under the walls of it, to defend it; they were encamped about Jerusalem; but the army of the enemy was so much superior to that of the church, that they compassed them and their city about. God would, in an extraordinary and more immediate manner, fight this last and decisive battle for his people. The devil is now cast into hell, with his two great officers, the erable than at present: 'while communion with God,' and 'the communion of the saints,' all being of one heart in the worship and service of God, will make religion a constant feast to their souls; and only inferior to heavenly felicity, because not absolutely perfect. Every one must likewise perceive, how immensely the human species would be increased, if wars, many destructive employments, and intemperance were put an end to; and God's ordinance of marriage were generally substituted, instead of that compound of licentiousness and selfishness, which constitute a vicious celibacy, at least till the prime of life is past; or, that forced and prudential celibacy, which comparative or real poverty, united with distrust of Providence, often occasions; things which exceedingly tend to corrupt the morals of the human species; and to destroy the lives of both sexes in youth, almost as much as war itself. We may, therefore, readily allow, that the number of persons, who shall live on earth, during the millennium, may be immensely greater, than the whole multitude of all the preceding ages; and, consequently, that far more of the human race may yet be saved than shall perish; even though we do not agree to the computations which have been made concerning it.—The wild notions and extravagant practices, grafted on the belief of a millennium, have long rendered the name of it contemptible or hateful to numbers; yet we have as just grounds to expect such a happy event, as the Jews had to look for a Messiah; but those who suppose it will be a carnal millennium, are as much mistaken, as the Jews were in waiting for a temporal Deliverer. It is our duty to pray for the promised glorious days, and to do everything, in our private or public situations, which can be instrumental in preparing the way for them; even as David made abundant provision for the temple, which Solomon was to build.—Whether the general opinion, that this thousand years will be the seventh thousand from the creation, or the sabbatical millenary, the event must determine: it is evident, however, that the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant.—(5) The rest of, &c.] 'The dead church lives again, in the same metaphorical sense, in which the rest of the dead, the enemies of the church, live again at the end of the thousand years, when Satan is loosed, and gathers them to battle against the church. The "souls of them, who were slain for the testimony of Jesus, and for the Word of God," are those Christians, who were slain in the time of the ten persecutions; (Note, 6:9—11.) and the souls of them, who worshipped not the beast, are those Christians, who chose rather to die, . . . than to be guilty of Romish idolatry: and they are said to live again; as the heathen who had received the wound of death, lived again, in the succession of the antichristian beast, . . . who exercised the power of the heathen emperors over the earth, and revived the idolatry of the heathen empire: and, as the two witnesses, when slain, are said to live again; . . . because a succession of men of the same faith, and the same opposition to the beast, revive and flourish, after they are slain.' Whit. (Is. 26:19. Ez. 37:1—14)—It appears to me undoubted, that the fathers or early writers of the Christian church in general expected a millennium, and several of them a millennium not materially differing from that above described. Others, gradually following the impulse of imagination, speculation, and carnal passions, advanced sentiments on the subject, so extravagant, ridiculous, and even licentious, that sober, yet injudicious men, became ashamed of the general doctrine. Thus it was disgraced, and almost forgotten, during many centuries: but, about the era of the Reformation, it was again revived; and again still more deeply disgraced, by the wild reveries and practical atrocities of those who maintained it, and rendered it subservient to rebellious insurrections, and every abomination. But, for some considerable time past, the question concerning a millennium has been brought forward and discussed in a more sober and holy manner. Further, the restoration to purity, [love,] and peace, of the Christian church, will be connected with the conversion of the Jews, as a nation, and their reinstatement in their own land: and this will introduce the conversion of the nations, in which the converted Jews will be most diligent and successful instruments. This seems to be foretold in many prophecies already considered: yet the event alone can fully show the order, manner, and instruments of their accomplishment. Scott.

V. 7—10. God will remove the restraint which had been laid on Satan and his angels, perhaps, among other reasons, to show that the long continued happy estate of the world, was not the effect of any amelioration of human nature, as descended from fallen Adam, but of an immediate divine influence on the minds of men by regeneration, 'to the praise of the glory of his grace.'—It is in vain to inquire, who Gog and Magog will be, or whence they will come: for this also must be understood figuratively, to denote enemies fierce and numerous, as Gog and Magog had been before the millennium; and it is expressly said, that they 'were the nations in the four quarters,' or corners 'of the earth.'—When Satan and his angels shall be loosed, a few years will suffice to seduce multitudes into [selfishness] idolatry or infidelity; and then persecutions and massacres of Christians will be as natural as ever, and as readily resorted to; so that it will probably appear to the pious remnant, as if the cause of Christ was about to be altogether ruined. The opinion, that some remote nations will continue idolaters, during the whole term of the millennium, and, at the close of it, come forward as persecutors of the church, which some respectable writers have advanced, and almost taken for granted, seems to have no scriptural support, except that Gog and Magog are mentioned both by Ezekiel and John. (Notes, Ez. 38:39.) It is, however, indisputable, that Ezekiel's prophecy relates to events previous to the millennium; and John's, to transactions subsequent to it. Magog is generally supposed to have been the progenitor of the nations formerly called Scythians, and in modern times, Tartars; but not of them exclusively; and Gog may be considered as the name, or title, of their king. But, if the same nation be literally and exclusively meant, it may apply to the descendants of Magog, as well after the millennium, as before; and Gog (as Pharaoh, Ptolemy, &c.) may be still considered, as the title of their prince. This, however, can hardly be allowed; because Gog and Magog, in Ezekiel, come exclusively from 'the north quarters;'—Gog and Magog, in John, come 'from the four quarters of the earth.'—The supposition of whole nations continuing idolaters, throughout the millennium, cannot be made consistent with the general tenor of prophecy; or, in particular, with these predictions; 'The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ.' (Note, 11:15—18.) 'All kings shall fall down before Him, all nations shall do Him service.' (Note, Ps. 72: 8—11.) 'The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.' (Note, Hab. 2:12—14.) 'And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him.' (Notes, Dan. 2:34—36, 44, 45. 7:9—14.) Many others to the same effect might be adduced.—It cannot reasonably be supposed, that when Satan, with the beast and the false prophet, is removed, and prevented from deceiving the nations; that whole nations should still continue under the gross deception of open idolatry: and if human depravity alone be sufficient (as indeed it is) to account for this, how can it be conceived, that the same depravity should fail to stir up the idolaters to war against the church? Will then a perfect neutrality prevail? Will the zealous Christians of the millennium, during ten whole centuries at least, make no efforts to convert the idolatrous nations? Or, will these nations adhere to their idolatry, and yet show no enmity against those who zealously and perseveringly attempt their conversion? All this is so contrary to scriptural statements, and to the known and experienced propensities of human nature, that it is wonderful it should have been overlooked on this argument.—All over the earth, I apprehend, men will generally be changed by divine grace: but they will be holy, not by natural birth, but by regeneration. Their children will have the same fallen nature as ours have: and, if left unregenerate, and exposed to Satan's temptations and delusions, a few years will suffice to raise up Gog and Magog from the dead. (5.) The same causes will produce the same effects; enmity against God will express itself by enmity against his people; the old scenes will be acted over again, and religious wars, persecutions, and massacres, with attempts to exterminate the hated company, must follow more and more; did not God at once interpose to protect his friends, to destroy his enemies, and to bring forward the solemn and long expected day of judgment. Scott.

beast and the false prophet, tyranny and idolatry, to be there tormented night and day, for ever and ever.

V. 11—15. The utter destruction of the devil's kingdom very properly leads to an account of the day of judgment, which will soon determine every man's everlasting state; and we may be assured there will be a judgment, when we see the prince of this world is judged, John 16: 11. Here we have a description of it; where, observe, 1. The throne, and tribunal of judgment, great and white, very glorious, and perfectly just and righteous. 2. The appearance of the Judge, that is, the Lord Jesus Christ, who then put on such majesty and terror, that the earth and the heaven fled from his face, and there was no place found for them, 2 Pet. 3: 10. 3. The persons to be judged, v. 12. the dead, small and great; both young and old, low and high, poor and rich. 4. The rule of judgment settled; the books were opened: the book of God's omniscience, the book of the sinner's conscience, formerly secret, now open; and another book,—the book of the Scriptures, the statute-book of heaven, the rule of life; this book is opened, as containing the law by which the hearts and lives of men are to be tried; this book determines matter of right, the other books give evidence of matters of fact; some, by the other book, called the book of life, understand the book of God's eternal counsels; but that does not seem to belong to the affair of judgment; in eternal election God does not act judicially, but with absolute, sovereign freedom. Let it be our great concern to see on what terms we stand with our Bibles.

CHAP. XXI. Hitherto, the prophecy of this book has presented a very remarkable mixture of light and shade, in the conduct of Divine Providence toward the church in the world: now, at the close of all, the day breaks, and the shadows flee away; a new world now appears, the former being passed away. Some are willing to understand all that is said in these last two chs. of the state of the church even here on earth, in the glory of the latter days; but others, more probably, take it as a representation of the perfect and triumphant state of the church in heaven. Let but the faithful saints and servants of God wait a while, and they shall not only see, but enjoy, the perfect holiness and happiness of that world.

V. 1—8. 1. A new world now opens to our view, v. 1. a new heaven and a new earth; i. e. a new universe; and the new heaven, and the new earth, will not then be distinct; the very earth of the saints, their glorified bodies, will now be spiritual and heavenly, and suited to those pure and bright mansions. To make way for the commencement of this new world, the old world, with all its troubles and commotions, passed away.

2. In this new world the apostle saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from heaven, not locally, but as to its original: this new Jerusalem is the church of God, in its new and perfect state, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband, beautified with all perfection of wisdom and holiness, meet for the full fruition of the Lord Jesus Christ in glory.

3. The blessed presence of God with his people is here proclaimed and admired, v. 3. Observe, God with his church is the glory of the church; but it is a wonder a holy God should ever dwell with men: God's presence with his people in heaven will not be interrupted as it is on earth, but He will dwell with them continually. The present covenant, interest, and relation, between God and his people, will be filled up and perfected in heaven. They shall be his people; their souls shall be assimilated to Him, filled with all the love, honor, and delight in God, that their relation to Him requires; this shall be their perfect holiness, and He conjectured with safety. They are to be handed down to the church of the latter days, even as the prophecies we see fulfilled have been delivered to us, and with this consolation, that this overflowing of iniquity shall be miraculously and completely terminated. And it is the last successful effort of Satan against the church. He is then consigned to his eternal prison. Woodh.

V. 11—15. After the events above predicted, the end will speedily come; and there are no prophetic intimations of anything, which shall intervene, before the appearing of Christ to raise the dead, and to judge the world. 'It [the idea of the final judgment as here presented] is so plain, that it does not need, so majestic and grand that it exceeds, commentary and paraphrase.' Blackwall, in Scott.—Beyond doubt, it is the grandest idea, which ever was expressed in human language; unless some verses in the first of Genesis may be thought to rival it. 'And the books were opened.' This figuratively represents the discoveries, which will be made of all the thoughts, words, actions, motives, intentions, dispositions, obligations, advantages, and talents, of all men, by the divine omniscience; and the comparison of the whole with the holy law of God; and the recollection and consciousness, which every man will have of all his past actions, though he had long forgotten many of them, till thus brought to light and to remembrance. Thus an exact estimate will be made of every person's character; of the evidence and degree of his grace, and of his fruitfulness in good works, or of the aggravations or alleviations of his sins; and the final award will be made in perfect justice and impartiality, connected with truth and mercy. For 'another book was opened, which is the book of life;' otherwise, all must have been condemned. This is the emblem of the Lord's knowledge of his people; and his declaration of their repentance, faith, love, and good works, as evidential of their election, redemption, regeneration, and interest in his righteousness, and the blessings of the new covenant. Then death and hell, the grave, and the separate state, (represented as two persons,) will 'be cast into the lake of fire;' i. e. they shall subsist no longer, to receive the bodies and souls of men; there shall be no death in heaven; and all the wicked will be cast into the place of torment, in which death and the separate state will be swallowed up; for 'this is the second death,' the final separation of sinners from God, without hopes of being restored to his favor, or delivered from his wrath. Scott.

(12.) 'Here is evidently an allusion to the proceedings of human courts of judicature, as in Dan. 7:9, 10. To illustrate this striking imagery, remark, 1. The book of God's remembrance will be opened, Mal. 3:16. An exact register of every man's state before God. Here are recorded all his thoughts, words, and actions. A most awful book to all who die in their sins. 2. The book of conscience,—an exact counterpart of the former. 3. The book of the law. The law of nature will be the canon for those who have had no other; and the law of revelation for those to whom it has been manifested. But by the law can no flesh be justified. 4. The book of the Gospel. While this will be an awfully tremendous record against all who have died in impenitence and unbelief, it will be a blessed book to every true believer in Christ Jesus. 5. The book of life. In this book will be found recorded the names of all those who will actually be saved, and brought to the possession of eternal glory and happiness; the chosen of the Father, the redeemed of the Son, and the sanctified of the Holy Ghost. This book shows the perfect knowledge the omniscient God has of all those on whom He intends to bestow eternal life, and whom He has registered as members of the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven. Gauntlett. The same ideas are partly expressed by Gill.

NOTES. CHAP. XXI. V. 1—4. Some interpreters, especially among those who hold a literal resurrection at the beginning of the millennium, and the personal reign of Christ on earth for a thousand years, (Note, 20:4—6.) understand these concluding chs. principally of the state of the church on earth at that time. But they come in order subsequent to the account of the general judgment; and we can never attain to a satisfactory understanding of prophecy, if imagination or conjecture be allowed to carry us backward or forward, without any fixed principles. For example, there was a necessity of returning, at the beginning of the 12th ch. to the primitive times of Christianity; because another regular series of predictions is there evidently begun, after the other had been completed. (Notes, 10:2—4. 11:15—19. 12:1, 2) This creates a proper degree of prophetic obscurity; and when the key is found, it adds to the consistency, energy, and beauty of the whole. But, having now traced both parts of the book to the end of the world, and the final judgment with its consequences, it must introduce much perplexity, and occasion an appearance of uncertainty and ambiguity, to return back, without any necessity, to the preceding millennium. 'The holy city, coming down from heaven;' the whole church triumphant was shown to him under this emblem; that he might perceive and report something of its glory and felicity, according to man's capacity of apprehending heavenly things: and he thus learned, that its blessedness came wholly from God, and depended on Him. (1) There was no more sea.] 'Therefore this new heaven and new earth are not designed to take place, till after the general judgment: for at the general judgment, "the sea gave up the dead which were in it." (20:13.) Gog and Magog, the nations in the four corners of the earth, are deceived by Satan, after the expiration of the millennium; but Gog and Magog are not inhabitants of "the new heaven and the new earth."' Bp. Newton. (4) No more death.] M. R. m.—No expression equally strong on this particular, occurs in any part of Scripture, except where the heavenly state is evidently intended. Scott.

5 And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write; for these words are true and faithful.

6 And he said unto me, It is done. *I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely.

7 He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.

8 But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death.

[Practical Observations.]

9 And there came unto me one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife.

10 And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God,

11 Having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal;

12 And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel:

13 On the east three gates; on the north three gates; on the south three gates; and on the west three gates. 14 And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb.

15 And he that talked with me had a golden reed to measure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof.

will be their God; God Himself will be their God; his immediate presence with them, his love fully manifested to them, and his glory put upon them, will be their perfect happiness; then He will fully answer the character of the relation on his part, as they shall do on their part.

4. This new and blessed state will be free from all trouble and sorrow, v. 4. all the effects of former trouble shall be done away; all the causes of future sorrow shall be forever removed; therefore, There shall be no more sorrow nor crying.

5. The truth and certainty of this blessed state are ratified by the Word and promise of God, and ordered to be committed to writing, as matter of perpetual record, v. 5, 6. The subject-matter of this vision is so great, and of so great importance to the church and people of God, that they have need of the fullest assurances of it; and, indeed, it would be inconsistent with the goodness of God, and his love to his people, to create in them holy and heavenly desires, after this state, and then deny them their proper satisfaction.

6. The greatness of this future felicity is declared and illustrated, (1.) By its freeness; He gives of the water of life freely. (2.) The fulness of it; they inherit all things, v. 7. enjoying God, they enjoy all things, He is All in all. (3.) By the tenure and title by which they enjoy this blessedness; as the sons of God; a title of all others the most honorable, as resulting from so near and endeared a relation to God Himself, and the most sure and indefeasible, that can no more cease than the relation from which it results. (4.) By the vastly different state of the wicked; their misery helps to illustrate the glory and blessedness of the saints, and the distinguishing goodness of God toward them, v. 8. Here, observe, The sins of those who perish, among which are first mentioned their cowardliness and unbelief: they durst not encounter the difficulties of religion, and their slavish fear proceeded from their unbelief. Their punishment; They have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone: which is the second death. They could not burn at the stake for Christ, but they must burn in hell for sin. They must die another death after their natural death; the agonies and terrors of the first death, will consign them over to the far greater terrors and agonies of eternal death; to die and to be always dying. This misery will be their proper part and portion, what they have justly deserved, what they have, in effect, chosen, and what they have prepared themselves for by their sins.

V. 9-21. We have already considered the introduction to the vision of the new Jerusalem in a more general idea of the heavenly state; we now come to the vision;—the bride, the Lamb's wife, v. 10. i. e. the church of God in her glorious, perfect, triumphant state, under the resemblance of Jerusalem, having the glory of God shining in its lustre, as the bride, comely through the comeliness put on her by her Husband; glorious in her relation to Christ, in his favor now perfected in her, and in his favor shining upon her; see, in this new Jerusalem,

1. The wall for security. Heaven is a safe state. The height of it, is very great, v. 17. sufficient both for ornament and security, all built of the most precious stones, for firmness and lustre, v. 11. The form four-square, the length as large as the breadth, equal in purity and perfection; there shall be an absolute uniformity in the church triumphant. The measure gives room sufficient for all the people of God; many mansions in their Father's house. The foundation is, the promise

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-8. 'There remaineth a rest for the people of God;' and when the idolized objects of worldly men's affections and pursuits shall 'pass away, and be no more' for ever, believers shall enter 'the new heaven and the new earth,' 'in which dwelleth righteousness,' and where no tumultuous passions, anxious cares, or changing dispensations, shall disturb their repose to all eternity. What then should, for a single moment, divert us from seeking so vast a blessing? Or what words can suffice to express our admiring gratitude?—But surely, the curse is also set before us, in this scripture, as well as the blessing; and most loudly does Christ say to all, who hear his Word, 'Fear not them who can kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do;' when such cowards, as dare not own Christ on earth, are ranked with the most abominable sinners, as 'cast into the lake of fire and brimstone.' Should the Lord speak in thunder from heaven, and protest to sinners by name, that they were in the way to hell, it could not be more manifest than it is at present, if men would but notice it; for, while they live in infidelity, impiety, or any of the sins here or elsewhere enumerated, does not God say expressly to them, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish?' But, blessed be his name, He says also to the vilest, 'Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out.' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'

SCOTT.

(2.) Bl. rejects 'I John.'

V. 7. For 'all things,' Bloomf. reads 'these things.'

V. 8. 'There is then a fearfulness which alone is sufficient to cause our condemnation, as well as the other crimes here mentioned. It is not only that fear which causes us to deny and to abandon the faith; but that also which causes us to be wanting to important and essential duties, through fear of hurting our fortunes, our ease, and even our temporal and spiritual interests, and of creating ourselves enemies. True courage is, to fear nothing but God and displeasing Him. Real cowardice is, not to have courage to overcome self, nor renounce the creature, through the hope of enjoying the Creator. Quiesnel.' HENRY, abr.

V. 9-21. This city was illuminated, beautified, and rendered illustrious beyond expression, by 'the glory of God,' beaming full upon it; which shows that the happiness of heaven consists in immediate communications from God, and in conformity to Him. (Note, 22-27.) Thus the light, which shone on the city, was like the refulgency of the most admired jewels: the whole, as it appeared pendent in the air, shone with surprising lustre and beauty, and was 'transparent as crystal:' which may intimate, that our knowledge in heaven will be intuitive, certain, and productive of the most satisfying delight. The 'twelve foundations, inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles,' and formed of twelve precious stones, might show, that all who belonged to that holy city obtained their citizenship, by receiving and obeying the doctrine of the apostles respecting Christ and his salvation, as 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.' The whole city rests primarily on Christ Himself, 'the tried Foundation;' and, in a subordinate sense, on those who published and attested the true doctrine concerning Him, who will be honored there in a peculiar manner: nor will any person enter thither, who does not hold the doctrine of the apostles, in its grand outlines; for thus it has been believed by the church, ever since the first promise to fallen man. (Notes, Gen. 3:14, 15. Eph. 2:19-22.) The precious stones may denote, that all earthly splendor is mean and contemptible, compared with that of heaven; and that all possible excellency and glory will there combine, abound, and centre for ever. (Notes, Ex. 28:15-29. Is. 54:11-14.) The vast dimensions of the city, being an exact square, fifteen hundred miles on each side, might be emblematical of magnificence, and of room for all the multitude of inhabitants, which should ever enter it, however immense and innumerable. As it is inconceivable how a city could be fifteen hundred miles high, when it is said, that 'the length, breadth, and height were equal;' some conclude that no more is meant, than that the height was proportionable to the other dimensions. The whole, however, is enigmatical: and as a cube seems a kind of perfect form, perhaps the language is to be understood according to its obvious meaning; and then we may consider it as an intimation, that the reader is not allowed to form any gross conceptions of the city in his imagination, but to deduce instruction from it, as an emblem. It may also imply the stability, proportion, and uniformity of heavenly things, and the incomprehensible nature and glory of them. (Note, Eph. 3:14-19.)—The city, and the street of it, being 'of pure gold, as it were transparent glass,' may be an emblem of the union in heaven of those excellences, which seem here to be incompatible. 'They will be splendid, durable as the purest gold; clear and transparent as the finest glass. In that happy world, the beauties and advantages, which are here divided and incompatible, will unite and agree. Our glass is clear but brittle; our gold shining and solid, but opaque, and discovers only a surface. And thus it is with our minds. The powers of the imagination are lively and extensive, but transient and uncertain. The powers of the understanding are more solid and regular, but at the same time more slow and limited, and confined to the outside-properties of the few objects around us. but when we arrive within the veil, the perfections of the glass and gold will be combined, and the imperfections of each will entirely cease. Then we shall know more than we can now imagine. The glass will be all gold. And then we shall apprehend truth in its relations and consequences, not, as at present, by that tedious and fallible process which we call reasoning, but by a single glance of thought,

16 And the city lieth four-square, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length, and the breadth, and the height of it are equal.

17 And he measured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel.

18 And the building of the wall of it was of jasper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass.

19 And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald;

20 The fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysoprasus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst.

21 And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass.

22 And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it.

23 And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

24 And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it.

25 And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there.

26 And they shall bring the glory and honor of the nations into it.

27 And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

and power of God, and the purchase of Christ; as to matter, various and precious, set forth by 12 sorts of precious stones, denoting the variety and excellency of the doctrines of the Gospel, or of the graces of the Holy Spirit, or the personal excellences of the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. The gates for entrance; there is a free admission to all that are sanctified:—i. e. from all quarters of the earth there shall be some who shall get safe to heaven, and be received there, and there is as free entrance from one part of the world as the other, Ga. 3:28. The Pearl of great price (Christ) is our Way to God. Nothing is magnificent enough in this world fully to set forth the glory of heaven. Could we, in the glass of a strong imagination, contemplate such a city as is here described, even as to the exterior part of it, such a wall, and such gates, how amazing, how glorious, would the prospect be! And yet this is but a faint and dim representation of what heaven is in itself.

V. 22-27. The new Jerusalem has its several streets, in most exact order; every saint his proper mansion. There is converse in heaven; the saints are at rest [from disturbing thoughts]; but not passive; not in a state of sleep, but of delightful motion; the nations that are saved walk in the light of it; with Christ, and God, and one another, and all their steps are firm and clean.

1. The temple of the new Jerusalem; not material, made with men's hands, but altogether spiritual and divine; for the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof. There the saints are above the need of ordinances; when the end is attained, the means are no longer useful.

2. The light of this city. Where there is no light, there can be no lustre nor pleasure. What a dismal world would this be, if it were not for the light of the sun! Heaven is the inheritance of the saints in light; yet there is no sun nor moon shining there, v. 23. but the glory of God lightens that city, and the Lamb is the Light thereof. God in Christ will be an everlasting Fountain of knowledge and joy to the saints in heaven.

3. The inhabitants of this city; described by their numbers,—whole nations of saved souls; some out of all nations, and many out of some; by their dignity,—some of the kings and princes of the earth; by their continual accession and entrance into this city, some one or other coming in every hour and moment, at the always open gates.

4. The accommodations of this city; all the glory and honor of the nations shall be brought into it; whatever is excellent and valuable in this world, shall be there enjoyed in a more refined kind, and to a far greater degree.

5. And, lastly, the unmixed purity of all who belong to the new Jerusalem, v. 27. Hypocrites, such as make lies, say they are Jews, and are not, will creep into the churches of Christ on earth, and may lie concealed there, perhaps all their days; but they cannot intrude into the new Jerusalem.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1-5. The heavenly state, before described as a city, and called the new Jerusalem, is here described as a paradise; alluding to the earthly paradise which was lost by the sin of the first Adam;

PRACT. OBS. V. 9-27. The way in which the Lord teaches us the nature of heavenly glories, implies that we are poor, ignorant children, too apt to be pleased with trifles and externals; who must be spoken to in our own language; not being capable of knowing things as they are, or of fully relishing the pure and spiritual felicity of the celestial world. Yet, if anything draw off our affections from earthly objects, to seek 'a treasure in heaven,' and a permanent mansion in that blessed world, it will be well. 'Glorious things are' indeed here 'spoken of the city of God;' (Note, Ps. 87:3.) and the whole is well suited to raise our expectations, and enlarge our conceptions, of its security, peace, splendor, purity, and felicity; but, in proportion to our

as the sight pierces in an instant through the largest transparent body. The gold will be all glass.' Newton's Cardiphonia.—The twelve gates, made of as many vast pearls, may denote, that everything will be superlatively glorious, beyond all comparison with anything ever seen on earth.—The marg. ref. will show the reader, in a manner suited to excite a peculiar interest, that even in those things, which are stated as the glory of the antichristian harlot, the true spouse of Christ will infinitely exceed her. (Notes, 17:3-5.) SCOTT.

(9.) Bl. rejects 'unto me.' Ed. (10.) Bl. marks 'great' as doubtful. In. (12.) Private gentlemen had also their names on the doors and gates of their houses or country villas, in ancient Egypt. See Wilkinson.

V. 22-27. The temple was essential to Jerusalem, the holy city in Judea, as its great ornament and honor, and it made a prominent part in Ezekiel's vision of the church, as I suppose, during the millennium, under the emblem of the holy city. (Notes, Ez. 40:—48:) But 'there was no temple' in the mystical city that John saw; which is a demonstration, that the heavenly state was exclusively meant. In heaven there will be no need of external symbols of the Lord's presence. Neither will this holy city need 'the sun or moon to lighten it,' or any of the things which outwardly contribute to our comfort, and are suited to our state, on earth; for 'the glory of God will lighten it,' yea, the spirituality, we shall be more and more led to contemplate heaven, as filled with 'the glory of God,' and enlightened by the presence of the Lord Jesus, 'the Sun of righteousness,' and the Redeemer of lost sinners, knowing that 'in his presence is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore.' As nothing unclean can enter thither, let us be stirred up, by these glimpses of heavenly things, in giving diligence to 'cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God;' that we may be approved as 'Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile,' and have a sure evidence that we are written in the 'book of life of the Lamb that was slain, from the foundation of the world.' SCOTT.

Lamb 'will be the Light' and Felicity of it. (Notes, Ps. 36:5-9. 84:8-12. Is. 30:26. 60:15-22. Mal. 4:2, 3. 2 Cor. 4:3-6.) What words can more fully express the mysterious union and co-equality of the Son with the Father, in the Godhead?—Let the reader also compare carefully the language with that of those scriptures, which describe in most emphatical terms the most happy and glorious state of the church on earth; and while he perceives some of the same figures employed, he will likewise perceive that this passage is far more energetical than any of them.—The gates 'not shut by day,' and there being 'no night there,' emblematically and affectingly show the liberty, peace, security, and uninterrupted enjoyment of that blessed state; (Note, 7:13-17.) and as believers are 'the excellent of the earth,' and enter thither from every nation; so it may literally be said, that 'they bring the glory and honor of the nations into it;' as well as figuratively, in respect of its incomparable splendor and excellency. All the inhabitants are absolutely perfected in holiness, and all increase, share, and rejoice in each other's felicity; being excellent, loving, and lovely, beyond expression or imagination. (Is. 52:1. 2 Pet. 3:10-13.) SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. XXII. V. 1. 'The river clear,' or transparent, 'as crystal' may intimate, that the happiness of heaven greatly consists in a full, clear, and intuitive knowledge of God, and his glorious perfections and works, constantly exciting all holy and delightful affections in the heart. This river, 'proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb,' especially points to the quickening and sanctifying influences and consolations of the Holy Spirit, as given to sinners through Jesus Christ, to be the Author of spiritual and eternal life to their souls. (Ex. 17:5. 6. Is. 12:3. Jn. 4:10-15. 7:37-39.) This interpretation, which coincides with so many other scriptures, gives a peculiarly interesting view of the sacred Trinity; the Father, who sent his only begotten Son to be our Savior; the Son, who, having finished his work on earth, rose and ascended, and 'sat down with the Father on his throne, and ever liveth,' as Emmanuel, our divine, our incarnate Mediator, and the Holy Spirit, as 'proceeding from the Father and the Son,'

1. The river of paradise: the earthly paradise was well watered; no place can be pleasant or fruitful that is not so. This river is described, (1.) By its fountain-head,—the throne of God, and the Lamb. All our springs of grace, comfort, and glory, are in God; and flow from Him, through the mediation of the Lamb. (2.) By its quality,—pure, and clear as crystal. All the streams of earthly comfort are muddy; but these are clear, salutary, and refreshing, giving and preserving life, to those who drink of it.

2. The tree of life, in this paradise. Such a tree there was in the earthly paradise, Gen. 2:9. This far excels it. And observe, (1.) Its situation,—in the midst of the street, and on either side of the river; or, as better rendered, in the midst between the terrace-walk and the river. This tree of life is fed by the pure waters of the river that comes from the throne of God. The presence and perfections of God furnish out all the glory and blessedness of heaven. (2.) Its fruitfulness; many sorts of fruit, suited to the refined taste of all the saints; fruit at all times,—every month; this tree is never empty, never barren. In heaven there is not only a variety of pure and satisfying pleasures, but a continuance of them, and always fresh. The fruit is not only pleasant, but wholesome. The presence of God in heaven is the health and happiness of the saints.

3. The perfect freedom of this paradise from everything evil, v. 3. There shall be no more curse; no accursed one, no serpent there, as in the earthly paradise. They shall reign with Him for ever; their service shall be not only freedom, but honor and dominion.

V. 6—19. We have here a solemn ratification of the contents of this book, particularly of this last vision; though some think it may not only refer to the whole book, but to the whole New Test. yea, to the whole Bible, completing and confirming the canon of Scripture. And here, 1. This is confirmed by the name and nature of that God who gave out these discoveries; He is the Lord God, faithful and true, and so are all his sayings. 2. By the messengers He chose to reveal these things to the world; the holy angels showed them to holy men of God; and God would not employ his saints and angels in deceiving the world. 3. They will soon be confirmed by their accomplishment; they are things that must shortly be done; Christ will come quickly, and put all things out of doubt; and then they will prove the wise and happy men, who have believed and kept his words. 4. By the integrity of that angel who had been the apostle's guide and interpreter in these visions; he not only refused to accept religious adoration from John, but once and again reproved him for offering it. He who was so tender of the honor of God, and so displeased with what was a wrong to God, would never, in his name, lead the people of God into mere dreams and delusions; and it still is a further confirmation of the sincerity of this apostle, that he confesses his own sin and folly, into which he had now again relapsed, and he leaves this his failing on perpetual record; this shows he was a faithful and an impartial writer. 5. By the order given to leave the book of the prophecy open, to be perused by all, that they might labor to understand it, that they might make their objections against it, and compare the prophecy with the events. God here calls every one to witness to the declarations here made, v. 10. 6. By the effect this book, thus kept open, will have on men; those that are filthy and unjust, will take that occasion from thence to be more so; but it will confirm, strengthen, and further sancti-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—9. May the Lord show us the streams of 'the pure river of the water of life, which proceed out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb;' that, receiving the precious gift of the life-giving Spirit, we may be made meet for 'the inheritance of the saints in light.' All other streams are polluted, or will soon dry up; but this will flow, to apply, by his new-creating love and power, this salvation to our souls: that 'Glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end.' (M. R. d.)

(1.) Bl. rejects 'a pure.' En. V. 2—5. Tree of life. (Notes, 2:6, 7. Gen. 2:8, 9. 3:22—24.) This seems not here to mean a single tree, but a species of trees, which grew in the places of public resort, for the common benefit of all the inhabitants.—It is remarkable, that 'God and the Lamb,' are here spoken of as One, in such a manner, that we cannot determine to which of them the singular personal pronoun belongs. (Note, John 10:26—31.)—In that world of light and glory there will 'be no night,' no affliction, or dejection, no intermission of service and enjoyment; they will need no candle; no diversions or pleasures of man's devising will there be at all wanted; and even the outward comforts which God has provided, suited to our state in this world, will no longer be requisite. (Notes, 21:22—27. Mat. 22:23—33. 1 Cor. 15—39—49. Phil. 3:20, 21.) How very different is this view from a Mohammedan heaven, which could only please gross, sensual, and carnal men, if it were real! But indeed this, and various other notions of heavenly happiness, springing up, as new revelations from time to time, without excepting even the hope of philosophers, of enjoying the pleasure of 'learned society, an increasing knowledge of nature, and discoveries in science, beyond expression many and great, are mere delusions of the enemy, to soothe men into the opinion, that they may be happy without submission to the Gospel, and without the special favor and enjoyment of God, and without a renewal unto holiness; till the event shall awfully convince them of the fatal delusion. It is indeed most evident, that man, without revelation and regeneration, cannot conceive in what happiness consists. The most ingenious writers, of the pagans, fail in nothing more, than in describing the condition of their gods; who are represented as far removed from true happiness as from holiness, and liable to all the vexations of sinful men, with scarcely any peculiar satisfactions superior to what they enjoy; indeed differing little from them, except in power, knowledge, and exemption from death.—In the 292 opinions mentioned by Varro concerning the chief good, I apprehend that view here given of it by the apostle did not form one.—'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him.' 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.'

V. 6, 7. (21:5.) The angel's declaration in this passage, that the Lord God had sent him, compared with what follows (16), has been adduced as a conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ. Indeed, we meet with this doctrine, in one form or other, continually; and there is no way of avoiding it, but by rejecting, wholly or in part, the divine inspiration of those books in which it is so undeniably contained. Id.

(6.) Bl. rejects 'holy,' and inserts 'spirits of the.' En.

V. 8, 9. (Note, 19:9, 10.) While we are surprised, that the apostle should again fall into his former mistake, and need repeatedly the same admonition. We may observe the great wisdom of God in leaving him to do so. It has been remarked, that the idolatrous worship of saints and angels was one great abomination of that antichristian system, against which this whole prophecy is principally levelled; and here all palliations of that enormity are answered at once; for the most exalted and beneficent creature, when visibly present, would not allow the least appearance of adoration to be rendered to him; whereas, the papists worship creatures when not visibly present, and thus ascribe omnipresence and omniscience to them, as well as other divine honors! It also shows the weakness of the Socinian way of accounting for Stephen's adoration of Christ, because, say they, He was visibly present; but if He had not been also truly God, the martyr would nevertheless have been an idolater. Yet Christ neither reproved him, nor any other person, for showing Him this kind of honor, or any other, but, directly the contrary, He always honored those in a peculiar manner who thus honored Him. (Jn. 5:20—23. 20:24—29. Ac. 7:54—60. 10:24—26.) Sc.

V. 10—12. The Lord Jesus is undoubtedly the Speaker in these vs.: again appearing in vision to his apostle, to close the prophecy, as He had done at the opening of it. (Notes, 1:9—20.) Id.

(11.) 'What God permits, is often expressed in Holy Writ, by terms which imply commands, and of that which He says, it is done, the execution will follow, as if He had commanded it to be done. In the prophetic style, whether a thing be uttered in the past, the future, or in the imperative, it is equal; the imperative being really a future, and the future has frequently the force of an imperative. Daubuz.' HENRY, abr.

15 For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.

16 I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star.

17 And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.

18 For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book:

19 And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.

20 He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly; Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

fy those that are upright with God; it will be a savor of life to some, and of death to others, and so will appear to be from God, v. 12. 7. It will be Christ's rule of judgment at the great day; He will dispense rewards and punishments to men according as their works agree or disagree with the Word of God; therefore that Word itself must needs be faithful and true. 8. It is the Word of Him who is the Author, Finisher, and Rewarder of the faith and holiness of his people, v. 13, 14. the First and the Last, He who will give a right to the tree of life, and an entrance into heaven; and this will be a full confirmation of the truth and authority of his Word, since it contains the title and evidence of that confirmed state of holiness and happiness that remains for his people in heaven. 9. It is a book that condemns and excludes from heaven all wicked, unrighteous persons, and particularly those that love and make lies, v. 15. and therefore can never be itself a lie. 10. It is confirmed by the testimony of Jesus, who is the Spirit of prophecy. And this Jesus, as God, is the Root of David, though, as Man, his Offspring; a Person in whom all uncreated and created excellences meet; too great and too good to deceive his churches and the world. He is the Fountain of all light, the bright and the morning star; and as such has given to his churches this morning light of prophecy, to assure them of the light of that perfect day that is approaching. 11. It is confirmed by an open and general invitation to all, to come and partake of the promises and privileges of the Gospel, those streams of the water of life. 12. It is confirmed by the joint testimony of the Spirit of God, and that gracious Spirit that is in all the true members of the church of God; the Spirit and the bride join in testifying the truth and excellency of the Gospel. 13. Lastly, It is confirmed by a most solemn sanction, condemning and cursing all who should dare to corrupt or change the Word of God, either by adding to it, or taking from it, v. 18, 19. Such a fence as this, God set about the law, Deut. 4:2. and the whole Old Test. Mal. 4:4. and now in the most solemn manner about the whole Bible; assuring us that it is a book of the most sacred nature, divine authority, and of the last importance, and therefore the peculiar care of the great God.

V. 20, 21. 1. Christ's farewell to his church. If any say, 'Where is the promise of his coming, when so many ages are now past since this was written?' let them know, his coming will be sooner than they are aware, sooner than they are prepared, sooner than they desire; and to his people it will be seasonable; the vision is for an appointed time, and will not tarry; He will come quickly; let this word be always sounding in our ear, and let us give all diligence, that we may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless. 2. The church's hearty echo to Christ's promise: what comes from heaven in a promise, should be sent back to heaven in a prayer. The apostolical benediction closes the whole; The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. The Bible ends with a clear proof of the Godhead of Christ, since the Spirit of God teaches the apostle to bless his people in the name of Christ, and to beg from Christ a blessing for them; this is a proper act of adoration. It is by his grace that we must be kept in a joyful expectation of his glory, fitted for it, and preserved to it; and his glorious appearance will be welcome and joyful to those that are partakers of his grace and favor here; therefore to this most comprehensive prayer we should all add our hearty Amen; most earnestly thirsting after greater measures of the gracious influences of the blessed Jesus in our souls, and his

It is only by grace received from Christ that we can perform anything truly acceptable to God. Till we have obeyed this command, 1 John 3:22. we are under a sentence of condemnation which can never be reversed, but through faith in Christ. If we truly believe in Him, we shall not wish any demand of the law to be reversed, but shall labor after a perfect conformity to its every requirement. At the same time our pardon will not be on our own obedience, but on the finished work of Christ. Simeon.' HENRY, abr.

V. 16, 17. 'Christ's rising, in his incarnation, introduced the gospel-day; his rising in power introduceth the millennial day; his rising in the saving influences of his Spirit, introduceth the spiritual day of grace and comfort; and his appearance to judge the world, will introduce the eternal day of light, purity, and joy.' BROWN. (Note, 2:24—28.) 'The Spirit,' by the sacred Word, and by his convictions and influence in the sinner's conscience, says, 'Come' to Christ for salvation: (Notes, John 16:8—15) 'the Bride,' or the whole church militant and triumphant, says, 'Come,' and share our felicity. It therefore behooves every man, who hears the invitation, to call on others to 'come.' (Notes, Is. 2:2—5. Jer. 50:4—6. Mic. 4:1—3.) In fine, 'let every man,' throughout the earth, who 'thirsts' for salvation, 'come' to Christ. Nay, lest any should hesitate, as not able to determine whether their thirst be spiritual or not, it is added, 'Let whosoever will,' (or is willing,) 'come, and take of the water of life freely,' as he would take water from a well, which belonged in common to him and to all his neighbors: nor ought he think of paying for these blessings; except as he throws away his poison to receive food, or his dross to receive gold (Notes, 21:5—8. Is. 55:1—3. John 7:37—39. 2 Cor. 5:19—21. 6:1, 2.) SCOTT.

V. 18—21. As the Lord doubtless intended this for the conclusion of the sacred canon; and as the crime [of adding to, or taking away from, the Word of God] is similar, in respect of all other parts of the Word of God; it may fairly be applied to the whole written Word; and it warns every man, in the most awful manner, to 'add nothing to, and take nothing from,' what God has revealed, of doctrine, ordinance, or commandment; the standard of truth, the way of acceptance, the evidence of conversion, or the rule of duty. (Notes, Deut. 4:2. Prov. 30:5, 6. Mat. 15:3—14. Luke 11:52.) Enthusiasts, pretenders to new revelations, bigoted sectaries, and imposing churchmen, on the one hand, with infidels and skeptics on the other; and all who, to maintain their unscriptural tenets, or to exclude those mysteries which they reject, would either expunge part of the sacred canon, or invalidate its divine authority; with all those, who think or say, that it is of no consequence what men believe, (which takes away all doctrinal truth at once,) have abundant cause to tremble at this solemn warning. Critics, who are continually proposing conjectural alterations, or expunging from the text of Scripture, and adding to it, often on frivolous grounds, on slight authority, and in a dogmatical and self-confident spirit, I had almost said, in a wanton manner, are in no small danger; and expositors in general have abundant cause to be cautious and humble. Indeed, I am ready to tremble at the awful responsibility to which I have subjected myself, when I write on this testimony of Christ, and think of the work in which I have been, during so many years, engaged. But the merciful Savior will no more condemn unintentional mistakes, in the honest writer, who desires to help men to understand his Word, and proceeds in simple, humble dependence on his teaching, than He will [in] the honest preacher; and I trust this effort to explain his Holy Scriptures, though feeble and defective, has been conducted from proper motives, and in dependence on the Lord. I can confidently appeal to my heart-searching Judge, that I have, as far as I know, written, word for word, what I supposed He would have me write; without adding, altering, or keeping back, the sense of any passage, willingly, to serve any personal end, or party-interest, from fear of incurring reproach or opposition, or desire of conciliating the favor of any man or set of men whatever; and that the mistakes which have been made, were involuntary, the effects of ignorance and error, and not of design.—Men are sometimes apt to think, that if they could but see a miracle wrought in favor of religion, they would readily resign all their scruples, believe without doubt, and obey without reserve. The very thing that you desire, you have. You have the greatest and most striking of miracles, in the series of scripture-prophecies accomplished; accomplished, as we see, in the present state of almost all nations,—the Africans, the Egyptians, the Arabians, the Turks, the Jews, the Papists, the Protestants, Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, the seven churches of Asia, Jerusalem, and Rome. And this is not a transient miracle, ceasing almost as soon as performed; but is permanent, and protracted through the course of many generations. It is not a miracle delivered on the report of others, but it is subject to your own inspection and examination. It is not a miracle, exhibited only before a certain number of witnesses; but is open to the observation and contemplation of all mankind; and, after so many ages, is still growing, still improving to future ages. What stronger miracle, therefore, can you require for your conviction? Or, what will avail, if this be found ineffectual? Alas! if you reject the evidence of prophecy, 'neither would you be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.' What can be plainer? You see, or may see, with your own eyes, the scripture-prophecies accomplished; and if the scripture-prophecies are accomplished, the Scripture must be the Word of God; and if the Scripture is the Word of God, the Christian religion must be true.' Bp. Newton.

TABULAR VIEWS OF SEVERAL SCHEMES OF INTERPRETING REVELATION.

Woodhouse.

The annotations of Woodhouse are justly considered as among the most valuable of the numerous works on the Apocalypse.

The 4 horses of the first 4 seals, represent the going forth of some power divinely commissioned to effect changes upon the earth; the character of the change is to be collected from the color of the horse.

He then proceeds, in accordance with the scheme of interpretation adopted by Vitrina, which distinguishes the prophetic history of the seals from that of the trumpets.

The silence, 8:1. is preparatory to a change in the mode of exhibition, and in the series of the events, and the effects of the first act upon the earth are the commotions resulting from the reception of the Christian religion.

The mighty angel, ch. 10: is a created angel, and the book in his hand a portion of the larger sealed one, and possibly the same in part with the prophecies of Daniel, which were sealed in his time for a distant period.

As to the woman and the dragon, ch. 12: almost all agree, that the former represents the church of Christ, Methusias, who wrote as early as A. D. 290, applies it thus.

The beast, ch. 13: rising out of the sea, or the Gentile world, represents an oppressive and persecuting power, renewed and continued for ages, during 1260 years, even after the Roman empire had been divided into its ten horns or kingdoms.

The beast from the land, or false prophet, appears to denote a wide display of antichristian enormities in the whole Christian world, both West and East, verified in the papacy of the one part, and the Mohammedanism of the other.

The 21 relates to its further progress, and prophetically anticipates the fall of Babylon. The 31 warns of the Divine wrath.

With respect to the vials, the number, 7, denotes a complete visitation. The objects of the Divine vengeance are the enemies of the Lamb, and the persecutors of his followers.

The great harlot, the Mystical Babylon, is referred to the apostate Christian Rome. Her beast, like that of ch. 13: is the secular power, which has at all times persecuted the saints.

The white horse, ch. 19: Woodhouse identifies with the same emblem under the first seal, whose rider went forth conquering and to conquer, and has been pursuing his destined course, though not always equally in sight.

After the grand period of the millennium, another period of apostasy shall take place, but different from the former, as the same instruments are not employed.

The church of Christ being at length triumphant over its enemies, and Satan eternally brooded, nothing remains to describe but the general judgment, the process of which is shortly and sublimely related in figurative language.

Cuninghame.

His writings on prophecy have lately engaged much attention. He differs considerably from Faber and others; and writing later, can avoid some of their difficulties and mistakes.

He considers the events under the first 6 seals, as extending from the promulgation of Christianity to the consummation of all things. Those of the 7th seal he considers (with Vitrina and others) to include a new series of prophecies: indicated by the silence in heaven, 8:1.

The mighty Angel, ch. 10: is our Lord Himself, and the little book given to the prophet to eat, signifies that the time is arrived when the obscure prophecies of Dan. should be fully understood by the servants of the Lord.

The annexed table, taken, with some explanatory additions, from a diagram prefixed to his work, gives Cuninghame's view of the first 5 seals, and of the former part of the 7th seal, which he considers is parallel with them.

The events under the 6th seal chiefly describe the great revolution in the latter days, to precede the establishment of the kingdom of God. This commenced A. D. 1792, with the French revolution, indicated by the great earthquake, 6:12.

TABULAR VIEWS OF REVELATION.

which is to bring utter destruction upon the wicked. The 4 angels holding the winds, represent the 4 powers employed as instruments to procure this interval. The sealed, 7:4, appear to be the true members of Christ, set apart and saved from the general destruction of the ungodly, and the interval of peace has given occasion to new activity and more widely extended exertions in circulating the sacred Scriptures. The palm-bearing multitude he refers to the illustrious appearance and establishment of the kingdom of our Lord, described Dan. 7:13, 14, 27, being a portion of the professing church, left in the midst of the great tribulation, to be united to the faithful part, counted worthy of escaping the troubles which should come to pass.

Cuninghame's Tabular View.

The first Five Seals.				The Seventh Seal includes the events in these columns, as parallel with those in the first 5 Seals, and also those subsequent, which are parallel with the events of the Sixth Seal.
Seal I. White horse & crowned rider. A. D. 33 to 312. Triumphs of Gospel.		Silence in heaven, ch. 8:1. (indicating new series of prophecies.) Increase offered, 3, 4, (the prayers of the saints.) Fire cast on earth, (wrath of God on Roman empire.) Earthquake, A. D. 312-324. Paganism ceased.		Woman clothed with sun (is the church), has a man child (Christ formed in his members). About 313-324.		War of Michael & dragon, who is cast out of heaven.
Seal II. Fire-colored horse, his rider with a great sword, begins about 319. Discord & dissension in the church.		The Trumpets. 1 Visigoths, A. D. 376 2 Alaric . . . 395 3 Attila . . . 411 4 Genseric . . . 455 5 Odoacer . . . 476 Irruptions of Goths and Vandals.		The woman flies into the wilderness. (The church is concealed and invisible, and no longer has spiritual children.)		Dragon (devil) persecutes woman, and casts out flood of waters after her. (Hosts of enemies and bitter afflictions and sufferings of the church.)
Seal III. Black horse, his rider with a yoke, begins about A. D. 500. Papal yoke during dark ages.		This space represents A. D. 533. Fifth trumpet, or woe 1. Fallen star opens pit (bishop of Rome) about A. D. 533. Locusts about 622.		Edict of Justinian acknowledging the pope. Temple measured. (Invisible church.) Outer court left out, and given to the Gentiles, who occupy it during the 1260 yrs. (Visible professing church occupied by degenerate professors.) Temple in heaven, or holy of holies, (signifying heaven,) shut during the 1260 years. Also a symbol of future and glorious kingdom of Christ on earth, when tabernacle of God shall be with men.		The 1260 years begin. The woman is nourished in wilderness, and her seed is persecuted by Dragon during the 1260 years. (True Christians sought out and persecuted with malignant activity.)
Seal IV. Pale, livid-green horse, his rider death, followed by hell, begins about A. D. 1200. Papal persecutions.		Sixth trumpet, or woe 2. Euphratians angels loosed, prepared to slay 3rd part of men, (The Turks,) begins about A. D. 1302, ends (at peace Carlowitz) A. D. 1699, (since which period Turkish empire has been on decline.)		The 2 witnesses (true spiritual church) prophesy in sackcloth, 1260 years, (testify against corruptions.) Saino, A. D. 1548. (The interim in Germany.) Rise, 1551. Ascend to symbolical heaven, 1552 (Security from peace of Passau.) The earthquake, which overthrows a tenth part of city, begins, A. D. 1597, ends A. D. 1638. (Reformation & separation of Engl. from papal yoke.)		The Ten-horned beast (Roman empire after its division) has power to continue 1260 yrs. Co temporary with it is two-horned beast (papacy) and imperious age, (church deformed and corrupted.)
Seal V. Souls of slain martyrs (the church, apparently extirpated) cry for vengeance, about A. D. 1500. White robes given them about 1532. Improved state of church in consequence of Reformation.		This line represents A. D. 1792, (French revolution,) and 1260 yrs.

Seal VI. Seventh Trumpet, &c. see the following summary. The preceding table represents his views, with reference to that part of the events under the 7th seal, prior to A. D. 1792, when he considers that the Ancient days came, and the judgment began to sit, to take away the dominion of the little horn, to coalesce it into the ead, Dan. 7:21. It remains to state his views as to the latter part of this seal. We now enter upon Rev. 14: The 144,000 sealed being placed on Zion, indicates the security and final salvation of the true church during the awful convulsions of the great earthquake, the first shock of which took place at the French revolution in 1792, when the 7th trumpet began to sound. Although believers may suffer many things as individual persons, the church, as a body, shall be saved. The first proclaiming angel, v. 6, is supposed to represent a preaching of the Gospel much more extensive than any that preceded it, and a diffusion of the written Word throughout the world, in a manner and with a rapidity before unexampled. These events are now receiving their accomplishment. The going forth of the 21 and 31 angels are yet future, though already preparing; and, when Babylon is fallen and the beast slain, the church will enter into the glorious state of rest. The advent of Christ is next referred to, with the gathering in of his elect, symbolized by the harvest and the treading of the wine-press, which prefigure the dreadful destruction of the nations assembled together against the people of God.

The pouring forth of the vials or bowls, he also refers to the period of the French revolution. Vial I signifies the diffusion of the principles of anarchy and insubordination, which accompanied the national avowal of atheism at that period. These principles of irreligion and insubordination have been the germ and fruitful source of all the fearful calamities since poured forth on Europe. 2. The destruction of human life in massacres and campaigns, among the French nation, as the most numerous body of people in the Roman world. 3. The loss of life in the other smaller nations and states. 4. The symbolical sun represents the government of France, whether republican or imperial, ruining by ravages and exactions, and tormenting the men of the Roman earth yet they make an attempt to avert the wrath of God by timely repentance. 5. The seat of the beast is considered to denote successively Austria and France, distressed during the revolutionary and imperial wars, and since then the vial is poured upon England; the counsels of the kingdom on which it descends being smitten with blindness and foolishness. 6. The Euphrates is considered to denote the Ottoman empire, hastening to decay; the Kings of the East probably denote the Jews, but the accomplishment of the events here shadowed forth, is yet future. The 3 unclean spirits are now manifestly at work,—the spirit of atheism, or infidelity and anarchy, from the mouth of the dragon or Satan himself; the spirit of despotism from the mouth of the beast; and the spirit of popery from the mouth of the false prophet. 7. The symbolical air represents the political and ecclesiastical constitutions of the states, agitated throughout the bestial empire, the earthquake of the 6th seal, and that of the 7th trumpet and the 7th vial, being the same, all these passages affording different views of the last great revolution, which immediately precedes the 21 advent. And the vision of the 4 angels holding the 4 winds of the earth, relates to an interval of peace in the midst of the earthquake, granted for the purpose of sealing the elect, typifying the mighty confederacy led on by 4 great powers which lately gave peace to Europe. Thus the pouring out the 7th vial is for the present (1832) suspended. The division into three parts probably will be religious or political, or it may be taken a 3-fold division of the states under the 3 unclean spirits. Great Babylon betokens the Roman church, and the islands and mountains removed mean states and kingdoms, overthrown and disappearing; the great hail, the fierce and relentless wars since 1792.

He says, "The effects of the 7th vial are detailed more fully in chs. 17, 18, 19, but as the greater part are still future, we must wait patiently until events throw light upon them. But all the revolutionary changes which take place in consequence of the effusion of this vial into this symbolical air, will tend to prepare the Roman empire for that last blasphemous opposition to the Lamb, in which it shall perish." He does not consider any national reformation is likely to take place in the Western empire. Many individuals will probably be awakened to true repentance, but the great iniquity will wax worse and worse, and bring down upon themselves the signal vengeance of the Almighty Word of Jehovah, in the day of Armageddon. But it would be very rash to form conjectures with regard to the shape the empire will assume preparatory to that event. That day is also mentioned under the 6th vial as the object of the last confederacy, which may be to oppose the purposes of God with respect to the Jews, whose conversion will proceed with accelerated velocity during the remainder of the period of the pouring forth of the vials; some being converted at their restoration, but the greater part still remaining unconverted.

Thus he supposes the 7 vials are contemporaneously poured out on the different parts of the same symbolical world. 1. Affects the political, religious, and moral principles of the people. 2 and 3. Causes the slaughter of its inhabitants. 4. Affects the imperial power in its influential effects upon human happiness. 5. Affects the same as to its authority and stability. 6. Destroys the Ottoman power. 7. Dissolves the whole frame of the political and ecclesiastical government of the empire.

In reference to the destruction of Babylon by fire, by whatever means it is effected, the incorrigibly wicked will be exterminated from the earth before the millennium, and amidst these dark scenes of deepening judgments, he thinks the future fates of England will be unfavorable.

Scripture shows the advent of our Lord will take place, before the loosing of the winds, or the outbreak of desolations, while men are saying peace and safety, busily occupied with the affairs and even the frivolities of the world, yet in a season of shaking, and alarm, and fear, when the hearts of men are filled with dismay. Both those states of mind he considers as exhibited in the events of the times wherein we live, and that we have entered into the last period of awful expectation, during which the church is likened to the ten virgins, Mat. 25. He considers, that the coming of our Lord is just at hand, when the dead saints will spring from the dust, and the living saints in a moment be changed, and both together will be rapt up above the clouds, to meet Him long before He is seen by the inhabitants of the earth. He does not consider that the restoration of the Jews will precede this advent, but that it will begin just at the rapture of the saints, and that they are to be led through the wilderness as formerly, by the pillar of a cloud by day, and of fire by night, without knowing their conductor as the crucified Nazarene, their discovery of Him belonging to a later period. At this time the whirlwind of wrath will go forth against the Roman earth, the political heavens will pass away as a scroll, the war of Armageddon will commence, and in its progress make the world a wilderness, probably beginning as an intestine war of the nations against themselves. A long interval is to elapse between the first appearance of our Lord above the clouds, and the descent mentioned, Zech. 14:4, 5, and Rev. 19:11. During the whole of this interval the glorified church shall be with our Lord in the air, in the higher region of the atmosphere above the clouds; a part of the church, however, being left in the midst of the great tribulation, to form the nucleus of the innumerable company of palm-bearers. But here we may stop; Cuninghame himself states, that he wishes his further views respecting this multitude "to be considered simply as conjecture." Henry, abr.

Mede.

He is considered the father of modern interpreters, from his ability in advocating synchronizations; of which he makes 7. A Diagram of his interpretation is given.

The 7 vials portend gradations of the ruin of the beast, beginning when the Waldenses and others began to renounce its authority. This method of arranging the vials under the Sixth trumpet, is considered the most defective part of Mede's scheme.

The little open book, or the latter series of prophecy.

Henry, abr.

Croly.

His view differs from others. He considers Rev. a collection of Divine visions, seen probably at different times, and divides the contents into 6 portions. I. the vision of the Asiatic persecution, 1-3: II. Vision of the seals, or general view of providence, in governing the church and world, 4-7: III. Vision of the trumpets, 8-11: IV. Vision of the vials, chs. 15, 16, with the connected chapters, 17, 18, 19. V. Vision of the church, distinguished into 3 eras, pagan persecution, papal persecution, and the catastrophe of the persecutors, 12-14: VI. Vision of the triumph of Christianity, 20-22: But if Mede's interpretation is justly considered objectionable, from the too great prominence it gives to secular events of the Roman empire, Croly's will probably be disapproved, from its being as restricted in its application, although to a Roman empire, more spiritual in its nature. Nearly the whole of the seals, trumpets, and vials are referred by him exclusively to the papacy and the French revolution.

TABULAR VIEWS OF REVELATION.

Faber.

His scheme is the most elaborate, and deserves special notice, as it purports to be the most complete, embracing and harmonizing the prophecies of Daniel and John. Townsend says, it solves more difficulties, answers more objections, and throws a brighter lustre on some of the more involved passages of Revelation, than any other; though of course it fails in some points, and from lack of judgment. We abridge from Faber's B. C. Chronology of the Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 1823.

Perhaps the reader would refer the seals to the Roman empire. Then, the 1st seal is applied to that era which commenced from the death of Domitian, A. D. 96, and extended to the accession of Commodus, A. D. 180, a period happy and prosperous as to public events. Thus the first spectacle revealed to the prophet would be the commencement or going forth of an era of prosperity and beneficent government, which then actually began in the Roman empire, and continued under 5 successive emperors, for nearly a century, in which time also the empire was enlarged by distant conquests. (In Poole's Annotations, the 1st seal is also considered as referring to the Roman emperors, armed with power.) The red horse of civil war, and the great sword wherewith men should kill one another, mark the period, from A. D. 130 to 378, during which there were 25 emperors, not to mention pretenders, of whom 32 perished by the sword of conspiracy or war. The 3d and 4th seals may represent the state of the empire from A. D. 376 to A. D. 456, as over-ridden and enslaved by the rider on the black horse, the barbarians, Goths, and Germans, bringing bondage and famine upon the land; and the pale or livid-colored horse, marking the period when the ruin of the empire was sealed by the ravages of the Huns and Vandals, when the miserable countries of the Roman world were exhausted by war, pestilence, and famine, and in some provinces the human species was almost extirpated.

Of this interval Robertson speaks, as the period in the world's history, during which the condition of the human race was the most calamitous and afflicted. Id.

More.

The following is the description of the curious diagram we have given on the colored page, opposite, from the rare work of Henry Moie, D. D., entitled 'Apocalypsis Apocalypsois,' 1680.

Let AD be the principal line of the Apocalyptic scheme, divided into 3 parts, AB, BC, CD, and let the whole semicircle AZD, contain the prophecy of the Sealed Book, but the semicircle AND, the prophecy of the Opened Book. But of those two particular semicircles ALB, and BRD, the former contains the first 6 Seals, the latter the 7th, which comprehends the 7 Trumpets. The 6 first of which trumpets the semicircle BMC includes, and the semicircle CDN the 7th, distributed into 7 Thunders, 1, 11, 111, IV, &c. as are the seals and trumpets. To this line of Seals, Trumpets, and Thunders, all the rest of the visions, not only of the Opened Book, but of the seven churches, may some way be annexed and applied by synchronisms, either proper and perfect, or imperfect and partial, as we shall advertise as we go through them.

AEB is the Woman in travail, 12:1.; AFB, the Court of the Temple and Altar, commensurate, 11:1.; AGB, the fight of Michael with the Dragon about the Woman, 12:4, 7, 8.; ABR, the church of Ephesus, or the Ephesine interval, contemporizing in part with the 1st Seal, 2:1.; RIK, Smyrnan do., which contemporizes with the latter part of the 1st Seal, and with the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th Seals, and with the fore part of the 6th, 2:3.

The medial visions now follow, where BC is the company of the 144,000 servants of God, sealed, 7:3.; BDC, the outward Court trodden down, ch. 11.; BEC, the 2 Witnesses in sackcloth, prophesying 1260 days, ch. 11.; Be C, the same slain, and lying in the great city 3 1-2 days; BFC, the Woman in the wilderness, 12:6, 14; BGC, the 7 headed 10 horned Beast, whose deadly wound is healed, 13:3.; BHC, the 2 horned Beast, or false Prophet, the restorer or healer of the Beast, 13:11.; BIC, the Virgin company of 144,000, sealed of the Lamb, 14:1.; BKC, that great City, the Whore of Babylon, 17:3, 8.; KPR, the Pergamian interval, containing the latter part of the 6th seal, and with the 5 first trumpets. RQC is the Thyatirian interval, synchronizing with some small part of the 5th and with the whole 6th trumpet! As for LNC and MC, in these visions, and CEH and G II, in the following, they respect the voices of the 3 angels, the 1st is assigned to the times of the Turks taking Constantinople, the 2d to the appearing of the Reformation, the 3d to about the times of the 4th Vial.

Of the post-medial visions; CAH, HYP, PZQ, Q q R, R r S, S p T, and T o D, are the 7 antisynchronisms of the 7 Thunders; CAH, the interval of the 7 Vials, ch. 16.; CPH, the compendium of the vials, 11:35. &c. CBO is the interval of the Sardian church, contemporizing with the interval of the 6 first vials, 3:1. GH comprehends 3 combinations of synchronal Visions, the vision of the Harvest and the Wine-press, 14: 15, 18.; of the 6th and 7th Vial, 16:12.; of the preparation of the Bride, and of the battle of the Rider of the White Horse, 19:7, 11.

HYP is the New Jerusalem descending from heaven; HIR, the laying hold of Satan; PZQ, the thousand years' reign of Christ on earth; PLQ, the imprisoning of Satan during it, ch. 20.; HMQ, the palm bearing Company, 7:9.; OWQ, the interval of the Philadelphian church, 3:7, beginning with the 7th vial, and ending at the commencement of the 4th antisynchronal Q q R, which is the losing of Satan, 10:3.; R r S, the besieging of the holy city by Gog and Magog, 20:7.; S p T, the coming of Christ to judgment, 20:11.; PVT, a continuance of the New Jerusalem, or holy city, contemporizing with the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th antisynchronals. PNT, the wicked rabble (contemporizing with the same antisynchronals) excluded out of the holy city, 22: 15.; QXT, the interval of the church of Laodicea, 3:14.; T o D, the conflagration of the earth, 20:14.; T e D, the consummate happiness of the Saints.

This is the description of all my synchronisms belonging to the Apocalyptic Visions, which differ from the synchronisms of Mr. Mede, (besides that he meddled not with the 7 churches, nor made the 3 1-2 days the same with the 1260,) only in this, that I place all the Vials after the middle synchronals under the 1st Thunder of the 7th Trumpet, he 6 of them before the 7th Trumpet, and that he does not distinguish the 7th Trumpet into 7 Thunders, in his table, as I have done, and therefore makes the binding of Satan and millennial reign of Christ, &c. to commence immediately (and consequently the reign of the beast quite to expire) at the beginning of that trumpet, whereas, in truth, the entireness of his kingdom only then expires. Ed.

It would not be difficult to add 20 other schemes of interpretation to those already given, and for the most part differing widely from them, but the reader probably is already more than satisfied. We may however remark, in reference to these, that, although each is, and must be incorrect in some respects, yet they may be considered to include among them the soundest and best interpretations which have been given, and those which it may be believed, will be found to approximate nearly to the truth in many respects, when it shall please the Most High to lift the remainder of the veil which yet covers a large portion of this book.

Durham cautions to avoid those expositors, who enervate the scope and ground of the book, which is, to show things belonging to the church and Christ's servants peculiarly, and especially to show the trials of the church from inward enemies, and the spiritual hurt and defection that is to come on the church.

One valuable feature, common to Mede, Faber, Cuninghame, and Woodhouse, is, that they seldom attempt to make any individual application of the symbols; and it may be remarked, that wherever they have so done, their interpretation will be found the least satisfactory, and the most easily set aside by their opponents. The commentaries of Vitrina (whom Woodhouse says, he found by far the most useful of all) and Gill will be found to contain much that is valuable, and notice most of the views given by the leading commentators of recent date, expressed in terms free from a dictatorial spirit, and void of censure towards those who may differ. The readers of these, and some other older commentators, will be surprised to find how few ideas, really novel and original, have of late been brought forward, even by the wilder theorists, excepting in their application to events of very recent date, in which many have been so much inclined to indulge, but here the expositor always treads upon dangerous ground. Events of our own times present themselves in such strong points of view, and appear in such glowing colors, that it is difficult to avoid the temptation to apply them to some symbolical representations in this mysterious book. Henry, abr.

SUPPLEMENT

COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY.

To render the COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY the most complete work of the kind in the English language, and as perfect a help to the study of the Bible as possible, the publishers have issued a supplementary volume, uniform in size, paper, binding, and price, with the regular volumes, and superintended by the same editor. Its principal contents are as follows:

I. A VERY FULL AND COMPLETE ALPHABETICAL INDEX OF ALL the matters discussed in the Commentary.

The importance of this must be obvious. It will enable any one to turn, readily and without delay, to every passage in the Bible and Commentary where any given fact, opinion, or sentiment is touched upon; thus bringing together, for comparison, on each topic, all the different remarks scattered through more than 4000 pages; saving much time, which must, for want of such a help, be consumed in tedious researches, oftentimes in a great degree fruitless. In this respect, there is a great deficiency in the works of HENRY, SCOTT, CLARKE, and others, which any person who has had occasion to consult them extensively, must have frequently felt. In such extended works, an Index of this kind is invaluable, not only to the Minister and Sabbath School Teacher, but to every student of the Bible. How often indeed does it happen, that one wishes to consult the Commentary on some subject, and to examine it fully and in detail, when the remarks upon it may be scattered through all the volumes, and based perhaps upon twenty different passages of Scripture, to find which would require much time and careful attention. Such an Index would at once place them all as it were under the eye.

II. A NEW, FULL, AND COMPLETE CONCORDANCE; ILLUSTRATED WITH monumental, traditional, and oriental engravings, founded on Butterworth's, with Cruden's Definitions; forming, it is believed, on many accounts, a more valuable work than either Butterworth, Cruden, or any other similar book in the language.

The value of a Concordance is now generally understood, and those who have used one, consider it indispensable in connexion with the Bible.

III. A GUIDE TO THE READING AND STUDY OF THE BIBLE; BEING CAR-
PENTER'S valuable BIBLICAL COMPANION, lately published in London, containing a complete History of the Bible, and forming a most excellent introduction to its study. It embraces the Evidences of Christianity, Jewish antiquities, manners, customs, arts, Natural History, &c., of the Bible, with Notes and Engravings added.

IV. COMPLETE BIOGRAPHIES OF HENRY, BY WILLIAMS; SCOTT, BY his SON; DODDRIDGE, by ORTON; with sketches of the lives and characters, and notices of the works, of the writers on the Scriptures, who are quoted in the Commentary, living and dead, American and foreign.

This part of the volume not only affords a large quantity of interesting and useful reading for pious families, but will also be a source of gratification to all those who are in the habit of consulting the Commentary, — every one naturally feeling a desire to know some particulars of the lives and characters of those whose opinions he seeks. Appended to this part will be a Bibliotheca Biblica, or list of the best works on the Bible, of all kinds, arranged under their appropriate heads.

V. A COMPLETE INDEX OF THE MATTER CONTAINED IN THE BIBLE TEXT.

VI. A SYMBOL DICTIONARY. A VERY COMPREHENSIVE AND VAL- uable Dictionary of Scripture Symbols, (occupying about fifty-six closely printed pages,) by THOMAS WEMYSS, (author of 'Biblical Gleanings,' &c.) Comprising Daubuz, Lancaster, Hutcheson, &c.

VII. THE WORK CONTAINS SEVERAL OTHER ARTICLES,—INDEXES, TABLES, &c. &c., and is,

VIII. ILLUSTRATED BY A LARGE PLAN OF JERUSALEM, IDENTIFYING, AS far as tradition, &c. go, the original sites, drawn on the spot by F. Catherwood, of London, architect. Also, two steel engravings of PORTRAITS of seven foreign and eight American Theological writers, and numerous wood engravings.

The whole forms a desirable and necessary accompaniment to the original work, and affords a great fund of instruction for the use not only of Clergymen and Sabbath School Teachers, but also for Families. When the great amount of matter it must contain is considered, it will be deemed exceedingly cheap, and COULD NOT BE AFFORDED, AT THE PRICE PROPOSED, EXCEPT IN CONNEXION WITH THE COMMENTARY, the value of which it greatly enhances.

The work is bound and lettered exactly to match the Commentary, forming a sixth volume.

Some copies are also bound without the Index to the Commentary, and published under the title of designed to accompany the Family Bible, or Henry's, Scott's, Clarke's, Gill's, or other Commentaries.

RECOMMENDATIONS

BUSH'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

From Rev. H. HUMPHREY, D. D., Pres. of Amherst Col.

'I have spent some time in examining Bush's Illustrations, and I think them an exceedingly valuable addition to the department of Biblical illustration. The work contains a vast amount of information, in regard to the habits, manners, and customs of eastern nations, which everywhere shed light upon the sacred text, and make a great many passages very plain, that, to the common reader of the Bible, without some such help, must always remain extremely obscure.

H. HUMPHREY.

'Amherst College, June 16, 1837.'

From Rev. A. ALEXANDER, D. D., Prof. at Princeton (N. J.) Theol. Seminary.

'I am prepared to express a very favorable opinion of the work. It will prevent the necessity of turning over the pages of many volumes where they are accessible, and will be a good substitute for them, when they are not. What is needed for the illustration of the Sacred Scriptures is here placed immediately under the text; so that the reader is put to no trouble to look after it; and, uniformly, due credit is given to the authors from whom the remarks have been borrowed, and to whom the inquisitive reader can have recourse for further details. The Biblical student, as well as the common reader of the Bible, are, in my opinion, much indebted to the Rev. Mr. Bush, for supplying this desideratum; and to the enterprising publishers, for this addition to the valuable works which have heretofore passed through their press.

A. ALEXANDER.'

'I have examined it with great care, and I can say with the utmost confidence, that it is, in every respect, entitled to the highest commendation. The requisites for the execution of such a work were many and unusual,—but the profound and distinguished editor seems to me to have possessed them all. Deep learning, extensive general knowledge, nice discrimination, exact judgment, power of condensation, refined taste, and pure and unostentatious piety, are all evident in the labors of his pen; and my sincere hope is, that his countrymen at large will appreciate the high advantage of possessing one among them who has drank so deeply at the sacred fount of Biblical lore himself, and who, in the volume he has produced, pours forth copiously the streams at which others may freely slake their thirst. Signed,

J. S. BUCKINGHAM.'

'This volume must prove an acceptable present to every one who occupies the important station of an interpreter of the Bible, whether as Pastor or Sunday School Teacher. To those who know the editor, and the facilities he enjoys for the execution of such a work, no additional recommendation is needed. Prof. Bush is fully competent for a work of this kind, both from his general habits of study, and from his particular devotion to the criticism of the Bible.'

From Rev. WM. JENKS, D. D., Editor of the Comprehensive Commentary.

'I have examined the Illustrations of the Scriptures, edited by Rev. Prof. Bush, with some care. It being published by the same company from whose press the Comprehensive Commentary is issued, and being intended by them for a companion to that work, I have had it before me in my labors as the Editor of the Commentary, and have made frequent reference to it in the latter volume for the illustration of many passages where the limits of the Commentary would not admit of a long quotation. I regard it as a valuable help in the department which it fills, to every reader, whether general or critical, in understanding many portions of the Bible, and should be gratified to have it stand side by side with the Commentary in the library of every subscriber for the latter.

WM. JENKS.'

'The subscribers having examined a work entitled,—"Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," cheerfully express our opinions of its great value and importance to ministers, families, and especially to the Sabbath School Teachers. It embraces a distinct department of Biblical illustrations, which is of great importance in elucidating a large portion of the sacred volume; many passages indeed can be correctly understood, only by a reference to oriental manners, customs, idioms, &c. The labors and researches of modern travellers in the east, where the Scriptures were written, have illustrated and rendered clear many passages which were before obscure or unintelligible. The work in question contains a vast amount of illustrative matter of the description referred to, affording a fund of entertainment and instruction. We cheerfully commend it to all who love the sacred volume, and should consider it a highly valuable addition to every family library.—Its design precludes the necessity of its embracing controversy, and it will not therefore be found to contain anything objectionable to any denomination of evangelical Christians.'

'Dear Sir,—I have examined, at your request, Bush's Illustrations of Scripture. I think it a very valuable book, calculated to be very useful in families and to Sunday School Teachers, though some of the expressions, and often the general phraseology are based upon, and imply the doctrinal views of the editor. The work is yet free from any sectarian purposes, or direct doctrinal expositions. It can be used with pleasure and profit by all denominations of Christians; and, independent of the light its illustrations throw upon many passages of Scripture, it embodies a vast amount of interesting and accurate information, relating to eastern nations, manners, and customs. I sincerely hope the work may have an extensive circulation.

Yours,

'I concur in the main in the above.

SAM'L. BARRETT, Pastor of Chamber st. (Unitarian) Church.'

From the Biblical Repository, October 1837, edited by Prof. B. B. EDWARDS.

'The numerous highly finished engravings, executed by distinguished artists, from sketches taken on the spot, and accompanied, for the most part, with letter-press descriptions by the Rev. T. H. Horne, originally published in Finsen's Landscape Illustrations, greatly enhance the value of this portion of the Illustrations. The number of engravings, maps, profiles, &c. is forty-five.

'The whole work is well executed. The texts illustrated are printed in a larger type than the Illustrations, and with considerable space intervening. The arrangement is orderly, commencing with the first verse in Genesis, and proceeding to the Apocalypse. Professor Bush had excellent opportunities, by his previous studies, to execute the undertaking to great advantage; and he has performed the labor accordingly. He will have the grateful acknowledgments of all lovers of the Bible. The book is adapted to be a companion to the "Comprehensive Commentary;" it may, however, be used with advantage separately. We commend it, with entire confidence, to our readers.'

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

'This work is calculated to be of great practical benefit to the Christian household. Its title-page is sufficient to assure us, that the subjects of which it treats are important for the illustration of Scripture. Its size assures us, that its editor has taken time and room in which to treat them. The learning and diligence of Prof. Bush are evidence that the attempt has not been unsuccessful. From such examination as we have been able to give the work, after having it in our possession a number of days, we have been led to consider it a very great auxiliary in the study of the Sacred Scriptures.'

From the Vermont Chronicle.

'We hold this book in the highest estimation. A vast number of passages, by themselves of difficult interpretation, at least to the common reader of the Bible, are illustrated by copious extracts from the best travellers in the East. This source of illustration has always been highly prized, and to the community generally is highly interesting. But to how small a portion are the numerous volumes of good travels in the East accessible? Chiefly they are confined to village libraries, and those of ministers. Here, in the compass of one volume, and at the small expense of five dollars, is presented to the public, we may say, the cream of eastern travels, in reference to Scripture illustration.

'This work, as an accompaniment of the Comprehensive Commentary and the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, by the same publishers, is particularly valuable. These three works form a library,—a comprehensive library. They contain, for a small sum, as much pertinent matter,—pertinent for illustrating the Bible,—as could have been purchased, separately, for hundreds of dollars. The publishers deserve the thanks of the Christian public, and should continue to receive, as they have, their generous encouragement.

'Of the "Scripture Illustrations" we may say, that, independently of its relations to its predecessors, it will prove a most interesting and useful book to anybody. It is exclusively a compilation, and entirely free from anything sectarian.'

From the N. Y. Observer.

'We always wait with some impatience, for the appearance of books prepared with the industry and ability of those by Professor Bush. The subject of this work is happily one of the most important to those who love to understand the Bible, the beauty and force of which are lost in many portions of it, from ignorance of oriental manners, customs, &c.

'In the preparation of this work, Prof. Bush has availed himself of the best works of oriental travellers and writers, both ancient and modern; among whom he has enumerated over forty, whose writings comprise more than 90 large volumes. The only recommendation the book requires, is the mention of its object, the name of its compiler, and a knowledge of the materials from which it has been prepared. We wish for it, and are sure it will find, an extensive circulation.'

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

'This work, replete with the results of all the latest and most valuable discoveries in the East, which can be made tributary to the elucidation of the Scriptures, will form, with its predecessors, the Comprehensive Commentary, and Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, a very considerable library of themselves,—one which will be invaluable to the Ministers of the Gospel, and Sabbath School Teachers; and which, we trust, will long remain, a monument of the enlightened and Christian enterprise of the publishers.'

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES,

DERIVED PRINCIPALLY FROM THE MANNERS, CUSTOMS, ANTIQUITIES, TRADITIONS, AND FORMS OF SPEECH, RITES, CLIMATE, WORKS OF ART, AND LITERATURE, OF THE EASTERN NATIONS; EMBODYING ALL THAT IS VALUABLE IN THE WORKS OF ROBERTS, HARMER, BURDER, PAXTON, CHANDLER, AND THE MOST CELEBRATED ORIENTAL TRAVELLERS; EMBRACING ALSO THE SUBJECT OF THE FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY, AS EXHIBITED BY KEITH AND OTHERS, WITH DESCRIPTIONS OF THE PRESENT STATE OF COUNTRIES AND PLACES MENTIONED IN THE SACRED WRITINGS, ILLUSTRATED BY NUMEROUS LANDSCAPE ENGRAVINGS, FROM SKETCHES TAKEN ON THE SPOT. EDITED BY REV. GEORGE BUSH, PROFESSOR OF HEBREW AND ORIENTAL LITERATURE IN THE NEW YORK CITY UNIVERSITY.

Next in worth and importance to the possession, is doubtless to be estimated the correct interpretation of the sacred volume. Indeed, it is the latter which gives its value to the former. A revelation not understood, or not intelligible, is no revelation, as far as its recipients are concerned. The position, therefore, that the meaning of the Bible is the Bible, we consider as unquestionably true, and consequently any new accession of light, which goes to clear up its obscurities, and cause its genuine sense to stand forth in bolder relief upon the inspired page, is in reality enriching us with a larger amount of its treasures, and virtually bestowing upon us added communications of the Divine will. In this view, the progressive elucidation of the scriptures, whether by the expository labors of critics, the researches of travellers, or the fulfilments of prophecy, may be compared to the gradual rolling away of the morning mist from a splendid landscape. As the sun advances, the shades retire, and new and interesting features of the prospect are continually opening upon the delighted eye of the spectator. Or, it may be said to resemble the slow, but momentous process of unfolding the ancient papyrus, which the ravages of time and fire have spared among the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Here, as every successive word and letter, which can be redeemed from the crisp and crumbling texture of the blackened parchment, is noted down with the most scrupulous care, as forming a part of the continuous record, and going to make out its entire sense; so the sense of the sacred volume is gradually elicited, item by item, and needs only to be collected and treasured up with equal solicitude, in order to constitute a possession of infinitely more value than the choicest literary relics of antiquity. Perhaps it may safely be affirmed, that the materials are at this moment in existence, for the satisfactory solution of nearly every obscure passage of holy writ: but the great desideratum is to have them brought together—to collect them from their wide dispersion over a countless multitude of writings, in various languages, which the great majority of Christians can neither procure nor understand. It is only in this way that they can be made really available to the great end which they are calculated to subservise; and far from idle are the claims of any one who professes to bring from scattered sources a new quota to the general stock of biblical illustration.

As the Bible, in its structure, spirit, and costume, is essentially an Eastern book, it is obvious that the natural phenomena, and the moral condition of the East, should be made largely tributary to its elucidation. In order to appreciate fully the truth of its descriptions, and the accuracy, force, and beauty of its various allusions, it is indispensable that the reader, as far as possible, separate himself from his ordinary associations, and put himself, by a kind of mental transmigration, into the very circumstances of the writers. He must set himself down in the midst of oriental scenery—gaze upon the sun, sky, mountains, and rivers of Asia—go forth with the nomadic tribes of the desert—follow their flocks—travel with their caravans—rest in their tents—lodge in their khans—load and unload their camels—drink at their watering-places—pause during the heat of the day under the shade of their palms—cultivate the fields with their own rude implements—gather in or glean after their harvests—beat out and ventilate the grain in their open thrashing-floors—dress in their costume—note their proverbial or idiomatic forms of speech, and listen to the strain of song or story, with which they beguile the vacant hours. In a word, he must surround himself with, and transfuse himself into, all the forms, habitudes, and usages of oriental life. In this way only can he catch the sources of their imagery, or enter into full communion with the genius of the sacred penmen.

While, therefore, we readily concede the very high importance of critical and philological research in dissipating the obscurities of the scriptures, and fixing their exact sense, we cannot, at the same time, but think that the collateral illustrations derived from this source, are deserving of at least equal attention from the student of revelation. The truth is, the providence of God, which is never more worthily employed than about his Word, seems now to be directing the eyes of his servants, as with pointed finger, to the immense stores of elucidation constantly accumulating from this quarter. The tide of travel within a few years has turned remarkably to the East. Animated either by the noble spirit of missionary enterprise, of commercial speculation, of military adventure, or laudable curiosity, men of intelligence and observation have made their way into every region on which the light of revelation originally shone; exploring its antiquities, mingling with its inhabitants, detailing its manners and customs, and displaying its physical, moral, and political circumstances. From these expeditions they have returned laden with the rich results of their industry, and the labors of the pen and the pencil have made thousands partakers of the benefits of their toils. Little more than half a century ago, when the justly celebrated Observations of Harmer were given to the public, the range of materials to which he had access was comparatively limited. The travels of Chardin, Pococke, Shaw, Maundrell, Pitts, D'Arvieux, with Russet's Natural History of Aleppo, were his principal authorities—authorities, it is true, which have not yet been wholly superseded. But since his time, what an immense accession has the department of oriental travels received! The names of Volney, Niebuhr, Mariti, Clarke, Chateaubriand, Porter, Burckhardt, Buckingham, Morier, Seetzen, De Lamartine, Laborde, exhaust but a small part of the list of eastern tourists, whose labors have gone to make us familiarly acquainted with the land of patriarchs, prophets, and apostles. How desirable that the scattered gleams of illustrative light, which shine in their works, should be concentrated into one focus of illumination! This is the task which we have essayed in the present volume.

In entering upon and advancing in this task, we have been more and more impressed with the remarkable fact of the permanence of eastern usages. To the question, therefore, whether the state of things in the East, as described by modern travellers, really coincides with that which existed at the time the scriptures were written, so that one may be cited as conveying a correct idea of the other; we may reply, in the words of Sir John Chardin, one of the most respectable and authentic of the number:—"The language of that divine book (especially of the Old Testament) being oriental, and very often figurative and hyperbolic, these parts of scripture which are written in verse, and in the prophecies, are full of figures and hyperboles, which, as it is manifest, cannot be well understood without a knowledge of things from whence such figures are taken, which are natural properties and particular manners of the countries to which they refer. I discerned this in my first voyage to the Indies: for I gradually found a greater sense and beauty in divers passages of scripture than I had before, by having in my view the things, either natural or moral, which explained them to me; and in perusing the different translations which the greatest part of the translators of the Bible had made, I observed that every one of them (to render the expositions, as they thought, more intelligible) used such expressions as would accommodate the phrase to the places where they writ: and which did not only many times pervert the text, but often rendered the sense obscure, and sometimes absurd also. In fine, consulting the commentators upon such kind of passages, I found very strange mistakes in them, and that they had long guessed at the sense, and did but grope (as in the dark) in search of it. And from these reflections I took a resolution to make my remarks upon many passages of the scriptures; persuading myself that they would be equally agreeable and profitable for use. And the learned, to whom I communicated my design, encouraged me very much, by their commendations, to proceed in it: and more especially when I informed them, that it is not in Asia, as in our Europe, where there are frequent changes, more or less, in the form of things, as the habits, buildings, gardens, and the like. In the East they are constant in all things; the habits are at this day in the same manner as in the preceding ages; so that one may reasonably believe, that in that part of the world, the exterior form of things (as their manners and customs) are the same now as they were two thousand years since, except in such changes as have been introduced by religion, which are, nevertheless, very inconsiderable."—(Preface to Travels in Persia, p. 6.) Morier, an eastern traveller, says, "The manners of the East, amid all the changes of government and religion, are still the same; they are living impressions from an original mould: and at every step, some object, some idiom, some dress, or some custom of common life, reminds the traveller of ancient times, and confirms, above all, the beauty, the accuracy, and the propriety of the language and the history of the Bible." * * *

This steadfast resistance to the spirit of innovation and change, which thus remarkably distinguishes the nations of the East, will probably, in the providence of God, remain unsubdued, till it shall have answered all the important purposes of biblical elucidation, when it will give way to the all-pervading, all-regenerating influence of the Bible itself, borne upon the bosom of a new tide of civilization and improvement, which shall, ere long, set in upon the East from the nations of Europe, and the great continent of the West.

In the mean time, while the inevitable doom of revolution and transformation that awaits the East, lingers, it behooves us to make the most, for useful purposes, of that state of society which still exists, but which, ere long, will have passed away. With this view, we have endeavored to embody in the present volume a large mass of oriental illustration. The work is strictly of an eclectic character. Postponing the claims of originality to those of practical utility, the Editor, after arraying before him the amplest store of materials which he could command, set himself to the task of selecting and arranging the most valuable portions which he could bring within the limits of his plan. The kindred works of Harmer, Burder, Paxton, Taylor's edition of Calmet, (five vols. 4to.) scarcely any of which are in common accessible to the majority of biblical students, have been diligently gleaned, and all their important contents transferred to our pages. As these works are not likely ever to be reprinted in this country, there appeared no other way to arrest their progress to oblivion, and to secure a larger and wider circulation to the valuable matter which they contain.

But the range of selection has been by no means confined to the works now mentioned. So prolific has been the press within the last twenty or thirty years, of books of eastern travels, illustrative of manners, customs, and religion, that our resources in this department have been almost indefinitely multiplied.

As the present work is designed to be marked by somewhat of the same Comprehensive character which distinguishes the other biblical works lately issued from the press of the Publishers, the illustrations bear upon numerous other points than those relating to manners and customs.

The subject of the Fulfilment of Prophecy cannot well be lost sight of by any one conversant at once with the scriptures and the reports of modern travellers. The topographical descriptions of many of the most noted places of scripture, a department to which particular attention has been given in the ensuing pages, suggests at once the divine predictions bearing upon their future doom. The researches of tourists, both skeptics and Christians, have poured a flood of light upon this subject. It is perfectly astonishing, to one who has never examined the subject, to find how literally and minutely the prophetic declarations of scripture have been fulfilled, so that even infidel travellers and historians, as Volney and Gibbon, in their accounts of nations and countries, have unwittingly used for description, almost the words of scripture in which the events are foretold. Volney, particularly, (one of the bitterest opposers of Christianity,) in his published travels in the East, has afforded, unwillingly and unthinkingly, a wonderful attestation to the truth of the Bible, in the relation of facts which came under his own eye. There needs no better witness. Indeed, it is impossible for the most determined infidel carefully to examine and weigh this subject, and not be forced to feel that the Bible is divine: or, in the words of Bishop Newton, "he is reduced to the necessity, either to renounce his senses, deny what he reads in the Bible, and what he sees and observes in the world, or acknowledge the truth of prophecy, and consequently, of divine revelation." The researches of travellers in Palestine have been abundant, and the prophecies thereby verified are numerous and distinct, so that the facts may be related literally in the language of the prophecy. To use the words of a late writer in the London Quarterly Review, "we confess that we have felt more surprise, delight, and conviction, in examining the accounts which the travels of Burckhardt, Mangles, Irby, Leigh, and Laborde have so recently given of Judea, Edom, &c. than we have ever derived from any similar inquiry. It seems like a miracle in our own times. Twenty years ago we read certain portions of the prophetic scriptures with a belief that they were true, because other similar passages had, in the course of ages, been proved to be so, and we had an indistinct notion,

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE; OR,

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, THEOLOGY, RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY, ALL RELIGIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, AND MISSIONS; CONTAINING DEFINITIONS OF ALL RELIGIOUS TERMS; AN IMPARTIAL ACCOUNT OF THE PRINCIPAL CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS THAT HAVE EXISTED IN THE WORLD FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST TO THE PRESENT DAY, WITH THEIR DOCTRINES, RELIGIOUS RITES AND CEREMONIES, AS WELL AS THOSE OF THE JEWS, MOHAMMEDANS, AND HEATHEN NATIONS; TOGETHER WITH THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE EAST, ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, AND A DESCRIPTION OF THE QUADRUPEDS, BIRDS, FISHES, REPTILES, INSECTS, TREES, PLANTS, AND MINERALS, MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE; A STATEMENT OF THE MOST REMARKABLE TRANSACTIONS AND EVENTS IN ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY; BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES OF THE EARLY MARTYRS AND DISTINGUISHED RELIGIOUS WRITERS AND CHARACTERS OF ALL AGES. ## PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT.

THE present is an age, and ours is a country, demanding great condensation and brevity in writers who would secure attention. So active and busy are the habits of the mass of our countrymen, that they have neither time nor patience to turn and peruse the pages of the cumbersome quartos and folios of the 17th century; while a tolerable competency would scarcely suffice for the purchase of the numerous works of which the modern press is so fruitful, on the subjects embraced in this volume. The work then, combining and condensing the most valuable results of the researches of the best writers on any subject, while it will be most likely to be received with favor, will at the same time be best calculated to facilitate the acquisition, and consequently the diffusion of knowledge. With these views the "COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY on the Bible" was projected; and its unprecedented sale has encouraged the same publishers to offer to the public the present volume. The subjects embraced in this work are interesting to ALL, and as it is not designed to be in the least sectarian, or denominational, it cannot fail to be desirable for all, whether professedly religious or not, at least as a book of reference.

The following are some of the peculiarities of the plan:—

I. It is designed to be a standard and permanent work; and here it is believed will be found collected and compressed in one super-royal octavo volume of upwards of twelve hundred pages, in a shape combining convenience and cheapness, and in a style blending the sweetness of the popular with the richness of the profound, what has heretofore been scattered through more than fifty volumes, and mixed with much of little or no value. Among the works, all the valuable matter of which will be found in this, together with some from which copious extracts have been made, are the following:—

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATION. Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible; Brown's do.; Barr's do.; Wells' Scripture Geography; Horne's Introduction; Harris' Scripture Natural History; Abbott's edition of Carpenter's do.; Paxton's Illustrations of Scripture; Draper's do.; Harmer's Observations; Jahn's Archaeology; Mrs. Sherwood's Dictionary of Types and Emblems; Burder's Oriental Customs; Josephus' Jewish Customs; Keith's Evidence of Prophecy; Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium; Robinson's Biblical Repository; Crabbe's English Synonymes.	ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. Mosheim's History of the Christian Church; Milner's do.; Jones' do.; Waddington's do.; Neander's do.; Murdock's Elements of Dogmatic History; Lord King's History of the Primitive Church; Robinson's History of Baptism; Sismond's History of the Crusades against the Albigenses.	THEOLOGY. Buck's Theological Dictionary, enlarged by Dr. Henderson; Jones' Biblical Cyclopædia; Hawker's Biblical Dictionary; Watson's Biblical and Theological Dictionary; Christian Examiner; Campbell's Dissertations; Dwight's Theology; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Works of Andrew Fuller; do. of Robert Hall; Douglas on the Advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion.	CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS. Evans' Sketch of Religious Denominations; Jones' Dictionary of Religious Opinions; Hannah Adams' do.; Robbius' do.; Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Benedict's History of All Religions; Williams' Dictionary of do.; Ward's Farewell Letters; Edwards' Quarterly Register.
RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY. Fox's Lives of the Martyrs; Middleton's Evangelical Biography; Jones' Christian Biog.; Davenport's Dictionary of Biography; Universal Biographical Dictionary; Betham's Female Biography; Clissold's	THEOLOGY. Last Hours of Eminent Christians; Ivimey's History of the Baptists; Benedict's do.; Mather's Magnalia; Elliot's American Biography; Allen's do.; Memoirs of American Missionaries; Encyclopædia Americana.	MISSIONS. Edwards' Missionary Gazetteer;

Many articles are original, especially those relating to the principal denominations in this country, as will be seen on reference to the fourth paragraph below.

2. It is designed for a complete book of reference on ALL religious subjects; to which a person can turn when any thing occurs in reading or conversation connected with Religion which he does not understand, or in regard to which he wishes to refresh his memory, as he would to a dictionary for a definition of a word. Nearly every subject treated in the books which form the basis of this, is touched upon; but those which are of minor importance are very brief, and those of greater utility handled more at length. Articles rarely recurred to will be found here; but it is not burdened with any thing that is altogether useless.

3. In Theology, the general plan of Buck's Dictionary is followed; especially in its evangelical cast and Christian candor, in its copious illustrations of important topics, and its valuable references to the best works on both sides of the question. Watson, Jones, and others, however, have supplied us occasionally with articles of superior value.

The edition of Buck which has been used is the new one lately published in England, edited by Prof. HENDERSON, who has added nearly five hundred new articles, which will be found incorporated in this.

4. The accounts of the History, Doctrines, &c. of different denominations, have been prepared with an aim at the strictest impartiality. Where it was practicable some leading man of the principal sects existing in this country has been employed to prepare the article relating to it; and where it has not been, the matter has been drawn from some one or more prominent writer of the denomination, of acknowledged authority. THE WORK DOES NOT AIM TO EFFECT A COMPROMISE of opinions among the different denominations of Christians, but to present the views of each fully, and in their own words, leaving the reader to form his own conclusions as to which is most correct. This must be a truly acceptable course to all who can respond to the sentiment quoted by Robert Hall, "Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica VERITAS."

The following are some of the contributors under this head:—

BAPTISM. Pedobaptist Views, Rev. J. TRACY, Editor of the Boston Recorder. Baptist Views, Rev. J. D. KNOWLES, Professor in the Newton Theological Institution.	CHRISTIANS. Rev. J. V. HIMES, Boston.	PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Rev. Mr. BOYLE, presbyter, of Boston.
BAPTISTS. Prepared under the revision and sanction of Rev. Dr. Sharp, Boston.	DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, or REFORMERS. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, of Bethany, Virginia.	PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH. Rev. T. F. NORRIS, President of the New England Conference.
CONGREGATIONALISTS. Prepared by a member, and revised and sanctioned by Rev. Prof. EMERSON, of Andover Theological Seminary, and Rev. Dr. Wisner, of Boston.	FREE WILL BAPTISTS. Rev. S. BEEDE, Editor of the Morning Star, Dover, N. H.	UNITARIANS. Rev. Prof. PALFREY.
	METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Rev. S. W. WILLSON, Editor of Zion's Herald, Boston.	UNIVERSALISTS. Rev. L. R. PAIGE.
	PRESBYTERIANS. Rev. Dr. MILLER, of Princeton Theological Seminary.	UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS. Rev. PAUL DEAN.

5. To adapt it to popular use, all words in foreign languages have been omitted; or where Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek terms unavoidably occur, they are given in English characters.

6. Scripture Biography, which occupies a large space in most Bible Dictionaries, is handled here in the briefest manner possible—giving only the characteristic outlines, except when difficulties occur which require to be cleared up.

7. In consequence of the space thus gained, the new department of Religious Biography is made full and extensive; embracing, it is believed, every distinguished religious writer, preacher, and character, including the most distinguished females, and those philanthropists who were actuated by religious principles. Every denomination will find here notices of its most illustrious men, especially such as have lived and died in this country, from its settlement to this time. To every notice of an author a list of his principal writings (so far as possible) is given, with a reference to the best biographies of the individual.

8. As a Dictionary and Gazetteer of the Bible, the work will be found, it is believed, more copious and accurate than any other now in use, adapting it to the wants of the PULPIT and of SABBATH SCHOOLS. In the notices of the various cities and countries mentioned in the Bible, the fulfilment of the Prophecies regarding them, so far as developed, are particularly noticed.

9. The object of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA being to do good on evangelical principles, the work preserves throughout, as far as possible, a devotional and practical, as well as a critical, picturesque, and popular character, that it may minister to the heart, no less than to the judgment and the imagination.

10. MAPS AND ENGRAVINGS, as well as WOOD CUTS, have been added to enrich and adorn, as well as illustrate, the work.

On the whole, the amount of information embodied in this work is immense, and it is hoped the matter, by collation, arrangement, abridgment, and addition, has been very greatly improved; and while it will be found interesting and valuable to Families, and those individuals who only desire to acquire general knowledge, to the SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHER and BIBLE CLASS LEADER it cannot but prove an invaluable treasure.

CONDITIONS.

This volume will contain about 1250 pages, Super Royal octavo, be neatly printed, and durably bound. It will be afforded to subscribers at the low price of $5.00. Any clergyman or other person becoming responsible for six subscribers, shall be entitled to a seventh copy gratis.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS
ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is, upon the whole, a valuable book of reference, and the theological articles are, in the main, good. The work is rich in biographical notices, and contains much useful information respecting the tenets of different sects, which in most cases is supplied by their own writers. The theological student will find it a convenient and useful companion.
A. ALEXANDER, D. D.
Princeton Theol. Sem., N. J.'

'I regard the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge as a very valuable book of reference. While it is particularly convenient and useful to ministers of the gospel, it will be found to be very entertaining and instructive to others, and is well worthy of a place in every family library.
B. TYLER, D. D.
Pres. of E. Windsor Theol. Institute, Conn.'

'I have examined the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge in sundry of its articles; and holding in my library its principal authorities, I am ready to say that I much approve it. We have no work which contains, and judiciously contains, so much informing matter at so moderate a price.
Rev. JONATHAN HOMER, D. D.
Newton, Mass.'

'This volume is certainly an exception to the general style in which compends, summaries, and Encys. are manufactured among us. It bears the marks of care, honest research, and accurate statement. The commendable practice is followed of giving the authorities at the close of each article.

It is not a bookselling expedient, prepared in the haste of a plagiarist from English works; but in part original, and in part condensed, and accommodated to suit the general intention of the volume. The department of religious biography is very complete;—a field of labor in which the American Encyclopædia is notoriously deficient. Candor and good judgment are here manifested.

On the whole, we heartily commend this publication to our readers. It will repay many fold the cost of its purchase. No single volume in the language, so far as we know, contains a larger amount of valuable knowledge. [Biblical Repository and Quarterly Observer.]

'We are confident that this must be a valuable acquisition to any man's library; and one who expects to purchase and use much literature of this sort, we are equally confident, will save both money and time by subscribing for this.

We have Encys. in other departments of science; but we do not know that any thing in the form of a Religious Ency. has ever been published in this, or any other country. A work of this kind has therefore been a great desideratum in the religious and reading community.

So far as we have examined it—and we have devoted some time and care to the subject—the book fulfils the large promise of the title quite as well as could reasonably be expected. It is a vast storehouse of information all the subjects indicated, judiciously selected—condensed, perspicuous, and well arranged; and, what is of great importance, with references, at the end of the more important articles, to works from which more particular information may be obtained. The work is handsomely printed, on good paper; the type is clean and fair, and sufficiently large. On the whole, it is entirely beyond any thing else extant as a convenient book of reference for clergymen, teachers of Bible classes and Sabbath schools, and all, in fact, who wish for any book of reference of the kind to assist them in their biblical and religious reading. It is marvellously cheap. We recommend it confidently. It will not disappoint any reasonable expectations.' [Vt. Chronicle.]

'A very useful work, 1300 imp. 8vo pages. Its usefulness in the family, in reading religious intelligence and other publications, and in writing on religious subjects, is obvious. The price, for so large a volume, prepared with so much labor, must be acknowledged very reasonable—cheap.' [N. Y. Evangelist.]

'The editorial execution altogether surpasses my expectations, and I am persuaded the work will be extensively popular.
Rev. GEO. BUSH,
Prof. of Ori. Lit. in N. Y. City University.'

'Its plan is very comprehensive, and embraces a variety of information respecting the state of religion throughout the world, which cannot be obtained except by recourse to a great number of original sources.

In regard to the different denominations in our own country, it is necessary only to recur to the names of the gentlemen who furnish the accounts of them, to obtain full confidence in the fidelity with which those accounts may be expected to be composed.'

[Boston Christian Register.]

This work contains in itself a religious library; and as such we consider it one of great value to the Christian public.

The plan of it is happily adapted to make it a book of reference, a convenient substitute, and more than a substitute for many volumes which Christian readers have heretofore had occasion to consult. And from an examination of a large number of articles, the plan appears to have been well executed. Many of the original articles are ably written. Those condensed from other works were evidently prepared with great care and attention, and show the result of extensive reading and patient research.

Its cheapness strongly commends it to public favor.'

[Southern Rel. Telegraph, Richmond, Va.]

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is deservedly having a large sale.'
[Boston Recorder.]

'Though it is a large volume, yet in view of its variety and comprehensiveness, it is multum in parvo,—much in a small space,—an ocean of matter in a drop of words. The work has been compiled with immense labor, with great accuracy and uncommon impartiality. Mr. Brown has performed his difficult and delicate task in a judicious manner—in a manner to highly promote the public benefit, and to entitle him to the approbation and gratitude of the community. We are happy to add, that the work has been got up in a handsome style, and in good taste.

We should sincerely hope, that the cause of truth and the interest of the religious public may be promoted by its extensive circulation. It should be a companion to the Bible in every family; it should find a place in the library of every Sunday school teacher; and we venture little in saying that, as a work of reference, the minister of the gospel would find it convenient and useful.' [American Baptist (New York).]

'The object of the work is to condense into one volume the most important matter now scattered throughout many expensive publications. The compiler appears to have executed his task with commendable diligence and good judgment. It requires more than ordinary wisdom, in compiling such a work, to determine what to reject and what to retain. As far as we have been able to examine the work, we think the author deserves the credit of a faithful and judicious compiler.—We deem the work worthy of extensive patronage. It is well executed, on good paper, and illustrated with engravings and wood cuts; and we hope the enterprising publishers will be well repaid for their expenditure on this praiseworthy and expensive work.' [Richmond Rel. Herald.]

'The general execution of the work is decidedly good. We recommend it for its general excellence, as a most useful book of reference, to families which desire information on religious subjects.'
[Presbyterian (Philadelphia).]

'This work is emphatically what its title imports, a repository of every description of religious knowledge, alphabetically arranged, for easy and familiar reference. It seems to embrace just that kind of knowledge which the ministers of the gospel, and the curious and enlightened Christian of every denomination, requires, relative to the Bible, theology, religious biography, ecclesiastical history, missions and all religions. The amount of matter embraced in about 1300 large octavo pages on these subjects is incalculable—enough, we should think, to fill 15 or 20 volumes of the Family Library. We consider it, in fact, if not the only, the most recent, comprehensive, illustrative, and trustworthy work of reference on all denominational points, and topics adverted to above, extant. It is designed as a complete book of reference on all religious subjects, and companion to the Bible, forming a compact library of religious knowledge; and when its excellence is fully known, it will, we doubt not, find a place in almost every Christian family.'

[N. Y. Weekly Messenger.]

'We have recently procured a copy of this excellent work;—it is just such a work as the religious public have long needed. It fills a place that is not occupied by any other work in the English language. We wish one could be placed in the hands of every minister of the gospel throughout our country. This one volume would be to him a valuable library of religious knowledge; he might accumulate a great variety of books before he could otherwise obtain the information which he needs upon various points, and which would be directly available in the great work in which he is engaged. Here he has a condensed, but accurate and satisfactory view of the religious customs and sentiments of the different denominations of Christians; and, notwithstanding their number and diversity, he can in this volume hear them nearly all speak their own language and assign their own reasons.

But besides information with regard to different religions, and the different denominations of the Christian religion, the minister of Christ may here find a distinct and evangelical statement of the great leading doctrines of the Scriptures; which will be no small advantage to any who may have had to enter upon the ministry with but little preparation.

On the same account, this work recommends itself as a most important help to every Bible class and Sabbath school teacher. Indeed, every head of a family, who wishes to acquire and impart to his children correct and enlightened views upon religious subjects in general, should have in his library this Encyclopædia. Were this generally the case, we might soon expect to see a higher degree of religious knowledge in circulation, and fewer misconceptions and misrepresentations respecting the sentiments of different religious denominations.'

[Zion's Advocate (Portland).]

'Few works of more value can be named, even in this time of condensing books. For theological students as a book of reference, and as a family book for youths, to which they may devote their evenings, and imbibe correct information upon the almost boundless field of survey which is connected with the moral and religious condition of mankind, it is unequalled in variety and amplitude of knowledge. We have extensively searched the articles of which it is composed; and can attest to the general fidelity with which the work has been compiled. We have ascertained that the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge comprehends the substance of FIFTY valuable works; all of which formerly were considered necessary to the library not only of a scholar, but also of all Christians who were anxious to obtain accurate and enlarged information of scriptural truth and ecclesiastical history. We can conceive of nothing more beneficial to the American churches than this laborious and grand scheme for the diffusion of religious knowledge.'

[N. Y. Protestant Vindicator.]

(From the Literary and Theological Review, (New York,) edited by Rev. Leonard Woods, Jr.)

'It is enough to say in commendation of it, that it fulfils the promise set forth in its long, descriptive, comprehensive title. The original articles contained in it are numerous, and of great value. The mechanical execution is excellent, and the whole constitutes, we have no doubt, the completest and most valuable book of reference, adapted to the use of families, Sunday school teachers, and ministers of the gospel, that has ever been prepared and published in this country.'

(From the New York Observer.)

'This volume is on a plan which we believe to be original, and which cannot fail, if its execution be judicious and faithful, to secure to the work extensive popularity and usefulness. So far as we have examined the articles in the work, with a few exceptions we think favorably of the skill, judgment and fidelity with which it has been executed. The names of several of the original contributors are sufficient to warrant the highest expectations concerning the articles which they have prepared.'

The following are some of the principal advantages of the English version of the Polyglott Bible, over other Editions of the Holy Scriptures, with references.

- I. Its originality will preëminently be found to consist in a laborious and entirely new selection and arrangement of References, in which it has been endeavored faithfully to exhibit the Scripture as its own Expositor. The advantages to the sincere reader of the sacred pages, of having constantly before him Marginal References to similar and illustrative passages, are obvious, and fully appreciated by all. 'It were to be wished,' says bishop Horsley, 'that no Bibles were printed without References. Particular diligence should be used in comparing the parallel texts of the Old and New Testaments. . . . It is incredible,' he adds, 'to any one who has not made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner, WITHOUT ANY OTHER COMMENTARY, OR EXPOSITION, THAN WHAT THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE SACRED VOLUME MUTUALLY FURNISH TO EACH OTHER.' References have, however, heretofore generally been confined either to Bibles of large and unwieldy size, or to those so small as to be useless or inconvenient to people advanced in life. Here is an Edition with References, which, while it is not liable to the objection now almost universally felt, against the inconvenient size and weight of the quarto editions, yet offers in a convenient shape and size, by a judicious arrangement and plan, a type as easily read as that of our largest editions, in the form of an elegant and convenient Family Bible.
- II. The References and Readings have been prepared with a strict attention to two things—1. That they should not be merely repetitious, but illustrative,—and, 2. That they should not be complex and crowded, and so numerous as to be tedious and forbidding, a fault with those of Scott and others, but that they should be as full as should be deemed useful and necessary, and a MORE APPROPRIATE AND ACCURATE selection, adaptation, and arrangement, than those in any other edition. So that, while no superfluous ones have been admitted, the most material purposes to be answered by references have been effectually secured.
- III. These References have the advantage of being selected - from many valuable editions and commentaries in different languages.
- IV. All the Marginal Readings contained in the folio and quarto Bibles are introduced; the idioms of the original languages, and also the various senses of particular words or phrases, being instructive and worthy to be known.
- V. The advantages of the present arrangement of the references in a middle column, are, that they are more condensed, and yet are plain and easy to be referred to, and are not liable, as those in other editions are, to be cut in binding or worn away by use, nor to be bound so into the back of the book as not to be easily read.
- VI. The Concordance will be found highly convenient, enabling any one by looking for a word in a verse or chapter, to turn immediately to it.
- VII. The value of the Introductions to the Bible, and the several books, the Indexes, Gazetteer, the new Tables, Maps, &c. will be readily seen, as they all tend to assist the sincere searcher of the Scriptures, in his inquiries. The Wood Cuts and Engravings are valuable, not merely as embellishing the work, but especially as illustrating scripture manners, customs, phrases, &c. and as attracting the attention of the young. An engraving as illustrative of a particular passage, conveys at once to the eye, and more readily and permanently fixes upon the mind, the meaning of that passage, than a page of comment or explanation.
- On the whole, the several advantages of the present Edition commend it to the patronage of the community as the best of the publications of the Bible ever offered to them, for compactness and combination of useful matter. Its medium size, not too large for handling with convenience, with large type for the eyes of the aged, are judged to be no trifling recommendations. The Publishers, therefore, look for some considerable portion of public favor towards this enterprise; and they indulge the hope and expectation of obtaining for the Word of God an increased circulation, and, of course, an increased influence.

CONTAINING NO COMMENTS ON THE MEANING OF THE SACRED TEXT, BUT YET COMBINING A VAST AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE FOR ITS STUDY, EXECUTED IN A BEAUTIFUL STYLE, IT CANNOT BUT BE AN ACCEPTABLE EDITION FOR THE USE OF INDIVIDUALS, AND AN ORNAMENT FOR THE TABLE OF EVERY FAMILY.

It has been highly recommended by eminent ministers of all denominations.

'The Polyglott Bible,' with the 'Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge' and 'Bush's Illustrations of the Scriptures,' form together a very complete apparatus for studying the Bible for all who cannot afford or do not desire a Commentary.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY.

The Publishers select the following, from the testimonials they have received as to the value of the work:—

WE the Subscribers having examined the volume of the Comprehensive Commentary, just issued from the press of Messrs. Fessenden & Co., and highly approving its character, would cheerfully and confidently recommend it as containing more matter and more advantages than any other with which we are acquainted; and, considering the expense incurred, and the excellent manner of its mechanical execution, we believe it to be one of the cheapest works ever issued from the press. We hope the publishers will be sustained by a liberal patronage, in their expensive and useful undertaking. We should be pleased to learn that every family in the United States had procured a copy.

The following are Extracts from Letters to the Publishers, and Notices in Periodicals.

DR. HUMPHREY, President of Amherst College. 'The execution of the plan thus far exceeds my high expectations; I have Henry, Doddridge, and Scott, and admire them all; but to say that your great work promises, when completed, to be more valuable than either, would be little more than saying that the best things in the three combined must be better than any one of them alone.'

DR. LORD, President of Dartmouth College. 'I have made considerable examination of the Comprehensive Commentary, and am satisfied of its superiority over all others which I have seen for the purposes intended.'

DR. GRIFFIN, President of Williams College. 'The Comprehensive Commentary appears to be on a plan better than any other which I have seen, and, judging from a short examination, and from the strong testimony of the ministers of Boston and vicinity, I have no doubt the execution is as good as the design.'

DR. HAWES, Hartford. 'The plan and execution, so far as I have been able to examine, I highly approve. * * * I sincerely hope that the work may have a wide circulation, and anything I can do to aid it, shall be done cheerfully.'

DR. WISNER, Secretary of American Board of Foreign Missions. 'I am exceedingly pleased with the volume published of the Comprehensive Commentary. I have all along had strong confidence that it would be well done, but my expectations are more than realized.'

DR. MATTHEWS, Chancellor of New York city University. 'I had expected that the Comprehensive Commentary would be a valuable work; but, judging from the volume on the Gospels, it exceeds my expectations. It gives us Henry nearly at large; and superadds a synopsis of what is important in many of the other most enlightened Commentaries on the Bible. I have no hesitation in saying, that I shall esteem it the most valuable Commentary in our language, should it be finished as it has been commenced.'

New York, Aug. 29, 1834. J. M. MATTHEWS.

DR. BATES, President of Middlebury College. 'I am free to express my entire approbation of the work, both in respect to the editorial labors, and the mechanical execution. Notwithstanding my previous high opinion of the Editor, the present specimen of the work altogether exceeds my high expectations. Most sincerely do I hope that it will obtain an extensive (and I might say universal) circulation through our country and in England. Besides the other qualities which recommend it, it possesses one of great importance to English Literature, viz. that of possessing the same Saxon purity, both as to the choice of words, and to idiomatic arrangement in the Commentary (Henry) as characterises the Text of the Bible, which Fisher Ames used to say had done more to guard against the corrupting influence of foreign words and idioms, and thus to preserve the purity and simplicity of the English language, than all other causes combined.'

From REV. LYMAN BEECHER, D. D. Pres. of Lane Theol. Seminary, Ohio.

'Of evangelical Expositors of the Bible, Henry and Scott are among the best for family use. The Comprehensive Commentary is intended to include, in a condensed form, the excellences of both, with copious explanatory notes from all the best critics and commentators. From what I know personally of the publishers and the editor of the work, and from what I know of its execution, I am persuaded it will meet the expectation of subscribers, and be cheaper and better for Family use than any other; and that it will be a treasure to any family who shall obtain it: and I cordially recommend it for universal family use.' LYMAN BEECHER.

DR. WOODS, Professor of Theology in Andover Seminary. 'I hope it will be extensively circulated, and doubt not that it will be very useful in Bible Classes, as well as in the study of Ministers, and the closets of private Christians.'

REV. ASA CUMMINGS, Editor of Christian Mirror, and author of Memoir of Payson. 'It is with no ordinary degree of pleasure that I can express myself satisfied with the Comprehensive Commentary—it is far superior to what I had dared to expect.'

From the Professors at Princeton Theol. Seminary.

'The Comprehensive Commentary contains the whole of Henry's Exposition in a condensed form, Scott's Practical Observations and Marginal References, and a large number of very valuable philological and critical notes, selected from various authors.—The work as far as it has proceeded appears to be executed with judgment and fidelity and care; and will furnish a rich treasure of scriptural knowledge to the Biblical student, and to the teachers of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes.'

A. ALEXANDER, D. D.
 SAMUEL MILLER, D. D.
 CHARLES HODGE, D. D.

From the Professors at Bangor Theological Seminary, &c.

'This certifies that we have examined to some extent the volume of the Comprehensive Commentary, recently issued from the press; and although, from our knowledge of the design and plan of the publication, and of the qualifications and character of the gentlemen concerned in it, we had no doubt as to its general interest and importance, we must say that our expectations are more than realized. The work is altogether one of great value, and merits the attention and patronage, not only of private Christians, and those concerned in Sabbath Schools, but of the public teachers of religion also.'

AMERICAN QUARTERLY OBSERVER. 'We have looked over the first volume of this long expected work, with great satisfaction. * * * Henry is permitted to speak his own sentiments in his own quaint and admirable manner. The notes are selected with taste and judgment. * * * We are well satisfied that it has been done judiciously and faithfully.'

BOSTON RECORDER. 'We are glad to learn that the publishers have received many names as patrons of the work from various portions of the United States; we think now that they can present a volume liberally "got up" as this is in respect to engravings, paper, printing and binding, and combining so many advantages, their list will receive daily additions, and the cheapness of the work is such that they can only be remunerated from extended sales.'

NEW HAMPSHIRE OBSERVER. 'The excellence of the design is too obvious to be mentioned. To bring together in one work what is most valuable in all our Commentaries, for about the price of one of them, is certainly doing the public a great service. Such a work, tolerably executed, must, we think, take the place of all other Commentaries for general reading.'

NEW YORK OBSERVER. 'Whoever desires to obtain the exposition of Matthew Henry, along with the better part of Scott and Doddridge, and the most valuable criticisms on the English text, of Adam Clarke, Gill, Burder and others, will do well to subscribe for the Comprehensive Commentary. The character of the editor is a sufficient guaranty for the remaining volumes, that neither learning, integrity nor industry, will be wanting to render them worthy of the most extensive patronage.'

NEW YORK EVANGELIST. 'The Editor is well known as a gentleman of extensive learning and deep research, and in this work he has displayed a good judgment in the selection of notes. It is handsomely printed, well bound, and on good paper. We hope the publishers will take special pains to gain the assistance of American ministers. The note from Dr. Wisner, on Luke xxiv. 36—48, is a sample of what might be done by American writers in making portions of Scripture tell upon the christian action of the church. The work has been unusually fortunate in obtaining the commendation of ministers.'

CONN. OBSERVER. Comprehensive Commentary. 'The publishers of the Comprehensive Commentary, seem determined to make it as near perfect as it can be made by care, and labor and expense. It bears examination well, and the attentive reader after a thorough perusal will doubtless assent to the correctness of the remark, that aside from all its other excellences it presents the commentaries on which it is based in a better shape than the originals.'

VERMONT CHRONICLE. 'We have examined parts of it with a good deal of care; and can assure subscribers and others, that the work is in all respects faithfully done. Having taken pains to compare the abridgements of Henry, and the extracts from Scott with the originals, to considerable extent, and looked critically at the notes from other sources, we have no hesitation in saying that, in our opinion, it is very decidedly superior, in many important respects, to any Commentary ever published in this country. The admirers of Henry have the substance of his Commentary faithfully before them, in his own language, and fitted to be more generally useful by the removal of repetitions and other redundances, and the omission of words and phrases that are ill-judged and in bad taste. The selections from Scott and Doddridge have been carefully and judiciously made. The miscellaneous notes from other sources are the result of extensive reading, and furnish a great mass of illustrative facts and hints that can be found together nowhere else. Large libraries, accessible only to the few, have here been laid under contribution for the service of all. The whole has been prepared for popular use, and is conveniently arranged. As to its orthodoxy, and the spirit that it breathes, we need only say that Henry, Scott, and Doddridge, are permitted to speak out their views and feelings fully, and that with these, the other materials are in harmony. The price is very low—so low as to place the work within the means of almost every one. Many thousands of copies of Henry and Scott have been sold among us at a higher price. Can pastors do a better service to the interests of religion, in any similar way, than by exerting themselves to introduce this work among the people of their charge?'

'While the standard Commentaries in our language certainly have great excellences, they also have glaring defects, and it was a good thought to form a commentary which should combine the excellences and exclude the defects of our most approved interpreters of the Bible. Such is the object of the Comprehensive Commentary. The task was certainly a difficult one, and failure would not have been strange. But it has been accomplished thus far, under the auspices of the learned and able editor, in such a way as to realize the expectations of the public. We have no doubt that the best and only way of promoting a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, is for writers to devote themselves to the more careful study of particular books. The whole Bible is too large a field to be successfully cultivated by a single hand, hence we think the labors of Prof. Stuart, Robinson, Bush and others, are far more wisely directed in being employed on particular portions of the sacred Word, than in being extended like those of some others over the whole Bible.

This opinion, however, does not diminish our approbation of the attempt to render the riches of scripture knowledge and particular instruction already existing in the language, more available by the great mass of the community. The one is an effort to elevate the standard of Biblical learning—the other to disseminate the knowledge already accumulated; and for the latter object no work on the Scriptures which we have seen is better calculated than the Comprehensive Commentary.'

From the Portland, (Me.) Christian Mirror, Edited by Rev. Asa Cummings, author of Life of Payson.

'When the first volume of this work made its appearance, we spoke with a measure of caution, as to its merits. From the time of issuing the Prospectus, we have heard good men express fears, that it was to favor a mitigated theology, and weaken the hold of the Churches upon "the faith once delivered to the saints." We of course felt it incumbent on us to wait till we could examine it with some care before expressing a full and decided judgment of its merits. We have accordingly made it a part of the business of every week to consult the Comprehensive Commentary, and the examination has afforded us a degree of satisfaction which we did not anticipate. So far from commending it with reluctance, we feel that we should do wrong to withhold an expression of approbation.—This we give in the language of the Editors of the Protestant Vindicator,—and we could not use stronger.'

NEW YORK PROTESTANT VINDICATOR. 'Having devoted nearly a whole day to a close scrutiny of its contents, we are able to express a decisive opinion respecting its merits and its claims to public patronage. Of the quantity of matter contained in this volume an accurate idea may be formed from one remark. The Commentary of Henry, and the practical observations of Scott, are published nearly entire. The additional notes are selected from a regiment of authors, for we ascertained that there are nearly fifty different writers quoted in the first four chapters only of the gospel by Matthew. The decorations are fine specimens of the artists skill and are judiciously selected. As printers, we pronounce, that the mechanical execution of this volume cannot be surpassed until some additional discovery in the typographical art gives more accuracy of composition and lucidness to ink, for we have not encountered one literal error or a stray "Monk or Friar," through any of the "forms," which we have deliberately perused. These topics, however, although they comprise economy, taste and even the multiplication of books at a price so low that there is not a christian parent in this republic "Glory to God in the highest," who cannot procure them; yet these attractions are "altogether lighter than vanity," when placed in competition with the momentous inquiry,—Does the Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible speak "as the truth is in Jesus?" To this ineffably important inquiry, we give a deliberate answer. As we have already stated we have extensively searched the volume which comprises the four Gospels. We have amply scrutinized its pages in reference to the fundamental doctrines of Christian theology, and our examination has been very gratifying. The passages which we most inquisitively explored included the topics to which the principal modern controversies advert, and especially the cardinal points "of the faith which was once delivered to the saints." We have not stumbled upon a comment that in our opinion is contrary to "that which is noted in the Scriptures of truth."—We therefore, most conscientiously avow our preference of the "Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible," to any others, or rather we say all others.

It must be remembered this is not an ephemeral publication. A sum of money the ordinary interest of which is amply sufficient to support any temperate family in comfort, must be expended and laid up only in the Stereotype plates, which are requisite to complete the work. We have often recommended books to the perusal of our brethren and friends, but never have we performed that duty with such deep solicitude; as we now advise all who duly value the "one pearl of great price," to buy this most "godly pearl."

SALEM, (Mass.) LANDMARK. 'We have no hesitation of giving it as our opinion, that for the greater portion of readers, this work will be more valuable than the separate Commentaries of the various eminent men who have just been named. The most important matter that these severally contain is here collected together, and the reader can be furnished with it without looking through a number of volumes.

There is a rich variety of notes supplying abundant information respecting the geography, and the manners and customs of the country in which the writers of the Bible lived. * * * The Sabbath School teacher will find it an able coadjutor in the instruction of his class.'

CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER. (New York city. From the pen of the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D.) 'The able Editor is the Rev. Dr. Jenks, of Boston; one in whom the evangelical community have full and unshaken confidence. We call the attention particularly of young clergymen, and of all lovers of sound and practical truth, to this great work. Were I again to select my books of this character, and were I to have my choice of this work on the one hand, and of Henry, Scott, and Doddridge, I would decidedly choose this work. Besides the choice being one suggested by economy, which is always something to young clergymen, I should in that case have every leading sentiment and valuable idea of these favorite Commentators set down together on the same page before me, and thereby save much time and trouble in examining each of them apart. I have had this volume under examination for several months, and for one I say deliberately that the more I examine it, the more I am convinced of its intrinsic value and superior excellence. It appears evident to us that the able and truly estimable Editor has faithfully exhibited the doctrinal sentiments of Henry, Scott, and Doddridge. It would be extremely difficult to detect a single omission of any real consequence. And the labor and industry of Dr. Jenks in quoting and culling valuable sentiments from such a host of writers, is really astonishing. The grand and precious doctrines of the gospel are carefully exhibited in this work. And we must add, that we have not yet met with one sentiment which the devout and intelligent Christian who embraces the doctrines in the standard of the Reformed Churches can with any show of justice find fault with. Hence it is a work of exceeding great value to the private Christian, and to the heads of families.

It exhibits a most correct and truly beautiful specimen of printing. * * * Here is an honest appeal to every patriot, who is called on to encourage domestic enterprise, and the arts and manufactures among us; and to every lover of the gospel of Jesus, to patronise the excellent Editor and enterprising publishers, who are undertaking such a laborious work, and embarking such immense capital in the laudable endeavor to promote evangelical truth and diffuse the knowledge of our Savior throughout the land.

We conclude by earnestly recommending this work to our brethren and friends. It is indeed "a godly pearl," which every devout and good man should seek to possess in his family, for his own benefit and that of his children. W. C. B.'

THE PHILADELPHIAN. (Edited by Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, D. D.) 'The work we confidently expect will be as valuable as any two, if not three, of the Commentaries from which extracts are made, and all, we repeat it, for fifteen dollars. We like the plan and execution of the work.'

'Having so far examined the Comprehensive Commentary now in course of publication by Fessenden & Co., and edited by Rev. Dr. Jenks, as to be satisfied of its great advantages over those of any other work of the kind extant;—in addition to the already copious recommendations, from a large number of highly distinguished clergymen, Presidents of Colleges and other literary gentlemen in the Northern and Middle States, we would cheerfully commend the work to the Southern community as one of great and permanent value—highly worthy the patronage of all—especially heads of Families and Bible Class and Sunday School Teachers; and we cannot but cherish the hope that it will be received with the favor and patronage which its merits deserve, and which are so indispensable to the arduous and expensive enterprise of publishing so extensive and valuable a work.'

From Clergymen in Baltimore.

'I cordially approve of the plan and design of the Comprehensive Commentary, and of the execution of the work, so far as a cursory examination of the volume published qualifies me to judge of it, and I recommend it to the people of my pastoral charge and others, as a work well deserving of their patronage.'

WILLIAM NEVINS,
Pastor of the First Presb. Chh. Baltimore.

'The commentaries intended to be comprised in the work for which you propose to solicit subscribers are too well known and too generally appreciated to require commendation. The plan, as set forth by the prospectus, is a very good one, and if the whole execution proves to be in keeping with the specimen which you have sent me for inspection, the work will well deserve, and I have no doubt will receive, the liberal patronage of the christian community.'

J. JOHNS,
Rector of Christ's Church, Baltimore.

'I entirely concur in the recommendations of the Comprehensive Commentary, given by Drs. Johns and Nevins.'

J. P. K. HENSHAW,
Rector of St. Peter's Church, Baltimore.

'If my opinion is considered of any value by any one, I very readily say, that I should consider the "Comprehensive Commentary," when faithfully completed on the plan laid down in the prospectus, by far the most valuable work of the kind to be found in any language, for the common reader. Matthew Henry is before all men as an expositor, and Dr. Scott's Practical Observations are scarcely equalled; while those two, with Doddridge, are of all doctrinal guides the safest amongst commentators, to say nothing of others. Such a work as the one proposed, if fairly executed upon the basis of the labors of these holy, wise, and I will add learned men, must be above price.'

J. R. BRECKENRIDGE,
Pastor of the York-st. Presb. Church, Baltimore.
From Clergymen in Washington City, D. C.

'To those who are at all acquainted with the character and standing of the distinguished men who have recommended this work, no other recommendation can be necessary. The undersigned fully accords with them in their opinion, and believes that they have not rated its merits too high. To Families, Bible Classes, and Sabbath School Teachers, it must be an invaluable help to the correct understanding of the sacred Scriptures. All, indeed, who wish to have an excellent Commentary on the Bible—even the excellences of the best Commentaries in one single work—will, if possible, possess themselves of this. It is handsomely executed, and offered on very reasonable terms.'

R. POST,
Pastor 1st Pres. Church, Washington City.'

'I cheerfully concur in the views and recommendations expressed above.'

JAMES LOWRIE, D. D.
Pastor F street Church.'

'The high recommendation given to the work above referred to, by the Reverend Gentlemen whose names are well known to the public, induces me to believe that it is entitled to the approbation and patronage of all who are desirous of rightly understanding the Scriptures of Divine Revelation, which are able to make them wise unto salvation.'

WILLIAM HAWLEY,
Rector of St. John's Chh. Washington City.'

'After such an inspection of the first volume of this work as my time has permitted me to make, in the space of three or four days, I freely add my suffrage to that of many others, that it is a publication well worthy the title which it bears. It is "a Comprehensive Commentary." Whoever possesses it, will be able, without reference to other books, to make himself acquainted with the leading opinions of the best and most approved Commentators, both critical and practical, on the four Evangelists. If the subsequent volumes shall be prepared with the same care, judiciousness and talent, which are exhibited in the one already published—and this it seems reasonable to presume—the work will be one of great value to young clergymen, to Sabbath school teachers, and to heads of families; and indeed, to all who love the study of the Bible, not excepting those who are already provided with other expositions of the sacred text.'

ASHBEL GREEN, D. D.
Philadelphia, Nov. 23, 1834.'

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER, Washington City, D. C. 'The first volume of this long expected work is just published in royal octavo, in a very superior style, on a beautiful clear type and fine paper. The price of this valuable work is only three dollars per volume, substantially bound, and a cheaper work has perhaps never issued from the press.'

NORFOLK BEACON. 'An agent of Messrs. Fessenden & Co., Publishers, is now in our town, soliciting subscriptions to a work of manifestly great merit, under the above title. The work is intended to be completed in five volumes, royal octavo, (nearly as large as quarto,) of about 800 pages each, at the low price of $3 per volume, payable on delivery. At least one volume per year will be issued to subscribers, embellished with superb engravings, maps, and other illustrative cuts. We have the first volume before us, which is a beautiful specimen of printing and engraving, and the respectability of the Editor, Rev. Dr. Wm. Jenks, Pastor of Green-street Church, Boston, with the high testimonials in his favor, from distinguished presidents of Colleges, and a number of eminent clergymen, are a strong assurance that there will be no disappointment either in the ability or style of its execution.'

RICHMOND RELIGIOUS TELEGRAPH, Oct. 31, 1834. 'One volume of this work is now before the public, and we doubt not will be highly valued and extensively patronised. The good and handsome style in which the mechanical part is executed, and the moderate terms on which it is offered, strongly commend it to the favor and liberal patronage of the public.'

RICHMOND RELIGIOUS TELEGRAPH, Nov. 6, 1834. The recommendations of many of the most distinguished clergymen in this country, which accompany it, are explicit and ample; and from such examination as we have been able to give the first volume during the week it has been before us, we cannot doubt that it will meet the expectations of the Christian public.

RICHMOND COMPILER. 'We have hastily looked over the first volume of this valuable work, and would call the attention of such of our readers as may desire to possess themselves of the mass of Biblical information which it contains, to a publication having high claims to their notice. The typographical execution, the copper plate and wood cuts, and the general plan of the illustrations, entitle the enterprising publishers to much credit; and the cheapness at which the work is offered to the public will, we are confident, insure it a wide and useful circulation.'

'It really deserves the encouragement of the public. The amount of capital employed in getting up the first volume, and making the necessary arrangements for carrying on the publication, has induced the proprietors to offer it for sale, before the completion of the others, that they may avoid the heavy and ruinous loss of the interest that must accumulate on the sum invested, which would otherwise be kept idle till the whole work was completed and ready for delivery sometime hence. The individual subscriber will be put to little inconvenience from paying the cost of each volume as it is delivered, while the publishers would be subjected to a heavy loss if compelled to wait for the whole till the five volumes were finished.' (It may also be added, in the words of the editor of Zion's Advocate, 'We shall have more leisure, and be more likely to give it a thorough examination, on receiving it in successive volumes,' while the use of the several volumes up to the time of completion, will be worth as much in proportion to the cost, as the whole would be.)

HERALD OF THE TIMES, (North Carolina.) 'We do no more than justice, when we recommend it to our citizens, as a work which cannot but be highly desirable, not only to every Christian reader, but to all others who wish to obtain light and knowledge on the volume of inspiration.'

STATESMAN, (Washington, North Carolina.) 'We are confident it is a work of very great merit, and for beauty of its typography and engravings, surpasses anything we have seen on the same subject. This work is edited by Dr. Wm. Jenks, of Boston, and professedly combines the labors and learning of those great lights in the Christian world, Henry, Clarke, Scott, Lowth, Doddridge, Gill, and others, and will bind up in five volumes of about 800 pages each, in quarto form, embellished with superb engravings, at the astonishing low price of three dollars per volume. The high recommendations of the work by distinguished Clergymen conclusively attest its value.'

THE PRESBYTERIAN, (Philadelphia.) 'We have heard this work highly commended by competent critics. * * * The volume containing the Evangelists has been submitted to us, and we are decidedly of opinion, that if the other volumes are equal to this in point of execution, it will be a work every way worthy of patronage, as comprehending for family use, a larger amount of valuable matter than any Commentary extant. To such as are not furnished, we would recommend an examination of this work, as containing a vast fund of matter, and at a reasonable price.'

PETERSBURG (VIRGINIA) CONSTELLATION. 'The price is low, we think, for the splendid manner in which this edition of the sacred writings is gotten up.'
